for their diet, and to ſpare in them, to come honorablie armed to the fielde, for defence of their contrie. Thereuppon, if you had looked into the goldeſmithes ſhoppes, ye ſhould haue ſeene nothinge elſe in their handes, but breakinge and batteringe of pottes of golde and ſil- C uer, to be caſt and molton downe againe, and then gildinge of armors and targettes, and ſiluering of bittes. In the ſhowe places for the runninge of horſes, there was mannedging and breakinge of younge horſes, and younge men exerciſinge armes. Womens handes alſo were full of morryans and heade peeces, whereto they tyed goodly braue plumes of feathers of ſundry colours, and were alſo full of imbrodered arminge coates and caſſockes, with curious and very riche workes. The ſight of which brauerie did heaue vppe their hartes, and made them gallant and liuely: ſo as enuy bred ſtraight in them who ſhoulde doe beſt ſeruice, and no way ſpare for the warres. In deede, ſumptuouſneſſe and brauerie in other ſightes, doth ſe-cretely cary mens mindes away, and allure them to ſeeke after vanities, which makes them tender bodied, and womaniſhe perſones: bicauſe this ſweete ticklinge, and intiſinge of the outwarde ſence that is delighted therewith, doth ſtraight melt and ſoften the ſtrength and D corage of the minde. But againe, the ſumptuous coſt beſtowed apon warlike furniture, doth incorage and make great a noble harte. Euen as Homer ſayeth it did Achilles, when his mother brought him newe armor and weapons, ſhe hadde cauſed Vulcan to make for him, and layed them at his feete: who ſeeinge them, coulde not tarie, but was ſtraight ſette on fyre with deſire to occupie them. So when Philopœmen hadde brought the youth of ACHAIA to this good paſſe, to come thus brauely armed and furniſhed into the fielde, he beganne then to exerciſe them continuallie in armes: wherein they did not onely ſhewe them ſelues obedient to him, but did moreouer ſtriue one to excell an other, and to doe better then their fellowes. For they liked maruelous well the orderinge of the battell he hadde taught them, bicauſe that ſtandinge ſo cloſe together as they did, they thought ſurely they coulde hard- E ly be ouerthrowen. Thus by continuaunce of time, beinge muche vſed to weare their armor, they founde them a great deale eaſier and lighter then before, beſides the pleaſure they to trye them ſtraight vppon their enemies. Now the ACHAIANS at that time were at warres with Machanidas, the tyranne of LACEDÆMON, who ſought by all deuiſe he coulde with a great armie, to become chiefe Lorde of all the PELOPONNESIANS. When newes was brought that Machanidas was come into the contrie of the MANTINIANS, Philopœmen ſtraight marched towardes him with his army: ſo they mett bothe not farre from the citie of MANTINEA, where by and by they put them ſelues in order of battell. They both hadde entertayned in paye a great number of ſtraungers to ſerue them, beſides the whole force F of their contrie: and when they came to ioyne battell, Machanidas with his ſtraungers gaue ſuch a luſtie charge vppon certaine ſlinges and archers being the forlorne hope whome

Philopœmen

A Philopœmen had cast of before the battell of the ACHAIANS to beginne the skirmishe, that he ouerthrew them,& made them flie withal. But where he should haue gone on directly against the ACHAIANS that were ranged in battell ray, to haue proued if he could haue broken them: he was very busie, and earnest still, to follow the chase of them that first fled, and so came hard by the ACHAIANS that stoode still in their battel, and kept their ranckes. This great ouerthrow fortuning at the beginning, many men thought the ACHAIANS were but cast away. But Philopœmen made as though it had bene nothinge, and that he set light by it, and spying the great fault his enemies made, following the forlorne hope on the spurre, whom they had ouerthrowen, and straying so farre from the battell of their footemen, whome they had left naked, and the field open apon them: he did not make towardes them to stay them, nor did striue to stop B thē that they should not follow those that fled, but suffered thē to take their course. And when he saw that they were gone a good way from their footemen, he made his men marche apon the LACEDÆMONIANS, whose sides were naked, hauing no horsemen to gard them: and so did set vpon them on the one side, and ranne so hastely on them to winne one of their flancks, that he made them flie, and slue withall a great number of them. For it is said, there were foure thousand LACEDÆMONIANS slaine in the field, bicause they had no man to leade them: and moreouer, they say they did not looke to fight, but supposed rather they had wonne the fielde, whē they saw Machanidas chasing stil those vpon the spurre, whom he had ouerthrowē. After this, Philopœmen retyred to mete Machanidas, who came backe from the chase with his straungers. But by chaunce there was a great broade ditch betwene them, so as both of them rode v- C pon the banckes sides of the same, a great while together, one against an other of them: thone side seking some conuenient place to get ouer and flie, & the other side seking meanes to kepe them from starting away. So, to see the one before the other in this sorte, it appeared as they had bene wild beastes brought to an extreamity, to defend them selues by force, from so fierce a hunter as Philopœmen was. But whilest they were striuing thus, the tyrans horse that was lusty and coragious, and felt the force of his masters spurres pricking in his sides, that the blood followed after, did venter to leape the ditche, comminge to the banckes side, stoode apon his hindemost legges, and aduaunced forward with his foremost feete, to reach to the other side. Then Simmias and Polyænus, who were about Philopœmen when he fought, ran thither straight to kepe him in with their bore staues that he should not leape the ditche. But Philopœmen who D was there before thē, perceiuing that the tyrans horse by lifting vp his head so high, did couer all his maisters body: forsooke by and by his horse, and tooke his speare in both his hands, and thrust at the tyran with so good a will, that he slue him in the ditch. In memory whereof, the ACHAIANS that did highly esteeme this valliant acte of his, and his wisedome also in leadinge of the battell: did set vp his image in brasse, in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, in the forme he slue the tyran. They say, that at the assembly of the common games called Nemea, (which they solemnise in honor of Hercules, not farre from the citie of ARGOS) and not long after he had wonne this battell of MANTINEA, being made Generall the seconde time of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, and beinge at good leasure also by reason of the feast: he first shewed all the GREECIANS that were come thither to see the games and pastimes, his army raunging in or- E der of battell, and made them see how easily they remoued their places euery way, as necessity and occasion of fight required, without troublinge or confoundinge their ranckes, and that with a maruelous force & redines. When he had done this, he went into the Theater to heare the musitians play, and sing to their instrumentes, who should winne the best game, being accompanied with lusty young gentlemen apparrelled in purple clokes, and in skarlet coates & cassockes they ware apon their armor, being all in the flower of their youth, and well giuen & disposed: who did greatly honor & reuerence their Captaine, & besides that, shewed thē selues inwardly of noble hartes, being incoraged by many notable battells they had fought, in which they had euer attained the victory, & gotten the vpper hand of their enemies. And by chaūce, as they were entred into the Theater, Pylades the musitian, singinge certaine poemes of Timotheus, called the Perses, fell into these verses. F

Philopœmen slue Machanidas.

When he had ſweetely ſong out alowde theſe noble verſes, paſſingly well made: the whole A aſſembly of the GREECIANS in the Theater, that were gathered thither to ſee the games, caſt all their eyes ſtraight vpon Philopœmen, and clapped their handes one to an other for ioy, bicauſe of the great hope they had in him, that through him they ſhoulde ſoone recouer their auncient reputacion, and ſo imagined they poſſeſſed already the noble and worthy mindes of their aunceſters. And as younge horſe that doe alwayes looke to be ridden by their ordinarie riders, if any ſtraunger get vp on their backes, do ſtraight waxe ſtraunge to be handeled, and make great a do: euen ſo, when the ACHAIANS came to any daungerous battell, their hartes were euen done, if they had any other Generall or leader then Philopœmen, on whom ſtill they depended and looked. And when they ſawe him euer, the whole army reioyced, and deſired ſtraight to be at it, they had ſuch confidence in his valliantneſſe and good fortune: and truely B not without cauſe. For of all men, their enemies did feare him moſt, and durſt not ſtande before him: bicauſe they were afrayed to heare his name only, as it ſeemed by their doings. For Philip kinge of MACEDON, imagining that if he could finde meanes to diſpatche Philopœmen out of the way, howſoeuer it were, the ACHAIANS would ſtraight take parte againe with him: ſent men ſecretly into the city of ARGOS, to kill him by treaſon. Howbeit the practiſe was diſcouered, and the king euer after was mortally hated of all the GREECIANS generally, and taken for a cowardly and wicked Prince. It fortuned one day when the BOEOTIANS layed ſiege to the city of MEGARA, and thought certainly to haue wonne it at the firſt aſſault: there roſe a rumor ſodainely amongeſt them, that Philopœmen came to aide the city, and was not farre from it with his army. But it was a falſe reporte. Notwithſtandinge, the BOEOTIANS were ſo C ſcared, that for feare they left their ſcaling ladders behinde them, which they had ſet againſt the walls to haue ſcaled the towne, and fled ſtraight to ſaue them ſelues. An other time, when Nabis the tyran of LACEDÆMON, that ſucceeded Machanidas, had taken the city of MESSINA vppon the ſodaine: Philopœmen being then a priuate man, and hauinge no charge of ſouldiers, went vnto Lyſippus, General of the ACHAIANS that yere, to perſwade him that he would ſend preſent aide vnto them of MESSINA. Lyſippus told him, it was to late now to goe thither, and that it was but a loſt towne, not to be holpen: conſidering the enemies were in it already. Philopœmen perceiuing he could not procure him to go, went thither him ſelfe with the force of MESSINA only, not ſtaying for the aſſembly of the MEGALOPOLITANS, that were in coũſell about it, to giue him commiſſion by voyces of the people to take them with him: but they D all willingly followed him, as if he had bene their continuall Generall, and the man that by nature was worthieſt of all other to commaunde them. Now when he came neere vnto MESSINA, Nabis hearinge of his comminge, durſt not tary him, though he had his army within the city, but ſtale out at an other gate, and marched away in all the haſt he could, thinking him ſelfe a happy man and he could ſo eſcape his handes, and retyre with ſafety, as in dede he did. And thus was MESSINA, by his meanes, deliuered frõ captiuity. All that we haue written hitherto concerning Philopœmen, falleth out doutleſſe to his great honor and glory: but afterwardes he was greatly diſpraiſed for a iorney he made into CRETA, at the requeſt of the GORTYNIANS, who ſent to pray him to be their Captaine, being ſore troubled with warres at that time. Bicauſe Philopœmen went then to ſerue the GORTYNIANS, when the tyranne Nabis had B greateſt warres with the MEGALOPOLITANS, in their owne contry: they laid it to his charge, either that he did it to flie the warres, or elſe that he ſought honor out of ſeaſon with foreine nations, when his poore citizens the MEGALOPOLITANS were in ſuch diſtreſſe, that their contry being loſt and deſtroyed, they were driuen to keepe them within their city, and to ſow all their voide grounds and ſtreetes in the ſame with corne, to ſuſteine them withall, when their enemies were encamped almoſt hard at their towne gates. And the rather, bicauſe him ſelfe making warres with the CRETANS, and ſeruing ſtraungers beyonde the ſea in the meane time, gaue his enemyes occaſion to ſlaunder him that he fled, that he would not tary to fight for defence of his contry. Againe, there were that ſayd, bicauſe the ACHAIANS did chooſe other for their Generall, that he being a priuate man and without charge, was the rather con- F tented to be Generall of the GORTYNIANS, who had maruelouſly intreated him to take the charge: for he was a man that coulde not abide to liue idlely, and that deſired ſpecially aboue all

A all things to ſerue continually in the warres, and to put in practiſe his skil and diſcipline in the leading of an army. The wordes he ſpake one day of king Ptolomie doth witneſſe as much. For when there were ſome that praiſed king Ptolomie highly, ſaying that he trained his army well, and that he ſtill continued his perſone in exerciſe of armes: It is not commendable for a king (ſayd he) of his yeares, to delite in traininge his men to exerciſe armes, but to doe ſome acte him ſelfe in perſone. Well, in the ende, the MEGALOPOLITANS tooke his abſcence in ſuch euill parte, that they thought it a peece of treaſon, and would needes haue baniſhed him, and put him from the freedome of the citie: had not the ACHAIANS ſent their Generall Ariſtænetus vnto them, who would not ſuffer the ſentence of baniſhment to paſſe againſt him, although otherwiſe there was euer contention betwene them about matters of the common

B wealth. Afterwards, Philopœmen perceiuing his contrymen made no more accompt of him, to ſpight them withall, he made diuerſe ſmall villages and cities rebell againſt them, & taught them to ſay, & to giue it out, that they were not their ſubiects, neither payed them tribute from the beginning: and he made them ſtande to it openly, and maintaine their ſedition againſt the city of MEGALIPOLIS, before the councell of the ACHAIANS. Theſe things happened ſhortly after. But whileſt he made warres in CRETA for the GORTYNIANS, he ſhewed not himſelf a PELOPONNESIAN, nor like a man borne in ARCADIA, to make plaine & open warres: but he had learned the maner of the CRETANS, to vſe their owne policies, fine deuiſes, & ambuſhes againſt them ſelues. And made them know alſo, that all their crafts, were but childiſh ſportes as it were: in reſpect of thoſe that were deuiſed, and put in execution, by a wiſe experienced

C Captaine, and skilfull to fight a battell. So, Philopœmen hauing wonne great fame by his actes done in CRETA, returned againe to PELOPONNESVS, where he founde, that Philip kinge of MACEDON had bene ouercome in battell, by Titus Quintius Flaminius: and that the ACHAIANS ioyning with the ROMAINES, did make warre againſt the tyran Nabis, againſt whome he was made Generall immediatly vpon his returne, and gaue him battell by ſea. In the which it ſeemed he fell into like misfortune, as Epaminondas did: the euent of this battell ſallinge out much worſe with him, then was looked for, in reſpect of his former corage and valliantneſſe. But as for Epaminondas, ſome ſay he returned willingly out of ASIA, and the Iles, without any exployte done, bicauſe he would not haue his contrymen fleſhed with ſpoyle by ſea, as fearing leaſt of valliant ſouldiers by lande, they would by litle and litle (as Plato ſayd) become diſſolute

D mariners by ſea. But Philopœmen contrariwiſe, preſuming vpon the skill he had to ſet the battell in good order by lande, woulde needes take vppon him to do the ſame by ſea. But he was taught to his coſt to knowe what exerciſe and experience ment, and howe ſtronge it maketh them that are practiſed in thinges. For he loſt not onely the battell by ſea, beinge vnskilfull of that ſeruice: but he committed beſides a fowler errour. For that he cauſed an old ſhippe to be rigged, which had bene very good of ſeruice before, but not occupied in forty yeares together, and imbarked his contrymen into the ſame, which were all likely to periſh, bicauſe the ſhippe had diuerſe leakes, by fault of good calking. This ouerthrow made his enemies deſpiſe him vterly, who perſwaded them ſelues he was fled for altogether, and had giuen them ſea roome: whereupon they layed ſiege to the citie of GYTHIVM. Philopœmen beinge aduertiſed thereof,

E imbarked his men ſodainely, and ſet vpon his enemies ere they wiſt it, or had any thought of his comming: and founde them ſtraggling vp and downe, without watch or garde, by reaſon of the victory they had lately wonne. So he landed his men cloſely by night, and went and ſet fyre vppon his enemies campe, and burnt it euery whitte: and in this feare and hurly burly, ſlue a great number of them. Shortely after this ſtealing apon them, the tyran Nabis alſo ſtole apon him againe vnwares, as he was to goe through a maruelous ill and daungerous way. Which made the ACHAIANS amazed at the firſt, thinkinge it vnpoſſible for them that they could euer ſcape that daunger, conſidering their enemies kept all the wayes thereabouts. But Philopœmen bethinking him ſelfe, and conſidering the nature & ſcituacion of the place: after he had viewed it well, he ſhewed them plainly then, that the chiefeſt point of a good ſouldier,

F and man of warre, was to know how to put an army in battell, accordinge to the time and ſcituacion of the place. For he did but alter the forme of his battell a litle, and ſorted it according to the ſcituacion of the place, wherein he was compaſſed: and by doinge this without trouble or busines, he tooke away all feare of daunger, and gaue a charge vpon his enemies in such fierce wise, that in a shorte time he put thē all to flight. And when he perceiued that they did not flie all in troupes together towardes the city, but scatteringwise, abroade in the fieldes in euery place: he caused the trompet to sound the retreate. Then he commaunded the chase to be followed no further, for that all the contry thereabout was full of thicke woddes and groues, very ill for horsemen: and also bicause there were many brookes, vallies, and quauemyres which they should passe ouer, he encamped him selfe presently, being yet broade day. And so, fearinge least his enemies would in the night time draw vnto the city, one after an other, and by couples: he sent a great number of ACHAIANS, & laid them in ambush amongest the brookes and hilles neere about it, which made great slaughter of Nabis souldiers, bicause they came not altogether in troupes, but scatteringly one after an other as they fled, one here, an other there, and so fell into their enemies handes, as birdes into the fowlers net. These acts made Philopæmen singularly beloued of the GREECIANS, and they did him great honor in all their Theaters and common assemblies. Whereat Titus Quintius Flaminius, of nature very ambitious, and couetous of honor: did much repine, and was enuious at the matter, thinking that a Consul of ROME should haue place & honor amongest the ACHAIANS, before a meane gentleman of ARCADIA. And he imagined he had deserued better of all GREECE, then Philopæmen had: considering, howe by the onely proclamation of an heraulde, he had restored GREECE againe to her auncient liberty, which before his comminge was subiect vnto kinge Philip, and vnto the MACEDONIANS. Afterwardes, Titus Quintius made peace with the tyran Nabis. Nabis was shortely after very traiterously slaine by the ÆTOLIANS. Whereuppon the citie of SPARTA grew to a tumult, and Philopæmen straight taking the occasion, went thither with his army, and handeled the matter so wisely: that partely for loue, and partely by force, he wanne the city, & ioyned it vnto the tribe of the ACHAIANS. So was he maruelously commended and esteemed of the ACHAIANS for this notable victory, to haue wonne their tribe and communalty so famous a city, and of so great estimacion. For the city of SPARTA was no smale encrease of their power, and being ioyned as a member of ACHAIA. Moreouer he wan by this meanes, the loue and good will of all the honest men of LACEDÆMON, of the hope they had to finde him a protector and defender of their liberty. Wherefore, when the tyran Nabis house and goodes were solde, as forfitted to the state: they resolued in their counsell to make him a present of the money therof, which amounted to the summe of sixe score talents, and sent Ambassadors purposely vnto him, to offer it him. Then Philopæmen shewed himselfe plainely to be no counterfeate honest man, but a good man in deede. For first of all, there was not one of all the LACEDÆMONIANS that durst presume to offer him this money, but euery man was afrayed to tell him of it: and euery body that was appointed to do it, made some excuse or other for them selues. Notwithstandinge, in the ende they made one Timolaus to take the matter vpon him, who was his familiar frend, and also his hoste. And yet the same Timolaus when he came vnto MEGALIPOLIS, & was lodged & entertained in Philopæmenes house, did so much reuerence him for his wise talke and conuersation, for his moderate diet, and iust dealing with all men: that he sawe there was no likely possibility to corrupt him with money, so as he durst not once open his mouth to speake to him of the present he had brought him, but founde some other occasion to excuse the cause of his comminge vnto him. And beinge sent vnto him againe the second time, he did euen as much as at the first time. And making a third proofe, he ventured at the last to open the matter vnto him, and told him the good will the city of SPARTA did beare him. Philopæmen became a glad man to heare it: and when he had heard all he had to say to him, he went him selfe vnto the citie of SPARTA. There he declared vnto the counsell, that it was not honest men, and their good frends, they should seeke to winne and corrupt with money, considering they might commaund their vertue vpon any occasion, without cost vnto them: but that they should seeke to bribe naughty men with money, and such as by seditious orations in counsell did mutine, and put a whole citie in vprore: to the ende that hauing their mouthes stopped with giftes, they should trouble them the lesse in the common wealth. For, said he, it is more necessarie to stoppe your enemies mouthes, and to sowe vp their lippes from libertie of speaking: then it is to keepe your frendes from it.

So

A So noble a man was Philopœmen against all couetousnesse of money. Shortely after, the LACEDÆMONIANS beginning to stirre againe, Diophanes (who was then General of the ACHAIANS) beinge aduertised of it, beganne to prepare to punish them. The LACEDÆMONIANS on the other side preparinge for the warres, did set all the contry of PELOPONNESVS in armes. Hereupon Philopœmen sought to pacifie Diophanes anger, declaring vnto him, that king Antiochus, and the ROMAINES, being at warres together at that present time, and they both hauing puisant armies one against an other in the middest of GREECE: it was meete for a good Generall and wise gouernor, to haue an eye to their doings, to be carefull of the same, and to beware that he did not trouble or alter any thinge within his contry at that instant, but then rather to dissemble it, and not to seeme to heare any fault whatsoeuer they did. Diophanes would

B not be perswaded, but entred the territories of LACEDÆMON with a great army, and Titus Quintius Flaminius with him: and they together marched directly towardes the city of SPARTA. Philopœmen was so madde with their doings, that he tooke apon him an enterprise not very lawfull, nor altogether iust: neuertheless, his attempt proceeded of a noble minde, and great corage. For he got into the citie of SPARTA, and beinge but a priuate persone, kept out the General of the ACHAIANS, & the Consull of the ROMAINES for entring the city: & when he had pacified all troubles and seditions in the same, he deliuered it vp againe as it was before, into the handes of the communaltie of the ACHAIANS. Neuertheless, him selfe being afterwardes Generall of the ACHAIANS, did compell the LACEDÆMONIANS to receiue those home againe whom they had banished for certaine faultes, and did put foure score naturall Philopœmenes cruelty to the Spartans.

C borne citizens of SPARTA vnto death, as Polybius wryteth. Or three hundred and fifty, as Aristocrates an other historiographer reciteth. Then he pulled downe the walles of the city, and rased them to the grounde, and tooke away the most parte of their territories, and gaue them to the MEGALOPOLITANS. All those whome the tyrannes had made free denizens of SPARTA, he compelled them to departe the contry of LACEDÆMON, and forced them to dwell in ACHAIA, three thousand only excepted, who would not obey his commaundement: all those he solde for slaues, and with the money he made of them (to spight them the more) he built a goodly fayer walke within the citie of MEGALIPOLIS. Yet furthermore, to do the LACEDÆMONIANS all the mischiefe he coulde, and as it were, to treade them vnder the feete in their most grieuous misery: he did a most cruell and vniust acte towarde them. For he compelled Philopœmen made the Spartans forsake Lycurgus law.

D them to leaue the discipline and maner of education of their children, which Lycurgus had of olde time instituted: and made them to follow the maner the ACHAIANS vsed, in liew of their olde grounded contry custome, bicause he sawe they would neuer be humble minded, so long as they kept Lycurgus order and institucion. Thus were they driuen to put the heades in the choller, by the miserable mishappe that befell them: and in all despight, to suffer Philopœmen in this maner to cut a sunder (as it were) the sinewes of their common wealth. But afterwardes they made sute to the ROMAINES, that they might be suffered to enioy their auncient discipline againe, which being graunted them, they straight left the maner of the ACHAIANS, and did set vp againe as much as was possible (after so great miserie and corruption of their maners) their olde auncient customes and orders of their contry. Now about the time the warres

E beganne in GREECE, betwene the ROMAINES and king Antiochus, Philopœmen was then a priuate man, and without any authority. He seeinge that kinge Antiochus lay still in the citie of CHALCIS, and did nothing but feast and loue, and had maried a younge maide farre vnmeete for his yeres: and perceiuing that his SYRIAN souldiers wandered vp and downe the townes in great disorder, playing many lewde partes without guide of Captaines: he was very sory he was not at that time Generall of the ACHAIANS, and tolde the ROMAINES, that he enuied their victory, hauing warres with enemies that were so easily to be ouercome. For (sayd he) if fortune fauored me that I were Generall of the ACHAIANS at this present, I woulde haue killed them euery man in the cellers and tippling houses. Now when the ROMAINES had ouercome Antiochus, they beganne to haue surer footing in GREECE: and to compasse in the Aagainſt the ROMAINES, and did withſtande them in the moſt parte of their proceedinges, by ſeeking euer to defend the liberty of thoſe, who by their eloquence & well doing caried great authority among the ACHAIANS. And when Ariſtænetus MEGALOPOLITAN, (a man of great authority among the ACHAIANS, and one that euer bare great deuotion to the ROMAINES) ſayd in open Senate among the ACHAIANS, that they ſhould deny the ROMAINES nothinge, nor ſhew them ſelues vnthankefull to them: Philopæmen hearing what he ſayd, held his peace a while, and ſuffered him to ſpeake (though it boyled in his hart, he was ſo angry with him) and in the ende, breaking all pacience, and as one ouercome with choller, he ſayd. O Ariſte- B netus, why haue you ſuch haſt to ſee the vnfortunate ende of GREECE? An other time, when Manius, Conſull of ROME (after he had conquered king Antiochus) did make requeſt to the counſell of the ACHAIANS, that ſuch as were baniſhed from LACEDÆMON, might returne home into their contry againe, and that Titus Quintius Flaminius alſo did earneſtly intreate them: Philopæmen was againſt it, not for any hatred he bare vnto the baniſhed men, but bicauſe he would haue done it by his owne meane, and the only grace of the ACHAIANS, to the ende they ſhuld not be beholding for ſo good a turne, neither vnto Titus, nor yet to the ROMAINES.

Afterwardes he him ſelfe, being Generall of the ACHAIANS, did reſtore them wholly to their owne againe. Thus was Philopæmen ſomtime, a litle to bolde and quarrellous, by reaſon of his great ſtomake: and ſpecially when any man of authority ſought for to haue thinges. Laſtely, C beinge three ſcore and tenne yeares of age, he was the eight time choſen Generall of the A-CHAIANS, and hoped well, not only to paſſe the yeare of his chrage in peace and quietnes, but alſo all the reſt of his life without any ſturre of new warres, he ſaw the affaires of GREECE take ſo good ſucceſſe. For like as the force & ſtrength of ſickenes declineth, as the natural ſtrength of the ſickely body empaireth: ſo through all the cities and people of GREECE, enuy of quar-rell and warres ſurceaſed, as their power diminiſhed. Neuertheleſſe, in the end of his yeares gouernment, the goddes diuine (who iuſtly puniſh all inſolent wordes and deedes) threw him to the grounde, as they ſuffer a ryder vnfortunately to take a fall of his horſe, beinge come almoſt to the ende of his cariere. For they wryte, thar he beinge in a place on a time amongeſt good companie, where one was maruelouſly praiſed for a good Captaine, ſayed vnto them: D why, maſters, can ye commende him that was contented to be taken priſoner aliue of his enemies? Shortely after came newes that Dinocrates MESSENIAN (a priuate enemy of Philopæ- menes for certaine controuerſies paſt betwene them, and a man generally hated beſides, of all honorable and vertuous men, for his licentious wicked life) had withdrawen the city of MES-SINA from the deuotion of the ACHAIANS: and moreouer that he came with an army to take a towne called COLONIDE. Philopæmen was at that time in the city of ARGOS, ſicke of an a-gew, and yet hearing theſe newes, tooke his iorney toward MEGALIPOLIS, making al the haſt he could poſſible, ſo that he came aboue foure hundred furlongs that day. Straight he departed thence toward MESSINA, and taried not, but tooke with him a company of men at armes of the luſtieſt and wealthieſt MEGALOPOLITANS: who were all young noble men of the ci- E ty, and willingly offered them ſelues to goe with him for the goodwill they bare him, and for the deſire they had to follow his valliantnes. Thus went they on their way towards the city of MESSINA, and marched ſo longe, that they came nere vnto the hill of Euander, where they met with Dinocrates & his cõpany, & gaue ſo fierce an onſet on them, that they made them all turne taile: howbeit in the meane while, there came a reliefe of fiue hũdred men to Dinocrates, which he had left to keepe the contry of MESSINA. The flying men that were ſcattered here & there, ſeeing this ſupply, gathered them ſelues againe together, and ſhewed vpon the hills.
Philopæmen fearinge to be enuironned, and being deſirous to bring his men ſafe home againe, who moſt of loue had followed him: beganne to marche away through narrow buſhy places, him ſelfe being in the rereward, and turned oftentimes vpon his enemies, & skirmiſhed with F them, onely to driue them away from followinge of the reſt of his company, and not a man that durſt once ſet apon him: for they did but cry out aloofe, and wheele as it were about him.

How-

A Howebeit Philopœmen ſundry times venturinge farre from his company, to geue theſe young noble men leaſure to ſaue them ſelues one after an other: tooke no heede to him ſelfe that he was alone, enuironned on euery ſide with a great number of ennemies. Notwithſtandinge, of all his enemies there was not a man that durſt come to hande ſtrokes with him, but ſtill ſlinging and ſhooting at him a farre of, they draue him in the end amongeſt ſtony places betwene hewen rockes, where he had much a doe to guide his horſe, although he had ſpurred him that he was all of a gore blood. And as for his age, that did not lette him but he might haue ſaued him ſelfe, for he was ſtrong and luſty by the continuall exerciſe he tooke: but by curſed happe, his body being weake with ſickenes, and weary with the long iorney he had made that day, he founde him ſelfe very heauy and ill diſpoſed, that his horſe ſtumbling with him, threwe
B him to the grounde. His fall was very great, and bruſed all his head, that he lay for dead in the place a great while, and neuer ſturred nor ſpake: ſo that his enemies thinkinge he had bene dead, came to turne his body to ſtrippe him. But when they ſaw him lift vp his head and open his eyes, then many of them fell all at once apon him, and tooke him, and bounde both his hands behinde him, and did all the villany and miſchiefe they could vnto him, and ſuch, as one would litle haue thought Dinocrates would haue vſed in that ſorte, or that he could haue had ſuch an ill thought towardes him. So, they that taried behinde in the city of MESSINA, were maruelous glad when they heard theſe newes, and ranne all to the gates of the city to ſee him brought in. When they ſaw him thus ſhamefully bounde, and pinnioned, againſt the dignity of ſo many honors as he had receiued, and of ſo many triumphes and victories as he had paſ-
C ſed: the moſt parte of them wept for pitie, to conſider the mishappe and ill fortune of mans nature, where there is ſo litle certainety, as in maner it is nothing. Then beganne there ſome curteous ſpeeche to runne in the mouthes of the people by litle and litle, that they ſhould remember the great good he had done vnto them in times paſt, and the liberty he had reſtored them vnto, when he expulſed the tyran Nabis out of MESSINA. But there were other againe (howbeit very few) that to pleaſe Dinocrates, ſayed they ſhould hang him on a gibbet, and put him to death as a daungerous enemy, and that would neuer forgiue man that had once offended him: and the rather, bicauſe he would be more terrible to Dinocrates, then euer he was before, if he eſcaped his hands, receiuing ſuch open ſhame by him. Neuertheles, in the end they caried him into a certen dungeon vnder the ground, called the treaſury, (which had neither D light nor ayer at all into it, nor dore, nor half dore, but a great ſtone rolled on the mouth of the dungeon) and ſo they did let him downe the ſame, and ſtopped the hole againe with the ſtone, and watched it with armed men for to keepe him. Now when theſe younge noble ACHAIAN horſemen had fled vppon the ſpurre a great way from the enemy, they remembred them ſelues, & looked round about for Philopœmen: & finding him not in fight, they ſuppoſed ſtraight he had bene ſlaine. Thereuppon they ſtayed a great while, and called for him by name, and perceiuing he aunſwered not, they beganne to ſay among them ſelues, they were beaſtes and cowardes to flie in that ſorte: and how they were diſhonored for euer ſo to haue forſaken their Captaine, to ſaue themſelues, who had not ſpared his owne life, to deliuer them from daunger. Hereupon ryding on their way, and enquiring ſtill for him: they were in the end aduerti-
E ſed how he was taken. And then they went & caried thoſe newes through all the townes and cities of ACHAIA, which were very ſory for him, and tooke it as a ſigne of great ill fortune toward them. Wherupon they agreed to ſend Ambaſſadors forthwith to the MESSENIANS, to demaunde him: and in the meane time euery man ſhould prepare to arme them ſelues, to go thither, and get him either by force or loue. When the ACHAIANS had thus ſent, Dinocrates feared nothing ſo much, as that delay of time might ſaue Philopœmenes life: wherefore to preuent it, as ſoone as night came, and that the people were at reſt, he ſtraight cauſed the ſtone to be rolled from the mouth of the dungeon, and willed the hangman to be let downe to Philopœmen with a cuppe of poiſon to offer him, who was commaunded alſo not to goe from him, F vntill he had dronke it. When the hangman was come downe, he found Philopœmen layed on the grounde apon a litle cloke, hauinge no liſt to ſleepe, he was ſo grieuouſly troubled in his minde. Who when he ſawe light, and the man ſtanding by him, holding a cuppe in his hande with this poiſon, he ſate vpright vpon his cowch, howbeit with great paine he was ſo weake:

and taking the cuppe in his hande, asked the hangman if he heard any newes of the horsemen A that came with him, and specially of Lycortas. The hangman made him answer, that the most of them were saued. Then he cast his handes a litle ouer his head, and looking merely on him selfe: and so did all the rest make themselues away, who gaue aduise that Philopœmen should be put to death. But those that would haue had Philopœmen hanged on a gibbet, Lycortas caused thẽ to be taken, which afterwards were put to death with all kind of tormẽts. That done, they

MESSINA, not in disorder, one apon an others necke as euery man listed: but in such an order and ray, that in the middest of these funeralles they did make a triumphe of victorie. For the souldiers were all crowned with garlandes of lawrell in token of victory, notwithstanding, the C teares ranne downe their cheekes in token of sorowe, and they led their enemies prisoners, shackled and chained. The funerall pot in the which were Philopœmenes ashes, was so couered with garlandes of flowers, nosegaies, and laces, that it could scant be seene or discerned, and was caried by one Polybius a young man, the sonne of Lycortas, that was Generall at that time to the ACHAIANS: about whom there marched all the noblest and chiefest of the ACHAIANS, and after them also followed all the souldiers armed, and their horses very well furnished. The rest, they were not so sorowfull in their countenance, as they are commonly which haue great cause of sorow; nor yet so ioyful, as those that came conquerers from so great a victory. Those of the cities, townes, and villages in their way as they past, came and presented them selues vnto them, to touche the funerall pot of his ashes, euen as they were wont to take him by the D hande, and to make much of him when he was returned from the warres: and did accompany his conuoy vnto the city of MEGALIPOLIS. At the gates whereof, were olde men, women, and children, which thrustinge them selues amongest the souldiers, did renewe the teares, sorowes, and lamentacions of all the miserable and vnfortunate city: who tooke it that they had lost with their citizen, the first and chiefest place of honor among the ACHAIANS. So he was buried very honorably as appertained vnto him: and the other prisoners of MESSINA, were all stoned to death, about his sepulchre. All the other cities of ACHAIA, besides many other honors they did vnto him, did set vp statues, and as like to him, as could be counterfeated. Afterwards in the vnfortunate time of GREECE, when the city of CORINTHE was burnt and destroied by the ROMAINES, there was a malicious ROMAINE that did what he could to haue the E same pulled downe againe, by burdening & accusing Philopœmen (as if he had bene aliue) that he was alwaies enemy to the ROMAINES, and enuied much their prosperity and victories. But after Polybius had aunswered him: neither the Consul Mummius, nor his counsellers, nor lieu-

& worthy a mã, although he had many waies done much hurt vnto Titus Quintius Flaminius, & C vnto Manius. So, these good men then made a differẽce betwene duety & profit: & did thinke honesty & profit two distinct things, and so separated one from the other, according to reason and iustice. Moreouer they were perswaded, that like as men receiue curtesie and goodnes of any, so are they bound to requite them againe, with kindenes and duety. And as men vse to acknowledge the same: euen so ought men to honor and reuerence vertue. And thus much for F the life of Philopœmen.

The ende of Philopœmenes life.

Titus Quintius Flaminius.

IT is easie to see Titus Quintius Flaminius forme, and ſtature, by Philopœmenes ſtatue of braſſe, to whome we compare him: the which is now ſet vppe at Rome, neere to great Apollo that was brought from Carthage, and is placed right againſt the comming in to the ſhow place, vnder which there is an inſcription in Greeke letters. But for his nature and conditions, they ſay of him thus: he would quickely be angry, and yet very ready to pleaſure men againe. For, if he did puniſh any man that had angered him, he would do it gently, but his anger did not long continew with him. He did good alſo to many, and euer loued them whom he had once pleaſured, as if they had done him ſome pleaſure: & was ready to do for them ſtill whom he founde thankefull, bicauſe he would euer make them beholding to him, and thought that as honorable a thinge, as he could purchaſe to him ſelfe. Bicauſe he greatly ſought honor aboue all thinges, when any notable ſeruice was to be done, he would do it him ſelfe, and no man ſhould take it out of his hand. He would euer be rather with them that needed his helpe, then with thoſe that could helpe him, or do him good. For, the firſt he eſteemed as a meane to exerciſe his vertue with: the other, he tooke them as his fellowes and followers of honor with him. He came to mans ſtate, when the citie of Rome had greateſt warres and trouble. At that time all the youth of Rome, which were of age to cary weapon, were ſent to the warres to learne to traile the pyke, and how to become good Captaines. Thus was he entred into marſhall affaires, and the firſt charge he tooke, was in the warre againſt Hannibal of Carthage, where he was made Colonell of a thouſande footemen, vnder Marcellus the conſull: who being ſlaine by an ambuſh Hannibal had layed for him betwene the cities of Bantia, and Venuſia, then they did chooſe Titus Quintius Flaminius gouernor of the prouince and city of Tarentum, which was now taken againe the ſeconde time. In this gouernment of his, he warine the reputacion as much of a good and iuſt man, as he did of an expert and skilfull Captaine. By reaſon whereof, when the Romaines were requeſted to ſend men to inhabite the cities of Narnia & Coſſa, he was appointed the chiefe leader of them, which chiefely gaue him hart and corage to aſpire at the firſt to the Conſulſhippe, paſſinge ouer all other meane offices, as to be Ædile, Tribune, or Prætor, by which (as by degrees) other younge men were wont to attaine the Consulshippe. Therefore when the time came that the Consulls should be elected, he did present him selfe amonge other, accompanied with a great number of those he hadde brought with him, to inhabite the two newe townes, who did make earnest sute for him. But the two Tribunes Fuluius, and Manlius, spake against him, and sayed: it was out of all reason, that so younge a man should in such manner prease to haue the office of the highest dignitie, against the vse and custome of Rome, before he hadde passed through the inferior offices of the common wealth. Neuertheless, the Senate preferred it wholly to the voyces of the people: who presently pronounced him Consull openly, with Sextius AElius, although he was not yet thirtie yeare olde. Afterwardes,

T. Q. Flaminius, Sextius AElius Consulls.

AElius and he deuidinge the offices of the state by lotte: it fell apon T. Quintius to make warre with Philip kinge of Macedon. In the which me thinkes fortune greatly fauored the Romaines affaires, that made such a man Generall of these warres: for, to haue pointed a Generall that by force and violence woulde haue sought all thinges at the Macedonians handes, that were a people to be wonne rather by gentleneesse and perswasions, then by force & compulsion: it was all against them selues. Philip, to maintaine the bront of a battell against the Romaines, had power enough of his owne in his realme of Macedon: but to make warre any long time, to furnish him selfe with money and vittailes, to haue a place and cities to retyre vnto, and lastly, to haue all other necessaries for his men and army: it stoode him apon to get the force of Greece. And had not the force of Greece bene politickely cut from him, the warres against him had not bene ended with one battell. Moreouer, Greece (which neuer before bare the Romaines any great good will) would not haue delt then so inwardly in frendshippe with them, had not their Generall bene (as he was) a gentle persone, lowly, and tractable, that wanne them more by his wisedome, then by his force, & could both eloquently vtter his minde to them, and curteously also heare them speake, that had to doe with him, and chiefely, ministred iustice and equity to euery man a like. For it is not to be thought that Greece would otherwise so soone haue withdrawen them selues from the rule of those, with whome they were acquainted, and gouerned: and haue put them selues vnder the rule of straungers, but that they saw great iustice and lenity in them. Howbeit that may more plainly appeare, by declaring of his actes. Titus was informed, that the Generalls before him sent to the warre in Macedon (as Sulpitius, and Publius Iulius) vsed to come thither about the later end of the yeare, and made but cold warres, and certaine light skirmishes, as sometime in one place, and sometime in an other against Philip, and all to take some straite, or to cut of vittells: which he thought was not his way to follow their example. For they tarying at home, consumed the most of their Consulshippe at Rome, in matters of gouernment, and so enioyed the honor of their office. Afterwardes in the end of their yeare, they would set out to the warres, of intent to get an other yeare ouer their heades in their office, that spending one yere in their Consulship at home, they might employ the other in the warres abroade. But Titus not minding to trifle out the halfe of his Consulshippe at Rome, and the other abroade in the warres: did willingly leaue all his honors and dignities he might haue enioyed by his office at Rome, and besought the Senate that they would appoint his brother Lucius Quintius Lieutenant of their army by sea. Furthermore, he tooke with him selfe about three thousande olde souldiers of those that had first ouerthrowen Asdrubal in Spayne, & Hannibal afterwardes in Africke, vnder the conduct of Scipio, which yet were able to serue, and were very willinge to goe with him in this iorney, to be the strength of his army. With this companie he passed the seaes without daunger, and landed in Epirvs, where he found Publius Iulius encamped with his army before kinge Philip, who of longe time had lien in campe about the mouth of the riuer of Apsus, to kepe the straight and passage which is the entry into Epirvs. So that Publius Iulius had lien still there, and done nothing, by reason of the naturall force and hardnes of the place. Then Titus tooke the army of him, and sent him to Rome. Afterwards, him selfe went in persone to view and consider the nature of the contry, which was in this sorte. It is a longe valley walled on either side with great high mountaines, as those which shut in the valley of Tempe in Thessalie. Howbeit it had no such goodly woods, nor grene forrests, nor fayer medowes,

Titus curtesie wanne the Greecians more then his force.

T. Q. landed in Epirus. Apsus flu.

The descripsiō of the contry of Epirus.

A nor other like places of pleasure, as the other side had : but it was a great deepe marrishe or quauemyre, through the middest whereof the riuer called Apsus did runne, being in greatnes and swiftnes of streame, very like to the riuer of Peneus. The riuer did occupie all the ground at the feete of the mountaines, sauing a litle way that was cut out of the maine rocke by mans hand, and a narrow straight pathe by the waters side, very vnhandesome for an army to passe that way, though they foūd not a man to keepe the passage. There were some in the army that counselled Titus to fetche a great compasse about by the contry of DASSARETIDE, and by the city of LYNCVS, where the contry is very plaine, and the way maruelous easie. Howebeit he stoode in great feare he should lacke vittells, if he stayed farre from the sea, and happely if he fell into any barren or leane contry, (Philip refusing the battel, and purposing to flie) he should B be constrained in the end to returne againe towardes the sea, without doing any thing, as his predecessor had done before. Wherefore he determined to crosse the mountaines to set vpon his enemy, and to proue if he could winne the passage by force. Now Philip kept the top of the mountaines with his army, and when the ROMAINES forced to get vp the hilles, they were receiued with dartes, slings, and shot, that lighted amongest them here & there: insomuch as the skirmish was very hot for the time it lasted, and many were slayne and hurt on either side. But this was not the ende of the warre. For in the meane time there came certaine neateherdes of the contry vnto Titus (who did vse to keepe beastes on these mountaines) and tolde him they could bring him a way which they knew the enemies kept not: by the which they promised to guide his army so, that in three dayes at the furtheest, they would bringe them on the top of the C mountaine. And bicause they might be assured that their wordes were true, they sayed they were sent to him by Charopus, the sonne of Machatas. This Charopus was the chiefest man of the EPIROTS, who loued the ROMAINES very well, yet he fauored them but vnder hand, for feare of Philip. Titus gaue credit vnto them, and so sent one of his Captaines with them, with foure thousand footemen, and three hundred horsemen. The heard men that were their guides, went before still, fast bounde: and the ROMAINES followed after. All the day time the army rested in thicke woddes, and marched all night by moone light, which was then by good happe at the ful. Titus hauing sent these men away, rested all the rest of his campe: sauing that some daies he entertayned them with some light skirmishes to occupy the enemy withall. But the same day, when his men that fetched a compasse about, shoulde come vnto the top of the mountaine a- D boue the campe of his enemies, he brought all his army out of the campe by breake of day, & deuided them into three troupes, with the one of them he himselfe went on that side of the riuer where the way is straightest, making his bands to march directly against the side of the hil. The MACEDONIANS againe, they shot lustely at them from the height of the hill, and in certen places amongest the rockes they came to the sworde. At the selfe same time, the two other troupes on either hande of him did their endeuor likewise to get vp the hill, and as it were enuying one an other, they climed vp with great corage against the sharpe and steepe hanginge of the mountaine. When the sunne was vp, they might see a farre of as it were, a certen smoke, not very bright at the beginning, much like to the mistes we see cōmonly rise from the tops of the mountaines. The enemies could see nothing, bicause it was behinde them, & that the top E of the mountaine was possessed with the same. The ROMAINES, though they were not assured of it, did hope being in the middest of the fight, that it was their fellowes they looked for. But when they saw it increased stil more, & more, & in such sorte, that it darkened all the ayer: then they did assure them selues it was certainely the token their men did giue them that they were come. Then they beganne to crie out, clyminge vp the hills with such a lusty corage, that they draue their enemies vp the hill still, euen vnto the very rough and hardest places of the mountaine. Their fellowes also that were behind the enemies, did aunswer thē with like lowde cries from the top of the moūtaine: wherwith the enemies were so astonied, that they fled presently apō it. Nothwithstāding, there were not slaine aboue two thousand of thē, bicause the hardnes & straightnes of the place did so gard them, that they could not be chased. But the ROMAINES F spoiled their campe, tooke all that they found in their tents, tooke also their slaues, & wan the passage into the moūtaines, by the which they entred the cōtry of EPIRVS: & did passe through it so quietly, & with so great abstinēce, that though they were farre from their ships & the sea,

& lacked their ordinary portion of corne which they were wont to haue monthely, & that victells were very ſcant with thē at that time, yet they neuer tooke any thing of the cōtry, though they founde great ſtore & plenty of all riches in it. For Titus was aduertiſed, that Philip paſſing by THESSALIE, and flying for feare, had cauſed the inhabitants of the cities to get them to the mountaines, & then to ſet fire on their houſes, & to leaue thoſe goodes they could not cary away, by reaſon of the weight & vnhandſome cariage therof, to the ſpoyle of his ſouldiers: & ſo (as it ſeemed) he left the whole contry to the conqueſt of the ROMAINES. Whereuppon Titus looking cōſideratly to his doings, gaue his men great charge to paſſe through the contry without doing any hurt or miſchief, as the ſame which their enemies had now left to them as their owne. So they taried not long to enioy the benefit of their orderly and wiſe forbearing of the contry. For, ſo ſoone as they were entred THESSALIE, the cities willingly yeelded them ſelues vnto them: & the GREECIANS inhabiting beyond the contry of THERMOPYLES, did maruelouſly deſire to ſee Titus, asking no other thing, but to put them ſelues into his hands. The ACHAIANS alſo on the other ſide, did renoūce the league & alliance they had made with Philip and furthermore did determine in their counſell, to make warre with him on the ROMAINES ſide. And although the ÆTOLIANS were at that time frendes and confederates with the ROMAINES, & that they did ſhew thē ſelues very louing to take their parte in theſe warres: neuertheles when they deſired the OPVNTIANS that they would put their city into their hands, and were offred that it ſhould be kept & defended frō Philip: they would not harkē therto, but ſent for Titus, & put thē ſelues & their goods wholly into his protection. They ſay, that when king Pyrrus firſt ſaw the ROMAINES army range in order of battel from the top of a hill, he ſaid: this order of the barbarous people, ſetting of their men in battell ray, was not done in a barbarous maner. And thoſe alſo that neuer had ſeene Titus before, & came for to ſpeake with him: were compelled in a manner to ſay as much. For where they had hearde the MACEDONIANS ſay, that there came a Captaine of the barbarous people that deſtroyed all before him by force of armes, & ſubdued whole contries by violence: they ſayd to the contrary, that they found him a man, in dede young of yeres, howbeit gentle, & curteous to looke on, & that ſpake the Greeke tongue excellētly wel, & was a louer only of true glory. By reaſon wherof they returned home maruelous glad, & filled all the cities & townes of GREECE with goodwill towardes him, and ſayd: they had ſeene Titus the Captaine, that would reſtore them to their auncient libertie againe. Then it much more appeared, when Philip ſhewed him ſelfe willing to haue peace, and that Titus alſo did offer it him, and the frendſhippe of the people of ROME, with theſe conditions: that he would leaue the GREECIANS their whole liberties, & remoue his garriſons out of their cities and ſtrong holdes: which Philip refuſed to do. And thereupon all GREECE, and euen thoſe which fauored Philip, ſayed with one voyce: that the ROMAINES were not come to make warres with them, but rather with the MACEDONIANS in fauor of the GREECIANS. Wherupon all GREECE came in, & offred them ſelues vnto Titus without cōpulſion. And as he paſſed through the contry of BOEOTIA, without any ſhew at al of warres, the chiefeſt mē of the city of THEBES wēt to mete him: who though they tooke part with the king of MACEDON, bicauſe of a priuate mā called Brachylelis, yet they would honor Titus, as thoſe which were cōtented to keepe league & frendſhip with either ſide. Titus embraced them, & ſpake very curteouſly vnto thē, going on his way ſtil fayer & ſoftly, entertaining thē ſomtime with one matter, & ſomtime with an other, & kept them talke of purpoſe, to the end his ſouldiers being wearied with iornying, might in the meane time take good breath: & ſo marching on, by litle & litle, he entred into the city with thē. Wherewith the Lords of THEBES were not greatly pleaſed, but yet they durſt not refuſe him, thogh he had not at that time any nūber of ſouldiers about him. Whē he was within THEBES, he praied audiēce, & began to perſwade the people (as carefully as if he had not had the city already) that they woulde rather take parte with the ROMAINES, then with the king of MACEDON. And to further Titus purpoſe, king Attalus being by chaūce at that time in the aſſembly, did help to exhort the THEBANS very earneſtly, that they would doe as Titus perſwaded them. But Attalus was more earneſt then became a man of his yeares, for the deſire he had (as was imagined) to ſhewe Titus his eloquence: who did ſo ſtraine and moue him ſelfe withall, that he ſounded ſodaynely in the middeſt of his oration, whereby the

A rewme fell downe ſo faſt vppon him, that it tooke away his ſences, ſo as he fell in a traunſe before them all, and few dayes after was conueyed againe by ſea into ASIA, where he liued not lõg after. In the meane time, the BOEOTIANS came into the ROMAINES, & tooke their parte. And Philip hauing ſent Ambaſſadors to ROME, Titus alſo ſent thither of his men to ſolicite for him, in two reſpects. The one, if the warres continued againſt Philip, that then they would prolong his time there. The other, if the Senate did graunt him peace: that they would do him the honor, as to make and conclude it with Philip. For Titus of his owne nature being very ambitious, did feare leaſt they would ſend a ſucceſſor to continew thoſe warres, who ſhould take the glory from him, and make an end of them. But his frends made ſuch earneſt ſute for him, that neither king Philip attained that he prayed: neither was there ſent any other generall in Titus

B place, but he ſtill continued his charge in theſe warres. Wherfore, ſo ſoone as he had receiued his cõmiſſion & authority from the Senate, he went ſtraight towards THESSALIE, with great hope to ouercome Philip. For he had in his army aboue ſix & twenty thouſand fighting men, whereof the ÆTOLIANS made ſix thouſand footemen, and three thouſande horſemen. King Philips army on thother ſide was no leſſe in number, & they began to march one towards the other, vntill at the length they both drew neere the city of SCOTVSA, where they determined to try the battell. So, neither they nor their men were afraid, to ſee them ſelues one ſo neere an other: but rather to the contrary, the ROMAINES on the one ſide tooke greater hart & corage vnto them, deſiring to fight, as thinking with themſelues what great honor they ſhould win to

C ouercome the MACEDONIANS, who were ſo highly eſteemed for their valliantnes, by reaſon of the famous acts that Alexander the great did by them. And the MACEDONIANS on the other ſide alſo, taking the ROMAINES for other maner of ſouldiers then the PERSIANS, began to haue good hope if they might winne the field, to make king Philip more famous in the world, then euer was Alexander his father. Titus thẽ calling his men together, ſpake, & exhorted thẽ to ſtand to it like men, & to ſhow thẽſelues valliant ſouldiers in this battel, as thoſe which were to ſhew the proofe of their valliantneſſe in the hart of GREECE, the goodlieſt Theater of the world, & againſt their enemies of moſt noble fame. Philip then by chaunce, or forced to it by the ſpede he made, bicauſe they were both ready to ioyne: did get vp vnwares vpon a charnell houſe, (where they had buried many bodies, being a litle hill raiſed vp aboue the reſt, & neere

D the trenches of his campe) and there began to encorage his ſouldiers, as all generals do before they giue battel. Who when he ſaw them all diſcoraged, for they tooke it for an il ſigne that he was gotten vp on the top of a graue to ſpeake vnto them: he of a conceite at the matter, did of himſelfe deferre to giue battell that day. The next morning, bicauſe the night was very wet by reaſon the ſowthewindes had blowen, the clowds were turned to a miſte, & filled all the valley with a darke groſſe thicke ayer, cõming from the mountaines thereabouts, which couered the field betwene both campes with a miſt all the morning: by reaſon wherof the skowtes on both ſides that were ſent to diſcouer what the enemies did, in very ſhorte time met together, & one gaue charge vpon an other in a place they call the dogges heads, which are pointes of rockes placed vpon litle hills one before an other, and very nere one vnto an other: which haue bene called ſo, bicauſe they haue had ſome likenes of it. In this skirmiſh there were many chaũges,

E as cõmonly falleth out when they fight in ſuch ill fauored ſtony places. For ſometime the ROMAINES fled, and the MACEDONIANS chaſed them: an other time the MACEDONIANS that followed the chaſe, were glad to fly themſelues, & the ROMAINES who fled before, nowe had thẽ in chaſe. This chaunge & alteracion came by ſending new ſupplies ſtil from both campes, to relieue them that were diſtreſſed & driuen to flie. Now began the miſte to breake vp, & the ayer to clere: ſo that both generals might ſee about thẽ what was done in either campe: by reaſon wherof both of thẽ drew on their army to the field & battel. So Philip had the vantage on the right wing of his army, which was placed on the height of an hanging hill frõ which they came for a maine to ſet vpon the ROMAINES, & with ſuch a fury, that the ſtrõgeſt & valliantest that could be, had neuer bene able to abide the front of their battel, ſo cloſely were they ioined

F together, & their wall of pykes was ſo ſtrõg. But on his left wing it was not ſo, bicauſe the rãcks of his battel could not ioyne ſo nere nor cloſe target to targer, the place being betwixt the hills & the rockes where the battel was cõming ſo as they were cõpelled by reaſõ of the ſtraightnes Battell betwene Quintius and Philip kinge of Macedon.

& vneuennes of the ground, to leaue it open, & vnfurnished in many places. Titus finding that A disaduãtage, went frõ the left wing of his battel which he saw ouerlaid by the right wing of his enemies, & going sodainly toward the left wing of king Philips battell, he set vpon the MACEDONIANS on that side, where he saw they could not close their ranckes in the front, nor ioyne them together in the middest of the battel (which is the whole strength & order of the MACEDONIAN fight) bicause the field was vp hill & downe hill: & to fight hand to hand they were so pestered behind, that one thronged & ouerlaid an other. For the battel of the MACEDONIANS hath this property, that so lõg as the order is kept close & ioyned together, it semeth as it were but the body of a beast of a force inuincible. But also after that it is once open, & that they are sundered & not ioyned together, it doth not only loose the force & power of the whole body, but also of euery priuate souldier that fighteth: partly by reason of the diuersity of the weapons B wherewith they fight, & partely for that their whole strength consisteth most, in the disposing & ioyning together of their ranckes & orders which doth stay vp one an other, more thẽ doth euery priuate souldiers strength. So when this left wing of the MACEDONIANS was broken, & that they ran their way: one parte of the ROMAINES followed the chase, & the other ranne to giue a charge vppon the flanckes of the right winge which fought yet, and they made great slaughter of them. Whereupon they now which before had the vantage, beganne to stagger and breake, & in the ende ranne away as fast as the other did, throwing downe their weapons: insomuch as there were slaine of them eight thousande in the fielde, and fiue thousande taken prisoners in the chase. And had not the fault bene in the ÆTOLIANS, Philip had not saued him selfe by flyinge as he did. For whileste the ROMAINES had their enemies in chase, the ÆTOLI- C ANS taried, and rifled all kinge Philips campe, so as they had left the ROMAINES nothinge to spoyle at their returne. Whereupon there grew great quarrell, & hot words betwene them, & one with an other. But afterwardes they angered Titus worse, chalenginge the honor of this victory to thẽ selues, bicause they gaue it out through GREECE, that they alone had ouerthro-wen king Philip in the battell. So that in the songs and ballets the Poets made in praise of this victory, which euery cõtry & townes man had in his mouth: they alwaies put the ÆTOLIANS before the ROMAINES, as in this that followeth, which was currantly song in euery place.

The Poet was Alcæus that made these verses for to singe, who did them in disgrace of kinge Philip, falsely increasinge the number of his men which died in the battell, only to shame and spite him the more: howbeit he spited Titus thereby, more then Philip, bicause it was song in E euery place. For Philip laughed at it, & to encounter him againe with the like mocke, he made a song to counterfeate his, as followeth.

Privy grudge betwixt Quintius and the AEtolians.

But Titus tooke it greuously, who chiefly desired to be honored amongest the GREECIANS, by reason whereof from that time forwards he dealt in the rest of his matters alone, without making accompt of the ÆTOLIANS: wherwith they were maruelous angry, & specially when he receiued an Ambassador from Philip, and gaue eare vnto a treaty of peace which he offred. For then they were so netled against him, that they gaue it out through all GREECE, that Titus F had solde peace vnto Philip, when he might altogether haue ended the warre, and vtterly haue destroyed Philips whole power and Empire, who had first brought GREECE into bondage.
These slaunderous reports & false tales which the ÆTOLIANS spred thus abroade, did much

A trouble the Romaines frendes and confederates: but Philip ſelfe pulled this ſuſpicion out of their heades, when he came in perſon to require peace, and did ſubmit him ſelfe wholly to the diſcretion of Titus and the Romaines. Titus then graunted him peace, and deliuered to him his realme of Macedon, and commaunded him he ſhoulde giue ouer all that he helde in Greece, and beſides, that he ſhould pay one thouſande talents for tribute, taking from him all his army by ſea, ſauing only tenne ſhippes: and for aſſurance of this peace, he tooke one of his ſonnes for hoſtage, whome he ſent to Rome. Wherein Titus certainely did very well, and wiſely did foreſee the time to come. For then Hanniball of Carthage, (the great enemy of the Romaines) was baniſhed out of his contry, and commen to kinge Antiochus, whome he put in the head, and earneſtly moued, to follow his good fortune, and the increaſe of his Em-

B pire. Whom Hanniball ſo followed with theſe perſwaſions, that kinge Antiochus at length was come to it. And truſting to his former good ſucceſſe, and notable acts, whereby in the warres before he had attained the ſurname of great: he began now to aſpire to the monarchy of the whole world, & ſought how to finde occaſion to make warres with the Romaines. So that if Titus (foreſeeing that a far of) had not wiſely inclined to peace, but that the wars of Antiochus had fallen out together with the warres of king Philip, and that theſe two the mightieſt Princes of the worlde had ioyned together againſt the city of Rome: then it had bene in as great trouble and daunger, as euer it was before, in the time of their warres againſt Hannibal. Howbeit Titus hauinge happely thruſt in this peace betwene both warres, he cut of the warre that was preſent, before the other that was comminge: by which meanes he tooke from one

C of the kinges his laſt, and from the other his firſt hope. In the meane time, the tenne commiſſioners that were ſent by the Senate from Rome to Titus, to aide and aſſiſt him in the order of the affaiers of Greece: did counſell him to ſet all the reſt of Greece at liberty, and onely to kepe in their handes with good garriſon, the cities of Chalcide, of Corinthe, and of Demetriade, to make ſure that by practiſe they ſhould not enter into league and alliance with Antiochus. Then the Ætolians (that were the common ſlaunderers of Titus proceedinges) beganne openly to make theſe cities to rebell, and did ſummone Titus to looſe the chaines of Greece: for ſo did kinge Philip call theſe three cities. Then they asked the Greecians in mockery, whether they were willing now to haue heauier fetters on their legges, then before, being ſomwhat brighter and fayrer then thoſe they had bene ſhackled with: and alſo whether

D they were not greatly beholding to Titus for taking of the fetters from the Greecians legs, and tyinge them about their neckes. Titus beinge maruelouſly troubled and vexed with this, moued the tenne counſellers ſo earneſtly, that he made them graunt his requeſt in the ende, that thoſe three cities alſo ſhould be deliuered frō garriſon: bicauſe the Greecians thenceforth might no more complaine, that his grace and liberality was not throughly performed, and accompliſhed in euery reſpect on them all. Wherefore, when the feaſt called Iſthmia was come, there were gathered together an infinite multitude of people come to ſee the ſporte of the games played there: for Greece hauing bene long time troubled with warres, they ſeeing them ſelues now in ſure peace, & in very good hope of ful liberty, looked after no other thing, but delited only to ſee games, and to make mery. Proclamation was then made by ſounde of

E trompet in the aſſembly, that euery man ſhoulde keepe ſilence. That done, the herauld went forward, and thruſt into the middeſt of the multitude, and proclaimed out alowde: that the Senate of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius, Conſul of the people of Rome (now that they had ouerthrowen kinge Philip and the Macedonians in battell) did thenceforth diſcharge from all garriſons, and ſet at liberty from all taxes, ſubſidies, and impoſitions for euer, to liue after their olde auncient lawes, and in full liberty: the Corinthians, the Locrians, thoſe of Phocide, thoſe of the Ile of Euboea, the Achaians, the Pythiotes, the Magneſians, the Theſſalians, and the Perrhoebeians. At the firſt time of the proclamation, all the people could not heare the voice of the herauld, and the moſt parte of thoſe that hearde him, coulde not tell diſtinctly what he ſayed: for there ranne vp and downe the ſhewe place

F where the games were played, a confuſed brute and tumult of the people that wondered, and asked what the matter ment, ſo as the herauld was driuen againe to make the proclamation. Whereupon after ſilence made, the herauld puttinge out his voice farre lowder then before, did proclaime it in ſuch audible wiſe, that the whole aſſembly heard him: and then roſe there A ſuch a lowde ſhowte and crie of ioy through the whole people, that the ſound of it was heard to the ſea. Then all the people that had taken their places, & were ſet to ſee the Swordplayers play, roſe vp all on their feete, lettinge the games alone, and went together with great ioy to ſalute, to embrace, and to thanke Titus the recouerer, protector, and patrone of all their liberties of GREECE. Then was ſeene (which is much ſpoken of) the power of mens voyces: Crowes flying, fell downe by the ſounde of mens voices. for crowes fel downe at that preſent time among the people, which by chaunce flew ouer the ſhow place at that time that they made the ſame out ſhowte. This came to paſſe, by reaſon the ayer was broken and cut a ſunder, with the vehemency and ſtrength of the voyces, ſo as it had not his naturall power in it, to keepe vp the flying of the birdes: which were driuen of neceſſi-ty to fall to the grounde, as flyinge through a voide place where they lacked ayer. Vnleſſe we B will rather ſay, that it was the violence of the crie, which ſtrooke the birdes paſſinge through the ayer, as they had bene hit with arrowes, and ſo made them fall downe dead to the earth.

It may be alſo, that there was ſome hurlinge winde in the ayer, as we doe ſee ſometime in the ſea, when it riſeth high, and many times turneth about the waues, by violence of the ſtorme.
So it is, that if Titus hadde not preuented the whole multitude of people which came to ſee him, and that he had not got him away betimes, before the games were ended: he had hardly ſcaped from being ſtifled amongeſt them, the people came ſo thicke about him from euery place. But after that they were weary of crying, and ſinging about his pauillion vntill night, in the ende they went their way: and as they went, if they met any of their kinne, frendes or citizens, they did kiſſe and embrace one an other for ioy, and ſo ſupped, and made mery together. C In their more reioycinge yet, as we may thinke full well, they had no other talke at the table, but of the warres of GREECE, diſcourſing amongeſt them what ſundry great warres they had made, what they had endured heretofore, and all to defend and recouer their liberty. And yet for all that, they coulde neuer ſo ioyfully nor more aſſuredly obtaine it, then they did euen at that preſent, receiuing the honorableſt reward, & that which deſerued greateſt fame through the worlde: that by the valliantneſſe of ſtraungers who fought for the ſame (without any ſpil-blood of their owne in compariſon, or that they loſt the life of any one man, whoſe death they had cauſe to lament) they were ſo reſtored to their auncient freedome and liberty. It is a very rare thinge amongeſt men, to finde a man very valliant, and wiſe withall: but yet of all ſortes of valliant men, it is harder to finde a iuſt man. For Ageſilaus, Lyſander, Nicias, Alcibiades, D and all other the famous Captaines of former times, had very good skill to lead an army, and to winne the battell, as well by ſea as by lande: but to turne their victories to any honorable benefit, or true honor among men, they could neuer skill of it. And if you doe except the battell againſt the barbarous people, in the plaine of MARATHON, the battell of SALAMINA, the iorney of PLATEES, the battell of THERMOPYLES, the battell Cimon fought about CIPRVS, and vpon the riuer of Eurymedon: all the other warres & battels of GREECE that were made, fell out againſt them ſelues, and did euer bringe them into bondage: and all the tokens of triumphe which euer were ſet vp for the ſame, was to their ſhame and loſſe. So that in the end, GREECE was vtterly deſtroyed and ouerthrowen, and that chiefly through the wickednes and ſelfe will of her gouernors and captaines of the cities, one enuying an others doing. Where a E ſtraunge nation, the which (as it ſhould ſeeme) had very ſmall occaſion to moue them to do it (for that they haue had no great familiarity with auncient GREECE, & through the counſel & good wiſedome of the which it ſhould ſeeme very ſtraunge that GREECE coulde receiue any benefit) haue notwithſtanding with daungerous battels and infinite troubles, deliuered it from oppreſſion, and ſeruitude, of violent Lordes and tyrans. This, and ſuch like talke, did at that time occupy the GREECIANS heades: and moreouer, the deedes following did aunſwer and performe the words of the proclamatiõ. For at one ſelfe time, Titus ſent Lentulus into ASIA, to ſet the BARGYLIANS at liberty, and Titillius into THRACIA, to remoue the garriſons out of the Iles & cities which Philip had kept there: and Publius Iulius was ſent alſo into ASIA, vnto king Quintiuscare to ſtabliſh the liberty of the Greecians. Antiochus, to ſpeake vnto him to ſet the GREECIANS at liberty which he kept in ſubiection. F
And as for Titus, he went him ſelfe vnto the city of CHALCIDE, where he tooke ſea, and went into the prouince of MAGNESIA, out of the which he tooke all the garriſons of the cities, and redeliuered

A redeliuered the gouernment of the common wealth vnto the citizes of the same. Afterwards when time came, that the feast of Nemea was celebrated in the citie of ARGOS in the honor of Hercules, Titus was chosen iudge, & rector of the games that were plaied there: where, after he had set all thinges in very good order, pertaining vnto the solemnity of the feast, he caused againe solemne proclamation to be made openly, for the generall liberty of all GREECE. Furthermore, visiting the cities, he did stablish very good lawes, reformed iustice, and did set the inhabitants and citizens of euery one of them in good peace, amity, and concord one with an other: and did call home also all those that were outlawes and banished men, and pacified all olde quarrells and dissentions amonge them. The which did no lesse please and content him, that by perswasions he could bring the GREECIANS to be reconciled one with the other: then B if he had by force of armes ouercome the MACEDONIANS. Insomuch, as the recouery of the libertie which Titus had restored vnto the GREECIANS, seemed vnto them the least parte of the goodnesse they had receiued at his handes. They say, that Lycurgus the orator seeinge the collectors of taxes, cary Zenocrates the Philosopher one day to prison, for lacke of payment of a certaine imposition, which the straungers inhabiting within the citie of ATHENS were to pay: he rescued him from them by force, and moreouer prosecuted law so hard against them, that he made them pay a fyne for the iniury they had done vnto so worthy a person. And they tell, how the same Philosopher afterwardes meeting Lycurgus children in the city, sayed vnto them. I doe wel requite your fathers good turne he did me: for I am the cause that he is praised and commended of euery man, for the kindenesse he shewed on my behalfe. So the good C deedes of the ROMAINES, and of Titus Quintius Flaminius vnto the GREECIANS, did not only reape this benefit vnto them, in recompence that they were praised and honored of all the worlde: but they were cause also of increasinge their dominions and Empire ouer all nations, and that the worlde afterwardes had great affiance and trust in them, and that most iustly. So that the people and cities did not onely receiue the Captaines and gouernors the ROMAINES sent them: but they also went to ROME vnto them, and procured them to come, and did put them selues into their handes. And not only the cities and communalties, but kings & princes also (which were oppressed by other more mighty than them selues) had no other refuge, but to put them selues vnder their protection: by reason whereof in a very shorte time (with the fauor and helpe of the goddes as I am perswaded) all the world came to submit them selues to D their obedience, and vnder the protection of their Empire. Titus also did glory more, that he had restored GREECE againe vnto liberty, then in any other seruice or exployte he had euer done. For when he offered vp vnto the temple of Apollo in the citie of DELPHES, the targets of siluer with his owne shielde, he made these verses to be grauen vpon them, in effect as followeth.

The feast Nemea kept at Argos.

Lycurgus the orator, rescued Zenocrates the Philosopher, & saued him from prison.

O noble twynnes Tyndarides, Dan Ioue his children deare: Throwe out lowde shoutes of ioy, and mirth, reioyce and make good cheare.
O noble kinges of Spartan soyle, which take delight to ryde, Your trampling steedes, with fumy byt, and trappings by their side:
Reioyce you nowe, for Titus he, the valliant Romaine knight, E These giftes so great to you hath got, euen by his force and might:
That hauing taken cleane awaye, from of the Greekishe neckes,
The heauy yoke of seruitude, which held them thrall to checkes, Vnto their former liberty, he hath restorde them free, Which altogether perisht was, as men might plainely see.

He gaue a crowne of massie gold vnto Apollo, vppon the which he made this inscription to be wrytten.

A valliant Romaine knight, euen Titus by his name,
A captaine worthy by desert, of high renowne and fame:
To thee (Apollo god) this crowne of pure fine golde, F Hath geuen thy godhead to adorne, with mells manifolde, Therefore let it thee please (Apollo god of grace)
With fauor to requite this lone, to him and to his race:

That his renovvmed fame, and vertue may be ſpred, And blaſed through the vvorlde ſo vvide, to shevv vvhat life he led.

So hath the city of CORINTHE enioyed this good happe, that the GREECIANS haue bene twiſe proclaimed to be ſet at liberty: the firſt time by Titus Quintius Flaminius, and the ſecond time, by Nero in our time, and at the ſelfe ſame inſtant when they ſolemnly kept the feaſt called Iſthmia. Howebeit the firſt proclamation of their liberty (as we haue tolde ye before) was done by the voyce of a herauld: and the ſeconde time it was done by Nero him ſelfe, who proclaimed it in an oration he made vnto the people in open aſſembly, in the market place of the city of CORINTHE. But it was a longe time after. Furthermore, Titus beganne then a goodly and iuſt warre againſt Nabis, the curſed and wicked tyran of LACEDÆMON. Howebeit in the ende he deceaued the expectation of GREECE. For when he might haue taken him, he would not doe it, but made peace with him, forſakinge poore SPARTA vnworthily oppreſſed vnder the yoke of bondage: either bicauſe he was afrayed that if the warre helde on, there ſhoulde come a ſucceſſor vnto him from ROME, that ſhould cary the glory away to ende the ſame, or elſe he ſtoode Iealous and enuious of the honor they did vnto Philopœmen. Who hauing ſhewed him ſelfe in euery place as excellent a Captaine as euer came in GREECE, and hauinge done notable actes and famous ſeruice, both of great wiſedome, and alſo of valliantneſſe, and ſpecially in the ACHAIANS warre: he was as much honored & reuerenced of the ACHAIANS, in the Theaters and common aſſemblies, euen as Titus was. Whereat Titus was maruelouſly offended, for he thought it vnreaſonable, that an ARCADIAN who had neuer bene generall of an army, but in ſmall litle warres againſt his neighbours, ſhould be as much eſteemed and honored, as a Conſull of ROME, that was come to make warres for the recouery of the libertie of GREECE. But Titus alleaged reaſonable excuſe for his doinges, ſaying that he ſaw very well he coulde not deſtroy this tyran Nabis, without the great loſſe and miſery of the other SPARTANS. Furthermore, of all the honors the ACHAIANS euer did him (which were very great) me thinkes there was none that came neere any recompence of his honorable and well deſeruing, but one onely preſent they offered him, and which he aboue all the reſt moſt eſteemed: and this it was. Duringe the ſeconde warres of AFRICKE, which the ROMAINES had againſt Hannibal, many ROMAINES were taken priſoners in the ſundry battells they loſt, and beinge ſolde here and there, remained ſlaues in many contries: and amongeſt other, there were diſperſed in GREECE to the number of twelue hundred, which from time to time did moue men with pitie and compaſſion towardes them, that ſaw them in ſo miſerable chaunge and ſtate of fortune. But then much more was their miſerie to be pitied, when theſe captiues found in the ROMAINES army, ſome of them their ſonnes, other their brethren, and the reſt their fellowes and frendes, free, and conquerours, and them ſelues ſlaues and bondemen. It grieued Titus much to ſee theſe poore men in ſuch miſerable captiuity, notwithſtanding he would not take them by force from thoſe that had them. Whereupon the ACHAIANS redeemed and bought them for fiue hundred pence a man, and hauinge gathered them together into a troupe, they preſented all the ROMAINE captiues vnto Titus, euen as he was ready to take ſhip to returne into ITALIE: which preſent made him returne home with greater ioy and contentacion, hauing receiued for his noble deedes ſo honorable a recompence, and worthy of him ſelfe, that was ſo louing a man to his citizens and contry. And ſurely, that onely was the ornament (in my opinion) that did moſt beautifie his triumphe. For theſe poore redeemed captiues did that, which the ſlaues are wont to doe on that day when they be ſet at liberty: to witte, they ſhaue their heades, and doe weare litle hattes apon them. The ROMAINES that were thus redeemed, did in like maner: and ſo followed Titus charret, on the day of his triumphe and entrie made into ROME in the triumphing manner. It was a goodly ſight alſo, to ſee the ſpoyles of the enemies, which were caried in the ſhow of this triumphe: as, ſtore of helmets after the GREECIANS facion, heapes of targets, ſhieldes, and pykes after the MACEDONIAN manner, with a wonderfull ſumme of gold and ſiluer. For Itanus the hiſtoriographer writeth, that there was brought a maruelous great maſſe of treaſure in niggots of golde, of three thouſand ſeuen hundred and thirteene pounde weight, and of ſiluer, of forty three thouſande, two hundred, three ſcore and tenne pound weight, and of gold ready coyned in peeces called Philips foure-

A teene thousand, fiue hundred, and foureteene, besides the thousand talents king Philip should pay for a raunsome. The which summe, the ROMAINES afterwardes forgaue him, chiefly at Titus sute and intercession, who procured that grace for him, and caused him to be called a frend and confederate of the people of ROME, and his sonne Demetrius to be sent vnto him againe, who remained before as an hostage at ROME. Shortely after, king Antiochus went out of ASIA into GREECE with a great fleete of shippes, and a very puisant army, to stirre vp the cities to forsake their league and allyance with the ROMAINES, and to make a dissention amongest them. To further this his desire and enterprise, the ÆTOLIANS did aide and backe him, which of long time had borne great and secrete malice against the ROMAINES, and desired much to haue had warres with them. So they taught king Antiochus to say, that the warre
B which he tooke in hande, was to set the GREECIANS at liberty, whereof they had no neede, bicause they did already enioy their liberty: but for that they had no iust cause to make warre, they taught him to cloke it the honestest way he coulde. Wherefore the ROMAINES fearinge greatly the rising of the people, & the rumor of the power of this great king, they sent thither Manius Acilius their generall, and Titus, one of his Lieutenaunts for the GREECIANS sakes. Which arriuall did the more assure them that already bare good will to the ROMAINES, after they had once seene Manius and Titus: and the rest that beganne to flie out, and to shrinke from them, those Titus kept in obedience from starting, remembringe them of the frendship and good will they had borne him, euen like a good skilfull phisitian that coulde geue his pa-C cient phisicke to preserue him from a contageous disease. In deede there were some (but fewe of them) that left him, which were won and corrupted before by the ÆTOLIANS: and though he had iust cause of offence towardes them, yet he saued them after the battell. For king Antiochus being ouercome in the contry of THERMOPYLES, fled his way, and in great hast tooke the sea to returne into ASIA. And the Consull Manius following his victory, entred into the contry of the ÆTOLIANS, where he tooke certaine townes by force, and left the other for a pray vnto kinge Philip. So Philip kinge of MACEDON on the one side, spoyled and sacked the DOLOPIANS, the MAGNESIANS, the ATHAMANIANS, and the APERANTINES: and the Consull Manius on the other side, destroyed the city of HERACLEA, and layed siege to the citie
D of NAVPACTVM, which the ÆTOLIANS kept. But Titus takinge compassion of them, to see the poore people of GREECE thus spoiled and turned out of all: went out of PELOPONNESVS (where he was then) vnto Manius Acilius campe, and there reproued him for suffering king Philip to vsurpe the benefit and reward of his honorable victory, still conqueringe many people, kings, and contries, whilest he continued siege before a city, and only to wreake his anger vpon them. Afterwardes, when they that were besieged saw Titus from their walles, they called him by his name, and helde vp their handes vnto him, prayinge him he would take pitie vpon them: but he gaue them neuer a word at that time, and turning his backe vnto them, he E fell a weeping. Afterwards he spake with Manius, and appeasing his anger, got him to graunt the ÆTOLIANS truce for certaine dayes, in which time they might sende Ambassadors to ROME, to see if they could obtaine grace and pardon of the Senate. But the most trouble and difficulty he had, was to intreate for the CHALCIDIANS, with whome the Consull Manius was more grieuously offended, then with all the rest: bicause that kinge Antiochus after the warres was begonne, had maried his wife in their citie, when he was past yeares of mariage, and out of all due time. For he was now very olde, and beinge in his extreame age, and in the middest of his warres, he fell in dotage with a yoūg gentlewoman, the daughter of Cleoptolemus, the fayrest woman that was at that time in all GREECE. Therefore the CHALCIDIANS were F much affected vnto king Antiochus, and did put their city into his handes, to serue him in this warre, for a strong & safe retyring place. Whervpō, whē Antiochus had lost the battell, he came thither with all possible speede, and takinge from thence with him his passinge fayer younge Queene which he had maried, and his golde, his siluer, and frendes, he tooke the seas incontinently, and returned into ASIA. For this cause the Consull Manius hauing wonne the battell, did marche straight with his army towardes the citie of CHALCIS in great rage and fury. But Titus that followed him, did alwayes lye vpon him to pacifie his anger, and did so much intreate him, together with the other ROMAINES of state and authoritie in counsell:

that in the ende, he gotte him to pardone them of CHALCIDE alſo. Who, bicauſe they were preſerued from perill by his meanes, they, to recompence this fact of his, did conſecrate vnto him, all their moſt ſtately and ſumptuous buildinges and common workes in their citie, as appeareth yet by the ſuperſcriptions remaininge to be ſeene at this day. As in the ſhow place of exerciſes: The people of CHALCIDE did dedicate this ſhow place of exerciſes, vnto Titus & Hercules. And in the temple called Delphinium: The people of CHALCIDE did conſecrate this temple, vnto Titus, and vnto Apollo. And furthermore, vnto this preſent time, there is a prieſt choſen by the voyce of the people, purpoſely to do ſacrifice vnto Titus: in which ſacrifice, after that the thing ſacrificed is offered vp, and wine powred apon it, the people ſtanding by, do ſing a ſong of triumphe made in praiſe of him. But bicauſe it were to long to wryte it all out, we haue only drawen in briefe the latter end of the ſame: and this it is.

Honors done vnto T. Quintius for ſauing the Chalcidians and the Greecians.

By vvhom you haue preſerued bene, from ruine, dole, and death.

Now the CHALCIDIANS did not alone only honor & reuerence Titus, but he was generally honored alſo by the GREECIANS as he deſerued, & was marueloufly beloued for his curteſie and good nature: which argueth plainely that they did not fainedly honor him, or through compulſion, but euen from the hart. For though there was ſome iarre betwixt him and Philopœmen at the firſt about ſeruice, for emulation of honor, and after betwixt him and Diophanes alſo, both generalls of the ACHAIANS: yet he neuer bare them any malice in his hart, neither did his anger moue him at any time to hurt them any way, but he euer ended the heate of his wordes, in counſell and aſſemblies, where he vttered his minde franckely to them both. Therefore none thought him euer a cruell man, or eger of reuenge: but many haue thought him raſhe, and haſty of nature. Otherwiſe, he was as good a companion in company as poſſibly could be, and would vſe as pleaſaunt wiſe mirthe as any man. As when he ſayed to the ACHAIANS, on a time, who would needes vniuſtly vſurpe the Ile of the ZACYNTHIANS, to diſſwade them from it: my Lordes of ACHAIA, if ye once goe out of PELOPONNESVS, you put your ſelues in daunger, as the torteyſes doe, when they thruſt their heades out of their ſhell. And the firſt time he parled with Philip to treate of peace: when Philip ſaid vnto him, you haue brought many men with you, and I am come alone. In deede it is true you are alone, ſayd he, bicauſe you made all your frendes and kinne to be ſlaine. An other time, Dinocrates MESSENIAN being in ROME, after he had taken in his cuppes in a feaſt where he was, he diſguiſed him ſelfe in womans apparell, and daunced in that manner: and the next day followinge he went vnto Titus, to pray him to helpe him through with his ſute, which was, to make the citie of MESSENA to rebell, and leaue the tribe of the ACHAIANS. Titus made him aunſwer, that he would thinke vpon it: but I can but wonder at you (ſayd he) howe you can daunce in womans apparell, and ſinge at a feaſt, hauinge ſuch matters of weight in your head. In the counſell of the ACHAIANS, king Antiochus ambaſſadors beinge come thither, to moue them to breake their league with the ROMAINES, and to make alliance with the king their maſter, they made a marueloous large diſcourſe of the great multitude of ſouldiers that were in their maſters armys, and did number them by many diuerſe names. Whereunto Titus aunſwered, and tolde how a frend of his hauing bidden him one night to ſupper, and hauing ſerued ſo many diſhes of meate to his bord, as he was angry with him for beſtowing ſo great coſt apon him, as wonderinge howe he could ſo ſodainely get ſo much ſtore of meate, and of ſo diuerſe kindes. My frende ſayed to me againe, that all was but porke dreſſed ſo many wayes, and with ſo ſundry ſawces. And euen ſo (quod Titus) my Lords of ACHAIA, eſteeme not king Antiochus army the more, to heare of ſo many men of armes, nunbred with their launces, and of ſuch a number of footemen with their pykes: for they are all but SYRIANS, diuerſely armed, only with ill fauored little weapons. Furthermore, after Titus had done theſe thinges, and that the warre with Antiochus was ended, he was choſen Cenſor at ROME, with the ſonne of that ſame Marcellus, who

A who had bene fiue times Consull. This office is of great dignitie, and as a man may say, the crowne of all the honors that a citizen of ROME can haue in their common wealth. They put of the Senate, foure men only: but they were not famous. They did receiue all into the number of citizens of ROME, that would present them selues to be enrolled in their common regester: with a prouiso, that they were borne free by father and mother. They were compelled to doe it, by Terentius Culeo, Tribune of the people, who to despight the nobility, perswaded the people of ROME to commaunde it so. Nowe at that time, two of the noblest and most famous men of ROME were great enemies one against an other: Publius Scipio AFRICAN, and Marcus Porcius Cato. Of these two, Titus named Publius Scipio AFRICAN, to be prince of the Senate, as the chiefest and worthiest persone in the citie: and got the displeasure of the other, B which was Cato, by this mishappe. Titus had a brother called Lucius Quintius Flaminius, nothing like vnto him in condition at all: for he was so dissolutely and licentiously giuen ouer to his pleasure, that he forgatte all comlinesse and honesty. This Lucius loued well a younge boy, and caried him alwayes with him when he went to the warres, or to the charge and gouernment of any prouince. This boy flattering him, one day sayd vnto Lucius Quintius, that he loued him so well, that he did leaue the sight of the Swordplayers at the sharpe, which were making ready to the fight, although he had neuer seene man killed before: to waite vpon him. Lucius being very glad of the boyes wordes, aunswered him straight, thou shalt loose nothing for that my boy, for I will by & by please thee as well. So he commaunded a condemned man to be fetched out of prison, and withall called for the hangman, whome he willed to strike of C his head in the middest of his supper, that the boy might see him killed. Valerius Antias the historiographer wryteth, that it was not for the loue of the boy, but of a woman which he loued. But Titus Liuius declareth, that in an oration which Cato him selfe made, it was wrytten, that it was one of the GAVLES: who beinge a traitor to his contry men, was come to Flaminius gate with his wife and children, and that Flaminius making him come into his halle, killed him with his owne handes, to please a boy he loued, that was desirous to see a man killed. Howebeit it is very likely that Cato wrote in this sorte, to aggrauate the offence, and to make it more cruell. For, many haue wrytten it that it is true, and that he was no traitor, but an offendor condemned to dye: and amonge other, Cicero the orator doth recite it in a booke he made of age, where he made it to be tolde vnto Catoes owne persone. Howesoeuer it was, Marcus Ca-
D to being chosen Censor, and clensing the Senate of all vnworthy persones, he put of the same Lucius Quintius Flaminius, although he had bene Consull: which disgrace did seeme to redowne to his brother Titus Quintius Flaminius also. Whereupon both the brethren came weping with all humility before the people, and made a petition that seemed very reasonable & ciuill: which was that they would commaunde Cato to come before them, to declare the cause openly why he had with such open shame defaced so noble a house as theirs was. Cato then without delay, or shrinking backe, came with his companion into the market place, where he asked Titus out alowde, if he knew nothing of the supper where such a fact was committed. Titus aunswered, he knewe not of it. Then Cato opened all the whole matter as it was, and in the ende of his tale, he bad Lucius Quintius sweare openly, if he would deny that he had sayed E was true. Lucius aunswered not a worde. Whereuppon the people iudged the shame was iustly layed vpon him: and so to honor Cato, they did accompany him from the pulpit for orations, home vnto his owne house. But Titus beinge much offended at the disgrace of his brother, became enemy to Cato, and fell in with those that of long time had hated him. And so by practise he procured of the Senate, that all bargaines of leases, and all deedes of sales made by Cato during his office, were called in, and made voyde: and caused many sutes also to be commenced against him. Wherein, I can not say he did wisely or ciuilly, to become mortall enemy to an honest man, a good citizen, and duetifull in his office, for his yeare, but vnworthy kinseman, who had iustly deserued the shame layed vpon him. Notwithstanding, shortely after when the people were assembled in the Theater to see games played, & the Senators were F set according to their custome, in the most honorable places: Lucius Flaminius came in also, who in lowly and humble maner went to sit downe in the furthest seates of the Theater, without regard of his former honor: which when the people saw, they tooke pity of him, & could not abide to see him thus dishonored. So they cried out to haue him come and sit among the other Senators the Consulls, who made him place, and receiued him accordingly. But to returne againe to Titus. The naturall ambition & couetous greedy minde he had of honor, was very well taken and esteemed, so long as he had any occasion offered him to exercise it in the warres, which we haue spoken of before. For, after he had bene Consull, of his owne seeking he became a Colonell of a thousand footemen, not being called to it by any man. So when he beganne to stoupe for age, and that he had giuen ouer as a man at the last cast, to beare office any longer in the state: they saw plainely he was ambitious beyond measure, to suffer himselfe in olde age to be ouercome with such youthfull violence, beinge farre vnmeete for any of his yeares. For me thinkes his ambition was the only cause that moued him to procure Hannibals death, which bred him much disliking and ill opinion with many. For, after Hannibal had fled out of his owne contry, he went first vnto king Antiochus: who, after he lost the battel in PHRYGIA, was glad the ROMAINES graũted him peace with such conditions as them selues would. Wherefore Hannibal fled againe from him, and after he had long wandered vp and downe, at the length he came to the realme of BITHYNIA, and remained there about king Prusias, the ROMAINES knowinge it well enough: and bicause Hannibal was then an olde broken man, of no force nor power, and one whome fortune had spurned at her feete, they made no more reckening of him. But Titus being sent Ambassador by the Senate, vnto Prusias kinge of BITHYNIA, and finding Hannibal there, it grieued him to see him aliue. So that notwithstanding Prusias marueilously intreated him, to take pitie apon Hannibal a poore olde man, & his frend who came to him for succor: yet he coulde not perswade Titus to be content he should liue. Hannibal long before had receiued aunswer of his death from an oracle, to this effect.

T. Quintius cause of Hanniballs death.

Titus sent Ambassador vnto Prusias king of Bithynia.

Hannibal deceiued by an oracle concerning his death.

The lande of Lybia, shall couer vnder mould,
The valliant corps of Hanniball, when he is dead and colde.

So Hannibal vnderstoode that of LYBIA, as if he should haue dyed in AFRICKE, and bene buried in CARTHAGE. There is a certaine sandy contry in BITHYNIA neere to the seaes side, where there is a litle village called LIBYSSA, and where Hannibal remained continually. He mistrusting king Prusias fayntе harte, and fearing the ROMAINES malice also, had made seuen priuy caues and vaultes vnder grounde longe before, that he might secretly go out at either of them which way he woulde, and euery one of them came to the maine vault where him selfe did lye, and coulde not be discerned outwardly. When it was tolde him that Titus had willed Prusias to deliuer him into his handes, he sought then to saue him selfe by those mynes: but he found that all the ventes out, had watch and ward apon them by the kinges commaundement. So then he determined to kill him selfe. Now some say, that he wounde a linnen towell harde about his necke, and commaunded one of his men he should set his knee vpon his buttocke, and waying hard vpon him, holding the towell fast he should pull his necke backeward with all the power and strength he could, and neuer linne pressing on him, till he had strangled him. Other say that he drancke bulles blood, as Midas and Themistocles had done before him. But Titus Liuius wryteth, that he had poyson which he kept for such a purpose, and tempered it in a cuppe he helde in his handes, and before he dranke, he spake these wordes. Come on, let vs deliuer the ROMAINES of this great care, sith my life is so grieuous to them, that they thinke it to long to tary the naturall death of a poore old man, whom they hate so much: and yet Titus by this shall winne no honorable victorie, nor worthie the memorie of the auncient ROMAINES, who aduertised king Pyrrus their enemy, euen when he made warres with them, and had wonne battels of them, that he should beware of poysoning which was intended towards him. And this was Hannibalis ende, as we finde it wrytten. The newes whereof being come to ROME vnto the Senate, many of them thought Titus to violent and cruell, to haue made Hannibal kill him selfe in that sorte, when extreamity of age had ouercome him already, and was as a birde left naked, her feathers fallinge from her for age: and so much the more, bicause there was no instant occasion offered him to vrge him to doe it, but a couetous minde of honor, for that he would be chronicled to be the cause and author of Hannibalis death. And then in contrariwise they did much honor and commend the clemency and noble minde of Scipio AFRICAN. Who hauing ouercomen Hannibal in battell, in AFRICKE selfe, and being then in

A in deede to be feared, and had bene neuer ouercome before: yet he did not cause him to be driuen out of his contry, neither did aske him of the CARTHAGINIANS, but both then, & before the battel, when he parled with him of peace, he tooke Hannibal curteously by the hand, and after the battell, in the condicions of peace he gaue them, he neuer spake word of hurt to Hanniballs person, neither did he shew any cruelty to him in his misery. And they tell how afterwardes they met againe together in the city of EPHESVS, and as they were walkinge, that Hannibal tooke the vpper hand of Scipio: and that Scipio bare it paciently, and left not of walking for that, neither shewed any countenaunce of misliking. And in entring into discourse of many matters, they discended in the ende to talke of auncient Captaines: and Hannibal gaue iudgement, that Alexander the great was the famousest Captaine, Pyrrus the second, and him B selfe the thirde. Then Scipio smilinge, gently asked him: what wouldest thou say then, if I had not ouercome thee? Truely, quod Hannibal, I would not then put my selfe the third man, but the first, and aboue all the Captaines that euer were. So diuers greatly cõmending the goodly sayinges and deedes of Scipio, did maruelously mislike Titus, for that he had (as a man may say) layed his handes vpon the death of an other man. Other to the contray againe sayd, it was well done of him, sayinge, that Hannibal so longe as he liued, was a fire to the Empire of the ROMAINES, which lacked but one to blow it: and that when he was in his best force and lusty age, it was not his hande nor body that troubled the ROMAINES, so much, but his great wisedome and skill he had in the warres, and the mortall hate he bare in his hart towardes the ROMAINES, which neither yeares, neither age would diminish he or take away. For mens naturall C condicions do remaine still, but fortune doth not alwayes keepe in a state, but chaungeth still, and then quickeneth vp our desires to set willingly vppon those that warre against vs, bicause they hate vs in their hartes. The thinges which fell out afterwards, did greatly proue the reasons brought out for this purpose, in discharge of Titus. For one Aristonicus, sonne of a daughter of a player vpon the citherne, vnder the fame and glory of Eumenes, whose bastard he was, filled all ASIA with warre & rebellion, by reason the people rose in his fauor. Againe Mithridates, after so many losses he had receiued against Sylla and Fimbria, and after so many armies ouerthrowen by battell and warres, and after so many famous Captaines lost and killed: did yet recouer againe, and came to be of great power both by sea and land against Lucullus. Truely Hannibal was no lower brought then Caius Marius had bene. For he had a king to his frend, D that gaue him entertainment for him and his family, and made him Admirall of his shippes, and Generall of his horsemen and footemen in the field. Marius also went vp and downe AFRICKE a begging for his liuing, insomuch as his enemies at ROME mocked him to scorne: & soone after notwithstanding they fell downe at his feete before him, when they saw they were whipped, murthered, and slaine within ROME by his commaundement. Thus we see no man can say certainely he is meane or great, by reason of the vncertainty of thinges to come: considering there is but one death, and chaunge of better life. Some say also, that Titus did not this act alone, and of his owne authority: but that he was sent Ambassador with Lucius Scipio to no other end, but to put Hannibal to death, by what meanes soeuer they could. Furthermore after this Ambassade, we do not finde any notaE ble thing written of Titus worthy of memory, neither in peace, nor in warres. For he died quietely of naturall death at home in his contrie.

THE COMPARISON OF Titus Quintius Flaminius with Philopœmen.

T. Quintius benefits vnto Greece.

IT is time nowe we come to compare them together. Therefore as touchinge the great benefits that came to the GREECIANS, neither Philopœmen, nor all the other former Captaines are to be compared with Titus. For all the auncient Captaines almost being GREECIANS, made warres with other GREECIANS: but Titus beinge a ROMAINE, and no GREECIAN, made warres for the liberty of GREECE. When Philopœmen was not able to helpe his poore citizens distressed sore, & vexed with warres, he sayled away into CRETA. Titus hauing ouercome Philip kinge of MACEDON in battell, did restore againe to liberty all the people and cities of the same, which were kept before in bondage. And if any wil narrowly examine the battells of either partie: they shall finde, that Philopœmen being Generall of the ACHAIANS, made more GREECIANS to be slaine, then Titus did of the MACEDONIANS, fightinge with them for the liberty of the GREECIANS. And for their imperfections, the one of them was ambitious, the other was as obstinate: the one was quicke and sodainly angered, the other was very hard to be pacified. Titus left kinge Philip his realme and crowne after he had ouercome him, and vsed great clemency towardes the ÆTOLIANS: where Philopœmen for spite, & malice, tooke townes and villages from his owne natiue contry, and city, wherein he was borne, that had alwayes payed them tribute. Furthermore, Titus continued a sounde frend to them, to whome he had once professed frendshippe, and done pleasure vnto: and Philopœmen, in a geare and anger, was ready to take away that he had giuen, and to ouerthrow the pleasure and good turne he had shewed. For Philopœmen when he had done the LACEDÆMONIANS great pleasure, did afterwards rase the walls of their city, and spoyled and destroyed all their contry: and lastly, ouerthrew their whole gouernment. It seemeth also by reason of his immoderate choller, he was him selfe cause of his owne death, for that he made more hast then good speede, to go out of time to set vpon those of MESSINA: and not as Titus, who did all his affaires with wisedome, and euer considered what was best to be done. But if we looke into the number of battells, and victories: the warre which Titus made against Philip was ended with two battells. Whereas Philopœmen in infinite battells in which he had the better, neuer left it doutfull, but that his skill did euer helpe him the more to victory, then the good fortune he had. Moreouer, Titus wanne honor by meanes of the power of ROME, when it florished most, and was in best prosperitie: Philopœmen made him selfe famous by his deedes, when GREECE beganne to stoupe and fall all together. So that the deedes of the one, were common to all the ROMAINES: & the dedes of the other, were priuate to himselfe alone. For Titus was General ouer good and valliant souldiers, that were already trained to his hand: and Philopœmen being chosen Generall, did traine his men him selfe, & made them afterwards very

Quintius cōmanded good souldiers: Philopœmen made good souldiers.

A very expert and valliant, that were but meane and greene ſouldiers before. And whereas Philopœmen had continuall warres with the GREECIANS, it was not for any good fortune he had, but that it made a certaine proofe of his valliantneſſe. For where all other thinges are aunſwerable to his, there we muſt iudge that ſuch as ouercome, haue the moſt corage. Now Philopœmen making warres with the moſt warlike nations of all GREECE, (as the CRETANS, and the LACEDÆMONIANS) did ouercome the ſubtilleſt of them, by fineneſſe and policy: and the moſt valliant, by prowes and hardineſſe. But Titus ouercame, by putting that only in practiſe, which was already found and ſtabliſhed: as the diſcipline of the warres, and order of battell, in the which his ſouldiers had longe before bene trained. Whereas Philopœmen brought into his contry, both the one and the other, and altered all the order which before they were B accuſtomed vnto. So that the chiefeſt point how to winne a battell, was found out a new, and brought in by the one, into a place where it was neuer before: and onely employed by the other, which could very good skill to vſe it, and had founde it out already before. Againe, touching the valliant actes done in the perſon of them ſelues, many notable actes may be told of Philopœmen, but none of Titus: but rather to the contrary. For there was one Archedamus an ÆTOLIAN, who flowtinge Titus one day, ſayd in his reproche: that at a day of battell, when Philopœmen ranne with his ſword in his hande, to that ſide where he ſaw the MACEDONIANS fighting, & making hed againſt the enemy, Titus held vp his hands vnto heauen, and was buſie at his prayers to the gods, not ſtirring one foote, when it was more time to handle the ſword, & to fight of all handes. All the goodly deedes Titus euer did, were done alwaies as a Conſul, C or Lieutenant, or a Magiſtrate: whereas Philopœmen ſhewed him ſelfe vnto the ACHAIANS, a man no leſſe valliant, and of execution, being out of office, then when he was a Generall. For when he was a Generall, he did driue Nabis the tyran of the LACEDÆMONIANS out of MESSINA, and deliuered the MESSENIANS out of bondage: and being a priuate man, he ſhut the gates of the city of SPARTA, in the face of Diophanes (Generall of the ACHAIANS) and of Titus Quintius Flaminius, and kept them both from comminge in, and thereby ſaued the city from ſacking. Thus being borne to commaunde, he knew not only how to commaunde accordinge to the law, but could commaund the law it ſelfe apon neceſſity, & when the common wealth required it. For at ſuch a time he would not tary, while the Magiſtrates which ſhould gouerne him, did geue him authority to commaund, but he tooke it of him ſelfe, and vſed them when D the time ſerued: eſteeming him in deede their Generall, that knew better then they what was to be done, then him whom they choſe of them ſelues. And therefore they doe well, that doe commende Titus actes, for his clemency, and curteſie, vſed to the GREECIANS: but much more the noble and valliant actes of Philopœmen vnto the ROMAINES. For it is much eaſier to pleaſure and gratifie the weake, then it is to hurt and reſiſt the ſtrong. Therfore, ſithence we haue throughly examined, and compared the one with the other: it is very harde to iudge altogether the difference that is betwene them. Peraduenture therefore the iudgement woulde not ſeeme very ill, if we doe geue the GREECIAN, for diſcipline of warre, the preheminence and praiſe of a good Captaine: and to the E ROMAINE, for iuſtice and clemency, the name and dignity of a moſt iuſt and curteous gentleman.

A Generall muſt not be at his prayers, whe he ſhould occupy his ſword.

The ende of Titus Quintius Flaminius life.

Pyrrus kinred, and beginning of the kingdome of Epirus.

IT is writtē, that since Noes floud, the first king of the THESPROTIANS, and of the MOLOSSIANS, was Phaëton, one of those who came with Pelasgus, into the realme of EPIRVS. But some say otherwise, that Deucalion, and his wife Pyrra remained there, after they had built and founded the temple of Dodone, in the contry of the MOLOSSIANS. But howsoeuer it was, a great while after that, Neoptolemus the sonne of Achilles, bringing thither a great number of people with him, conquered the contry, and after him left a succession of kinges, which were called after his name, the Pyrrides: bicause that from his infancy he was surnamed Pyrrus, as much to say, as redde: and one of his legittimate sonnes whom he had by Lanassa, the daughter of Cleodes, the sonne of Hillus, was also named by him Pyrrus. And this is the cause why Achilles is honored as a god in EPIRVS, beinge called in their language, Aspetos, that is to say, mighty, or very great. But from the first kinges of that race vntill the time of Tharrytas, there is no memory nor mencion made of them, nor of their power that raigned in the meane time, bicause they all became very barbarous, and vtterly voyde of ciuility. Tharrytas was in deede the first that beautified the cities of his contry with the GRECIAN tongue, brought in ciuill lawes and customes, and made his name famous to the posterity that followed. This Tharrytas left a sonne called Alcetas, of Alcetas came Arymbas, of Arymbas and Troiade his wife, came AEacides, who maried Phthia, the daughter of Menon THESSALIAN: A famous man in the time of the warres surnamed Lamiacus, and one that had farre greater authority then any other of the confederates, after Leosthenes. This AEacides had two daughters by his wife Phthia, to say, Deidamia and Troiade, and one sonne called Pyrrus. In his time the MOLOSSIANS rebelled, draue him out of his kingdome, & put the crowne into the hands of the sonnes of Neoptolemus. Whereupon all the frends of AEacides that could be taken, were generally murdered, and slaine outright. Androclides, & Angelus in the meane time stale away Pyrrus, being yet but a suckling babe (whome his enemies neuertheless egerly sought for to haue destroyed) and fled away with him as fast as possibly they might, with few seruauntes, his nurses and necessary women only to looke to the childe, and giue it sucke: by reason whereof their flight was much hindered, so as they could go no great iorneys, but that they might easily be ouertaken by them that followed. For which cause they put the childe into the handes of

How Pyrrus being an infant was saued.

Androcli-

A Androclion, Hippias, and Neander, three lusty young men, whome they trusted with him, and commaunded them to runne for life to a certaine citie of MACEDON, called MEGARES: and they them selues in the meane time, partely by intreaty, & partely by force, made stay of those that followed them till night. So as with much a doe hauinge driuen them backe, they ranne after them that caried the childe Pyrrus, whom they ouertooke at sunne set. And now, wening they had bene safe, and out of all daunger: they found it cleane contrary. For when they came to the riuer vnder the towne walles of MEGARES, they saw it so rough and swift, that it made them afrayed to beholde it: and when they gaged the forde, they found it vnpossible to wade through, it was so sore risen and troubled with the fall of the raine, besides that the darkenesse of the night made euery thing seeme feareful vnto them. So as they now that caried the child, B thought it not good to venter the passage ouer of them selues alone, with the women that tended the childe: but hearing certaine contrymen on the other side, they prayed and besought them in the name of the goddes, that they would helpe them to passe ouer the child, showing Pyrrus vnto them a farre of. But the contrymen by reason of the roaringe of the riuer vnderstoode them not. Thus they continued a longe space, the one cryinge, the other lystning, yet could they not vnderstand one an other, til at the last one of the company bethought him selfe to pill of a peece of the barke of an oke, & vpon that he wrote with the tongue of a buckle, the hard fortune and necessity of the childe. Which he tyed to a stone to geue it weight, and so threw it ouer to the other side of the riuer: other say that he did pricke the barke through with the point of a dart which he cast ouer. The contrymen on the other side of the riuer, hauinge C red what was wrytten, and vnderstanding thereby the present daunger the childe was in: felled downe trees in all the hast they could possibly, bounde them together, and so passed ouer the riuer. And it fortuned that the first man of them that passed ouer, and tooke the child, was called Achilles: the residue of the contrymen passed ouer also, and tooke the other that came with the childe, and conueyed them ouer as they came first to hand. And thus hauing escaped their hāds, by easie iorneys they came at the length vnto Glaucias king of ILLYRIA, whom they found in his house sitting by his wife: and layed downe the childe in the middest of the flower before him. The king hereuppon stayed a long time without vttering any one word, waying with him selfe what was best to be done: bicause of the feare he had of Cassander, a mortall enemy of AEacides. In the meane time, the childe Pyrrus creeping of all foure, tooke hold of D the kinges gowne, and scrawled vp by that, and so got vp on his feete against the kings knees. At the first, the king laughed to see the childe: but after it pitied him againe, bicause the child seemed like an humble suter that came to seeke sanctuary in his armes. Other say that Pyrrus came not to Glaucias, but vnto the alter of the familiar gods, alongest the which he got vp on his feete, and embraced it with both his hands. Which Glaucias imagining to be done by gods prouidence, presently deliuered the childe to his wife, gaue her the charge of him, and willed her to see him brought vp with his owne. Shortely after, his enemies sent to demaunde the childe of him: and moreouer, Cassander caused two hundred talents to be offered him, to deliuer the childe Pyrrus into his handes. Howebeit Glaucias would neuer graunt thereunto, but contrarily, when Pyrrus was comen to twelue yeares olde, brought him into his contry of E E PIRVS with an army, and stablished him king of the realme againe. Pyrrus had a great maiesty in his countenaunce, but yet in deede more fearefull then frendly. He had also no teeth in his vpper iawe that stoode distinctly one from an other, but one whole bone through out his gomme, marked a litle at the top only, with certaine riftes in the place where the teeth should be deuided. Men helde opinion also, that he did heale them that were sicke of the splene, by sacrificinge a white cocke, and touchinge the place of the splene on the left side of them that were sicke, softely with his right foote, they lying on their backes: and there was not so poore nor simple a man that craued this remedy of him, but he gaue it him, and tooke the cocke he sacrificed, for reward of the remedy, which pleased him very well. They say also that the great toe of his right foote had some secrete vertue in it. For when he was dead, and that they had F burnt all partes of his body, and consumed it to ashes: his great toe was whole, and had no hurt at all. But of that, we will wryte more hereafter. Now, when he was seuenteene yeares of age, thinking him selfe sure enough of his kingdome, it chaunced him to make a iorney into ILLY-

RIA, where he maried one of Glaucias daughters, with whom he had bene brought vp. But his backe was no ſooner turned, but the MOLOSSIANS rebelled againe againſt him, & draue out his frends, & ſeruaunts, and deſtroyed all his goods, and yelded themſelues vnto his aduerſary Neoptolemus. King Pyrrus hauing thus loſt his kingdom, & ſeeing himſelf forſaken on all ſides, went to Demetrius (Antigonus ſonne) that had maried his ſiſter Deidamia, who in her young age was aſſured to Alexander, the ſonne of Alexander the great, and of Roxane, and was called his wife. But when all that race was brought to wicked ende, Demetrius then maried her, being come to full and able age. And in that great battell which was ſtriken neere to the citie of HIPSVS, where all the kinges fought together, Pyrrus being then but a young man, and with Demetrius, put them all to flight that fought with him, and was worthely reputed for the valianteſt prince amongeſt them all. Furthermore, when Demetrius was ouercome, and had loſt the battell: Pyrrus neuer forſooke him, but faithfully did keepe for him the cities of GREECE, which he put into his hands. And afterwards when peace was concluded betwixt Demetrius and Ptolomie, Pyrrus was ſent an oſtage for Demetrius into the realme of ÆGIPTE: where he made Ptolomie know (both in huntinge, and in other exerciſes of his perſone) that he was very ſtrong, harde, and able to endure any labor. Furthermore perceiuing that Berenice amongeſt all king Ptolomies wiues, was beſt beloued and eſteemed of her husbande, both for her vertue and wiſedome: he beganne to entertaine and honor her aboue all the reſt. For he was a man that could tell how to humble him ſelfe towardes the great (by whom he might winne benefit) and knewe alſo how to creepe into their credit: and in like manner was he a great ſcorner and deſpiſer of ſuch as were his inferiors. Moreouer, for that he was found maruelous honorable and of fayer condicion, he was preferred before all other young princes, to be the huſbande of Antigona, the daughter of Queene Berenice, whom ſhe had by Philip, before ſhe was maried vnto Ptolomie. From thenceforth growing through the allyance of that mariage, more and more into eſtimacion and fauor by meanes of his wife Antigona, who ſhewed her ſelfe very vertuous and louing towardes him: he found meanes in the ende, to get both men and money to returne againe into the realme of EPIRVS, and to conquer it: ſo was he then very well receiued of the people, and the better, for the malice they bare to Neoptolemus, bicauſe he dealt both hardly and cruelly with them. That notwithſtandinge, Pyrrus fearinge leaſt Neoptolemus would repaire vnto ſome of the other kings, to ſeeke ayde againſt him, thought good to make peace with him. Whereupon it was agreed betwene them, that they ſhould both together be kinges of EPIRVS. But in proceſſe of time, ſome of their men ſecretly made ſtrife againe betwene them, and ſet them at defyance one with an other: and the chiefeſt cauſe as it is ſayed, that angered Pyrrus moſt, grew apon this. The kinges of EPIRVS had an auncient cuſtome of great antiquity, after they had made ſolemne ſacrifice vnto Iupiter Martiall, (in a certaine place in the prouince of MOLOSSIDE, called PASSARON) to take their othe, and to be ſworne to the EPIROTES, that they would raigne well and iuſtly, accordinge to the lawes and ordinaunces of the contry: and to receiue the ſubiectes othes interchaungeably alſo, that they would defend and maintaine them in their kingdome, according to the lawes in like maner. This ceremony was done in the preſence of both the kinges, and they with their frendes did both geue and receiue preſentes eche of other. At this meetinge and ſolemnity, amonge other, one Gelon a moſt faithfull ſeruaunt and aſſured frend vnto Neoptolemus, who beſides great ſhowes of frendſhippe and honor he did vnto Pyrrus, gaue him two payer of draught oxen, which one Myrtilus a cuppebearer of Pyrrus beinge preſent, and ſeeinge, did craue of his maſter. But Pyrrus denyed to geue them vnto him whereat Myrtilus was very angry. Gelon perceiuinge that Mytilus was angry, prayed him to ſuppe with him that night. Now ſome ſay, he ſought to abuſe Myrtilus, bicauſe he was fayer and younge: and beganne to perſwade him after ſupper to take parte with Neoptolemus, and to poyſon Pyrrus. Myrtilus made as though he was willing to geue eare to this perſwaſion, and to be well pleaſed withall. But in the meane time, he went and tolde his maſter of it, by whoſe commaundement he made Alexicrates, Pyrrus chiefe cuppebearer, to talke with Gelon about this practiſe, as though he had alſo geuen his conſent to it, and was willinge to be partaker of the enterpriſe. This did Pyrrus to haue two witneſſes, to proue the pretended poyſoninge of him. Thus Gelon beinge finely deceiued, and

A Neoptolemus alſo with him, both imagininge they had cunningly ſponne the threde of their treaſon: Neoptolemus was ſo glad of it, that he could not kepe it to him ſelfe, but told it to certaine of his frendes. And on a time going to be mery with his ſiſter, he could not keepe it in, but muſt be pratling of it to her, ſuppoſing no body had heard him but her ſelfe, bicauſe there was no liuing creature neere them, ſauing Phœnareta Samons wife, the kinges chiefe heardman of all his beaſtes, and yet ſhe was layed apon a litle bed by, and turned towards the wall: ſo that ſhe ſeemed as though ſhe had ſlept. But hauing heard all their talke, and no body miſtruſting her: the next morning ſhe went to Antigona king Pyrrus wife, and told her euery worde what ſhe had heard Neoptolemus ſay to his ſiſter. Pyrrus hearing this, made no countenaunce of any thing at that time. But hauinge made ſacrifice vnto the goddes, he bad Neoptolemus to ſupper
B to his houſe, where he ſlue him, being well informed before of the good will the chiefeſt men of the realme did beare him, who wiſhed him to diſpatch Neoptolemus, & not to content him ſelfe with a peece of EPIRVS only, but to follow his naturall inclination, being borne to great thinges: and for this cauſe therefore, this ſuſpition fallinge out in the meane while, he preuented Neoptolemus, and ſlue him firſt. And furthermore, remembringe the pleaſures he had receiued of Ptolomie and Berenice, he named his firſt ſonne by his wife Antigona, Ptolomie, and hauing built a city in the PRESCQVE, an Ile of EPIRVS, did name it BERENICIDA. When he had done that, imagining great matters in his head, but more in his hope, he firſt determined with him ſelfe howe to winne that which lay neereſt vnto him: and ſo tooke occaſion by this C meanes, firſt to ſet foote into the Empire of MACEDON. The eldeſt ſonne of Caſſander, called Antipater, put his owne mother Theſſalonica to death, and draue his brother Alexander out of his owne contry, who ſent to Demetrius for helpe, and called in Pyrrus alſo to his ayde. Demetrius being troubled with other matters, could not ſo quickely go thither. And Pyrrus being arriued there, demaunded for his charge ſuſteined, the citie of NYMPHÆA, with all the ſea coaſtes of MACEDON: and beſides all that, certaine landes alſo that were not belonginge to the auncient crowne and reuenues of the kinges of MACEDON, but were added vnto it by force of armes, as Ambracia, Acarnania, and Amphilochia. All theſe, the young king Alexander leauinge vnto him, he tooke poſſeſſion thereof, and put good garriſons into the ſame in his owne name: and conquering the reſt of MACEDON in the name of Alexander, put his brother Antipater to great diſtreſſe. In the meane time kinge Lyſimachus lacked no good will to helpe D Antipater with his force, but being buſied in other matters, had not the meane to doe it. Howbeit knowinge very well that Pyrrus in acknowledginge the great pleaſures he had receiued of Ptolomie, woulde deny him nothinge: he determined to wryte counterfeate letters to him in Ptolomies name, and thereby inſtantly to pray and require him to leaue of the warres begonne againſt Antipater, and to take of him towardes the defrayinge of his charges, the ſumme of three hundred talentes. Pyrrus opening the letters, knew ſtraight that this was but a fetch and deuiſe of Lyſimachus. For king Ptolomies common manner of greeting of him, which he vſed at the beginning of his letters, was not in them obſerued: To my ſonne Pyrrus, health. But in thoſe counterfeate was, king Ptolomie, vnto king Pyrrus, health. Whereupon he preſently pronounced Lyſimachus for a naughty man: neuertheleſſe, afterwardes he made peace with An-
E tipater, and they met together at a day appointed, to be ſworne vpon the ſacrifices vnto the articles of peace. There were three beaſtes brought to be ſacrificed, a goate, a bul, and a ramme: of the which, the ramme fell downe dead of him ſelfe before he was touched, whereat all the ſtanders by fell a laughinge. But there was a Soothſayer, one Theodotus, that perſwaded Pyrrus not to ſweare: ſaying, that this ſigne and token of the gods did threaten one of the three kings with ſodaine death. For which cauſe Pyrrus concluded no peace. Now Alexanders warres beinge ended, Demetrius notwithſtanding came to him, knowing well enough at his comming that Alexander had no more neede of his aide, and that he did it only but to feare him. They had not bene many dayes together, but thone beganne to miſtruſt thother, and to ſpie all the wayes they could to intrappe eche other: but Demetrius embracing the firſt occaſion offered, F preuented Alexander, and ſlue him, being a young man, and proclaimed him ſelfe king of MACEDON in his roome. Now Demetrius had certaine quarrells before againſt Pyrrus, bicauſe he had ouerrunne the contry of THESSALIE: and furthermore, greedy couetouſnes to haue the more(which is a common vice with princes and noble men)made, that being ſo neere neighbours, the one ſtoode in feare and miſtruſt of the other, and yet much more after the death of Deidamia. But now that they both occupied all MACEDON betwene them, and were to make diuiſion of one ſelfe kingdome. Now I ſay began the matter and occaſion of quarrell, to grow the greater betwene them. Whereupon Demetrius went with his army to ſet apon the AETOLIANS, and hauinge conquered the contry, left Pantauchus his Lieutenaunt there with a great army: and him ſelfe in perſon in the meane time, marched againſt Pyrrus, and Pyrrus on thother ſide againſt him. They both miſſed of meetinge, and Demetrius goinge on further on the one ſide, entred into the realme of EPIRVS, and brought a great ſpoyle away with him: Pyrrus on the other ſide marched on, till he came to the place where Pantauchus was. To whome he gaue battell, and it was valliantly fought out betwene the ſouldiers of either party, but ſpecially betwene the two Generalls. For doutleſſe, Pantauchus was the valliantеſt Captaine, the ſtowteſt man, and of the greateſt experience in armes, of all the Captaines and ſouldiers Demetrius had. Whereupon, Pantauchus truſting in his ſtrength and corage, aduaunced him ſelfe forwardes, and luſtely chalenged the combat of Pyrrus. Pyrrus on the other ſide being inferior to no king in valliantnes, nor in deſire to winne honor, as he that would aſcribe vnto himſelfe the glory of Achilles, more for the imitacion of his valliancy, then for that he was diſcended of his blood: paſſed through the middeſt of the battell vnto the firſt rancke, to buckle with Pantauchus. Thus they beganne to charge one an other, firſt with their dartes, and then comming nearer, fought with their ſwordes, not only artificially, but alſo with great force and fury: vntill ſuch time as Pyrrus was hurte in one place, and he hurte Pantauchus in two. The one neere vnto his throte and the other in his legge: ſo as in the ende Pyrrus made him turne his backe, and threw him to the ground, but neuertheleſſe killed him not. For, ſo ſoone as he was downe, his men tooke him, and caried him away. But the EPIROTES encoraged by the victory of their kinge, and the admiration of his valliantneſſe, ſtucke to it ſo luſtely, that in the end they brake the battell of the MACEDONIAN footemen: & hauing put them to flight, followed them ſo liuely, that they ſlewe a great number of them, and tooke fiue thouſande priſoners. This ouerthrowe did not ſo much fill the hartes of the MACEDONIANS with anger, for the loſſe they had receiued, nor with the hate conceiued againſt Pyrrus: as it wanne Pyrrus great fame & honor, making his corage and valliantnes to be wondred at of all uch as were preſent at the battell that ſaw him fight, and how he layed about him. For they thought that they ſaw in his face the very life and agility of Alexander the great, and the right ſhadow as it were, ſhowinge the force and fury of Alexander him ſelfe in that fight. And where other kinges did but only counterfeate Alexander the great in his purple garments, and in numbers of ſouldiers and gardes about their perſones, and in a certaine facion and bowing of their neckes a litle, and in vttering his ſpeech with an high voyce: Pyrrus only was like vnto him, and followed him in his marſhall deedes and valliant actes. Furthermore, for his experience and skill in warlike diſcipline, the bookes he wrote him ſelfe thereof, do amply proue and make manifeſt. Furthermore, they reporte, that kinge Antigonus being asked, whome he thought to be the greateſt Captaine: made aunſwer, Pyrrus, ſo farre foorth as he might liue to be olde, ſpeaking only of the Captaines of his time. But Hanniball generally ſayd, Pyrrus was the greateſt Captaine of experience and skil in warres of all other, Scipio the ſecond, and him ſelfe the third: as we haue wrytten in the life of Scipio. So it ſeemeth that Pyrrus gaue his whole life and ſtudy to the diſcipline of warres, as that which in dede was princely and meete for a king, making no reckening of all other knowledge. And furthermore touching this matter, they reporte that he being at a feaſt one day, a queſtion was asked him, whom he thought to be the beſt player of the flute, Python or Cepheſias: whereunto he aunſwered, that Polyperchon in his opinion was the beſt Captaine, as if he would haue ſayd, that was the only thing a prince ſhould ſeeke for, and which he ought chiefly to learne and know. He was very gentle and familiar with his frendes, eaſie to forgeue when any had offended him, and maruelous deſirous to requite and acknowledge any curteſie or pleaſure by him receiued. And that was the cauſe why he did very vnpaciently take the death of AEropus, not ſo much for his death (which he knewe was a common thing to euery liuing creature) as for that he was angry with himſelfe he had deferred the time

A so long, that time it selfe had cut him of from all occasion and meanes to requite the curtesies he had receiued of him. True it is that money lent, may be repayed againe vnto the heires of the lender: but yet it greueth an honest nature, when he can not recompence the good will of the lender, of whom he hath receiued the good turne. An other time Pyrrus being in the city of AMBRACIA, there were certaine of his frends that gaue him counsel to put a naughty man out of the city that did nothing but speake ill of him. But he aunswered, it is better (quod he) to keepe him here still, speakinge ill of vs but to a fewe: then driuing him away, to make him speake ill of vs euery where. Certaine youthes were brought before him on a time, who making mery together, drinking freely, were bolde with the king to speake their pleasure of him in very vnduetifull sorte. So, Pyrrus askinge them whether it was true they sayed so or no: it

B is true, and it please your grace, sayed one of them, we sayed it in deede, and had not our wine failed vs, we had spoken a great deale more. The king laughed at it, and pardoned them. After the death of Antigona, he maried many wiues to increase his power withall, and to gette moe frendes. For he maried the daughter of Autoleon kinge of PÆONIA, and Bircenna the daughter of Bardillis, king of ILLYRIA, and Lanassa, the daughter of Agathocles, tyran of SYRACVSA, that brought him for her dower the Ile of CORPHVE, which her father had taken. By Antigona his first wife, he had a sonne called Ptolomie: By Lanassa, an other called Alexander: and by Bircenna, an other (the youngest of all) called Helenus: all which though they were marshall men by race and naturall inclination, yet were they brought vp by him in warres, and therein trained as it were euen from their cradell. They wryte, that one of his sonnes beinge

C but a boy, asked him one day to which of them he would leaue his kingdome: Pyrrus aunswered the boy, to him that hath the sharpest sworde. That was much like the tragicall curse wherewith Oedipus cursed his children.

Let them (for me) deuide, both goodes, yea rentes and lande:
VVith trenchaunt swword, and bloody blowes, by force of mighty hande.

So cruell, hatefull, and beastly is the nature of ambition and desire of rule. But after this battell, Pyrrus returned home againe to his contry, full of honor and glory, his hart highly exalted, and his minde throughly contented. And as at his returne the EPIROTES his subiectes called him an Eagle, he aunswered them: if I be an Eagle, it is through you that I am so, for your weapons are the winges that haue raised me vp. Shortely after, beinge aduertised that

D Demetrius was fallen sicke, and in great daunger of death, he sodainely went into MACEDON, only to inuade it, and to make pray thereof: howbeit he had in deede almost taken the whole realme, and made him selfe Lord of all without stroke striken. For he came as farre as the city of EDESSA, and found no resistance: but rather to the contrary, many of the contry willingly came to his campe, and submitted them selues. The daunger Demetrius was in to loose his realme, did moue him more: then the disease and sickenes of his body. And on the other side, his frendes, seruauntes, and Captaines, hauing gathered a great number of men of warre together in maruelous shorte time, marched with great speede towardes Pyrrus, being earnestly bent to do some exploite against him: who being come into MACEDON but to make a roade only apon them, would not tary them, but fled, and flying, lost parte of his men, bicause the

E MACEDONIANS followed him hard, and set apon him by the way. But now, though they had driuen Pyrrus thus easily out of MACEDON, Demetrius for all that did not make light accompt of him: but pretending greater thinges, (as to recouer the landes and dominions of his father, with an army of an hundred thousand fighting men, and of fiue hundred sayle which he put to the sea) would not stande to make warres against Pyrrus, neither yet leaue the MACEDONIANS (whilest he was absent) so daungerous a neighbour, and so ill to deale withall. But lacking leasure to make warres with Pyrrus, concluded a peace with him, to the ende he might with the more liberty set apon the other kinges. Thus now, the peace concluded betwixt Demetrius & Pyrrus, the other kinges and princes beganne to finde out Demetrius intent, and why he had made so great preparation and being afrayed therof, wrote vnto Pyrrus by their Ambassadors,

F that they wondred how he could let go such oportunity and occasion, and to tary till Demetrius might with better leasure make warres vpon him. And why he chose rather to tary & fight with him for the aulters, temples, and sepulchers of the MOLOSSIANS, when he shoulde be

A to farre as yet, but rather ſtanding in doubt of their faith: graunted Lyſimachus his deſire, and thereupon deuided all the cities and prouinces of the realme of MACEDON betwene them. This partition was profitable for them both at that preſent, and ſtoode then to good purpoſe to pacifie the warre, that otherwiſe might ſodainely haue riſen betwene them. But ſhortly after, they found that this partition was no end of their enmity, but rather a beginning of quarrell and diſſention betwene them. For they whoſe auarice and inſatiable greedy appetite, neither the ſea, the mountaines, nor the vnhabitable deſertes coulde containe, nor yet the confynes that ſeparate ASIA from EVROPE determine: howe ſhould they be content with their owne, without vſurping others, when their fronters ioyne ſo neere together, that nothing deuides them? Sure it is not poſſible. For to ſay truely, they are willingly together by the eares,

B hauing theſe two curſed thinges rooted in them: that they continually ſeeke occaſion how to ſurpriſe eche other, and either of them enuies his neighbours well doing. Howbeit in apparaunce they vſe theſe two tearmes, of peace and warres, as they doe money: vſinge it as they thinke good, not accordinge to right and iuſtice, but for their priuate profit. And truely they are men of farre greater honeſty, that make open warre, and auow it: then thoſe that diſguiſe and colour the delay of their wicked purpoſe, by the holy name of inſtice or frendſhip. Which Pyrrus did truely then verifie. For deſiring to kepe Demetrius downe from riſing an other time, and that he ſhould not reuiue againe as eſcaped from a long daungerous diſeaſe: he went to aide the GREECIANS againſt him, and was at ATHENS, where they ſuffered him to come in-

Peace, and warre, vſed lyke money.

Pyrrus ayded the Grecians againſt Demetrius.

C ſtle againe the ſame day, he tolde the ATHENIANS he was greatly beholdinge vnto them for their curteſie, and the great truſt they had repoſed in him: wherefore to requite them againe, he gaue them counſell, neuer to ſuffer prince nor king from thenceforth to enter into their city, if they were wiſe, nor once open their gates vnto them. So, after that he made peace with Demetrius, who within ſhorte time beinge gone to make warres in ASIA, Pyrrus yet once againe (perſwaded thereunto by Lyſimachus) cauſed all THESSALIE to riſe againſt him, & went him ſelfe to ſet vpon thoſe garriſons which Demetrius had left in the cities of GREECE, liking better to continue the MACEDONIANS in warre, then to leaue them in peace: beſides that him ſelfe alſo was of ſuch a nature, as could not long continue in peace. Demetrius thus in the ende being vtterly ouerthrowen in SYRIA, Lyſimachus ſeeing him ſelfe free from feare on that

D ſide, and being at good leaſure, as hauing nothing to trouble him otherwayes: went ſtraight to make warre apon Pyrrus, who then remained neere vnto the city of EDESSA, & meeting by the way with the conuoy of vittells comming towards him, ſet vpon the conducters, and rifled them wholly. By this meanes, firſt he diſtreſſed Pyrrus for want of vittels: then he corrupted the princes of MACEDON with letters & meſſengers, declaring vnto thē, what ſhame they ſuſteined to haue made a ſtraunger their king (whoſe aunceſters had euer bene their vaſſalls & ſubiectes) and to haue turned all thoſe out of MACEDON, that had bene familiar frendes of king Alexander the great. Many of the MACEDONIANS were wonne by theſe perſwaſions, which fact ſo feared Pyrrus, that he departed out of MACEDON with his men of warre, the EPIROTES, and other his confederates: and ſo loſt MACEDON by the ſelfe ſame meanes he wanne

E it. Kinges and princes therefore muſt not blame priuate men, though they chaunge and alter ſometime for their profit: for therein they do but follow the example of princes, who teache them all diſloyalty, treaſon, and infidelity, iudging him moſt worthy of gaine, that leaſt obſerueth iuſtice and equity. So Pyrrus being come home againe to his kingdome of EPIRVS, forſakinge MACEDON altogether, fortune made him happy enough, and in deede he had good meanes to liue peaceably at home, without any trouble, if he could haue contented him ſelfe only with the ſouerainty ouer his owne naturall ſubiectes. But thinking, that if he did neither hurt other, nor that other did hurt him, he could not tell how to ſpend his time, and by peace he ſhould pyne away for ſorow, as Homer ſayd of Achilles:

He languiſhed and pynde by taking eaſe and reſt:
F And in the vvarres vvhere trauaile vvas, he liked euer beſt.

And thus ſeeking matter of newe trouble, fortune preſented him this occaſion. About this time, the ROMAINES by chaunce made warre with the TARENTINES, who could nether beare their force, nor yet deuise how to pacifie the same, by reason of the rashnesse, folly, and wic- A of them were put to silence, through the noyse and fury of the people, who cried for warres.

Some other seeing them checked, and taken vp by the multitude in this manner, woulde no

it: and when they had geuen silence to heare him sing, he spake vnto them with a lowd voice also (as many as you be) will take your liberty whilest you may enioy it. For when king Pyrrus shalbe in this city, you shall liue I warrant ye after an other sorte, and not as ye now do. These wordes of Meton moued many of the TARENTINES, and sodainly there ran a rumor through all the assembly, that he had sayed truely. But they that had offended the ROMAINES, fearing if peace were made, that they shoulde be deliuered into their handes, they checked the peo-

And that once conquered, it is moſt certaine there durſt not one of all our enemies that now doe daily vexe and trouble vs, lift vp their heades or handes againſt vs. No ſurely, ſayd Cineas: for it is a cleare caſe, that with ſo great a power we may eaſily recouer the realme of MACEDON againe, and commaunde all GREECE beſides, without let of any. But when we haue all in our handes: what ſhall we doe in the ende? Then Pyrrus laughing, tolde him againe: we will then (good Cineas) be quiet, & take our eaſe, and make feaſts euery day, & be as mery one with an other as we can poſſible. Cineas hauing brought him to that poynt, ſayd againe to him: my Lord, what letteth

Theſe laſt wordes of Cineas, did rather offende Pyrrus, then make him to alter his minde: for he was not ignorant of the happy ſtate he ſhoulde thereby forgoe, yet could he not leaue of the hope of that he did ſo much deſire. So he ſent Cineas before vnto the TARENTINES, with three thouſand footemen: and afterwardes the TARENTINES hauing ſent him great ſtore of flatbottomes, gallies, and of all ſortes of paſſengers, he ſhipped into them twenty elephantes, three thouſand horſemen, and

Notwithſtandinge, the ſhip which he was in him ſelfe, by great toile of the pilots and mariners turning to windeward, and with much a do, and maruelous daunger recouered the coaſt of ITALIE. Howbeit the reſt of his fleete were violently diſperſed here and there, whereof ſome of them failinge their courſe into ITALIE, were caſt into the ſeas of LIBYA, and SICILIA. The other not able to recouer the pointe of APVLIA, were benighted, and the ſea being hie wrought, by violence caſt them apon the ſhoare, and againſt the rockes, and made ſhipwrackes of them, the Admirall onely reſerued, which through her ſtrength, and the greatnes of her burden, reſiſted the force of the ſea that moſt violently bet againſt her. Wherefore Pyrrus caſtinge the perill euery way, thought beſt to leape into the ſea. After him foorthwith lept his gard, his ſeruauntes, and other his familiar frendes, venturing their liues to ſaue him. But the darkenes of the night, and rage of the waues (which the ſhore breakinge, forced ſo to rebound backe vpon them) with the great noyſe alſo, did ſo hinder their ſwimming: that it was euen day before they could recouer any lande, and yet was it by meanes that the winde fell. As for Pyrrus, he was ſo ſea beaten, and wearied with the waues, that he was able to do no more: though of himſelfe he had ſo great a harte, & ſtowte a corage, as was able to ouercome any perill. Moreouer, the MESSAPIANS (vpon whoſe coaſt the ſtorme had caſt him) ran out

F to helpe him, and diligently labored in all they coulde poſſible to ſaue him, and receiued alſo certaine of his ſhippes that had ſcaped, in which were a few horſemen, about two thowſande footemen, and two elephantes. With this ſmall force, Pyrrus marched on his iorney to goe by lande vnto TARENTVM: and Cineas being aduertiſed of his comming, went with his men to meete him. Now when he was come to TARENTVM, at the firſt he would doe nothing by force, nor againſt the goodwill of the inhabitantes: vntill ſuch time as his ſhippes that had eſcaped the daungers of the ſea, were all arriued, and the greateſt parte of his army comen together againe. But when he had all his army he looked for, ſeeing that the people of TARENTVM could neither ſaue them ſelues, nor be ſaued by any other, without ſtraight order & compulſion, bicauſe they made their reckening that Pyrrus ſhould fight for them, & in the meane time they would not ſtirre out of their houſes from bathing them ſelues, from banketing, and making good chere: firſt of all he cauſed all the parkes & places of ſhew to be ſhut vp, where they were wont to walke and diſporte them ſelues, in any kind of exerciſe, and as they walked, to talke of warres as it were in paſtime, & to fight with words, but not to come to the blowes. And further he forbad all feaſtinges, mommeries, and ſuch other like pleaſures, as at that time were out of ſeaſon. He trained them out alſo to exerciſe their weapons, and ſhewed him ſelfe very ſeuere in muſters, not pardoning any whoſe names were billed to ſerue in the warres: inſomuch as there were many (which vnacquainted with ſuch rough handling & gouernment) forſooke the city altogether, calling it a bondage, not to haue liberty to liue at their pleaſure. Furthermore, Pyrrus hauing intelligence that Leuinus the ROMAINE Conſul came againſt him with a great puiſant army, and that he was already entred into the lande of LVCANIA, where he deſtroyed and ſpoyled all the contry before him: albeit the TARENTINES aide of their confederates was not as yet comen, he thought it a great ſhame to ſuffer his enemies approche ſo nere him, and therefore taking that ſmall number he had, brought them into the fielde againſt Leuinus. Howbeit he ſent a herauld before to the ROMAINES, to vnderſtand of them, if (before they entred into this warre) they coulde be content the controuerſies they had with all the GREECIANS dwellinge in ITALIE, might be decided by iuſtice, and therein to referre them ſelues to his arbitremēt, who of him ſelfe would vndertake the pacification of thē. Whereunto the Conſull Leuinus made aunſwere, that the ROMAINES would neuer allow him for a iudge, neither did they feare him for an enemy. Wherfore Pyrrus going on ſtil, came to lodge in the plaine which is betwene the cities of PANDOSIA, & of HERACLEA: & hauing newes brought him that the ROMAINES were encamped very nere vnto him on the other ſide of the riuer of Siris, he tooke his horſe, and rode to the riuers ſide to view their campe. So hauing throughly conſidered the forme, the ſcituacion, and the order of the ſame, the maner of charging their watche, and all their facions of doing: he wondered much thereat. And ſpeaking to Megacles, one of his familiars about him, he ſayd: this order Megacles (quod he) though it be of barbarous people, yet is it not barbarouſly done, but we ſhall ſhortely proue their force. After he had thus taken this view, he beganne to be more carefull then he was before, and purpoſed to tary till the whole aide of their confederates were comen together, leauing men at the riuers ſide of Siris, to kepe the paſſage, if the enemies ventured to paſſe ouer as they did in dede. For they made haſt to preuent the aide that Pyrrus looked for, & paſſed their footemen ouer apon a bridge, and their horſemen at diuerſe fordes of the riuer: inſomuch as the GREECIANS fearinge leaſt they ſhoulde be compaſſed in behinde, drew backe. Pyrrus aduertiſed thereof, and being a litle troubled therwithall, cōmaunded the Captaines of his footemen preſently to put their bandes in battell ray, and not to ſturre till they knew his pleaſure: and he him ſelfe in the meane time marched on with three thowſande horſe, in hope to finde the ROMAINES by the riuer ſide, as yet out of order, & vtterly vnprouided. But when he ſaw a farre of a greater number of footemen with their targettes ranged in battell, on this ſide the riuer, and their horſemen marching towardes him in very good order: he cauſed his men to ioyne cloſe together, and him ſelfe firſt beganne the charge, being eaſie to be knowen from other, if it had bene no more but his paſſinge riche gliſteringe armor and furniture, and withall, for that his valliant dedes gaue manifeſt proofe of his well deſerued fame and renowne. For, though he valliantly beſturred his hands and body both, repulſing them he encountered withall in fight, yet he forgate not him ſelfe, nor neglected the iudgement & foreſight, which ſhould neuer be wanting in a Generall of an army: but as though he had not fought at all, quietly and diſcretly gaue order for euerie thinge, rydinge to and fro, to defende and encorage his men in thoſe places, where Pyrrus firſt conflict with the Romaines.

Pyrrus wiſedom & foreſight in battell.

A where he ſawe them in moſt diſtreſſe. But euen in the hotteſt of the battell, Leonatus MACEDONIAN, ſpyed an ITALIAN a man of armes, that followed Pyrrus vppe and downe where he went, and euer kept in manner of euen hande with him, to ſet apon him. Wherefore he ſayd to Pyrrus: my Lord doe you not ſee that barbarous man there vppon a baye horſe with white feete? Sure he looketh as though he ment to doe ſome notable feate and miſchiefe with his owne handes: for his eye is neuer of you, but wayteth only apon you, being ſharpe ſet to deale with your ſelfe & none other, & therefore take hede of him. Pyrrus aunſwered him, it is impoſſible Leonatus, for a man to auoyde his deſtinie: but neither he, nor any other ITALIAN whatſoeuer, ſhall haue any ioy to deale with me. And as they were talkinge thus of the matter, the ITALIAN taking his ſpeare in the middeſt, and ſetting ſpurres to his horſe, charged apon Pyr-
B rus, and ranne his horſe through and through with the ſame. Leonatus at the ſelfe ſame inſtant ſerued the ITALIANS horſe in the like manner, ſo as both their horſes fell dead to the ground. Howbeit Pyrrus men that were about him, ſaued him preſently, and ſlew the ITALIAN in the fielde, although he fought it out right valliantly. The ITALIANS name was Oplacus, borne in the city of FERENTVM, and was Captaine of a bande of men of armes. This miſchaunce made kinge Pyrrus looke the better to him ſelfe afterwardes, and ſeeinge his horſemen geue backe, ſent preſently to haſten his footemen forward, whom he ſtraight ſet in order of battell: and deliuering his armor and cloke to one of his familiars called Megacles, and being hidden as it were in Megacles armor, returned againe to the battell againſt the ROMAINES, who valiantly reſiſted him, ſo that the victory depended longe in doubt. For it is ſayd, that both the one ſide
C and the other did chaſe, and was chaſed, aboue ſeuen times in that conflict. The chaunginge of the kinges armor ſerued very well for the ſafety of his owne perſone, howebeit it was like to haue marred all, and to haue made him looſe the fielde. For many of his enemies ſet vppon Megacles, that ware the kings armor: and the partie that ſlue him dead, and threw him ſtarke to the grounde, was one Dexius by name, who quickely ſnatched of his head peece, tooke away his cloke, and ranne to Leuinus the Conſul, crying out alowde, that he had ſlaine Pyrrus, and withall ſhewed foorth the ſpoyles he ſuppoſed to haue taken from him. Which being caried about through all the bands, & openly ſhewed from hand to hand, made the ROMAINES maruelous ioyfull, and the GREECIANS to the contrary, both afeard and right ſorowfull: vntill ſ[illegible] time as Pyrrus hearing of it, went and paſſed alongeſt all his bandes bare headed, and D bar[illegible]ed, holdinge vp his hande to his ſouldiers, and geuinge them to vnderſtande with his owne voyce, that it was him ſelfe. The elephantes in the ende were they in deede that wanne the battell, and did moſt diſtreſſe the ROMAINES: for, their horſes ſeeing them a farre of, were ſore afrayed, and durſt not abide them, but caried their maſters backe in deſpite of them. Pyr- rus at the ſight thereof, made his THESSALIAN horſemen to geue a charge apon them whileſt they were in this diſorder, and that ſo luſtely, as they made the ROMAINES flie, and ſuſteine great ſlaughter. For Dionyſius wryteth, that there dyed few leſſe, then fifteene thowſand ROMAINES at that battell. But Hieronymus ſpeaketh onely of ſeuen thowſande. And of Pyrrus ſide, Dionyſius wryteth, there were ſlaine thirteene thowſande. But Hieronymus ſayth leſſe then foure thowſande: howebeit they were all of the beſt men of his army, and thoſe whome moſt E he truſted. King Pyrrus preſently hereupon alſo tooke the ROMAINES campe, which they forſooke, and wan many of their cities from their allyance, ſpoyled, and ouercame much of their contry. Inſomuch as he came within ſix and thirty mile of ROME, whither came to his aide, as confederates of the TARENTINES, the LVCANIANS, & the SAMNITES, whom he rebuked bicauſe they came to late to the battel. Howbeit a man might eaſily ſee in his face, that he was not a litle glad and proude to haue ouerthrowen ſo great an army of the ROMAINES with his owne men, and the aide of the TARENTINES onely. On thother ſide, the ROMAINES hartes were ſo great, that they would not depoſe Leuinus from his Conſullſhippe, notwithſtandinge the loſſe he had receiued: and Caius Fabricius ſayed openly, that they were not the EPIRO-
F TES that had ouercomen the ROMAINES, but Pyrrus had ouercome Leuinus: meaning thereby, that this ouerthrow chaunced vnto them, more through the ſubtilty and wiſe conduction of the Generall, then through the valliant feates and worthines of his army. And hereuppon they ſpeedily ſupplied their legyons againe that were miniſhed, with other newe ſouldiers in the dead mens place, and leauied a freſh force beſides, ſpeaking brauely and fiercely of this warre, like men whoſe hartes were nothinge appawled. Whereat Pyrrus maruelinge much, thought good firſt to ſend to the Romaines, to proue if they would geue any eare to an offer of peace, knowing right well that the winning of the city of Rome was no eaſie matter to cõpaſſe, or attaine, with that ſtrength he preſently had: and alſo that it would be greatly to his glory, if he could bring them to peace after this his valliant victory. And hereupon he ſent Cineas to Rome, who ſpake with the chiefeſt of the city, and offred preſentes to them and their wiues, in the behalfe of the king his maſter. Howbeit, neither man nor woman would receiue any at his handes, but aunſwered all with one voyce: that if the peace might be general to all, they all priuately woulde be at the kinges commaundement, and woulde be glad of his frendſhippe. Moreouer, when Cineas had talked in open audience before the Senate, of many curteous offers, and had deliuered them profitable capitulacions of peace: they accepted none, nor ſhewed any affection to geue eare vnto them, although he offered to deliuer them their priſoners home againe without raunſome, that had bene taken at the battell, and promiſed alſo to aide them in the conqueſt of Italie, requiring no other recompence at their handes, ſauing their goodwills only to his maſter, & aſſurance for the Tarentines, that they ſhould not be annoyed for any thinge paſt, without demaunde of other matter. Neuertheleſſe in the ende, when they had hearde theſe offers, many of the Senators yeelded, and were willinge to make peace: alleaginge that they had already loſt a great battell, and howe they looked for a greater, when the force of the confederates of Italie ſhould ioyne together with king Pyrrus power. But Appius Claudius, a famous man, who came no more to the Senate, nor delt in matters of ſtate at all by reaſon of his age, and partely bicauſe he was blinde: when he vnderſtoode of king Pyrrus offers, and of the common brute that ranne through the city, howe the Senate were in minde to agree to the capitulacions of peace propounded by Cineas, he could not abide, but cauſed his ſeruauntes to cary him in his chayer apon their armes vnto the Senate dore, his ſonnes, and ſonnes in law taking him in their armes, caried him ſo into the Senate houſe. The Senate made ſilence to honor the comming in of ſo notable & worthy a perſonage: and he ſo ſoone as they had ſette him in his ſeate, beganne to ſpeake in this ſorte. Hitherunto with great impacience (my Lordes of Rome) haue I borne the loſſe of my ſight, but now, I would I were alſo as deafe as I am blinde, that I might not (as I doe) heare the [illegible]orte of your diſhonorable conſultacions determined vpon in Senate, which tende to ſub[illegible] the glorious fame and reputacion of Rome. What is now become of all your great and mighty bragges you blaſed abroade, through the whole worlde? that if Alexander the great him ſelfe had come into Italie, in the time that our fathers had bene in the flower of their age, and we in the prime of our youth, they would not haue ſayed euery where that he was altogether inuincible, as now at this preſent they doe: but either he ſhould haue left his body ſlaine here in battell, or at the leaſt wiſe haue bene driuen to flie, and by his death or flyinge ſhoulde greatly haue enlarged the renowne and glory of Rome? you plainly ſhow it now, that all theſe words ſpoken thẽ, were but vaine & arrogant vaunts of fooliſh pride. Conſidering that you tremble for feare of the Molossians & Chaonians, who were euer a pray to the Macedonians: and that ye are afrayed of Pyrrus alſo, who all his life time ſerued and followed one of the gard vnto Alexander the great, and nowe is come to make warres in theſe partes, not to aide the Greecians inhabiting in Italie, but to flie from his enemies there about his owne contry, offering you to conquer all the reſt of Italie with an army, wherewith he was nothing able to kepe a ſmall parte of Macedon only for him ſelfe. And therefore you muſt not perſwade your ſelues, that in making peace with him, you ſhall thereby be rid of him: but rather ſhall you draw others to come & ſet apon you beſides. For they will vtterly deſpiſe you, when they ſhal heare ye are ſo eaſily ouercome, and that you haue ſuffered Pyrrus to eſcape your handes, before you made him feele the iuſt reward of his bolde preſumptuous attempt vpon you: carying with him for a further hier, this aduantage ouer you, that he hath geuen a great occaſion both to the Samnites, and Tarentines, hereafter to mocke and deride you. After that Appius had tolde this tale vnto the Senate, euery one through the whole aſſembly, deſired rather warre then peace. They diſpatched Cineas away thereupon with this aunſwere, that if

The noble minde of the Romaines.

Appius Claudius diſſwaded the Romaines from making peace with Pyrrus.

Appius Claudius oration to the Senate.

A if Pyrrus ſought the ROMAINES frendſhippe, he muſt firſt departe out of ITALIE, and then ſende vnto them to treate of peace: but ſo longe as he remained there with his army, the ROMAINES would make warres vpon him, with all the force and power they could make, yea although he had ouerthrowen and ſlaine tenne thowſand ſuch Captaines as Leuinus was. They ſay that Cineas, during the time of his abode at ROME, intreating for this peace, did curiouſly labor to conſider and vnderſtande, the manners, order, and life of the ROMAINES, and their common weale, diſcourſing thereof with the chiefeſt men of the city: and how afterwards he made ample reporte of the ſame vnto Pyrrus, and tolde him amongeſt other thinges, that the Senate appeared to him, a counſell houſe of many kinges. And furthermore (for the number of people) that he feared greatly they ſhould fight againſt ſuch a ſerpent, as that which was in B olde time in the mariſes of LERNE, of which, when they had cut of one heade, ſeuen other came vp in the place: bicauſe the Conſull Leuinus had nowe leauied an other army, twiſe as great as the firſt was, and had left at ROME alſo, many times as many good able men to cary armor. After this, there were ſent Ambaſſadors from ROME vnto Pyrrus, and amongeſt other, Caius Fabricius touching the ſtate of the priſoners. Cineas tolde the kinge his maſter, that this Fabricius was one of the greateſt menne of accompt in all ROME, a right honeſt man, a good Captaine, and a very valliant man of his handes, yet poore in deede he was notwithſtanding. Pyrrus taking him ſecretly a ſide, made very much of him, and amongeſt other thinges, offered him bothe golde and ſiluer, prayinge him to take it, not for any diſhoneſt reſpect he ment towardes him, but only for a pledge of the goodwill and frendſhippe that ſhould be be- C twene them. Fabricius would none of his gift: ſo Pyrrus left him for that time. Notwithſtanding, the next morninge thinkinge to feare him, bicauſe he had neuer ſeene elephant before, Pyrrus commaunded his men, that when they ſawe Fabricius and him talkinge together, they ſhoulde bringe one of his greateſt elephantes, and ſet him harde by them, behinde a hanging: which being done at a certaine ſigne by Pyrrus geuen, ſodainly the hanging was pulled backe, and the elephant with his troncke was ouer Fabricius heade, and gaue a terrible and fearefull crie. Fabricius ſoftely geuing backe, nothing afrayed, laughed and ſayd to Pyrrus ſmiling: neither did your golde (oh king) yeſterday moue me, nor your elephant to day feare me. Furthermore, whileſt they were at ſupper, fallinge in talke of diuerſe matters, ſpecially touchinge the ſtate of GREECE, and the Philoſophers there: Cineas by chaunce ſpake of EPICVRVS, and re- D hearſed the opinions of the EPICVRIANS touching the goddes and gouernment of the common wealth, how they placed mans chiefe felicity in pleaſure, how they fled from all office & publike charge, as from a thing that hindereth the fruition of true felicity: howe they maintained that the goddes were immortall, neither moued with pity nor anger, and led an idle life full of all pleaſures and delightes, without taking any regarde of mens doinges. But as he ſtill continued this diſcourſe, Fabricius cried out alowde, and ſayd: the goddes graunt that Pyrrus and the SAMNITES were of ſuch opinions, as long as they had warres againſt vs. Pyrrus marueling much at the conſtancy and magnanimity of this man, was more deſirous a great deale to haue peace with the ROMAINES, then before. And priuately prayed Fabricius very earneſtly, that he would treate for peace, whereby he might afterwards come and remaine with him, E ſaying: that he would giue him the chiefe place of honor about him, amongeſt all his frendes. Whereunto Fabricius aunſwered him ſoftly: that were not good (oh king) for your ſelfe, quod he: for your men that preſently doe honor and eſteeme you, by experience if they once knew me, would rather chooſe me for their kinge, then your ſelfe. Such was Fabricius talke, whoſe wordes Pyrrus tooke not in ill parte, neither was offended with them at all, as a tyran woulde haue bene: but did him ſelfe reporte to his frendes and familiars the noble minde he founde in him, and deliuered him apon his faith only, all the ROMAINE priſoners: to the ende that if the Senate would not agree vnto peace, they might yet ſee their frendes, and kepe the feaſt of Saturne with them, and then to ſend them backe againe vnto him. Which the Senate eſtabliſhed by decree, vpon paine of death to all ſuch as ſhould not performe the ſame accordingly. F Afterwardes Fabricius was choſen Conſull, and as he was in his campe, there came a man to him that brought him a letter from kinge Pyrrus Phiſitian, wrytten with his owne handes: in which the Phiſitian offered to poyſon his maiſter, ſo he would promiſe him a good reward, for

The contentes of his letter were theſe: Caius Fabricius, and Quintus AEmylius Conſuls of ROME, vnto king Pyrrus greeting. You haue (oh king) made vnfortunate choiſe, both of your frendes and of your enemies, as ſhall appeare vnto you by reading of this letter, which one of yours hath wrytten vnto vs: for you make warres with iuſt and honeſt men, and do your ſelfe truſt altogether the wicked and vnfaithfull. Hereof therfore we haue thought good to aduertiſe you, not in reſpect to pleaſure you, but for feare leaſt the misfortune of your death might make vs vniuſtly to be accuſed: imagining that by trechery of treaſon, we haue ſought to end this warre, as though by valliantneſſe we coulde not otherwiſe atchieue it. Pyrrus hauing red B this letter, and proued the contentes thereof true, executed the Phiſitian as he had deſerued: Pyrrus ſendeth the Romaines their priſoners with out ranſome. and to requite the aduertiſement of the Conſulls, he ſent Fabricius and the ROMAINES their priſoners, without payinge of raunſome, and ſent Cineas againe vnto them, to proue if he could obtaine peace. Howbeit, the ROMAINES, bicauſe they would neither receiue pleaſure of their enemies, and leaſt of all reward, for that they conſented not vnto ſo wicked a deede: did not only refuſe to take their priſoners of free gift, but they ſent him againe ſo many SAMNITES, and TARENTINES. And furthermore, for peace, and his frendſhippe, they would geue no eare to it, before the warres were ended, and that he had ſent away his army againe by ſea, into his kingdome of EPIRVS. Wherefore Pyrrus ſeing no remedy, but that he muſt needes fight an other battell, after he had ſomewhat refreſhed his army, drewe towardes the citie of C Pyrrus ſecond battel with the Romaines, by the city of Aſculum. ASCVLVM, where he fought the ſeconde time with the ROMAINES: and was brought into a maruelous ill grounde for horſemen, by a very ſwift running riuer, from whence came many brookes and deepe mariſhes, inſomuch as his elephantes could haue no ſpace nor ground to ioine with the battel of the footemen, by reaſon wherof there was a great number of men hurt and ſlaine on both ſides. And in the ende, the battell being fought out all day longe, the darke night did ſeuer them: but the next morninge, Pyrrus to winne the aduantage to fight in the plaine field, where he might preuaile with the force of his elephantes, ſent firſt certaine of his bandes to ſeaſe vpon the naughty ground they had fought on the day before. And by this policy hauing brought the ROMAINES into the plaine field, he thruſt in amongeſt his elephants, ſtore of ſhot, and ſlingmen, and then made his army marche (being very well ſet in order) with D great furie againſt his enemies. They miſſinge thother dayes turninges and places of retyre, were now compelled to fight all on a fronte in the plaine fielde: and ſtriuing to breake into the battell of Pyrrus footemen before the elephantes came, they deſperately preaced in apon their enemies pykes with their ſwordes, not caring for their owne perſones what became of them, but only looked to kill and deſtroy their enemies. In the ende notwithſtandinge, after the battell had holden out very long, the ROMAINES loſt it, and they firſt beganne to breake and flie

Neuertheleſſe, Dionyſius makes no mencion of two battells geuen neere vnto the city of ASCVLVM, nor that the ROMAINES were certainely ouerthrowen: howbeit he confirmeth that there was one battell only that continued vntil ſunne ſet, and that they ſcarcely ſeuered alſo when night was come on, Pyrrus being hurte on the arme with a ſpeare, and his cariage robbed and ſpoiled by the SAMNITES beſides. And further, that there died in this battell, aboue fifteene thowſande men, as F well of Pyrrus ſide, as of the ROMAINES parte: and that at the laſt, both the one and the other did retyre. And ſome ſay, that it was at that time Pyrrus aunſwered one, who reioyced with

A him for the victory they had wonne: if we winne an other of the price, quod he, we are vtterly vndone. For in dede thē had he loſt the moſt parte of his army he brought with him out of his realme, and all his frendes and Captaines in manner euery one, or at the leaſt there lacked litle of it: and beſides that, he had no meanes to ſupplie them with other from thence, and perceiued alſo that the confederates he had in ITALIE, beganne to waxe colde. Where the ROMAINES to the contrary, did eaſily renue their army with freſhe ſouldiers, which they cauſed to come from ROME as neede required, (much like vnto a liuely ſpring, the head whereof they had at home in their contry) and they fainted not at all for any loſſes they receiued, but rather were they ſo much the more hotly bent, ſtowtely determining to abide out the warres, what euer betyde. And thus whileſt Pyrrus was troubled in this ſorte, newe hopes, and newe enter-

B priſes were offred vnto him, that made him doubtful what to do. For euē at a clap came Ambaſſadors to him out of SICILIA, offering to put into his handes, the cities of SYRACVSA, of AGRIGENTVM, and of the LEONTINES, and beſeeching him to aide them to driue the CARTHAGINIANS out of the Ile, thereby to deliuer them from all the tyrannes. And on the other ſide alſo, newes was brought him from GREECE, howe Ptolomie ſurnamed the lightning, was ſlaine, and all his army ouerthrowen in battell againſt the GAVLES, and that now he ſhoulde come in good hower for the MACEDONIANS, who lacked but a king. Then he curſed his hard fortune that preſented him all at once, ſuch ſundry occaſions to doe great thinges: and as if both enterpriſes had bene already in his hande, he made his accompt that of neceſſitie he muſt looſe one of them. So, long debating the matter with him ſelfe, which of the two wayes

C he ſhould conclude vppon: in the ende he reſolued, that by the warres of SICILIA, there was good meane to attaine to the greater matters, conſidering that AFRICKE was not farre from them. Wherefore, diſpoſinge him ſelfe that way, he ſent Cineas thither immediatly to make his way, and to ſpeake to the townes and cities of the contry as he was wont to doe: and in the meane time left a ſtrong garriſon in the city of TARENTVM, to kepe it at his deuotion, wherewith the TARENTINES were very angry. For they made requeſt vnto him, either to remaine in their contry to maintaine warres with them againſt the ROMAINES, (which was their meaning why they ſent for him) or elſe if he would needes go, at the leaſt wiſe to leaue their city in as good ſtate as he founde it. But he aunſwered them againe very roughly, that they ſhoulde ſpeake no more to him in it, and that they ſhould not chooſe but tary his occaſion. And with

D this aunſwere tooke ſhippe, and ſailed towardes SICILIA: where ſo ſoone as he was arriued, he founde all that he hoped for, for the cities did willingely put them ſelues into his handes. And where neceſſity of battell was offered him to employ his army, nothing at the beginning could ſtande before him. For, with thirty thowſande footemen, two thowſande fiue hundred horſemen, and two hundred ſayle which he brought with him, he draue the CARTHAGINIANS before him, and conquered all the contry vnder their obedience. Nowe at that time, the city of ERIX was the ſtrongeſt place they had: and there were a great number of good ſouldiers within it to defende it. Pyrrus determined to proue the aſſault of it, and when his army was ready to geue the charge, he armed him ſelfe at all peeces from toppe to toe, and approching the walls, vowed vnto Hercules to geue him a ſolemne ſacrifice, with a feaſt of common

E playes, ſo that he would graunt him grace to ſhew him ſelfe vnto the GREECIANS inhabiting in SICILIA, worthy of the noble aunceſters from whence he came, and of the great good fortune he had in his handes. This vowe ended, he ſtraight made the trompettes ſound to the aſſault, & cauſed the barbarous people that were on the walles, to retyre with force of his ſhot. Then when the ſcaling ladders were ſet vp, him ſelfe was the firſt that mounted on the walle, where he found diuerſe of the barbarous people that reſiſted him. But ſome he threw ouer the walles on either ſide of him, and with his ſword ſlew many dead about him, himſelfe not once hurt: for the barbarous people had not the harte to looke him in the face, his countenaunce was ſo terrible. And this doth proue that Homer ſpake wiſely, and like a man of experience, when he ſayd: that valliantneſſe onely amongeſt all other morall vertues is that, which hath

F ſomtimes, certaine furious motions and diuine prouocations, which make a man beſides him ſelfe. So the city being taken, he honorably performed his vowed ſacrifice to Hercules, & kept a feaſt of all kindes and ſortes of games and weapons. There dwelt a barbarous people at that time about MESSINA, called the MAMERTINES, who did much hurt to the GREECIANS thereabouts, makinge many of them pay taxe and tribute: for they were a great number of them, and all men of warre and good ſouldiers, and had their name alſo of Mars, bicauſe they were marſhall men, and geuen to armes. Pyrrus led his army againſt them, and ouerthrew them in battell: and put their collectors to death, that did leauy and exact the taxe, and raſed many of their fortreſſes. And when the CARTHAGINIANS required peace and his frendſhip, offering him ſhippes and money, pretending greater matters: he made them a ſhorte aunſwere, that there was but one way to make peace and loue betwene them, to forſake SICILIA altogether, and to be contented to make Mare Libycum the border betwixt GREECE and them. For his good fortune, and the force he had in his handes, did ſet him aloft, and further allured him to follow the hope that brought him into SICILIA, aſpiring firſt of all vnto the conqueſt of LIBYA. Now, to paſſe him ouer thither, he had ſhips enough, but he lacked owers & mariners wherefore when he would preſſe them, then he began to deale roughly with the cities of SICILIA, and in anger compelled, and ſeuerely puniſhed them, that would not obey his commaundement. This he did not at his firſt comminge, but contrarily had wonne all their good wills, ſpeaking more curteouſly to them then any other did, and ſhewing that he truſted them altogether, and troubled them in nothing. But ſodainly being altered from a populer prince, vnto a violent tyran, he was not only thought cruell and rigorous, but that worſt of all is, vnfaithfull and ingratefull: neuertheleſſe, though they receiued great hurt by him, yet they ſuffered it, and graunted him any needefull thing he did demaund. But when they ſaw he began to miſtruſt Thænon and Soſtratus, the two chiefe Captaines of SYRACVSA, and they who firſt cauſed him to come into SICILIA, who alſo at his firſt arriuall deliuered the city of SYRACVSA into his hands, & had bene his chiefe aiders in helping him to compaſſe that he had done in SICILIA: when I ſay they ſaw he would no more cary them with him, nor leaue them behinde him for the miſtruſt he had of them, and that Soſtratus fled from him, and abſented him ſelfe, fearing leaſt Pyrrus would doe him ſome miſchiefe: and that Pyrrus moreouer, had put Thænon to death, miſtruſting that he would alſo haue done him ſome harme. Then all things fell out againſt Pyrrus, not one after an other, nor by litle and litle, but all together at one inſtant, and all the cities generally hated him to the death, and did againe ſome of them confederate with the CARTHAGINIANS, and others with the MAMERTINES, to ſet vpon him. But when all SICILIA was thus bent againſt him, he receiued letters from the SAMNITES & TARENTINES, by which they aduertiſed him, how they had much a doe to defende them ſelues within their cities and ſtrong holdes, and that they were wholly driuen out of the field: wherfore they earneſtly beſought him ſpeedily to come to their aide. This newes came happely to him, to cloke his flying, that he might ſay it was not for diſpaire of good ſucceſſe in SICILIA that he went his way: but true it was in dede, that when he ſaw he could no longer keepe it, then a ſhippe could ſtand ſtill among the waues, he ſought ſome honeſt ſhadow to colour his departing. And that ſurely was the cauſe why he returned againe into ITALIE. Neuertheleſſe, at his departure out of SICILE, they ſay that looking backe apon the Ile, he ſaid to thoſe that were about him: O what a goodly field for a battell, my frendes, doe we leaue to the ROMAINES and CARTHAGINIANS, to fight thone with thother? And verily ſo it fell out ſhortely after, as he had ſpoken. But the barbarous people conſpiringe together againſt Pyrrus, the CARTHAGINIANS on the one ſide watching his paſſage, gaue him battel on the ſea, in the very ſtraight it ſelfe of MESSINA, where he loſt many of his ſhips, and fled with the reſt, & tooke the coaſt of ITALIE. And there the MAMERTINES on the other ſide, being gone thither before, to the number of eighteene thowſande fighting men: durſt not preſent him battell in open fielde, but taried for him in certaine ſtraites of the mountaines, & in very hard places, and ſo ſet vpon his rereward, and diſordered all his army. They ſlew two of his elephants, and cut of a great number of his rereward, ſo as he was compelled him ſelfe in perſone to come from his vangard, to helpe them againſt the barbarous people, which were luſty valliant men, and olde trained ſouldiers. And there Pyrrus caught a blow on his head with a ſworde, and was in great daunger: inſomuch as he was forced to retyre out of the preaſe and fight, which did ſo much the more encorage his enemies. Among which there was one more aduenturous then the

A the reſt, a goodly man of perſonage, fayer armed in white armor, who aduauncing him ſelfe farre before his company, cried out to the king with a bolde and fierce voyce, and chalenged him to fight with him if he were aliue. Pyrrus beinge mad as it were with this brauery, turned againe with his garde, in ſpight of his men, hurt as he was. And beſides that he was all on a fire with choller, and his face all bloody and terrible to behold, he went through his men, and came at the length to this barbarous villen that had challenged him: & gaue him ſuch a blow on his head with all his force and power, that what by the ſtrength of his arme, and through the goodnes of the temper and mettle of the ſword, the blow claue his head right in the middeſt, downe to the ſhoulders: ſo that his heade beinge thus deuided, the one parte fell on the one ſhoulder, & the other parte on the other. This matter ſodainly ſtayed the barbarous peo-

B ple, and kept them from goinge any further, they were ſo afrayed and amaſed both to ſee ſo great a blowe with ones hande, and it made them thinke in dede that Pyrrus was more then a man. After that, they let him go, and troubled him no more. Pyrrus holding on his iorney, arriued at the length in the city of TARENTVM, with twenty thowſand footemen, & three thowſand horſe. And with theſe (ioyning thereto the choyceſt pyked men of the TARENTINES) he went incontinently into the field to ſeeke out the ROMAINES, who had their campe within the territories of the SAMNITES, which were then in very hard ſtate. For their hartes were killed, bicauſe that in many battells and encounters with the ROMAINES, they were euer ouerthrowen. They were very angry beſides with Pyrrus, for that he had forſaken them, to goe his voyage vnto SICILIA, by reaſon whereof there came no great number of ſouldiers into his

C campe. But notwithſtanding, he deuided all his ſtrength into two partes, whereof he ſent the one parte into LVCANIA, to occupy one of the ROMAINE Conſulls that was there, to the end he ſhould not come to aide his companion: and with the other parte he went him ſelfe againſt Manius Curius, who lay in a very ſtraunge place of aduantage nere to the citie of BENEVENTO, attending the aide that ſhould come to him out of LVCANIA, beſides alſo that the Soothſayers (by the ſignes & tokens of the birdes and ſacrifices) did counſell him not to ſturre from thence. Pyrrus to the contrary, deſiring to fight with Manius before his aide came vnto him, which he looked for out of LVCANIA, tooke with him the beſt ſouldiers he had in all his army, and the warlikeſt elephantes, and marched away in the night, ſuppoſing to ſteale vpon Manius on the ſodaine, and geue an aſſault vnto his campe. Now Pyrrus hauing a long way to

D go, and through a woddy contry, his lightes and torches failed him, by reaſon whereof many of his ſouldiers loſt their way, and they loſt a great deale of time alſo, before they could againe be gathered together: ſo as in this ſpace the night was ſpent, and the day once broken, the enemies perceiued plainely how he came downe the hills. This at the firſt ſight made thē muſe awhile, and put them in a litle feare: neuertheleſſe Manius hauing had the ſignes of the ſacrifices fauorable, and ſeeing that occaſion did preſſe him to it, went out into the field, and ſet a-pon the vowarde of his enemies, and made them turne their backes. The which feared all the reſt in ſuch wiſe, that there were ſlaine a great number of them in the fielde, and certaine elephantes alſo taken. This victory made Manius Curius leaue his ſtrength, and come into the plaine field, where he ſet his men in battell ray, and ouerthrew his enemies by plaine force on

E the one ſide: but on the other he was repulſed by violence of the elephantes, and compelled to drawe backe into his owne campe, wherein he had left a great number of men to garde it. So when he ſaw them vpon the rampers of his campe all armed, ready to fight, he called them out, and they comming freſh out of places of aduantage to charge vpon the elephantes, compelled them in a very ſhorte time to turne their backes, & flie through their owne men, whom they put to great trouble, and diſorder: ſo as in the ende, the whole victory fell apon the ROMAINES ſide, and conſequently by meanes of that victory, followed the greatnes and power of their Empire. For the ROMAINES being growen more coragious by this battell, and hauing increaſed their force, and wonne the reputacion of men vnconquerable: immediatly after conquered all ITALIE beſides, and ſoone after that, all SICILIA. To this ende as you ſee,

F came king Pyrrus vaine hope he had to conquer ITALIE and SICILIA, after he had ſpent ſixe yeares continually in warres, during which time his good fortune decayed, & his army conſumed. Notwithſtanding, his noble corage remained alwayes inuincible, what loſſes ſoeuer he had ſuſteined: and moreouer whileſt he liued, he was euer eſteemed the chiefeſt of all the kings & princes in his time, as well for his experience & ſufficiency in warres, as alſo for the valiantnes and hardines of his perſon. But what he wanne by famous deedes, he loſt by vaine hope: deſiring ſo earneſtly that which he had not, as he forgate to kepe that which he had. Wherefore Antigonus compared him vnto a dice player that caſteth well, but can not vſe his lucke. Now hauing brought backe againe with him into EPIRVS, eight thowſande footemen, and fiue hundred horſemen, and being without money to pay them, he deuiſed with himſelfe to ſeeke out ſome new warre to entertaine thoſe ſouldiers, and kepe them together. Wherefore vppon a newe aide of certaine of the GAVLES beinge comen vnto him, he entered into the realme of MACEDON (which Antigonus, Demetrius ſonne held at that time) with intent only to make a forrey, and to get ſome ſpoyle in the contry. But when he ſaw that he had taken diuerſe holdes, and moreouer, that two thowſand men of warre of the contry came and yelded themſelues vnto him: he beganne to hope of better ſucceſſe, then at the firſt he looked for. For vpon that hope he marched againſt king Antigonus ſelfe, whom he met in a very ſtraight valley, and at his firſt comming, gaue ſuch a luſty charge vpon his rereward, that he put all Antigonus army in great diſorder. For Antigonus had placed the GAVLES in the rereward of his army to cloſe it in, which were a conuenient number, and did valliantly defend the firſt charge: and the skirmiſhe was ſo hotte, that the moſt of them were ſlaine. After them, the leaders of the elephantes perceiuing they were enuironned on euery ſide, yelded themſelues and their beaſtes. Pyrrus ſeeing his power to be now increaſed with ſuch a ſupply, truſting more to his good fortune, then any good reaſon might moue him: thruſt further into the battel of the MACEDONIANS, who were all afrayed, and troubled for the ouerthrowe of their rereward, ſo as they would not once baſe their pykes, nor fight againſt him. He for his parte holdinge vp his hande, and callinge the Captaines of the bandes by their names, ſtraight wayes made all the footemen of Antigonus turne wholly to his ſide: who flying, ſaued himſelfe with a few horſemen, and kept certaine of the cities in his realme apon the ſea coaſt. But Pyrrus in all his proſperity, iudging nothing more to redownde to his honor and glory, then the ouerthrow of the GAVLES, layed aſide their goodlieſt and richeſt ſpoyles, and offred vp the ſame in the temple of Minerua Itonida, with this inſcription.

Immediatly after this battell, all the cities of the realme of MACEDON yelded vnto him: but when he had the citie of ÆGES in his power, he vſed the inhabitantes thereof very hardly, & ſpecially bicauſe he left a great garriſon of the GAVLES there which he had in pay. This nation is extreame couetous, as then they ſhewed themſelues: for they ſpared not to breake vp the tombes wherein the kinges of MACEDON lay buried there, tooke away all the gold and ſiluer they could finde, and afterwards with great inſolency caſt out their bones into the open winde. Pyrrus was tolde of it, but he lightly paſſed it ouer, and made no reckening of it: either bicauſe he deferred it till an other time, by reaſon of the warres he had then in hande: or elſe for that he durſt not meddle with puniſhing of theſe barbarous people at that time. But whatſoeuer the matter was, the MACEDONIANS were very angry with Pyrrus, & blamed him greatly for it. Furthermore, hauing not yet made all thinges ſure in MACEDON, nor being fully poſſeſt of the ſame: new toyes and hope came into his head, and mocking Antigonus, ſayd, he was a mad man to goe apparrelled in purple like a king, when a poore cloke might become him like a priuate man. Now, Cleonymus king of SPARTA being come to procure him to bring his

A his army into the contry of LACEDÆMON, Pyrrus was very willing to it. This Cleonymus was of the blood royall of SPARTA, but bicause he was a cruell man, and would do all thinges by authority, they loued him not at SPARTA, nor trusted him at all: and therefore did they put him out, & made Areus king, a very quiet man. And this was the oldest quarrell Cleonymus had against the cõmon wealth of SPARTA: but besides that, he had an other priuate quarrel, which grewe vppon this cause. In his olde yeares, Cleonymus had maried a fayer younge Lady called Chelidonide, which was also of the blood royall, and the daughter of Leotychides. This Lady being fallen extreamely in loue with Acrotatus, king Areus sonne, a goodly young gentleman, and in his lusty youth, she greatly vexed and dishonored her husbande Cleonymus, who was ouer heade and eares in loue and iealousie with her: for there was not one in all SPARTA, but Areus made king of Sparta, and Cleonymus put downe.

B plainely knewe that his wife made none accompt of him. And thus his home sorowes, being ioyned with his outwarde common greues, euen for spight, desiring a reuenge, in choller he went to procure Pyrrus to come vnto SPARTA, to restore him againe to his kingdome. Hereupon he brought him into LACEDÆMONIA forthwith, with fiue and twenty thowsand foote-men, two thowsand horse, and foure and twenty elephantes: by which preparacion, though by nothing elsse, the worlde might plainely see, that Pyrrus came with a minde not to restore Cleonymus againe vnto SPARTA, but of intent to conquer for him selfe (if he could) all the contrie of PELOPONNESVS. For in wordes he denied it to the LACEDÆMONIANS them selues, who sent Ambassadors vnto him when he was in the city of MEGALIPOLIS, where he tolde them that he was come into PELOPONNESVS, to sette the townes and cities at libertie which

C Antigonus kept in bondage: & that his true intent and meaning was to send his young sonnes into SPARTA (so they would be contented) to the end they might be trained after the LACONIAN manner, and from their youth haue this aduantage aboue all other kinges, to haue bene well brought vp. But faining these thinges, and abusing those that came to meete him on his way, they tooke no heede of him, till he came within the coast of LACONIA, into the which he was no sooner entred, but he beganne to spoyle and wast the whole contry. And when the Ambassadors of SPARTA reproued and founde fault with him, for that he made warres vpon them in such sorte, before he had openly proclaimed it: he made them aunswer: no more haue you your selues vsed to proclaime that, which you purposed to do to others. Then one of the Ambassadors called Mandricidas, replied againe vnto him in the LACONIAN tongue. If thou Mandricidas giues aunswer to king Pyrrus.

D be a god, thou wilt doe vs no hurt, bicause we haue not offended thee: and if thou be a man, thou shalt meete with an other that shalbe better then thy selfe. Then he marched directly to SPARTA, where Cleonymus gaue him counsell euen at the first, to assault it. But he would not so do, fearing (as they sayd) that if he did it by night, his souldiers would sacke the city: and sayd it should be time enough to assault it the next day at broad day light, bicause there were but few men within the towne, and beside they were very ill prouided. And furthermore, king Areus him selfe was not there, but gone into CRETA to aide the GORTYNIANS, who had warres in their owne contry. And doutlesse, that only was the sauing of SPARTA from taking, that they made no reckening to assault it hotly: bicause they thought it was not able to make resistaunce. For Pyrrus camped before the towne, throughly perswaded with him selfe, that he

E should finde none to fight with him: and Cleonymus frends and seruauntes also did prepare his lodging there, as if Pyrrus should haue come to supper to him, and lodged with him. When night was come, the LACEDÆMONIANS counselled together, & secretly determined to send away their wiues, and litle children into CRETA. But the women them selues were against it, and there was one amonge them called Archidamia, who went into the Senate house with a sword in her hand, to speake vnto them in the name of all the rest, and sayd: that they did their wiues great wronge, if they thought them so fainte harted, as to liue after SPARTA were destroyed. Afterwards it was agreed in counsell, that they should cast a trenche before the enemies campe, and that at both the endes of the same they should bury cartes in the ground vnto the middest of the wheeles, to the end that being fast set in the ground, they should stay the

F elephantes, and kepe them from passing further. And when they beganne to go in hand withall, there came wiues and maides vnto them, some of them their clothes girte vp round about them, and others all in their smockes, to worke at this trenche with the old men, aduising the young men that ſhould fight the next morning, to reſt them ſelues in the meane while. So the A

Then when the breake of day appeared, & the enemies remoued to come to the aſſault VVomen encoraged their men to fight. the women them ſelues fetched the weapons which they put into the young mens hands, and deliuered them the taske of the trenche ready made, which they before had vndertaken, praying them valliantly to keepe and defend it, tellinge them withall, howe great a pleaſure it is to ouercome the enemies, fighting in view and ſight of their natiue contry, and what great felicity and honor it is to dye in the armes of his mother and wife, after he hath fought valliantly like an honeſt man, and worthy of the magnanimity of SPARTA. But Chelidonida being gone aſide, had tyed a halter with a riding knot about her necke, ready to ſtrangle & hang her ſelfe, B rather thē to fall into the hands of Cleonymus, if by chaunce the city ſhould come to be taken.
Pyrrus battel. Now Pyrrus marched in perſon with his battell of footemen, againſt the fronte of the SPARTANS, who being a great number alſo, did tary his comming on the other ſide of the trenche: the which, beſides that it was very ill to paſſe ouer, did let the ſouldiers alſo to fight ſteadely in order of battell, bicauſe the earth being newly caſt vp, did yeld vnder their feete. Wherefore, Ptolomie king Pyrrus ſonne, paſſing all alongeſt the trench ſide with two thowſand GAVLES, & all the choyce men of the CHAONIANS, aſſayed if he could get ouer to the other ſide at one of the endes of the trenche where the cartes were: which being ſet very deepe into the ground, and one ioyned vnto an other, they did not only hinder thaſſaylants, but the defendants alſo. Howbeit in the end, the GAVLES began to plucke of the wheeles of theſe cartes, and to draw C them into the riuer. But Acrotatus, king Areus ſonne, a young man, ſeeing the daunger, ranne through the city with a troupe of three hundred luſty youthes beſides, & went to incloſe Ptolomie behinde before he eſpied him, for that he paſſed a ſecret hollow way till he came euen to geue the charge vpon them: whereby they were enforced to turne their faces towardes him, one runninge in an others necke, and ſo in great diſorder were thruſt into the trenches, and vnder the cartes: inſomuch as at the laſt, with much a doe, and great bloodſhed, Acrotatus and his company draue them backe, and repulſed them. Now the women and old men, that were on thother ſide of the trenche, ſaw plainly before their face, howe valliantly Acrotatus had re-

Wherefore, after Acrotatus had done this exployte, he returned againe through the city vnto the place from whence he came, all on a goare blood, coragious and D liuely, for the victory he came newly from. The women of SPARTA thought Acrotatus farre more noble and fayrer to beholde, then euer he was: ſo that they all thought Chelidonida happy to haue ſuch a frend and louer. And there were certaine olde men that followed him, crying after him, goe thy way Acrotatus, and enioy thy loue Chelidonida: beget noble children of her vnto SPARTA. The fight was cruell on that ſide where Pyrrus was, and many of the SPARTANS fought very valliantly. Howbeit amongeſt other, there was one named Phillius, who after he had fought long, and ſlaine many of his enemies with his owne handes, that forced to paſſe ouer the trenche: perceiuing that his hart fainted for the great number of woundes he had apon him, called one of them that were in the rancke next behinde him, and geuing him his place, fell downe deade in the armes of his frendes, bicauſe his enemies ſhoulde not haue E his body. In the ende, the battell hauinge continued all the day longe, the night did ſeparate Pyrrus dreame. them: and Pyrrus being layed in his bed, had this viſion in his ſleepe. He thought he ſtrake the city of LACEDÆMON with lightning, and that he vtterly conſumed it: whereat he was ſo paſſing glad, that euen with the very ioy he awaked. And thereuppon foorthwith commaunded his Captaines to make their men ready to the aſſault: and told his dreame vnto his familiers, ſuppoſing that out of dout it did betoken he ſhould in that approache take the citie. All that heard it, beleued it was ſo, ſauing one Lyſimachus: who to the contrary, ſayed that this viſion liked him not, bicauſe the places ſmitten with lightning are holy, and it is not lawfull to enter into them: by reaſon whereof he was alſo affraied, that the goddes did ſignifie vnto him, that he ſhould not enter into the citie of SPARTA. Pyrrus aunſwered him: that ſaied he, is a matter F diſputable to & fro in an open aſſembly of people, for there is no maner of certainty in it. But furthermore, euery man muſt take his weapon in his hand, & ſet this ſentence before his eyes

Alludinge vnto Homers verſes, which he wrote for the defence of his contry. And ſaying thus, he roſe, and at the breake of day led his army vnto the aſſault. On thother ſide alſo, the LACEDÆMONIANS with a maruelous corage & magnanimity, farre greater then their force beſtirred them ſelues wonderfully to make reſiſtaunce, hauing their wiues by them that gaue them their weapons wherewith they fought, and were ready at hand to geue meate & drinke to them that needed, and did alſo withdrawe thoſe that were hurt to cure them. The MACEDONIANS likewiſe for their parte, endeuored them ſelues with all their might to fill vppe the trenche with wodde and other thinges, which they caſt vpon the dead bodies and armors, lying in the bottome of the ditche: & the LACEDÆMONIANS againe, labored all that they could poſſible to let them. But in this great broyle, one perceiued Pyrrus a horſe backe to haue lept the trenche, paſt ouer the ſtrength of the cartes, and make force to enter into the city. Wherfore thoſe that were appointed to defende that parte of the trench, cried out ſtraight: and the women fell a ſhreeking, and running, as if all had bene loſt. And as Pyrrus paſſed further, ſtriking downe with his owne handes all that ſtoode before him, a CRETAN ſhot at him, & ſtrake his horſe through both ſides: who leapinge out of the preaſe for paine of his wounde, dying, caried Pyrrus away, and threw him vppon the hanging of a ſteepe hill, where he was in great daunger to fall from the toppe. This put all his ſeruauntes and frendes about him in a maruelous feare, and therewithall the LACEDÆMONIANS ſeeing them in this feare and trouble ran immediatly vnto that place, and with force of ſhotte draue them all out of the trenche. After this retyre, Pyrrus cauſed all aſſault to ceaſe, hoping the LACEDÆMONIANS in the end would yeelde, conſideringe there were many of them ſlaine in the two dayes paſt, and all the reſt in maner hurt. Howbeit, the good fortune of the citie (whether it were to proue the valliantnes of the inhabitantes them ſelues, or at the leaſt to ſhew what power they were of euen in their greateſt nede and diſtreſſe, when the LACEDÆMONIANS had ſmall hope left) brought one Aminias Phocian from CORINTHE, one of king Antigonus Captaines with a great band of men, and put them into the city to aide them: and ſtraight after him, as ſoone as he had entred, king Areus arriued alſo on thother ſide from CRETA, and two thowſand ſouldiers with him. So the women went home to their houſes, makinge their reckening that they ſhould not neede any more to trouble them ſelues with warres. They gaue the olde men liberty alſo to goe and reſt them ſelues, who being paſt all age to fight, for neceſſities ſake yet were driuen to arme them ſelues, and take weapon in hande: and in order of battell placed the newe come ſouldiers in their roomes. Pyrrus vnderſtanding that newe ſupplies were come, grewe to greater ſtomake then before, and inforced all that he could, to winne the towne by aſſault. But in the end, when to his coſt he founde that he wanne nothing but blowes, he gaue ouer the ſiege, and went to ſpoyle all the contry about, determining to lye there in garriſon all the winter. He coulde not for all this auoide his deſtenie. For there roſe a ſedition in the city of ARGOS betwene two of the chiefeſt citizens, Ariſteas and Ariſtippus: and bicauſe Ariſteas thought that kinge Antigonus did fauor his enemy Ariſtippus, he made haſt to ſende firſt vnto Pyrrus, whoſe nature and diſpoſition was ſuch, that he did continually heape hope vppon hope, euer taking the preſent proſperity, for an occaſion to hope after greater to come. And if it fell out he was a loſer, then he ſought to recouer him ſelfe, and to reſtore his loſſe, by ſome other newe attempts. So that neither for being conqueror, nor ouercomen, he would euer be quiet, but alwayes troubled ſome, and him ſelfe alſo: by reaſon wherof, he ſodainly departed towardes ARGOS. But king Areus hauing layed ambuſhes for him in diuerſe places, and occupied alſo the ſtraighteſt and hardeſt paſſages, by the which he was to paſſe: gaue a charge vppon the GAVLES and MOLOSSIANS, which were in the tayle of his army. Now, the ſelfe ſame day Pyrrus was warned by a Soothſayer, who ſacrificing had founde the liuer of the ſacrificed beaſt infected: that it betokened the loſſe of ſome moſt neere vnto him. But when he heard the noyſe of the charge geuen, he thought not of the forwarning of his Soothſayer, but commaunded his ſonne to take his houſehold ſeruauntes with him, and to go thither: as he him ſelfe in the meane time with as great haſt as he could, made the reſt of his army marche, to get them quickely out of this daungerous way. The fraye was very hotte about Ptolomie Pyrrus ſonne, for they were all the chiefe men of the LACEDÆMONIANS with whome he had to doe, led by a valliant Captaine called Eualcus. But as he fought valliantly againſt thoſe that ſtoode before him, there was a ſouldier of CRETA called Oræſus, borne in the citie of APTERA, a man very ready of his hande, and light of foote, who running alongeſt by him, ſtrake him ſuch a blowe on his ſide, that he fell downe dead in the place. This prince Ptolomie being ſlaine, his company began ſtraight to flie: and the LACEDÆMONIANS followed the chaſe ſo hottely, that they tooke no heede of them ſelues, vntill they ſawe they were in the plaine field farre from their footemen. Wherefore, Pyrrus vnto whom the death of his ſonne was newly reported, being a fire with ſorow and paſſion, turned ſodainly vpon them with the men of armes of the MOLOSSIANS, and being the firſt that came vnto them, made a maruelous ſlaughter among them. For, notwithſtanding that euery where before that time he was terrible and inuincible, hauing his ſword in his hande: yet then he did ſhewe more proofe of his valliantnes, ſtrength, and corage, then he had euer done before. And when he had ſette ſpurres to his horſe againſt Eualcus to cloſe with him, Eualcus turned on the toe ſide, and gaue Pyrrus ſuch a blowe with his ſword, that he miſſed litle the cutting of his bridle hande: for he cut in deede all the raines of the bridle a ſunder. But Pyrrus ſtraight ranne him through the body with his ſpeare, and lighting of from his horſe, he put all the troupe of the LACEDÆMONIANS to the ſword that were about the body of Eualcus, being all choſen men. Thus the ambition of the Captaines was cauſe of that loſſe vnto their contry for nothing, conſidering that the warres againſt thē were ended. But Pyrrus hauing now as it were made ſacrifice of theſe poore bodies of the LACEDÆMONIANS, for the ſoule of his dead ſonne, and fought thus wonderfully alſo to honor his funeralls, conuerting a great parte of his ſorow for his death, into anger and wrath againſt the enemies: he afterwardes held on his way directly towardes ARGOS. And vnderſtanding that king Antigonus had already ſeaſed the hills that were ouer the valley, he lodged neere vnto the city of NAVPLIA: and the next morning following ſent a heraulde vnto Antigonus, and gaue him defyance, calling him wicked man, and chalenged him to come downe into the valley to fight with him, to trye which of them two ſhould be king. Antigonus made him aunſwer, that he made warres as much with time, as with weapon: & furthermore, that if Pyrrus were weary of his life, he had wayes open enough to put him ſelfe to death. The citizens of ARGOS alſo ſent Ambaſſadors vnto them both, to pray them to departe, ſith they knew that there was nothing for them to ſee in the city of ARGOS, and that they would let it be a newter, & frend vnto them both. King Antigonus agreed vnto it, and gaue them his ſonne for hoſtage. Pyrrus alſo made thē fayer promiſe to do ſo too, but bicauſe he gaue no caution nor ſufficient pledge to performe it, they miſtruſtred him the more. Then there fel out many great & wonderful tokens, as wel vnto Pyrrus, as vnto the ARGIVES. For Pyrrus hauing ſacrificed oxen, their heades being ſtriken of from their bodies, they thruſt out their tongues, and licked vp their owne blood. And within the city of ARGOS, a ſiſter of the temple of Apollo Lycias, called Apollonide, ranne through the ſtreetes, crying out that ſhe ſaw the city full of murder, and blood running all about, and an Eagle that came vnto the fraye, howbeit ſhe vaniſhed away ſodainly, and no body knewe what became of her. Pyrrus then comminge hard to the walles of ARGOS in the night, & finding one of the gates called Diamperes, opened by Ariſteas, he put in his GAVLES: who poſſeſſed the market place, before the citizens knew any thing of it. But bicauſe the gate was too low to paſſe the elephantes through with their towers vpon their backes, they were driuen to take them of, & afterwards when they were within, to put them on in the darke, & in tumulte: by reaſon whereof they loſt much time, ſo that the citizens in the ende perceiued it, and ran incontinently vnto the caſtell of Aſpides, and into other ſtrong places of the city. And therewithall, they ſent with preſent ſpeede vnto Antigonus, to pray him to come and helpe them, and ſo he did: and after he was come hard to the walles, he remained without with the skowtes, & in the meane time ſent his ſonne with his chiefeſt Captaines into the towne, who brought a great number of good ſouldiers and men of warre with them. At the ſame time alſo arriued Areus, king of SPARTA, with a thowſand of the CRETANS, and moſt luſty SPARTANS: all which ioyning together, came to geue a charge vpō the GAVLES that were in the market place,

A place, who put them in a maruelous feare & hazard. Pyrrus entring on that side also of the city called Cylarabis, with terrible noyse & cries: when he vnderstoode that the GAVLES aunswered him not lustely and coragiously, he doubted straight that it was the voyce of men distressed, and that had their handes full. Wherefore, he came on with speede to relieue them, thrusting the horsemen forwards that marched before him, with great daunger and paine, by reason of holes, and sinckes, and water conduites, whereof the city was full. By this meane there was a wonderfull confusion amongest them, as may be thought fightinge by night, where no man saw what he had to doe, nor could heare what was commaunded, by reason of the great noyse they made, straying here and there vp and downe the streetes, the one scattered from the other: neither could the Captaines set their men in order, as wel for the darkenes of the night, B as also for the confused tumult that was all the city ouer, & for that the streetes also were very narrow. And therefore they remained on both sides without doing any thing, looking for day light: at the dawning wherof, Pyrrus perceiued the castel of Aspides, ful of his armed enemies. And furthermore, sodainly as he was come into the market place, amõgest many other goodly common workes sette out to beautifie the same, he spied the images of a bull and a woulfe in copper, the which fought one with an other. This sight made him afrayed, bicause at that present he remembred a prophecy that had bene tolde him, that his end and death should be, when he sawe a woulfe and a bull fight together. The ARGIVES reporte, that these images were set vp in the market place, for the remembraunce of a certaine chaunce that had happened in their contrie. For when Danaus came thither first, by the way called Pyramia (as one C would say, land sowen with corne) in the contry of THYREATIDE, he saw as he went, a woulfe fight with a bull: whereupon he stayed to see what the end of their fight would come to, supposing the case in him selfe, that the woulfe was of his side, bicause that being a straunger as he was, he came to set vppon the naturall inhabitantes of the contry. The woulfe in the ende obtained the victory: wherefore Danaus making his prayer vnto Apollo Lycius, followed on his enterprise, & had so good successe, that he draue Gelanor out of ARGOS, who at that time was king of the ARGIVES. And thus you heare the cause why they say these images of the woulfe and bull were set vp in the market place of ARGOS. Pyrrus being halfe discoraged with the sight of them, and also bicause nothinge fell out well according to his expectacion, thought best to retyre: but fearing the straitenesse of the gates of the city, he sent vnto his sonne Hele-
D nus, whome he had left without the city with the greatest parte of his force and army, commaunding him to ouerthrow a peece of the wall that his men might the more readily get out, and that he might receiue them, if their enemies by chaunce did hinder their comming out. But the messenger whom he sent, was so hasty and fearefull, with the tumult that troubled him in going out, that he did not well vnderstand what Pyrrus sayd vnto him, but reported his message quite contrary. Whereuppon the young prince Helenus taking the best souldiers he had with him, and the rest of his elephantes, entred into the city to helpe his father, who was now
E geuing backe: and so long as he had roome to fight at ease, retyring stilly, he valiantly repulsed those that set vpon him, turning his face oft vnto them. But when he was driuen vnto the streete that went from the market place to the gate of the city, he was kept in with his owne men that entered at the same gate to helpe him. But they couldenot heare when Pyrrus cried out, and bad them go backe, the noyse was so great: and though the first had heard him, and would haue gone backe, yet they that were behinde, and did full thrust forward into the preasse, did not permit them. Besides this moreouer, the biggest of all the elephantes by misfortune fell downe ouerthwart the gate, where he grindinge his teeth did hinder those also, that would haue comen out and geuen backe. Furthermore, an other of the elephantes that were F entred before into the city, called Nicon (as much to say, as conquering) seeking his gouernor that was striken downe to the ground from his backe with terrible blowes: ran vpon thē that came backe vpon him, ouerthrowing frendes and foes one in an others necke, til at the length hauing founde the body of his master slaine, he lift him vp from the ground with his troncke, and carying him vpon his two tushes, returned backe with great fury, treading all vnder feete he found in his way. Thus euery man being thronged and crowded vp together in this sorte, there was not one that could helpe him selfe: for it seemed to be a masse and heape of a multitude, and one whole body ſhut together, which ſometime thruſt forward, and ſomtime gaue backe, as the ſway went. They fought not ſo much againſt their enemies, who ſet apon them behinde: but they did them ſelues more hurt, then their enemies did. For if any drew out his ſword, or baſed his pyke, he could neither ſcabard thone againe, nor lift vp thother, but thruſt it full vpon his owne fellowes that came in to helpe them, and ſo killed them ſelues one thruſting vpon an other. Wherefore Pyrrus ſeeing his people thus troubled and harried to & fro, tooke his crowne from his heade which he ware apon his helmet, that made him knowen of his men a farre of, and gaue it vnto one of his familiars that was next vnto him: and truſting then to the goodnes of his horſe, flewe vpon his enemies that followed him. It fortuned that one hurt him with a pyke, but the wound was neither daungerous nor great: wherfore Pyrrus ſet vpon him that had hurt him, who was an ARGIAN borne, a man of meane condition, and a poore olde womans ſonne, whoſe mother at that preſent time was gotten vp to the toppe of the tyles of a houſe, as all other women of the city were, to ſee the fight. And ſhe perceiuing that it was her ſonne whome Pyrrus came apon, was ſo afrighted to ſee him in that daunger, that ſhe tooke a tyle, and with both her handes caſt it apon Pyrrus. The tyle falling of from his head by reaſon of his head peece, lighted full in the nape of his necke, & brake his necke bone aſunder: wherewith he was ſodainly ſo benummed, that he loſt his ſight with the blow, the raines of his bridle fell out of his hande, and him ſelfe fell from his horſe to the ground, by Licymmias tombe, before any man knew what he was, at the leaſt the common people. Vntill at the laſt there came one Zopyrus, that was in pay with Antigonus, and two or three other ſouldiers alſo that ran ſtraight to the place, and knowing him, dragged his body into a gate, euen as he was comming againe to him ſelfe out of this traunſe. This Zopyrus drewe out a SLAVON ſword he wore by his ſide, to ſtrike of his head. But Pyrrus caſt ſuch a grimme countenance on him betweene his eyes, that made him ſo afrayed, & his hand ſo to ſhake therewith: that being thus amazed, he did not ſtrike him right in the place where he ſhould haue cut of his head, but killed him vnder his mouth about his chinne, ſo that he was a great while ere he could ſtrike of his head. The matter was ſtraight blowen abroade amongeſt diuerſe: whereupon Alcyoneus running thither, asked for the head that he might know it againe. But when he had it, he ranne preſently vnto his father withall, and found him talking with his familiar frends, and caſt Pyrrus head before him. Antigonus looking vpon it, when he knew it, layed apon his ſonne with his ſtaffe, and called him cruell murderer, and vnnaturall barbarous beaſt: and ſo hyding his eyes with his cloke, wept for pity, (remembring the fortune of his grandfather Antigonus, and of his father Demetrius) and then cauſed Pyrrus head & body to be honorably burnt & buried. Afterwards Alcyoneus meeting Helenus (king Pyrrus ſonne) in very poore ſtate, mufled vp with a poore ſhorte cloke; vſed him very curteouſly with gentle wordes, and brought him to his father. Antigonus ſeeing his ſonne bringing of him, ſayd vnto him: this parte now (my ſonne) is better then the firſt, and pleaſeth me a great deale more. But yet thou haſt not done all thou ſhouldeſt: for thou ſhouldeſt haue taken from him his beggerly cloke he weareth, which doth more ſhame vs that are the gainers, then him that is the loſer. After he had ſpoken theſe wordes, Antigonus embraced Helenus, and hauing apparelled him in good ſorte, ſent him home with honorable conuoy into his realme of EPIRVS. Furthermore, ſeaſing all Pyrrus campe and army, he curteouſly receiued all his frendes and ſeruauntes.

IT is not knowen what was the third name of Caius Marius, no more then of Quintius Sertorius, who had all SPAYNE in his handes at one time: nor of Lucius Mummius, he that destroyed the citie of CORINTHE. For this name of Achaicus, that was geuen vnto Mummius, of Africanus vnto Scipio: and of Numidicus vnto Metellus: were all surnames geuen them, by reason of the conquestes they wan. By this reason Posidonius thinketh to ouercome them that say, that the third name the ROMAINES haue, is their proper name: as Camillus, Marcellus, Cato. For if it fell out so, sayd he, then it must needes follow that they which haue two names, should haue no proper name. But on the other side also, he doth not consider that by the like reason he should say, that women haue no names: for there is not a woman in ROME that is called by her first name, which Posidonius iudgeth to be the proper name of the ROMAINES. And that of the other two, the one is the common name of all the house or family, as of the POMPEIANS, of the MANLIANS, and of the CORNELIANS, like as the HERACLIDES and the PELOPIDES are amongest the GREECIANS: and the other is a surname taken of the deedes, or of the nature, forme, or shape of the body, or of some other like accident, as are these surnames, Matrinus, Torquatus, & Sylla. Euen as amongest the GREECIANS likewise, Mnemon, which signifieth hauing good memory: Grypos, hauing a crooked nose: Callinicos, conquering. But as for that, the diuersitie of custome would deliuer obiection sufficient to the contrary, to him that lifted. And furthermore, as touching the fauor of Marius face, we haue seene an image of his in marbell at RAVENNA, a citie of the GAVLES, which doth liuely represent that rough feuerity of nature and maner which they say was in him. For being borne a rough man by nature, and geuen to the warres, and hauing followed the same altogether from his youth, more then the ciuill life: when he came to authority, he could not bridle his anger and choller ieke nature. And they say furthermore, that he neuer learned the Greeke tongue, nor vsed it in any matters of weight: as though it had bene a mockery to study to learne the tongue, the masters whereof liued in bondage vnder others. After his second triumphe, in the dedication of a certaine temple, he made Greeke players to shewe the ROMAINES pastime: and came into the Theater, how beit he did but sit downe only, and went his way straight. Wherfore me thinkes, that as Plato was wont to say of vnto Xenocrates the Philosopher, who was of a curriſh nature, had his head euer occupied, and to ſeuere: Xenocrates, my frend: I pray thee doe ſacrifice to the Graces. So if any man could haue perſwaded Marius to haue ſacrificed to the Muſes, and to the GREECIAN Graces: (that is to ſay, that he had knowen the Greeke tongue) to ſo many famous and glorious deedes as he did, both in peace and warres, he had not ioyned ſo vnfortunate and miſerable an end as he made, through his choller and extreame ambition, at ſuch yeares, and through an vnſatiable couetouſnes, which like boyſterous windes made him to make ſhipwracke of all, in a moſt cruell, bloody, and vnnaturall age. The which is eaſily knowen in reading the diſcourſe of his doinges. Firſt of all he was of a meane houſe, borne of poore parents by father & mother, that got their liuings by ſweate of their browes. His father as him ſelfe, was called Caius: Fulcinia was his mother. And this was the cauſe why he beganne ſo late to haunt the city, and to learne the ciuility and manners of ROME, hauing bene brought vp alwayes before in a litle poore village called CIRROBATON, within the territory of the city of ARPOS: where he led a hard contry life, in reſpect of thoſe that liued pleaſauntly and finely in the cities, but otherwiſe well reformed, and neareſt vnto the manners of the auncient ROMAINES. The firſt iorney he made vnto the warres, was againſt the CELTIBERIANS in SPAYNE, vnder Scipio AFRICAN, when he went to beſiege the city of NVMANTIA: where his Captaines in ſhorte time found that he was a better ſouldier, then any other of his companions. For he did maruelous eaſily receiue the reformation of manners, and the diſcipline of warres, which Scipio aduaunced amongeſt his ſouldiers that were ill trained before, and geuen ouer to all pleaſure. And they ſay, that in the ſight of his Generall he fought hand to hand with one of his enemies, and ſlew him: vpon which occaſion, Scipio to make him loue him, did offer him many curteſies and pleaſures. But ſpecially one day aboue the reſt, hauing made him ſuppe with him at his table, ſome one after ſupper falling in talke of Captaines that were in ROME at that time: one that ſtoode by Scipio, asked him (either bicauſe in deede he ſtoode in doubt, or elſe for that he would curry fauor with Scipio) what other Captaine the ROMAINES ſhould haue after his death, like vnto him. Scipio hauing Marius by him, gently clapped him apon his ſhoulder, and ſayd: peraduenture this ſhalbe he. Thus happely were they both borne, the one to ſhew from his youth that one day he ſhould come to be a great man, and the other alſo for wiſely coniecturing the end, by ſeeing of the beginning. Well, it fortuned ſo, that theſe words of Scipio (by reporte) aboue all things elſe put Marius in a good hope, as if they had bene ſpoken by the oracle of ſome god, and made him bold to deale in matters of ſtate and common wealth: where, by meanes of the fauor & countenaunce Cæcilius Metellus gaue him (whoſe houſe his father and he had alwayes followed and honored) he obtained the office of Tribuneſhippe. In this office he preferred a law touching the manner howe to geue the voyces in election of the Magiſtrates, which did ſeeme to take from the nobility the authority they had in iudgement. And therefore the Conſull Cotta ſtepped vp againſt it, and perſwaded the Senate to reſiſt that lawe, and not ſuffer it to be authoriſed, and therewithall preſently to call Marius before them to yeld a reaſon of his doing. So was it agreed vppon in the Senate. Now Marius comming into the Senate, was not abaſhed at any thing, as ſome other young man would haue bene, that had but newly begonne to enter into the world as he did, and hauing no other notable calling or quality in him, ſauing his vertue only to commend him: but taking boldenes of him ſelfe (as the noble actes he afterwards did, gaue ſhow of his valor) he openly threatned the Conſull Cotta to ſende him to priſon, if he did not preſently withdrawe the concluſion he had cauſed to be reſolued apon. The Conſull then turning him ſelfe vnto Cæcilius Metellus, asked him how he liked it? Metellus ſtanding vp, ſpake in the behalfe of the Conſull: and then Marius calling a ſergeaunt out, commaunded him to take Metellus ſelfe, and to cary him to priſon. Metellus appealed to the other Tribunes, but neuer a one would take his matter in hand: ſo that the Senate when all was done, were compelled to call backe the concluſion that before was taken. Then Marius returning with great honor into the market place among the aſſembly of the people, cauſed this law to paſſe and be authoriſed: and euery man held opinion of him that he would proue a ſtowt man, and ſuch a one, as would not ſtoupe for any feare, nor ſhrinke for baſhfullnes, but would beard the Senate in fauor of the people. Notwithſtanding, he ſhortly after chaunged opinion, and altered

Cotta Conſull.

A altered the first, by an other act he made. For when an other went about to haue a law made, to distribute corne vnto euery citizen without payment of any penny, he was vehemently against it, and ouerthrew it: so that thereby he came to be a like honored and estemed of either party, as he that would neither pleasure the one, nor the other, to the preiudice of the common wealth. After he had bene Tribune, he sued for the chiefest office of Ædilis. Of the Ædiles there are two sortes: the first is called Ædilitas Curulis, so named bicause of certaine chayers that haue crooked feete, vpon which they sit when they geue audience. The other is of lesse dignity, and that is called Ædilitas popularis: and when they haue chosen the first and greater Ædilis at ROME, they presently proceede the same day also in the market place vnto election of the lesser. Marius seeing plainely that he was put by the chiefest of the Ædiles, turned againe straight yet to demaund the second: but this was misliked in him, and they tooke him for too bold, too shameles, and too presumptuous a man. So that in one selfe day he had two denyalles and repulses, which neuer man but him selfe before had. And neuertheless, all this could not cut his combe, but shortely after he sued also for the Prætorshippe, and he lacked but litle of the deniall of that: yet in the ende, being last of all chosen, he was accused to haue bribed the people, and bought their voyces for money. And surely amogenst many other, this presumption was very great: that they saw a man of CASSIVS SABACON within the barres where the election is made, running to and fro amonge them that gaue their voyces, bicause this Sabacon was Marius very great frend. The matter came before the iudges, and Sabacon was examined vpon it. Whereunto he aunswered, that for the great extreame heate he felt, he was very dry, and asked for colde water to drinke, and that this man had brought him some in a potte where he was, howbeit that he went his way as soone as euer he had dronke. This Sabacon was afterwardes put out of the Senate by the next Censors, and many iudge that he was worthy of this infamy, for that he was periured in iudgement, or bicause he was so subiect and geuen to his pleasure. Caius Herennius was also called for a witnesse against Marius: but he did alleage for his excuse, that the law and custome did dispense with the Patrone, to be a witnesse against his follower & client, and he was quit by the iudges. For the ROMAINES alwayes call those Patrons, who take the protection of meaner then them selues into their handes: saying, that Marius predecessors, and Marius him selfe, had euer bene followers of the house of the HERENNIANS. The iudges receiued his aunswere, and allowed thereof. But Marius spake against it, alleaging, that since he had receiued this honor to beare office in the common wealth, he was now growen from this base condicion, to be any more a follower of any man: the which was not true in all. For euery office of a Magistrate doth not exempt him that hath the office, nor yet his posterity, to be vnder the patronage of an other, nor doth discharge him from the duety of honoring them: but of necessity he must be a Magistrate, which the law doth permit to sit in the crooked chayer called Curulis, that is to say, caried vppon a charet through the city. But notwithstanding that at the first hearing of this cause, Marius had but ill successe, and that the iudges were against him all they could: yet in the ende for all that, at the last hearing of his matter, Marius, contrary to all mens opinions, was discharged, bicause the iudges opinions with and against him fell to be of like number. He vsed him selfe very orderly in his office of Prætorshippe, and after his yeare was out, when it came to deuide the prouinces by lot, SPAINE fell vnto him, which is beyond the riuer of Bætis: where it is reported that he skowred all the contrie thereabouts of theeues and robbers, which notwithstanding was yet very cruell and sauage, for the rude, barbarous, and vnciuill manner and facion of life of the inhabitantes there. For the SPANYARDS were of opinion euen at that time, that it was a goodly thinge to liue apon thefte and robbery. At his returne to ROME out of SPAYNE, desiring to deale in matters of the common wealth, he saw that he had neither eloquence nor riches, which were the two meanes, by the which those that were at that time in credit and authority, did cary the people euen as they would. Notwithstanding, they made great accompt of his constancy and noble minde they found in him, of his great paynes and trauell he tooke continually, and of the simplicity of his life: which were causes to bring him to honor and preferment, insomuch as he maried very highly. For he maried Iulia, that was of the noble house of the Cæsars, and aunte vnto Iulius Cæsar: who afterwardes came to be the chiefeſt man of all the ROMAINES, and who by reaſon of that allyance betwene them, ſeemed in ſome thinges to followe Marius, as we haue wrytten in his life. Marius was a man of great temperaunce and pacience, as may be iudged by an acte he did, puttinge him ſelfe into the handes of ſurgeons. For his ſhanckes and legges were full of great ſwollen veynes, and being angrie bicauſe it was no pleaſaunt thinge to beholde: he determined to put him ſelfe into the handes of ſurgeons to be cured. And firſt, laying out one of his legges to the ſurgeon to worke vpon, he would not be bound as others are in the like caſe: but paciently abode all the extreame paines a man muſt of neceſſity feele being cut, without ſturring, groning, or ſighing, ſtill keeping his countenaunce, and ſayed neuer a word. But when the ſurgeon had done with his firſt legge, and would haue gone to the other, he would not geue it him: nay ſayd he, I ſee the cure is not worth the paine I muſt abide. Afterwardes, Cæcilius Metellus the Conſull, being appointed to go into AFRICKE to make warre with king Iugurthe, tooke Marius with him for one of his Lieutenauntes. Marius being there, ſeeing notable good ſeruice to be done, and good occaſion to ſhew his manhoode, was not of minde in this voyage to increaſe Metellus honor and reputacion, as other Lieutenauntes did: and thought that it was not Metellus that called him forth for his Lieutenaunt, but fortune her ſelfe that preſented him a fit occaſion to raiſe him to greatnes, and (as it were) did lead him by the hand into a goodly field, to put him to the proofe of that he coulde doe. And for this cauſe therefore, he endeuored him ſelfe to ſhew all the poſſible proofes of valliantneſſe and honor he could. For, the warres being great continually there, he neuer for feare refuſed any attempt or ſeruice, how daungerous or painfull ſoeuer it were, neither diſdained to take any ſeruice in hand, were it neuer ſo litle: but exceeding all other his fellowes and companions in wiſedome and foreſight, in that which was to be done, and ſtriuing with the meaneſt ſouldiers in liuing hardly and painefully, wanne the goodwill and fauor of euery man. For to ſay truely, it is a great comforte & refreſhing to ſouldiers that labor, to haue companiõs that labor willingly with them. For they thinke, that their company laboring with them, doth in manner take away the compulſion and neceſſity. Furthermore, it pleaſeth the ROMAINE ſouldier maruelouſly to ſee the Generall eate openly of the ſame bread he eateth, or that he lyeth on a hard bed as he doth, or that him ſelfe is the firſt man to ſet his hande to any worke when a trenche is to be caſt, or their campe to be fortified. For they doe not ſo much eſteeme the Captaines, that honor and reward them: as they doe thoſe that in daungerous attempts labor, and venture their liues with them. And further, they do farre better loue them that take paines with them, then thoſe that ſuffer them to liue idlely by them. Marius performing all this, and winning thereby the loue and goodwills of his ſouldiers: he ſtraight filled all LIBYA and the city of ROME with his glory, ſo that he was in euery manns mouth. For they that were in the campe in AFRICKE, wrote vnto them that were at ROME, that they ſhould neuer ſee the ende of theſe warres againſt this barbarous king, if they gaue not the charge vnto Marius, and choſe him Conſull. Theſe thinges miſliked Metellus very much, but ſpecially the misfortune that came apon Turpilius, did maruelouſly trouble him: which fell out in this ſorte. Turpilius was Metellus frende, yea he and all his parentes had followed Metellus in this warre, being maſter of the workes in his campe. Metellus made him gouernor ouer the city of VACCA, a goodly great city: and he vſing the inhabitantes of the ſame very gently and curteouſly, miſtruſted nothing, till he was fallen into the handes of his enemies through their treaſon. For they had brought king Iugurthe into their city vnknowing to him, howbeit they did him no hurt, but onely begged him of the king, and let him goe his way ſafe. And this was the cauſe why they accuſed Turpilius of treaſon. Marius being one of his iudges in the counſell, was not contented to be bitter to him him ſelfe, but moued many of the counſell beſides to be againſt him. So that Metellus hy the voyces of the people, was driuen againſt his will to condemne him, to ſuffer as a traitor: and ſhortly after it was founde, and proued, that Turpilius was wrongfully condemned, and put to death. To ſay truely, there was not one of the coũſel but were very ſory with Metellus, who maruelous impaciently tooke the death of the poore innocent. But Marius contrarily reioyced, and tooke it vpon him that he purſued his death, and was not aſhamed to make open vauntes, that he had hanged a fury about Metellus necke, to reuenge his frendes blood, whom he giltleſſe had cauſed to be put to death.

Diſpleaſure betwixt Metellus & Marius.

A death. After that time they became mortall enemies. And they ſay, that one day Metellus to mocke him withall, ſayd vnto him: O good man, thou wilt leaue vs then, and returne to ROME to ſue for the Conſulſhippe, and canſt thou not be contented to tary to be Conſull with my ſonne? Now his ſonne at that time was but a boy. But whatſoeuer the matter ment, Marius left him not ſo, but labored for leaue all he could poſſible. And Metellus after he had vſed many delayes and excuſes, at the length gaue him leaue, twelue dayes only before the day of election of the Conſulls. Wherefore Marius made haſt, and in two dayes and a night came from the campe to Vtica apon the ſea ſide, which is a maruelous way from it: and there before he tooke ſhippe, did ſacrifice vnto the goddes, and the Sooth ſayer tolde him, that the goddes by the ſignes of his ſacrifices, did promiſe him vncredible proſperity, and ſo great, as he himſelfe
B durſt not hope after. Theſe wordes made Marius hart greater. Whereupon he hoyſed ſayle, and hauing a paſſing good gale of winde in the poope of the ſhippe, paſſed the ſeaes in foure dayes, and being landed, rode poſte to ROME. When he was arriued, he went to ſhewe himſelfe vnto the people: who were maruelous deſirous to ſee him. And being brought by one of the Tribunes of the people vnto the pulpit for orations, after many accuſations which he obiected againſt Metellus, in the end he beſought the people to chooſe him Conſull, promiſing that within few dayes he would either kill, or take king Iugurthe priſoner. Whereupon he was choſen Conſull without any contradiction. And ſo ſoone as he was proclaimed, he beganne immediatly to leauie men of warre, cauſing many poore men that had nothing, & many ſlaues alſo, to be enrolled againſt the order of auncient cuſtome: where other Captaines before him
C did receiue no ſuch maner of men, and did no more ſuffer vnworthy men to be ſouldiers, then they did allow of vnworthy officers in the common wealth: in doing the which euery one of them that were enrolled, left their goodes behinde them, as a pledge of their good ſeruice abroade in the warres. Yet this was not the matter that made Marius to be moſt hated, but they were his ſtowte prowde wordes, full of contempt of others, that did chiefely offende the noble men in the city. For he proclaimed it euery where abroade as it were, that his Conſullſhippe was a ſpoyle he had gotten of the effeminate riche noble men through his valliantnes, and that the wounds which he had vpon his body for ſeruice of the common wealth, and not the monuments of the dead, nor the images and ſtatues of others, were thoſe that recommended him to the people, nor weare his ſtrength. And ofttimes naming Albinus, and otherwhile D Beſtia, both noble men, and of great houſes, who hauing bene Generalls of the ROMAINE army, had very ill fortune in the contry of LIBYA: he called them cowardes, and ſimple ſouldiers, asking them that were about him, if they did not thinke that their auncеſters would rather haue wiſhed to haue left their children that came of them like vnto him ſelfe, then ſuch as they had bene: conſidering that they them ſelues had wonne honor and glory, not for that they were diſcended of noble blood, but through their deſerued vertue and valliant deedes. Now Marius ſpake not theſe wordes in a fooliſhe brauery, and for vaine glory onely, to purchaſe the ill will of the nobility for nothing: but the common people being very glad to ſee him ſhame and deſpite the Senate, and meaſuring alwayes the greatnes of his cotage with his hawty fierce wordes, they egged him forward ſtill not to ſpare the nobility, and to reproue the E great men, ſo that he euer held with the communalty. And furthermore, when he was paſſed ouer againe into AFRICKE, it ſpited Metellus to the hart, bicauſe that he hauing ended all the warre, that there remained almoſt no more to take or winne, Marius ſhould come in that ſorte to take away the glory and triumphe out of his handes, hauing ſought to riſe and increaſe by vnthankefullnes towards him. He would not come to him therefore, but went an other way, and left the army with Rutilius one of his Lieutenauntes, to deliuer the ſame vnto him. Howbeit the reuenge of this ingratitude, lighted in the ende vpon Marius owne necke. For Sylla tooke out of Marius hands, the honor of ending this warre: euen as Marius had taken it from Metellus. But how, & after what ſorte, I will repeate it in few words, bicauſe we haue written the particularities more at large in the life of Sylla. Bocchus king of high NVMIDIA, was father
F in law vnto king Iugurthe, vnto whom he gaue no great aide, whileſt he made warres with the ROMAINES, bicauſe he hated his vnfaithfullnes, & feared leaſt he would make him ſelfe greater then he was: but in the end, after Iugurthe had fled, and wandered vp and downe in euery place, he was constrained of very necessity to cast his last hope and ancker apon him, as his finall refuge, and so repayre vnto him. King Bocchus receiued him rather for shame, bicause he durst not punish him, then for any loue or goodwill he bare him: and hauing him in his hands, seemed openly to intreate Marius for him, and secretly to wryte the contrary vnto him. But in the meane time, he practised treason vnder hande, and sent priuely for Lucius Sylla, who then was Quæstor (to say, high treasorer) vnder Marius, and of whome he had receiued certaine pleasures in those warres. Sylla trusting to this barbarous king, went at his sending for to him. But when he was come, king Bocchus repented him of his promise, and altered his minde, standing many dayes in doubt with him selfe howe to resolue, whether he should deliuer king Iugurthe, or keepe Sylla him selfe: yet at the last he went on with his purpose and intended treason, and deliuered king Iugurthe aliue into Syllaes hands. And this was the first originall cause of the pestilent and mortall enmitie that grew afterwardes betwixt Marius and Sylla, and was like to haue vtterly ouerthrowen the citie of Rome, and to haue rased the foundation of the empyre vnto the grounde. For many enuyinge the glorie of Marius, gaue it out euery where, that this acte of the taking of king Iugurthe, appertained only vnto Sylla: and Sylla him selfe caused a ring to be made, which he ware cõmonly, and had grauen vpon the stone of the same, how Bocchus deliuered Iugurthe into his handes. And afterwardes he made it allwayes his seale to dispite Marius with all, who was an ambitious and proude man, and coulde abide no companion to be partaker of the glorie of his doings: and Sylla did it specially at the procurement of enemies & ill willers, who gaue the glory of the beginning & chiefe exployts of this warre, vnto Metellus, and the last and finall conclusion vnto Sylla, to the ende that the people should not haue Marius in so great estimacion and good opinion, as they had before. But all this enuy, detraction, and hatred against Marius, was soone after extinguished and troden vnder foote, by reason of the great daunger that fell apon all Italie out of the West: and they neuer spake of it afterwardes, knowing that the common wealth stoode in neede of a good Captaine, and that they beganne to looke about, and consider who should be that great wise Pylot, that might saue and preserue it, from so exceding daungerous storme of warres. For there was not a noble man of all the auncient houses of Rome, that durst vndertake to offer him selfe to demaunde the Consullshippe: but Marius being absent, was chosen Consull the second time. For Iugurthe was no sooner taken, but newes came to Rome of the cõming downe of the Tevtons, and of the Cimbres, the which would not be beleued at the first, by reason of the infinite number of the fighting men which was sayd to be in their company, and for the vncredible force and power of armies which was iustified to come also: but afterwardes they knew plainely, that the rumor that ranne abroade was lesse, then the troth fell out in deede. For they were three hundred thowsand fighting men all armed, who brought with them also an other multitude as great (or more) of women and children: which wandered vp and downe seeking contries and townes to dwell and liue in, as they heard say the Gavles had done in olde time, who leauing their owne contry, came, and had possessed the best parte of Italie, which they had taken away from the Thvscans. Now to say truely, no man knewe of what nation they were, nor from whence they came: as well for that they had no frendshippe with any other people, as also bicause they came out of a farre contry, as a clowde of people that was spred all ouer Gavle & Italie. It was douted much that they came out of Germanye, dwelling about the north sea: and this they coniectured by viewe of the greatnes of their bodies, and also for that they had darke blew eyes and redde, besides that the Germanes in their tongue doe call theeues and robbers, Cimbri. Other say that Celtica, for the great length and largenes of the contry, stretching it selfe from the coast of the great Occean sea and from the north partes, drawing towards the mariisses Mœotides, and the East runneth into Scythia, or Tartaria Pontica: and that for neighbourhood these two nations ioyned together, and went out of their contrie, not that they made this great voyage all at one time, but at many sundry times, marching yearely in the spring further and further into the contry. And thus by continuance of time, they passed by force of armes through all the firme lande of Evrope and that for this cause, although they had many particular names according to the diuersitie of their nations, yet all this masse and multitude of people gathered together, were called notwith-

A notwithſtanding, the army of the CELTOSCYTHES, as who would ſay, the CELTOTARTARES. Other hold opinion that the nation of the CIMMERIANS, who were knowen in old time for auncient GREECIANS, the one parte of them were not very great in reſpect of the whole, the which being fled (or driuen out of their contrie for ſome ciuill diſſention) were compelled by the TARTARES to paſſe beyond the mariſſes Mœotides, into the contries of ASIA, vnder the conduction of a Captaine called Ligdamis. But the reſidue of them which were a farre greater number, and more warlike men, they dwelt in the furdeſt partes of the earth, adioyning vnto the great Oceean ſea, in a darke ſhadowed contrie, couered with wonderfull forreſtes, of ſuch length, and ſo great and thicke, and the trees ſo high, that the ſunne can haue no power vpon the ground, and they ioyne hard vpon the great forreſt of Hercynia. And furB thermore, they are vnder ſuch a climate, where the pole is of ſuch a height by the inclination of the circles equidiſtant, which they call Parallelles, that it is not farre from the poynte that aunſwereth directly to the plummet vppon the head of the inhabitantes: and where the dayes are equinoctiall, they doe deuide all their time in two partes, the which geueth Homer occaſion to fayne, that when Vliſſes would call vpon the dead, he went into the contry of the CIMMERIANS, as into the contry of hell. And this is the cauſe why they ſay theſe barbarous people left their owne contries to come into ITALIE, which from the beginning were called CIMMERIANS, and afterwardes they ſay (and not without great likelyhoode) that they were ſurnamed CIMBRES: howebeit that is ſpoken rather by a likely coniecture, then by any aſſured troth of hiſtory. And as for the multitude of men, the moſt parte of hiſtoriographers doe C wryte, that they were rather moe, then leſſe then we haue ſpoken of: and that they were ſo hardy and valliant, that nothing coulde ſtande before them, they did ſo great thinges by the ſtrength of their handes where they fought with any, ſo violently, and ſo ſodainely, that they ſeemed to be like a lightninge fire all about where they came. By meanes whereof, they met with no man that durſt reſiſt them, but ſcraped together and caried away, all that they found, hande ouer head: and there were many ROMAINE Captaines appointed gouernors to keepe that which the ROMAINES held in GAVLE beyonde the mountaines, who with great armies were ſhamefully ouerthrowē by them. The cowardlynes of thoſe, whom they had ouercome, was the chiefeſt cauſe that moued them to direct their iorney to ROME. For when they had vanquiſhed the firſt they fought withall, and gotten great richeſſe alſo: they were ſo fleſhed D by this, that they determined to ſtay no where before they had firſt deſtroyed ROME, & ſacked all ITALIE. The ROMAINES hearing of this out of all partes, ſent for Marius to geue him the conduction and leading of theſe warres, and choſe him Conſull the ſeconde time: notwithſtanding that it was directly againſt the lawe, that did expreſſely forbid any man to be choſen being abſent, and vntill alſo a certaine time appointed had paſt betwene the vacation and election, before they could chooſe him officer twiſe in one office. Some alleaged this law, of intent to hinder the election. But the people repulſt them, obiecting to the contrary: that this was not the firſt time the law had geuen place to the benefit of the common wealth, and that the occaſion offered to abrogate the law at that preſent was no leſſe, then former occaſions by the which they choſe Scipio Conſull, againſt the courſe and time appointed by the law, not for E any feare they ſtoode in to loſe their owne contrie, but for the deſire they had to deſtroy the contry of the CARTHAGINIANS, by reaſon whereof the people proceeded to election. And Marius bringing home his armie againe out of LIBYA into ITALIE, tooke poſſeſſion of his Conſulſhip the firſt day of Ianuary (on which day the ROMAINES beginne their yeare) and therwithall made his triumphe into the city of ROME, ſhowing that to the ROMAINES, which they thought neuer to haue ſeene: and that was, kinge Iugurthe priſoner, who was ſo ſubtill a man, and coulde ſo well frame him ſelfe vnto his fortune, and with his craft and ſubtiltie was of ſo great corage beſides, that none of his enemies euer hoped to haue had him aliue. But it is ſayd, that after he was led in this triumphe, he fell mad ſtraight apon it. And the pompe of triumphe being ended, he was caried into priſone, where the ſergeauntes for haſt to haue the F ſpoyle of him, tare his apparell by force from of his backe: and bicauſe they would take away his rich golde eare ringes that hong at his eares, they pulled away with them the typpe of his eare, and then caſt him naked to the bottome of a deepe dungeon, his wittes being altogether troubled. Yet when they did throw him downe, laughing he sayd: O Hercules, how colde are your stoues. He liued there yet six dayes, fighting with hunger, and desiring alwayes to prolong his miserable life vnto the last hower: the which was a iust deserued punishment for his wicked life. In this triumphe were caried (as they say) three thowsand & seuen hundred pound weight in gold, and of siluer nygots, fiue thowsand seuen hundred and lxxv. pounde weight and more in golde and ready coyne, eight and twenty thowsand and seuen hundred crownes. After this triumphe, Marius caused the Senate to assemble within the Capitoll, where he entred into the companie with his triumphinge robe, either bicause he forgot it, or else of too grosse and vnciuill arrogancy: but perceiuing that all the assemblie misliked of it, he rose sodainly, and tooke his long Consulls gowne, and then returned quickely againe into his place.

Furthermore Marius departing to goe to the warres, thought to traine his army by the way, and to harden his souldiers vnto labor, causing them to runne euery way, making great longe iorneys, compelling ech souldier to cary his owne furniture, and to prepare him necessary vittells to finde him selfe withall: so that euer after they made a prouerbe of it, and called such as were paineful and willing to do that which they were commaunded without grudging, Marius moyles. Other notwithstanding, do shew an other cause and beginning of this prouerbe.

Marius moyles.

For they say, that Scipio lying at the siege of the city of NVMANTIA, would not only take view of the armor and horses of seruice that were in his armie, but also of the moyles and other beastes of burden, bicause he would see how they were kept & furnished. So Marius brought his horse and moyle to the muster which he kept him selfe, fatte, fayer, and very well dreste, and his moyles heare so slike and smooth, and therewithall so lusty and trimme, as none of the rest were like vnto them. Scipio tooke great pleasure to see these beastes so well kept, and in so good plyte: insomuch as he spake of it afterwards many a time and oft. And vpon his words, this manner of talke was taken vp euer after, and became a common prouerbe: when they meane to mocke any man that is painefull, and geuen to sore labor, makinge as though they would praise him, they call him Marius moyle. Furthermore, it was a happy turne for Marius (in mine opinion) that these barbarous people (like in force to the beating backe of the raging seaes) turned their first fury towardes SPAYNE: and that he in the meane space had time and leasure to traine and exercise his souldiers, to make them bolde, and withall, him selfe to be throughly knowen amongest them. For when by litle and litle they had learned not to offend, nor disobey: then they found his rough commaunding, and sharpe seuerity in punishing such as slacke their duety, both profitable and very necessarie, besides that it was also iust and reasonable. Againe, his great fury, his sharpe words, and his fierce lookes, after they had a while bene vsed to them, by litle and litle they seemed nothinge so fearfull to them, as to their enemies. But the thing that pleased the souldiers more then all the rest, was his iustice acd vpright dealinge: whereof they reporte such an example: Marius had a nephewe of his in his campe called Caius Lusius, who had charge of men in the army. This Lusius was taken for a maruelous honest man, sauing that he had this fowle vice in him, that he would be sodainly in loue with fayer young boyes: and as at that time he fell in loue with a trimme younge striplinge, called Trebonius, that serued vnder him, and hauing many times lewdly entised him, and neuer could obtaine his purpose, at the last sent for him one night by his seruaunt. The young man might not disobay his Captaine being sent for, but presently went vnto him. When he was come into his tent, and that his Captaine did striue with all his force to doe him villanny: he drewe out his sworde, and killed him in the place. And this was done when Marius was out of his campe: who so soone as he returned, caused the marshall to bring the young man before him. Many stepped forth straight to accuse him, but no man to defend him. Wherefore he boldly began to tell his tale himselfe, & to name many witnesses, who had both seene & knowen how his dead Captaine had oftentimes offered him dishonor, and how that he had continually resisted his abhominable motion, and would neuer yeld him selfe vnto him, for any gift or present he could offer him. Wherefore Marius commending him greatly, and being very glad of it, caused presently one of those crownes to be brought vnto him, which are vsed to be geuen to them that in a day of battel haue done some valliant deede, and he him selfe did crowne Trebonius withall, as one that had done a noble acte, and at such a time, as good and honest

A examples were requisite. This iudgement of Marius beinge caried to ROME, stoode him to great good purpose towardes the obtaining of his third Consullshippe: besides also that they looked for the comming backe of these barbarous people about the springe with whome the ROMAINE souldiers would not fight vnder any other Captaine, then Marius. Howbeit they came not so soone againe as they looked for them, but Marius passed ouer also the yeare of his third Consullshippe. So time comming about againe for the election of newe Consulls, and his companion also being dead: he was driuen to goe him selfe vnto ROME, leauing the charge of his campe in his absence, vnto Manius Acilius. At that time there were many noble men that sued for the Consullshippe: but Lucius Saturninus one of the Tribunes, who had the communalty vnder his girdell as he would him selfe, more then any of thother Tribunes, B and being wonne vnder hand by Marius, made many orations, in the which he perswaded the people to choose Marius Consull the fourth time. Marius to the contrary, seemed to refuse it, saying that he would none of it, though the people chose him. Whereupon Saturninus called him traitor, crying out, that his refusall in such a daunger and time of necessity, was an apparant parte to betray the common wealth. It was found straight that this was a grosse packe betwixt Saturninus and Marius, by such as could see day at a litle hole. Neuertheless, the people considering that their present troubles required Marius skil & good fortune in the warres, they made him Consull the fourth time, and ioyned Catulus Luctatius Consul with him, a man that was greatly honored of the nobility, and not misliked also of the common people. Marius hauing newes of the approching of the barbarous people, passed ouer the Alpes with great C speede, & fortifying his campe by the riuer of Rhone, he brought great prouision of all kindes of vittels thither with him, least being straighted by lacke therof, he should be forced to come to battell at any other time, but euen as he would him selfe, and as it should seeme good vnto him. And where before that time the transporting of vittells vnto his campe by sea was very long, and daungerous, and a maruelous great charge besides: he made it very shorte and easie by this meanes. The mouth of the riuer of Rhone had gathered together so much mudde, and such store of sande, which the waues of the sea had cast on heapes together, that the same was becomen very high and depe: so as the banckes made the entry into it very narrow, hard, and daungerous for great shippes of burden that came from the sea. Marius considering this matter, set his men a worke while they had nothing to do, & made them digge a large trench D and deepe channell, into the which he turned a great parte of the riuer, and caried it to a conuenient place of the coast, where the water fell into the sea by an open gulfe, wherby he made it able to cary the greatest shippes that were: and besides that, it was in a very still quiet place, not being troubled with windes nor waues. The channell carieth yet his name, and is called Marius Channell or trenche. These barbarous people deuided them selues into two armies to passe into ITALIE, so that it fell out to the one parte which were the CIMBRES, to goe through high GERMANYE, and to force that passage which Catulus kept: and vnto the other parte, which were the TEVTONS and AMBRONS, to passe through the contry of the GENOVESIANS by the sea side against Marius. Now the CIMBRES hauing the greater compasse to fetch about, stayed lenger, and remained behinde: but the TEVTONS and the AMBRONS go- E ing their way first, had in fewe dayes dispatched their iorney they had to go, to bring them to the campe where the ROMAINES lay, vnto whom they presented themselues by infinite numbers, with terrible faces to beholde, and their cryes & voyces farre contrary vnto other mens. They tooke in a maruelous deale of grounde in length to campe vpon, and so came forth to defie Marius, and prouoke him to battell in open field. Marius made no reckoning of all their bragging defiaces, but kept his men together within his campe, taking on terribly with them that would rashely take vpon them to moue ought to the contrary, and which through impacience of choller would nedes go forth to fight, calling them traytors to their contry. For said he, we are not come to fight for our priuate glory, neither to winne two triumphes nor victories for our selues: but we must seeke by all meanes to diuert and put by this great shower of F warres from vs, and this lightning and tempest, that it ouercome not all ITALIE. These words he spake vnto the priuate Captaines which were vnder him, as vnto men of hauior and quality. But as for the common souldiers, he made them stande vpon the trenches of his campe, one after an other to behold the enemies,& to acquaint them ſelues with ſight of their faces, their countenaunce,and marching,& not to be afrayed of their voyces to heare them ſpeake, which were wonderfull,both ſtraunge & beaſtly : and alſo that they might know the facion of their weapons,and how they handled them. And by this order & ordinary viewing of them, in time he made the things that ſemed fearefull vnto his men at the firſt ſight,to be afterwards very familiar : ſo that they made no more wondring at them. For he iudged, the thing which in deede is true,that a rare and new matter neuer ſeene before,for lacke of iudgement and vnderſtanding,maketh things vnknowen to vs,more horrible & fearefull thē they are:and to the contrary, that cuſtome taketh away a great deale of feare, & terror of thoſe things, which by nature are in deede fearefull. The which was ſeene then by experience. For they being dayly acquainted to looke vpon theſe barbarous people, it did not only diminiſh ſome parte of the former feare of the ROMAINE ſouldiers:but furthermore they whetting their choller with the fierce vntollerable threates and bragges of theſe barbarous brutiſh people,did ſet their hartes a fire to fight with them, bicauſe they did not only waſt and deſtroy all the contry about them, but beſides that,came to geue aſſault euen vnto their campe with ſuch a boldnes,that the ROMAINE ſouldiers could no lenger ſuffer them,and they letted not to ſpeake wordes that came to Marius eares him ſelfe. What cowardlines hath Marius euer knowen in vs, that he keepes vs thus from fighting, & vnder locke & key as it were,in the gard of porters,as if we were women ? Let vs therefore ſhew our ſelues like men,& go aske him if he looke for any other ſouldiers beſides our ſelues to defend ITALIE : and if he haue determined to employ vs as pioners onely,when he would caſt a trenche to ridde away the mudde,or to turne a riuer contrary.For therein hath he onely hitherunto employed vs in great labor,and they are the notable workes he hath done in his two Conſullſhippes, whereof he maketh his boaſt vnto them at ROME. Is he afrayed they ſhould take him,as they did Carbo & Cepio,whom the enemies haue ouerthrowen ? He muſt not be afrayed of that: for he is a Captaine of an other manner of valor and reputacion then they were,and his army much better then theirs was.But howeſoeuer it be,yet were it much better in prouing to looſe ſomething,then to be idle, & to ſuffer our frends and cōfederats to be deſtroyed & ſacked before our eyes. Marius was maruelous glad to heare his men cōplaine thus, & did comfort them,& told thē that he did nothing miſtruſt their corage & valiantnes:howbeit that through the coūſell of certaine prophecies & oracles of the gods, he did expect time & place fit for victory.For he euer caried a SYRIAN womā in a litter about with him called Martha,with great reuerence,whom they ſaid had the ſpirit of prophecie in her:& that he did euer ſacrifice vnto the gods by her order,& at ſuch time as ſhe willed him to do it. This SYRIAN woman went firſt to ſpeake with the Senate about theſe matters, and did foretell & prognoſticate what ſhould follow. But the Senate would not heare her,& made her to be driuē away.Wherupon ſhe went vnto the womē,& made thē ſee proofe of ſome things ſhe vaūted of,& ſpecially Marius wife,at whoſe feete ſhe was ſet one day in an aſſembly of the cōmon playes,to ſee ſwordplayers fight for life & death:for ſhe told her certenly which of the ſhould ouercome.Whereupon this Lady ſent her vnto her husband Marius,who made great reckening of her,& caried her euē in a litter with him wherſoeuer he went.She was alwaies at Marius ſacrifices,apparelled in a gown of purple in graine, claſped to her with claſpes,& held a ſpeare in her hand woūd all about with noſegayes,& garlands of flowers tyed on with laces. This maner of ieaſt made many dout whether Marius ſhewed this woman opēly, beleuing in dede that ſhe had the gift of prophecy:or els that knowing the cōtrary,he made as though he did beleue it, to helpe her fayning. But that which Alexander the MYNDIAN wrote touching Vultures,is a thing greatly to be wōdred at.For he ſaid there were two of thē followed Marius in his warres, & that they euer ſhewed thē ſelues & miſſed not, when he ſhould win any great battel,& that they did know them by latin collers they ware about their necks,which the ſouldiers had tyed about thē,& afterwards let them go where they would: by reaſon wherof, they did know the ſouldiers againe,& it ſemed alſo that they did ſalute thē,& were very glad when they ſaw thē, & perſwaded thē ſelues, that it was a ſigne & token of good lucke to follow. Many ſignes and tokens were ſeene before the battell : howbeit all the reſt were ordinary ſightes, ſauing that which was reported to be ſeene at TVDERTVM,& AMERIA,two cities of ITALIE.

For

A For they say there were seene speares and targets in the night, burning like fire in the element, which first were caried vp & downe here and there, and then met together euen as men moue & sturre that fight one with an other: vntill at the length, the one geuing backe, and the other followinge after, they all vanished away, and consumed towardes the West. About the selfe same time also, there came from the citie of PESSINVNTA, Batabaces, the chiefe priest of the great mother of the goddes, who brought newes, that the goddesse had spoken to him within her sanctuary, and told him that the victory of this warre should fall out on the ROMAINES side. The Senate beleued it, and ordained that they should build a temple vnto that goddesse, to geue her thankes for the victorie which she did promise them. Batabaces also would haue presented him selfe vnto the people in open assemblie, to tell them as much. But there was Batabaces the priest of the mother of the goddes.

B one Aulus Pompeius a Tribune that would not suffer him to do it, calling him tombler, or iugler, & violently thrust him behinde the pulpit for orations: but the mischaunce that fell apon Pompeius afterwards, made thē the more to beleue Batabaces words. For Pompeius the Tribune no sooner came home vnto his house, but a great vehement agew tooke him, whereof he dyed the seuenth day after, as all the world could witnes. Now the TEVTONS perceiuing that Marius stirred not at all out of his campe, they proued to assault him: howbeit they were so well receiued with shotte and slinges, that after they had lost certaine of their men, they gaue it ouer, and determined to goe further, perswading them selues that they might easily passe the Alpes without daunger. Wherfore trussing vp al their baggage, they passed by Marius campe:

Aulus Pompeius Tribune.

at which time it appeared more certainly then before, that they were a maruelous great mul-

C titude of people, by the length of time which they tooke to passe their way. For it is sayd they were passing by his campe, sixe dayes continually together. And as they came raking by the ROMAINES campe, they asked them in mockery, if they would wryte or send home any thing to their wiues, for they would be with them ere it were long. When they were all passed and gone, and that they continued on their iorney still, Marius also raised his campe, and went and followed them fayer and softly foote by foote, and euer kept hard at their taile as neere as he could, alwayes fortifying his campe very well, and euer choosing strong places of scituacion & aduantage to lodge in, that they might be safe in the night time. Thus they marched on in this sorte, vntill they came vnto the city of ARLES, from whence they had not farre to goe, but they entered straight into the mountaines of the Alpes. Wherefore Marius prepared nowe

The enemies campe were remouing sixe dayes together.

D to fight with them: & chose out a place that was very strong of scituacion to lodge his campe in, howebeit there lacked water. And they say he did it of purpose, to the ende to quicken his mens corage the more thereby. Many repined at it, and tolde him that they should stande in great daunger to abide maruelous thirst if they lodged there. Whereunto he made answere: shewing them the riuer that ranne hard by the enemies campe, saying withall, that they must go thither and buy drinke with their blood. The souldiers replyed againe: and why then doe ye not lead vs thither, whilest our blood is yet moyste? he gently answered them againe: bicause the first thing we doe, we must fortifie our campe. The souldiers, though they were angry with him, yet they obeyed him: but the slaues hauing neither drinke for them selues, nor for their cattell, gathered together a great troupe of them, and went towardes the riuer: some Marius bolde wordes to his souldiers, and their answer.

E of them carying axes, other hatchets, other swords and speares, with their pottes to cary water, determining to fight with the barbarous people, if otherwise they could not come by it. A fewe of the barbarous people at the first fought with them, bicause the most parte of their company were at dinner, after they had bathed, and others were still in the bathe washinge them selues, finding in that place many springes of hotte naturall bathes. Thus the ROMAINES founde many of the barbarous people makinge merry, and taking their pleasure about these bathes, for the great delite they tooke to cōsider the pleasauntnes of the place: but when they heard the noyse of them that fought, they beganne to runne one after an other vnto the place from whence the noyse came. Wherefore it was a hard thing for Marius any lenger to keepe the ROMAINE souldiers in from going to their helpe, for that they feared their slaues should

F haue bene slaine of the barbarous people: and moreouer, bicause the valliantest souldiers of their enemies called the AMBRONS (who before had ouercome Manlius and Cepio, two ROMAINE Captaines with their armies, and that made of them selues thirty thowsande fighting men) ranne to armes, being very heauy of their bodies, as hauing filled their bellies well, but otherwise valliant and coragious fellowes, and more liuely then they were wont to be, by reason of the wine they had dronke. They ran not furiously to fight out of order, neither did they crie out confusedly, but marching all togethier in good array, making a noyse with their harnes all after one sorte, they oft rehearsed their owne name AMBRONS, AMBRONS, AMBRONS which was, either to call one an other of them, or else to feare the ROMAINES with their name only. The ITALIANS also on thother side, being the first that came downe to fight with them, were the LIGVRIANS, dwelling vpon the coast of Genuoa, who hearing this noyse and crye of theirs, plainely vnderstanding them: aunswered them againe with the like noyse and crye, LIGVRIANS, LIGVRIANS, LIGVRIANS, saying that it was the true surname of all their nation. And so before they ioyned together, this crye was redoubled many a time on either side: and the Captaines of both partes made their souldiers crye out all together, contendinge for enuy one against an other, who should crye it out lowdest. This contention of crying, inflamed the souldiers corages the more. Now the AMBRONS hauing the riuer to passe, were by this meanes put out of order, and before they could put them selues in battell ray againe, after they had passed the riuer, the LIGVRIANS ranne with great fury to set apon the formest: and after them, (to aide the LIGVRIANS that had begon the charge) the ROMAINES them selues fell also apon the AMBRONS, comming downe from the places of aduantage vpon these barbarous people, and compelled them by this meanes to turne their backes, and flie. So the greatest slaughter they made, fortuned vppon the bancke of the riuer, whereinto they thrust one an other in such sorte, that all the riuer ran blood, being filled with dead bodies. And they that could get ouer the riuer againe, and were on thother side, durst not gather together any more to stand to defence: so as the ROMAINES slew them, and draue them into their campe, euen vnto their cariage. Then their women came out against them with swordes and axes in their handes, grinding their teeth: and crying out for sorrow and anger, they charged as well vpon their owne people that fled, as vpon them that chased them: the one as traitors, and the other as enemies. Furthermore, they thrust them selues amongest them that fought, & stroue by force to plucke the ROMAINES targets out of their handes, and tooke holde of their naked swordes bare handed, abiding with an inuincible corage to be hacked and mangled with their swordes. And thus was the first battell geuen (as they say) by the riuers side, rather by chaunce vnlooked for, then by any set purpose, or through the generals counsel. Now the ROMAINES, after they had ouercome the most parte of the AMBRONS, retyring backe by reason the night had ouertaken them, did not (as they were wont after they had geuen such an ouerthrow) sing songes of victory and triumphe, nor make good chere in their tentes one with an other, and least of all sleepe: (which is the best & sweetest refreshing for men that haue fought happely) but contrarily, they watched all that night with great feare and trouble, bicause their campe was not trenched and fortified, and bicause they knewe also that there remained almost innumerable thowsandes of barbarous people, that had not yet fought: besides also, that the AMBRONS that had fled and scaped from the ouerthrow, did howle out all night with lowd cries, which were nothing like mens lamentacions and sighes, but rather like wilde beastes bellowing and roaringe. So that the bellowing of such a great multitude of beastly people, mingled togethier with threates and waylinges, made the mountaines thereabouts and the running riuer to rebounde againe of the founde and ecco of their cries marueilously: by reason whereof, all the valley that lay betwene both, thundered to heare the horrible and fearefull trembling. This made the ROMAINE souldiers afeard, and Marius him selfe in some doubt: bicause they looked to haue benefought withall the same night, being altogether troubled and out of order. Notwithstanding, the barbarous people did not assault them that night, nor the next day following, but only prepared them selues vnto battell. And in the meane time Marius knowing that there was aboue the place where they were camped, certaine caues and litle valleyes couered with wodde: he secretly sent Claudius Marcellus thither with three thowsand footemen well armed, and commaunded him to keepe close in ambushe, vntill he saw that the barbarous people were fighting with him, and that then he should come and set apon their reareward. The residue of his armie, they supped when time came, and after supper reposed them selues.

Battell betwixt the Ambrons & Marius.

Marius ouercame the Ambrons.

The mannishnes of the women.

A ſelues. The next morning at the breake of day, Marius brought his men into the fielde out of his forte: where he put them in order of battell, ſending his horſemen before to draw the enemies out to skirmiſhe. The TEVTONS ſeeing them come, had not the pacience to tary till the ROMAINES were come downe into the plaine fielde to fight without aduantage, but arming them ſelues in haſt, and in a rage, ranne vp the hill to the ROMAINES, where they ſtoode in battell ray. Marius taking good regard to that they did, ſent here and there vnto the priuate Captaines, charging them they ſhould not ſtirre, and onely to temporiſe and forbeare, vntill the enemies came within a ſtones caſt of them: and that they ſhould then throw their dartes at them, and afterwardes drawe their ſwordes, and repulſe the barbarous people with their ſhieldes. For he did foreſee before, that when they ſhould clime vp againſt the hill (vppon the

B hanging whereof the ROMAINES had ſet their battell) that their blowes would not be of great force, nor their order and rankes could ſtand cloſe together to any effect or purpoſe: bicauſe they could not haue ſure footing, nor march aſſuredly, but would eaſily be throwē backeward if they were neuer ſo litle repulſed, by reaſon of the hanging of the hill. Marius gaue this order vnto his folke and therewithall was him ſelfe the firſt man that put it in execution: for he was as trymme a warriour, and as valliant a ſouldier, as any man in all his army: beſides, not one amongeſt them all would venter furder, and be more bolde then him ſelfe. So when the ROMAINES had reſiſted them, and ſtayed them ſodainely, going with fury to haue wonne the hill, perceiuing them ſelues to be repulſed, they gaue backe by litle and litle, vntill they came into the field: and then beganne the formeſt of them to gather together, and to put them ſelues in

C battell ray vppon the plaine, when ſodainly they heard the noyſe and charging of them that were in the tayle of their army. For Claudius Marcellus failed not to take the occaſion when it was offered him, bicauſe that the noyſe of the firſt charge comming vp againſt the hills thereabouts, vnder the which he lay in ambuſhe, gaue him aduertiſement thereof: whereupon he cauſed his men preſently to ſhew, and running with great cryes, came to geue a charge vpon thoſe which were in the tayle of the barbarous people, putting the hindemoſt to the worde. They made their fellowes whoſe backes were next vnto them, to turne their faces, & ſo from man to man, till at the length, in ſhorte time all their battell beganne to wauer in diſorder: and they made no great reſiſtaunce, when they ſaw they were ſo charged before and behinde, but beganne ſtraight to flie for life. The ROMAINES following them hard at the heeles, killed and

D tooke priſoners aboue a hundred thowſande of them, and tooke moreouer their cartes, their tentes and all their cariage. Which the whole army by conſent agreed to preſent vnto Marius, excepting nothing, ſauing that which was imbeaceled and conueyed away vnder hande. Now, though this was a maruelous honorable & right noble preſent yet they thought it not a recompence ſufficient for that he had deſerued, for the valure he had ſhewed of a famous Captaine in leading of his army, & for the good order he kept in this warre: ſo happy thought they them ſelues to haue eſcaped ſo great a daunger. Notwithſtanding, ſome wryters doe not agree, that the ſpoyle of the barbarous people was geuen vnto Marius: nor that there were alſo ſo great a number of men ſlaine as we haue ſpoken of. But they ſay, that after this battell the MARSSILIANS did incloſe their vines, with hedges made of dead mens bones: and that

E the bodies being rotten and conſumed vpon the fieldes through the great raine that fell vpon them the winter following, the ground waxed ſo fatte, and did ſoke the greaſe ſo deepe in the ſame, that the ſommer following they did beare an vncredible quantity of all ſortes of frutes. And by this meanes were Archilecus wordes proued true, that the errable land doth waxe fat with ſuch rottenneſſe or putrification. And it is ſayd alſo, that of ordinary after great battells, there falleth great ſtore of raine. Either it is by meane of ſome god that powring downe pure raine water doth purifie, waſh, and cleanſe the grounde, defiled and polluted with mans blood: or elſe it happeneth by naturall cauſe. For that the ouerthrow of ſo many dead bodies, and of the blood ſpilt, engendreth a moyſt, groſſe, and heauy vapoure, which doth thicken the ayer (that by nature is chaungeable, and eaſie to alter) from a very ſmall or litle beginning, vnto an

F exceeding great chaunge. After this battell, Marius cauſed the harneſſe and ſpoyles of the barbarous people to be layed aſide, that were left whole and fayer to ſight, to beautifie & enrich the pompe of his triumphe. Then he cauſed the reſt to be gathered together on a great

heape, and layed apon a ſtake of wodde, to make a noble ſacrifice vnto the gods, all his army being armed about him, crowned with garlandes of triumphe, and him ſelfe apparelled in a long gowne of purple, according to the cuſtome of the ROMAINES in ſuch a caſe, and holding a torch burning in both his hands, which he firſt lifted vp vnto heauen. And as he was turning downe the torch to put fire to the ſtake of wood; they ſaw ſome of his frends a good way of a horſe backe, comming poſt vnto him: then ſodainly there was a great ſilence made of all the aſſembly, euery man deſirous to heare what good newes they had brought. When they were come and lighted of their horſes, they ranne ſtraight to embrace Marius, and brought him newes that he was choſen Conſull the fift time: and preſented him the letters ſent him from ROME confirming the ſame. And thus, this new ioy falling out beſides the victory, the priuate ſouldiers did ſhewe the great ioy and pleaſure they tooke in both, with great ſhowtes and beating vpon their harneſſe: and the Captaines alſo, they crowned Marius againe with new garlandes of laurell which they put about his head, and that done, he put fire vnder the ſtake of wodde, and ended his ſacrifice. But that which neuer ſuffereth men quietly to enioy the good happe of any victory clearely, but in this mortall life doth euer mingle the ill with the good, be it either fortune or ſpight of fatall deſtenie, or elſe the neceſſitie of the naturall cauſes of earthly thinges: did ſhortely after this great ioy bring newes vnto Marius, of his companion Catulus Luctatius the other Conſull, who was like a cloude in a fayer bright day, and brought the city of ROME againe into a new feare and trouble. For Catulus that went againſt the CIMBRES, thought it was not for him to keepe the ſtraightes of the mountaines, in hope to let the barbarous people for paſſing: bicauſe that in ſo doing, he had bene compelled to deuide his army into many partes, and had weakened him ſelfe very much if he had taken that courſe. Wherefore comming a litle on this ſide the Alpes towardes ITALIE, he planted him ſelfe vppon the riuer of Atheſis, and built a bridge apon it, to paſſe and repaſſe ouer his men when he would, and ſette vp at either ende of the bridge two ſtrong fortes well fortified, that he might more cõmodiouſly helpe the places on the other ſide of the riuer, if the barbarous people by chaũce would offer to force thẽ, after they had gotten out of the ſtraights of the mountaines. Now, theſe barbarous people had ſuch a glory in them ſelues, and diſdained their enemies ſo much, that more to ſhew their force and boldnes, then of any neceſſity that compelled them, or for any benefit they got by it: they ſuffred it to ſnow apon them being ſtarke naked, and did clime vp to the toppe of the mountaines, throw great heapes of iſe and ſnow. And when they were at the very toppe of all, they layed their long broad targets vnder their bodies, and lay all along apon them, ſliding downe the ſteepe high rockes, that had certaine hanginges ouer of an infinite height. In the ende, they came to campe neere vnto the ROMAINES by the riuer ſide, and conſidered howe they might paſſe it ouer: and beganne to fill it vp, tearing downe (like gyants) great hilles of earth which they founde thereabours, brought thither great trees which they pulled vp whole by the rootes, threw in great peeces of rockes which they brake, and whole towers of earth after them, to ſtoppe and breake the courſe of the riuer. But beſides all this, they threw great tymber into the riuer, which being caried downe the ſtreame, came with ſuch a force, & hit againſt the poſtes of the bridge ſo violently, that they ſhaked the ROMAINES bridge maruelouſly. Whereuppon many of the ſouldiers of the great campe were afrayed, and forſaking it, beganne to retyre. But then did Catulus, like a perfit good Captaine ſhowe, that he made leſſe accompt of his owne priuate honor and eſtimacion, then he did of the generall honor of all his ſouldiers. For, ſeeing that he could not perſwade his men by any reaſon to tary, and that in this feare they diſlodged in diſorder againſt his will: he him ſelfe cõmaunded the ſtanderd bearer of the Eagle to marche on, and ranne to the foremeſt that went their way, and marched him ſelfe before them all, to the intent that the ſhame of this retyre ſhould altogether light vpon him, & not apon his contry, and that it might appeare the ROMAINES did follow their Captaine, and not flie away. The barbarous people therefore aſſaulting the forte at the end of the bridge of the riuer of Atheſis, tooke it, & all the men that were in it. And bicauſe the ROMAINES defended it like valliant men, and had luſtely ventured their liues to the death for defence of their contry: the barbarous people let them go vpon cõpoſition, which they ſware to kepe faithfully, by their bull of copper. This bull afterwards was taken when

A when they loſt the battell, and caried (as they ſay) into Catulus Luctatius houſe, as the chiefeſt thing of the victory. Furthermore, the barbarous people finding the contry open without any defence, ſcattered here and there, and deſtroyed all where they came. Whereuppon the Romaines ſent for Marius to Rome to goe againſt them: and after he was arriued, euery man thought he ſhoulde haue entred in triumphe, bicauſe alſo the Senate did graunt it him very willingly. But he would not doe it, either bicauſe he would not depriue his ſouldiers and the Captaines that had fought vnder him, of any parte of the honor that was due vnto them, they being abſent: or bicauſe that he would warrant the people frō the preſent daunger they were in, by layinge aſide the glory of his former victories, into the handes of the good fortune of Rome, in certaine hope to take it againe afterwardes, by a more honorable and perfit confir-

Marius refuſed to enter in triumphe.

B mation of the ſecond. Wherefore, after he had made an oration to the people, and Senate according to the time, he went his way immediatly towardes Catulus Luctatius, whoſe comming did comforte him much: and ſent alſo for his army that was yet in Gavle beyond the mountaines. And after his army was come, he paſſed the riuer of Po, to kepe the barbarous people from hurting Italie on this ſide the Po. Now, the Cimbres ſtill deferred to geue battell bicauſe they looked for the Tevtons, and ſayd: that they marueled much what they ment to tary ſo long: either bicauſe they knewe not in deede of their ouerthrowe, or elſe for that they would not ſeeme to knowe it, bicauſe they handeled them cruelly that brought the newes of their deathes. At the length, they ſent vnto Marius to aske him landes and townes ſufficient, to kepe them and their brethren. Marius asked their Ambaſſadors what brethren they ment.

C They aunſwered, that they were the Tevtons. Whereat the ſtanders by beganne to laugh: and Marius finely mocked them, ſaying. Care not for thoſe brethren ſayd he, for we haue geuen them ground enough, which they will kepe for euer. Theſe Ambaſſadors found his mock ſtraight, and beganne to reuile and threaten him, that the Cimbres ſhoulde preſently make him repent it, and the Tevtons ſo ſoone as they arriued. Why, ſayd Marius vnto them againe, they are come already: and there were no honeſty in you, if you could goe your way & not ſalute them, ſince they are your brethren. And as he ſpake theſe wordes, he commaunded his men to bring him the kinges of the Tevtons bounde and chained, that had bene taken within the mountaines of the Alpes by the Sequani. The Cimbres vnderſtāding this by reporte of their Ambaſſadors, preſently marched towardes Marius, who ſtirred not at all, but

D only fortified and kept his campe. They ſay that it was for this battell that Marius firſt inuented the newe deuiſe he brought in for the darte which the Romaines were wont alwayes to throwe againſt the enemies at the firſt charge. For before, the ſtaffe of the darte was faſtned vnto the iron, and the iron vnto the ſtaffe, with two litle iron pinnes that paſſed through the wodde: and then Marius left one of the iron pinnes as it was before, & taking away the other, put a litle thinne pinne of wodde, eaſie to be broken, in place of the ſame, making it craftely, to the end that when the darte was throwen, & ſtucke in the enemies target, it ſhould not ſtand right forward, but bow downewards towardes the iron, that the wodden pinne being broken, the ſtaffe of the darte ſhould hang downewardes, holding yet by the iron pinne running quite through at the poynte. So Bœorix king of the Cimbres, comming neere to Marius campe

E with a ſmall number of horſemen, ſent him defyaunce, & willed him to appoint a day & place for battell, that they might trye it out, who ſhould be owners of the contry. Whereunto Marius made aunſwer, that it was not the manner of the Romaines to counſell with their enemies, of the time and place when they ſhould geue battell: but neuertheleſſe, he would not ſticke to pleaſure the Cimbres ſo much. And thus they agreed betwene them, that it ſhould be the thirde day following, in the plaine of Verſelles, which was very commodious for the horſemen of the Romaines: and alſo for the barbarous people to put out at will their great number of fighting men. So both armies failed not to meete according to appointment, but appeared ranged in battell, the one before the other. Catulus Luctatius the other Conſull, had in his campe twenty thowſand, and three hundred ſouldiers: and Marius had in his campe two

The battell of the Cimbres.

As for the CIMBRES, the troupes of their footemen comming out of their fortes leaſurely, did put them ſelues into a ſquadron, as broade as long, for in euery ſide they occupied almoſt thirty furlong: but their horſemen which were fifteene thowſande, marched before in ſumptuous furniture. For they had helmets on their heades facioned like wilde beaſtes neckes, and ſtraunge beuers or buffes to the ſame, & ware on their helmets great high plumes of feathers, B as they had bene winges: which to ſight made them appeare taller and bigger men then they were. Furthermore, they had good curaſes on their backes, and caried great white targets before them: and for weapons offenſiue, euery man had two dartes in his hand to beſtow a farre of, & when they came to hand ſtrokes, they had great heauy ſwords which they fought with all neere hand. But at that time they did not marche directly in rancke againſt the army of the ROMAINES, but turned a litle on the right hand, meaning to incloſe the ROMAINES betwene them and their footemen that were on the left hand. The ROMAINE Captaines founde their policy ſtraight, but they coulde not keepe their ſouldiers backe: for there was one that cried, the enemies fled, and immediatly all the reſt beganne to runne after. In the meane time, the footemen of the barbarous people that were like to a ſea before them, came forwards ſtill: & C then Marius hauing waſhed his handes, and lifting them vp to heauen, promiſed, and vowed a ſolemne ſacrifice vnto the goddes of a hundred oxen. Catulus alſo made a vow, lifting vp his handes to heauen in like maner, that he would build a temple vnto fortune for that day: and it is reported, that Marius hauing ſacrificed, when they ſhewed him the intralls of the beaſtes was alſo in the hart of ſommer, about the ſeuen and twentie day of the moneth of Iulie, that this battell was geuen, and this duſt alſo made the ROMAINES the bolder, and kept them that they could not ſee the innumerable multitude of their enemies farre from them. And euery E man running to ſet apon them that came againſt them, they were ioyned together in fight, before that the ſight of their enemies could make them afrayed. And furthermore, they were ſo good ſouldiers, and ſo able to take paines, that how extreame ſoeuer the heate was, no man was ſene ſweate nor blow, though they ranne at the firſt to ſet apon them: & this hath Catulus Luctatius him ſelfe left in wryting vnto the praiſe of his ſouldiers. So were the moſt parte of the barbarous people, and ſpecially of the beſt ſouldiers, ſlaine in the field. And bicauſe they ſhould not open nor breake their rancks, the foremeſt rancks were all tyed & bound together with girdells, leather thongs, & long chaynes of iron: and they that fled, were chaſed & follo-

And that the men alſo, for lacke of a tree to hang them ſelues on, tyed ſlipping halters about their neckes, vnto the hornes & feete of the oxen, and that they did pricke them afterwardes with goades to make them fling and leape ſo long, that dragging them all about, and treading them vnder feete, at the length they killed them. Now, though nũbers were ſlaine by this meanes, yet were there three ſcore thowſand of them taken priſoners, and the number of them that were ſlaine, came to twiſe as many moe. In this manner Marius ſouldiers ſpoyled the campe of the CIMBRES: but the ſpoyles of dead men that were ſlaine in the fielde, with their enſignes and trompets, were all brought (as it is ſayd)

Striſe riſing thus betwene the ſouldiers of both campes about it, that the matter might be tryed frendly betwene them: they made the Ambaſſadors of PARMA their arbitrators, who were by chaunce at that time in the army. Catulus Luctatius ſouldiers led the Ambaſſadors to the place where the ouerthrowe was geuen, ſhewing them the enemies bodies pearſed through with their pykes, which were eaſie to be knowen, bicauſe Catulus had made them graue his name apon their pykes. For all this, Marius went away with the honor of this great victory, as well for the firſt battell he wanne alone, when he ouerthrewe the TEVTONS and the AMBRONS: as for his great calling, hauing bene Conſul fiue times. And furthermore, the common people at ROME, called him the third foũder of the city of ROME, thinking them

But he would not in any caſe, but triumphed into the city with Catulus Luctatius, meaning to ſhew himſelfe curteous and moderate in ſo great proſperity: and peraduenture alſo fearing Catulus ſouldiers, who were in readineſſe and prepared (if Marius would haue depriued their Captaine of that honor) to let him alſo of his triumphe. And thus you ſee howe he paſſed his fift Conſulſhippe. D then became his eſtate and calling, but directly alſo againſt his owne nature, counterfeating a curteous populer manner, being cleane contrarie to his diſpoſition. His ambition made him timerous to deale in matters of the ſtate concerning the city. For that corage and boldeneſſe which he had in battell againſt the enemy, he loſt it quite when he was in an aſſembly of people in the city: and was eaſily put out of his byaſe, with the firſt blame or praiſe he heard geuen him. And though they reporte, that on a time when he made a thowſande CAMERINES free of the city of ROME, bicauſe they had done valliant ſeruice in the warres, that there were ſome that did accuſe him, ſaying, that it was a thing done againſt all law: he aunſwered them, that for the noyſe of the armor, he could not heare the law. And thus through his euill behauior, he brought all the nobility generally to be his enemies. But he feared nor miſtruſted none ſo much, as he did Metellus, for the great vnthankefull parte he remembred he had played him: and the rather alſo, bicauſe he knew him to be a iuſt & true dealing man, and one that was euer againſt theſe people pleaſers and flatterers. Marius there-

And ſo in dede it happened. For Metellus hauing aſſured them then that he would not ſweare, the Senate brake vp vppon it. And ſhortly after, Saturninus the Tribune calling the Senators man. For sayd he, either things will amend, and the people then repenting them selues of the wrong they haue done me, will call me home againe: or else thinges standing as they do now, it shalbe best for me to be furthest of. But for his trauaill in his exile, howe much he was beloued and honored, and how sweetely he passed his time studying philosophie in the citie of RHODES, shalbe declared more at large in his life. Now on the other side, Marius to recompéce the pleasure Saturninus had done him, being driuen to let him haue his will in all things: did not foresee what an intollerable plague he brought vnto the common wealth, geuing the brydle to a desperate man, who euery way, by force, by sword and murder, plainly sought to vsurpe tyrannicall power, with the vtter destruction and subuertion of the whole common weale. And so bearing reuerence of the one side vnto the nobility, and desiring on the other side to gratifie the common people: he played a shamefull parte, and shewed him selfe a double dealing man. For one night the nobilitie and chiefest citizens comming to his house, to perswade him to brydle Saturninus insolencie and boldnes: at the selfe same time also Saturninus going thither to speake with him, he caused him to be let in at a backe dore, the noble men not being priuy to his comming. And so Marius telling the nobility, and then Saturninus, that he was troubled with a losenes of his body, vnder this pretence whipped vp and downe, now to the one, then to the other, and did nothing else but set them further out one against an other, thē they were before. Neuertheles, the Senate being maruelous angry with his naughty double dealing, and the order of knightes taking parte with the Senate, Marius in the ende was compelled to arme the people in the market place, to suppresse them that were vp, and draue them into the Capitoll: where for lacke of water, they were compelled to yelde them selues at the length, bicause he had cut of the pypes and conduits by the which the water ran vnto the Capitoll. By reason whereof, they being vnable to continue any lenger, called Marius vnto them, and yeelded them selues to him, vnder the assurance of the faith of the common people. But although Marius did what he could possible to his vttermost power to saue them, he could not preuaile, nor doe them pleasure: for they were no sooner come downe into the market place, but they were all put to death. Whereupon he hauing now purchased him selfe the ill will of the people and nobility both, when time came about that new Censors shoulde be chosen, euery man looked that he would haue bene one of the suters: howbeit he sued not for it, for feare of repulse, but suffered others to be chosen of farre lesse dignity and calling then him selfe. Wherein notwithstanding he gloried, saying that he would not sue to be Censor, bicause he would not haue the ill will of many, for examining too straghtly their liues & manners. Againe, a decree being preferred to repeale Metellus banishment, Marius did what he could possible by word and deede to hinder it: howbeit, seeing in the end he could not haue his will, he let it alone. The people hauing thus willingly reuoked Metellus banishment, Marius hart would not serue him to see Metellus returne againe, for the malice he bare him: wherfore, he tooke the seas to goe into CAPPADOCIA and GALATIA, vnder colour to pay certaine sacrifices to the mother of the goddes, which he had vowed vnto her. But this was not the very cause that made him to vndertake this iorney, for he had an other secret meaning in it. For his nature not being framed to liue in peace, and to gouerne ciuill matters, and hauing attained to his greatnes by armes, and supposing that his glorie & authority consumed and decreased altogether liuing idlely in peace: he sought to deuise new occasion of warres, hoping if he could stirre vp the kinges of ASIA, and specially Mithridates (who without his procurement was feared much, that one day he would make warres against the ROMAINES) that he should then vndoutedly without let of any man be chosen Generall to make warres with him, and withall also, that by that meanes he should haue occasion to fill the citie of ROME with newe triumphes, and his house with the spoyles of the great kingdome of PONTE, and with the riches of the king. Now Mithridates disposing him selfe to entertaine Marius, with all the honor and curtesies he could possibly shew him: Marius in the ende notwithstanding would not once geue him a good looke, nor a curteous word againe, but churlishly sayd vnto Mithridates at his departure from him. Thou must determine one of these two, king Mithridates: either to make thy selfe stronger then the ROMAINES, or else to looke to doe what they commaund thee, without resistaunce. These wordes amazed Mithridates, who had heard say before that the ROMAINES would speake their mindes freely: howbeit he neuer saw nor found it before, vntill that time. After Marius was returned vnto ROME, he built a house neere vnto the market place, bicause he would not (as he said himself) that such as came vnto him should trouble them selues in going farre to bring him home to his house: or else for that he thought this would be an occasion that diuerse would come to salute him, as they did other Senators. Howbeit that was not the cause in deede, but the onely cause was, for that he had no naturall grace nor ciuility to entertaine men curteously that came vnto him, and that he lacked behauior besides to rule in a common wealth: and therefore in time of peace they made no more reckoning of him, then they did of an old rusty harnesse or implement that was good for nothing, but for the warres only. And for all other that professed armes as him selfe did, no man grieued him so much to be called forward to office and state before him selfe, as Sylla did. For he was ready to burst for spite, to see that the noble men did all what they could to preferre Sylla, for the malice and ill will they bare him: and that Syllaes first rising and preferrement grew, by the quarrells and contentions he had with him. And specially when Bocchus king of NVMIDIA was proclaimed by the Senate, a frende and confederate of the ROMAINES people he offred vp statues of victories, carying tokens of triumphe, into the temple of the Capitoll and placed neere vnto them also, an image of gold of king Iugurthe, which he deliuered by his owne handes vnto Sylla. And this made Marius starke madde for spite and ielousie, and could not abide that an other should take vpon him the glory of his doinges: insomuch as he determined to plucke those images downe, and to cary them away by force. Sylla on the other side stomaked Marius, and would not suffer him to take them out of the place where they were: so that this ciuill sedition had taken present effect, had not the warres of their confederates fallen out betwene, and restrained them for a time. For the best souldiers and most warlike people of all ITALIE, and of greatest power, they all together rose against the ROMAINES, and had well neere ouerthrowen their whole Empire. For they were not onely of great force, and power, and well armed: but their Captaines also, for valliantnes and skill, did in maner equil the worthines of the ROMAINES. For this warre fell out wonderfully, by reason of the calamity and misfortune that happened in it: but it wanne Sylla as much fame and reputacion, as it did Marius shame and dishonor. For he shewed him selfe very colde and slow in all his enterprises, still delayinge time, either bicause age had mortified his actiue heate, and killed that quicke ready disposition of body that was wont to be in him, being then aboue three score and fiue yeare olde: or else as he sayd him selfe, bicause he was waxen gowty, and had ache in his vaines & sinewes, that he could not well stirre his body, and that for shame, bicause he would not tary behinde in this warre, he did more then his yeares could away withall. Notwithstanding, as he was, yet he wanne a great battell, wherein were slaine six thowsande of their enemies: and so long as the warres endured, he neuer gaue them aduantage of him, but pacientely suffred them sometime to intrenche him, and to mocke him, and geue him vile words, chalenging him out to fight, & yet all this would not prouoke him. It is sayd also, that Pompeius Silo, who was the chiefest Captaine of reputacion & authority the enemies had, said vnto Marius on a time: if thou be Marius, so great a Captaine as they say thou art, leaue thy campe, & come out to battel. Nay, said Marius to him againe: if thou be a great Captaine, plucke me out by the eares, & cõpell me to come to battell. An other time when the enemies gaue them occasion to geue a great charge vpon them with aduantage: the ROMAINES were fainte hartted, and durst not set vpon them. Wherefore, after both the one and the other were retyred, Marius caused his men to assemble, and spake vnto them in this sorte. I can not tell which of the two I should recken most cowardes: you your selues, or your enemies: for they durst not once see your backes, nor you them in the faces. In the end notwithstanding, he was compelled to resigne his charge, being able to serue no lenger for the weakenesse and debilitie of his body. Now, all the rebels of ITALIE being put downe, many at ROME (by the orators meanes) did sue to haue the charge of the warres against Mithridates: and among them, a Tribune of the people called Sulpitius, (a very bold and rash man) beyond all mens hope and opinion preferred Marius, and perswaded them to geue him the charge of these warres, with title and authority of vice Consull. The people thereupon were deuided in two partes: for the one side stoode

For Marius had a goodly stately house in those partes neere vnto the mount of Misene, which was farre more fine and curiously furnished, then became a Captaine that had bene in so many foughten battells and daungers. They say that Cornelia afterwardes bought that fine house for the summe of seuen thowsande fiue hundred crownes, and shortly after also, Lucullus bought it againe for two hundred and fifty thowsand crownes: to so great excesse was vanitie and curiositie growen in very shorte time at Rome. Mons Misenus.

Notwithstanding all this, Marius too ambitiously striuing like a passioned young man against the weakenes and debility of his age, neuer missed day but he would be in the field of Mars to Marius ambition.

B exercise him selfe among the young men, shewing his body disposed and ready to handle all kinde of weapons, and to ryde horses: albeit that in his latter time, he had no great health of body, bicause he was very heauy and sad. There were that liked that passing well in him, and went of purpose into the fielde to see the paines he tooke, striuing to excell the rest. Howbeit those of the better sorte were very sory to see his auarice and ambition, considering specially, that being of a poore man become very rich, and of a right meane persone a great estate, that he coulde not now containe his prosperity within reasonable boundes, nor content him selfe to be esteemed and honored, quietlie enioyinge all he had wonne, and which at that present he did possesse: but as if he had bene very poore and needy, after he had receiued such great honor and triumphes, would yet cary out his age so stowtly, euen into Cappadocia,

C and vnto the realme of Pont, to goe fight there against Archelaus, and Neoptolemus, Lieutenaunts of king Mithridates. In deede he alleaged some reasons to excuse him selfe, but they were altogether vaine: for he sayd that he desired in persone to bring vp his sonne in exercise of armes, and to teach him the discipline of warres. That discouered the secret hidden plague, which of long time hath lurked in Rome, Marius specially hauing now met with a fit instrument, and minister to destroy the common wealth, which was, the insolent and rash Sulpitius: who altogether followed Saturninus doinges, saying that he was found too cowardly & fainte harted in all his enterprises, and for that did Marius iustly reproue him. But Sulpitius, bicause he would not dally nor delay time, had euer sixe hundred younge gentlemen of the order of knightes, whome he vsed as his gard about him, and called them the gard against the Senate. Sulpitius gard of sixe hundred knightes.

D And one day as the Consulls kept their common assembly in the market place, Sulpitius comming in armed apon them, made them both take their heeles, and get them packing: and as they fled, one of the Consulls sonnes being taken tardy, was slaine. Sylla being thother Consull, and perceiuing that he was followed hard at hand vnto Marius house, ranne into the same against the opinion of all the world: wherof they that ranne after him not being aware, passed by the house. And it is reported that Marius him selfe conueyed Sylla safelie out at a backe dore, and that he being scaped thus, went vnto his campe. Notwithstanding, Sylla him selfe in his commentaries doth not say, that he was saued in Marius house when he fled: but that he was brought thither to geue his consent vnto a matter which Sulpitius woulde haue forced him vnto against his will, presenting him naked swordes on euery side. And he wryteth Sulpitius boldnes.

E also, that being thus forcibly brought vnto Marius house, he was kept there in this feare, vntill such time as returninge into the market place, he was compelled to reuoke againe the adiornement of iustice, which he and his companion by edict had commaunded. This done, Sulpitius then being the stronger, caused the commission & charge of this warres against Mithridates to be assigned vnto Marius by the voyce of the people. Therfore Marius geuing order for his departure, sent two of his Colonells before to take the army of Sylla: who hauing wonne his souldiers harts before, and stirred them vp against Marius, brought them on with him directly towardes Rome, being no lesse then fiue and thirty thowsand fighting men: who setting apon the Captaines Marius had sent vnto them, slewe them in the fielde. In reuenge whereof, Marius againe in Rome put many of Syllaes frendes and followers to death, and pro-

F claimed open liberty by sound of trompet, to all slaues and bondmen that would take armes for him: but there were neuer but three only that offered them selues. Whereupon, hauing made a litle resistaunce vnto Sylla when he came into Rome, he was soone after compelled to Marius sedition.

runne his way. Marius was no ſooner out of the citie, but they that were in his company for-ſaking him, diſperſed them ſelues here and there being darke night: and Marius him ſelfe got to a houſe of his in the contrie, called Salonium, and ſent his ſonne to one of his father in law Mutius farmes not farre from thence, to make ſome prouiſion for vittells. But Marius in the meane time, went before to OSTIA, where one of his frendes Numerius had prepared him a ſhippe, in the which he imbarked immediatly, not tarying for his ſonne, and hoiſed ſaile, hauing only Granius his wiues ſonne with him. In the meane time the younger Marius beinge at his father in law Mutius farme, ſtayed ſo long in getting of prouiſion, in truſſing of it vp, and carying it away, that broade day light had like to haue diſcouered him: for the enemies had aduertiſement whether he was gone, whereupon certaine horſemen were ſent thither ſuppoſing to haue found him. But the keeper of the houſe hauing an inckling of their comminge, and preuenting them alſo before they came, ſodainely yoked his oxen to the carte which he loded with beanes, and hidde this younger Marius vnder the ſame. And prickinge the oxen forward with his goade, ſet out, and met them as he went towards the city, and deliuered Marius in this ſorte into his wiues houſe: and there taking ſuch thinges as he needed, when the night following came, went towards the ſea, & tooke ſhippe, finding one croſſe ſayled, bound towards AFRICKE. Marius the father ſaylinge on ſtill, had a very good winde to poynte a-longeſt the coaſt of ITALIE: notwithſtanding, being afrayed of one Geminius, a chiefe man of TERRACINE, who hated him to the death, he gaue the maryners warning thereof betimes, and willed them to take heede of landing at TERRACINE. The maryners were very willing to obey him, but the winde ſtoode full againſt them comming from the mayne, which raiſed a great ſtorme, and they feared much that their veſſell which was but a bote, would not brooke the ſeas, beſides that he him ſelfe was very ſicke in his ſtomake, and ſore ſea beaten: notwithſtanding, at the length with the greateſt difficulty that might be, they recouered the coaſt ouer againſt the city of CIRCHES. In the meane time, the ſtorme increaſed ſtill, and their vittells failed them: whereupon they were compelled to land, and went wandring vp & downe not knowinge what to doe, nor what way to take. But as it falleth out commonly in ſuch like caſes of extremitie, they thought it alwayes the beſt ſafetie for them, to flie from the place where they were, and to hope of that which they ſaw not: for if the ſea were their enemy, the lande was ſo likewiſe. To meete with men, they were afrayed: and not to meete with them on thother ſide lacking vtittells, was in deede the greater daunger. Neuertheleſſe, in the end they met with heard men that could geue them nothing to eate, but knowing Marius, warned him to get him out of the way as ſoone as he could poſſible, bicauſe it was not longe ſince that there paſſed by a great troupe of horſemē that ſought him all about. And thus being brought vnto ſuch perplexity, that he knew not where to beſtowe him ſelfe, and ſpecially for that the poore men he had in his company were almoſt ſtarued for hunger: he got out of the high way notwithſtanding, and ſought out a very thicke wodde where he paſſed all that night in great ſorow, and the next morninge beinge compelled by neceſſity, determined yet to employ his body before all his ſtrēgth failed. Thus he wandered on alongeſt the ſea coaſt, ſtill comforting them that followed him the beſt he could, & praying them not to diſpayre, but to referre them ſelues to him, euen vntil the laſt hope, truſting in certaine prophecies which the Sooth-ſayers had told him of long time before. For when he was but very young, and dwelling in the contry, he gathered vp in the lappe of his gowne, the ayrie of an Eagle, in the which were ſeuen young Eagles: whereat his father and mother much wondering, asked the Soothſayers what that ment. They anſwered, that their ſonne one day ſhould be one of the greateſt men in the world, and that out of doubt he ſhould obtaine ſeuen times in his life the chiefeſt office of dignity in his contry. And for that matter, it is ſayd that ſo in dede it came to paſſe. Other hold opinion, that ſuch as were about Marius at that time, in that preſent place, and elſe where, during the time of his flying: they hearing him tell this tale, beleued it, and afterwardes put it downe in wrytinge, as a true thinge, although of trothe it is bothe falſe and fayned. For they ſay, that the Eagle neuer getteth but two younge ones: by reaſon whereof it is mayntayned alſo, that the Poet Muſæus hathe lyed, in that which he hathe wrytten in theſe verſes.

Howsoeuer it was, it is certaine that Marius many times during the time of his flying sayd, that he was assured he should come vnto the seuenth Consulship. When they were comen neere now to the city of MINTVRNES, about a two myle & a halfe frō it, they might perceiue a troupe of horsemen comming by the sea side, and two shippes on the sea that fell vppon the coast by good happe. Wherefore they all beganne to runne (so long as they had breath and strength) towardes the sea, into the which they threw them selues, and got by swymming vnto one of the shippes where Granius was: and they crossed ouer vnto the Ile that is right against it called ENARIA. Now for Marius, who was heauy and sicke of body, two of his seruauntes holpe to holde him vp alwayes aboue water, with the greatest paine and difficultie in the worlde: and at the last they labored so throughly, that they put him into the other shippe at the selfe same present, when the horsemen came vnto the sea side, who cried out alowde to the maryners, to lande againe, or else throw Marius ouer borde, and then to goe where they would. Marius on thother side humbly besought them with teares, not so to do: whereby the masters of the shippe in a shorte space were in many mindes whether to doe it, or not to doe it. In the ende notwithstanding, they aunswered the horsemen they would not throwe him ouer the borde: so the horsemen went their way in a great rage. But as soone as they were gone, the masters of the shippe chaunging minde, drewe towardes lande, and cast ancker about the mouth of the riuer of Liris, where it leaueth her banckes, and maketh great marysses: & there they tolde Marius he should doe well to goe a land to eate somewhat, and refresh his sea sicke body, till the winde serued them to make saile, which doubtlesse sayed they, will be at a certaine hower when the sea winde falles and becomes calme, and that there riseth a litle winde from the lande, ingendred by the vapours of the marysses, which will serue the turne very well to take seas againe. Marius following their counsell, and thinking they had ment good faith, was set a lande vppon the riuers bancke: and there layed him downe apon the grasse, nothing suspecting that which happened after to him. For the mariners presently taking their shippe againe, and hoysing vp their anckers, sailed straight away, and fled: iudging it no honesty for them to haue deliuered Marius into the handes of his enemies, nor safetie for them selues to haue saued him. Marius finding him selfe all alone, & forsaken of euery man, lay on the ground a great while, and sayd neuer a word: yet at the length taking harte a litle to him, got vp once againe on his feete, and painefully wandred vp and downe, where was neither way nor pathe at all, ouerthwart deepe marisses and great ditches, full of water and mudde, till he came at the length to a poore olde mans cotage, dwelling there in these marisses, and fallinge at his feete, besought him to helpe to saue and succour a poore afflicted man, with promise that one day he would geue him a better recompence then he looked for, if he might escape this present daunger wherein he was. The olde man whether for that he had knowen Marius aforetime, or that seeing him (by coniecture only) iudged him to be some great personage: told him that if he ment but to lye downe and rest him selfe a litle, his poore cabyne would serue that turne reasonably well: but if he ment to wander thus, to flie his enemies that followed him, he would then bring him into a more secret place, and farder of from noyse. Marius prayed him that he would so much doe for him: and the good man brought him into the marishe, vnto a low place by the riuers side, where he made him lye downe, and then couered him with a great deale of reede and bent, and other such light thinges as could not hurte him. He had not long bene there, but he heard a great noyse comming towardes the cabin of the poore old man: for Geminius of TERRACINE had sent men all about to seeke for him, whereof some by chaunce came that way, and put the poore man in a feare, and threatned him, that he had receiued and hidden an enemie of the ROMAINES. Marius hearing that, rose out of the place where the old man had layed him, and stripping him selfe starke naked, went into a parte of the marishe where the water was full of myre and mudde, and there was founde of those that searched for him: who takinge him out of the slime all naked as he was, caried him into the citie of MINTVRNES, and deliuered him there into the gouernours handes. Open proclamation was made by the Senate through all ITALIE, that they should apprehend Marius, and kill him whereſoeuer they founde him. Notwithſtanding, the gouernors and magiſtrates of MINTVRNES A thought good firſt to conſult therupon amongeſt them ſelues, & in the meane time they deliuered him into the ſafe cuſtody of a woman called Fannia, whom they thought to haue bene a bitter enemie of his, for an old grudge ſhe had to him, which was this: Fannia ſomtime had a husband called Tinnius, whom ſhe was willing to leaue for that they could not agre, and required her dower of him againe, which was very great. Her husbande againe ſayed, ſhe had played the whore. The matter was brought before Marius in his ſixt Conſulſhippe, who had geuen iudgement apon it. Both parties being heard, and the law proſecuted on either ſide, it was found that this Fannia was a naughty woman of her body, and that her husband knowing it well enough before he maried her, yet tooke her with her faultes, and long time liued with her. Wherefore Marius being angrie with them both, gaue ſentence that the husband ſhould B repay backe her dower, and that for her naughty life, ſhe ſhould pay foure farthings. This notwithſtanding, when Fannia ſaw Marius, ſhe grudged him not for that, and leaſt of all had any reuenginge minde in her towardes him, but contrarily did comforte and helpe him what ſhe could with that ſhe had. Marius thanked her maruelouſly for it, and bad her hope well: bicauſe he met with good lucke as he was comming to her houſe, and in this manner. As they were leading of him, when he came neere to Fanniaes houſe, her dore being open, there came an aſſe running out to go drinke at a conduit: not farre from thence: and meeting Marius by the way, looked apon him with a liuely ioyfull countenaunce, firſt of all ſtopping ſodainly before him, and then beginning to bray out alowde, and to leape and skippe by him. Whereuppon Marius ſtraight conie&turing with him ſelfe, ſaid, that the goddes did ſignifie vnto him, that he C ſhould ſaue him ſelfe ſooner by water then by lande: bicauſe that the aſſe leauing him, ranne to drinke, and cared not to eate. So when he had tolde Fannia this tale, he deſired to reſt, and prayed them to let him alone, and to ſhut the chamber dore to him. But the magiſtrates of the citie hauing conſulted together about him, in the ende reſolued they muſt deferre no lenger time, but diſpatche him out of the way preſently. Now when they were agreed apon it, they could not finde a man in the citie that durſt take apon him to kill him: but a man of armes of the GAVLES, or one of the CIMBRES (for we finde both the one and the other in wryting) that went thither with his ſword drawen in his hande. Now, that place of the chamber wherein Marius lay was very darke, and as it is reported, the man of armes thought he ſawe two burninge flames come out of Marius eyen, and heard a voyce out of that darke corner, D ſaying vnto him: O fellowe, thou, dareſt thou come to kill Caius Marius? The barbarous GAVLE hearing theſe wordes, ranne out of the chamber preſently, caſting his ſworde in the middeſt of the flower, and crying out theſe wordes onely: I can not kill Caius Marius. This made the MINTVRNIANS afraied in the city at the firſt, but afterwards it moued them to compaſſion. So they were angry with them ſelues, and did repent them that they conuerted their counſell to ſo cruell and vnkinde a deede, againſt one that had preſerued all ITALIE: and to deny him aide in ſo extreame neceſſity, it was too great a ſinne. Therefore let vs let him goe, ſayed they to them ſelues, where he will, and ſuffer him take his fortune appointed him elſe where: and let vs pray to the goddes to pardone this offence of ours, to haue thruſt Marius naked and beggerly out of our city. For theſe conſiderations, the MINTVRNIANS went all to- E gether to Marius where he was, and ſtoode about him, determining to ſee him ſafely conducted vnto the ſea ſide. Now though euery man was ready, and willing to pleaſure him, ſome with one thing, ſome with an other, and that they did haſten him all they could poſſible, yet they were a good while a going thither: bicauſe there was a wodde called Marica, that laye right in their way betwene their city and the ſea coaſt which they greatly reuerence, & thinke it a ſcriledge to cary any thing out of that wodde, that was once brought into it. On thother ſide, to leaue to goe through this wodde, and to compaſſe it rounde about, it would aske a maruelous long time. So they ſtanding all in doubt what they ſhould doe, one of the auncienteſt men of the city, ſpake alowde vnto them, and ſaid: that there was no way forbidden them, that went about to ſaue Marius life. Then Marius him ſelfe being the formeſt man, taking F vp ſome of the fardells which they caried with him, to pleaſure him in the ſhip, went through the wodde. All other things neceſſary being thus readily prepared for him with like goodwil,

A and ſpecially the ſhippe which one Bellæus had ordained for him: he cauſed all this ſtorie to be painted in a table at large, which he gaue vnto the temple, out of the which he departed when he tooke ſhippe. After he was departed thence, the winde by good fortune caried him into the Ile of ENARIA, where he founde Granius and ſome other of his frendes, with whom he tooke ſea againe, and pointed towardes AFRICKE. But lacking water, they were compelled to lande in SICILIA, in the territory of the city of ERIX: where by chaunce there laye a ROMAINE Quæſtor, who kept that coaſt. Marius being landed there, ſcaped very narrowly that he was not taken of him: for he ſlue ſixteene of his men that came out with him to take water. So Marius getting him thence with all ſpeede, croſſed the ſeas, vntill he arriued in the Ile of MENYNGE, where he firſt vnderſtoode that his ſonne was ſaued with Cethegus, and that

B they were both together gone to Hiempſal king of the NVMIDIANS to beſeeche him of ayde. This gaue him a litle corage, & made him bold to paſſe out of that Ile, into the coaſt of CARTHAGE. Nowe at that time, Sextilius a ROMAINE Prætor was gouernor of AFRICKE, vnto whom Marius had neuer done good nor hurt, & therfore he hoped, that for pity only he might perhappes haue helpe at his hande. Howbeit he was no ſooner landed with a few of his men, but a ſergeaunt came ſtraight and ſayd vnto him: Sextilius, Prætor and gouernor of LIBYA, doth forbid thee to lande in all this prouince: otherwiſe he telleth thee, that he will obay the Senates commaundement, and purſue thee as an enemy of the ROMAINES. Marius hearing this commaundement, was ſo angry and ſory both, that he coulde not readily tell what aunſwere to make him, and pawſed a good while, and ſayd neuer a word, ſtill eying the ſergeaunt

C with a grimme looke: vntill he asked him, what aunſwer he would make, to the Prætors commaundement. Marius then fetching a deepe ſigh from his harte, gaue him this aunſwer. Thou ſhalt tell Sextilius, that thou haſt ſeene Caius Marius baniſhed out of his contrie, ſitting amongeſt the ruines of the city of CARTHAGE. By this aunſwere, he wiſely layed the example of the ruine and deſtruction of that great city of CARTHAGE, before Sextilius eyes, and the chaunge of his fortune: to warne Sextilius that the like might fall vppon him. In the meane time, Hiempſal king of the NVMIDIANS, not knowing how to reſolue, did honorably intreate young Marius and his companie. But when they were willing to goe their way, he alwayes founde newe occaſion to ſtay them, and was very glad to ſee that he ſtarted not for any oportunity or good occaſion that was offered: notwithſtandinge, there fortuned a happy meane

D vnto them, whereby they ſaued them ſelues. And this it was. This Marius the younger being a fayer complexioned young man, it pitied one of the kinges concubines to ſee him ſo hardly delt withall. This pity of hers was a ſhadow to cloke the loue ſhe bare him: but Marius would not hearken at the firſt to her intiſementes, and refuſed her. Yet in the ende, perceiuing that there was no other way for him to eſcape thence, and conſidering that ſhe did all thinges for their auaile, more diligently and louingly then ſhe would haue done, if ſhe had not ment further matter vnto him, then only to enioy the pleaſure of him: he then accepted her loue and kyndneſſe, ſo as at the length ſhe taught him a way howe to flye, and ſaue him ſelfe and his frendes. Hereupon he went to his father, and after they had imbraced and ſaluted eche other, going alongeſt the ſea ſide, they founde two ſcorpions fighting together. Marius tooke this

E for an ill ſigne: wherupon they quickly tooke a fiſher boate, and wēt into the ile of CERCINA, which is no great diſtaunce of from firme lande. They had no ſoner hoiſed vp ancker, but they ſawe the horſe men which kinge Hiempſal had ſent vnto the place from whence they were departed: and that was one of the greateſt daungers that Marius euer eſcaped. In the meane time there was newes at ROME, that Silla made warre againſt kinge Mithridates Lieutenauntes: and furthermore, that the Conſulls being vp in armes thone againſt thother, Octauius wanne the battell, and being the ſtronger had driuen out Cinna, who ſought to haue vſurped tyrannicall power, and had made Cornelius Merula Conſull in his place: and that Cinna on thother ſide leauied men out of other partes of ITALIE, and made warres vpon them that were in ROME. Marius hearing of this diſſention, thought good to returne as ſoone as he

F could poſſible into ITALIE. And aſſembling certaine horſemen of the nation of the MAVRVSIANS in AFRICKE, & certaine ITALIANS that had ſaued them ſelues there, vnto the number of a thowſand men in all: he tooke ſea, & landed in a hauen of THVSCANE called TELAMON, and being landed, proclaimed by ſounde of trompet, liberty to all ſlaues and bonde men that would come to him. So the laborers, heard men, and neateheardes of all that marche, for the onely name and reputacion of Marius, ranne to the ſea ſide from all partes: of the which he hauing choſen out the ſtowteſt and luſtieſt of them, wanne them ſo by fayer wordes, that hauing gathered a great companie together in few dayes, he made fortie ſayle of them. Furthermore, knowing that Octauius was a maruelous honeſt man, that would haue no authoritie otherwiſe then law & reaſon would: and that Cinna to the contrarie was ſuſpected of Sylla, and that he ſought to bring in chaunge and innouation to the common wealth, he determined to ioyne his force with Cinna. So Marius ſent firſt vnto Cinna, to lette him vnderſtande that he would obay him as Conſull, and be ready to do all that he ſhould commaunde him. Cinna receiued him, and gaue him the title and authoritie of Viceconſull, and ſent him ſergeaunts to carie axes and roddes before him, with all other ſignes of publicke authoritie. But Marius refuſed them, and ſayed, that pompe became not his miſerable fortune: for he euer went in a poore threede bare gowne, and had let his heare grow ſtill after he was baniſhed, being aboue three ſcore and tenne yeare olde, and had a ſober gate with him, to make men pitie him the more that ſawe him. But vnder all this counterfeate pitie of his, he neuer chaunged his naturall looke, which was euer more fearefull and terrible, then otherwiſe. And where he ſpake but litle, & went very demurely & ſoberly: that ſhewed rather a cankered corage within him, then a minde humbled by his baniſhment. Thus when he had ſaluted Cinna, and ſpoken to the ſouldiers: he then beganne to ſet thinges abroache, and made a wonderfull chaunge in fewe dayes. For firſt of all, with his ſhippes he cut of all the vittells by ſea, & robbed the marchaunts that caried corne and other vittells to ROME: ſo that in a ſhorte ſpace he was maſter purueyer for all neceſſarie prouiſion and vittells. After this he went alongeſt the coaſt, and tooke all the cities apon the ſea ſide, and at the length wanne OSTIA alſo by treaſon, put the moſt parte of them in the towne to the ſword, and ſpoyled all their goodes: and afterwards making a bridge apon the riuer of Tiber, tooke from his enemies all hope to haue any manner of prouiſion by ſea. That done, he went directly towardes ROME with his armie, where firſt he wanne the hill called Ianiculum through Octauius faulte: who ouerthrewe him ſelfe in his doinges, not ſo much for lacke of reaſonable skill of warres, as through his vnprofitable curioſitie and ſtrictnes in obſeruing the law. For when diuerſe did perſwade him to ſet the bond men at liberty to take armes for defence of the common wealth: he aunſwered, that he would neuer geue bond men the law and priuiledge of a ROMAINE citizen, hauing driuen Caius Marius out of ROME, to maintaine the authoritie of the lawe. But when Cæcilius Metellus was come to ROME, the ſonne of that Metellus Numidicus, that hauing begonne the warres in LIBYA againſt king Iugurthe, was put out by Marius: the ſouldiers forſooke Octauius immediatly, and came vnto him, bicauſe they tooke him to be a better Captaine, and deſired alſo to haue a leader that could tell how to commaund them, to ſaue the citie, and the common wealth. For they promiſed to fight valliantly, & perſwaded them ſelues that they ſhould ouercome their enemies, ſo that they had a skilfull & valliant Captaine that could order them. Metellus miſliking their offer, commaunded them in anger to returne againe vnto the Conſull: but they for ſpite went vnto their enemies. Metellus on thother ſide, ſeeing no good order taken in the citie to reſiſt the enemies, got him out of ROME. But Octauius being perſwaded by certaine Soothſayers and CHALDEAN ſacrificers, who promiſed him all ſhould goe well with him, taried ſtill in ROME. For that man being otherwiſe, as wiſe as any ROMAINE of his time, and one that dealt as vprightly in his Conſulſhippe, not caried away with flattering tales, and one alſo that followed the auncient orders and cuſtomes as infallible rules and examples, neither breaking nor omitting any parte therof: me thinkes yet had this imperfection, that he frequẽted the Soothſayers, wiſe men, and aſtronomers, more then men skilfull in armes and gouernment. Wherefore, before that Marius him ſelfe came into the citie, Octauius was by force pluct out of the pulpit for orations, and ſlaine preſently by Marius ſouldiers, whome he had ſent before into the citie. And it is ſayed alſo, that when he was ſlaine, they founde a figure of a CHALDEAN prophecie in his boſome: and here is to be noted a great contrarietie in theſe two notable men, Octauius and Marius. The firſt loſt his life, by truſting to ſoothſaying: and the ſeconde proſpered, Marius ioyneth force with Cinna.

Octauius too much geuen to Soothſaiers. Octauius vertue and imperfection.

Octauius ſlaine by Marius ſouldiers. A great contrariety in aſtronomy.

A prospered,& rose againe, bicause he did not despise the arte of diuination. The state of Rome standing then in this maner, the Senate consulting together, sent Ambassadors vnto Cinna and Marius, to pray them to come peacibly into Rome, and not to embrue their hands with the blood of their citizens. Cinna sitting in his chayer as Consul, gaue them audience,& made them a very reasonable and curteous aunswer. Marius standing by him, spake neuer a worde: but shewed by his sower looke that he would straight fill Rome with murder and blood. So when the Ambassadors were gone, Cinna came into Rome enuironned with a great number of souldiers: but Marius stayed sodainly at the gate, speaking partely in anger, and partely in mockerie, that he was a banished man, and driuen out of his contrie by law. And therefore if they would haue him come into Rome againe, they should first by a contrarie decree abolish B and reuoke that of his banishment, as if he had bene a religious obseruer of the lawes, and as though Rome had at that present enioyed their freedom and libertie. Thus he made the people assemble in the market place to proceede to the confirmation of his calling home againe. But before three or foure tribes had time to geue their voices, disguising the matter no lenger, and showing plainly that he ment not to be lawfully called home againe from exile: he came into Rome with a garde about him, of the veriest rascalls, & most shameless slaues, called the Bardioeians, who came to him from all partes: and they for the least word he spake, or at the twinckling of his eye, or at a nodde of his head made to them, slew many men through his commaundement, and at the length slew Ancharius a Senator (that had bene Prætor) at Marius feete with their swordes, bicause only that Marius did not salute him when he came one C day to speake with him. After this murther, they continued killinge all them that Marius did not salute, and speake vnto: for that was the very signe he had geuen them, to kill them openly in the streetes before euery man, so that his very frendes were afearde of being murthered, when they came to salute him. Thus being a great number of men slaine, Cinna in the end beganne to be satisfied, and to appease his anger. But Marius anger and vnsatiable desire of reuenge increased more and more, so that he spared not one if he suspected him neuer so litle: and there was neither towne nor high way, that was not full of skowtes & spies, to hunte them out that hidde them selues and fled. Then experience taught them, that no frende is faithfull, and to be trusted, if fortune especially frowne neuer so litle: for there were very fewe that did not betray their frendes that fled to them for succor. And therefore doe Cornutus seruaunts so D much the more deserue praise, who hauing secretly hidden their master in his house, did hang vp the dead body of some common persone by the necke, and hauing put a golde ring on his finger, they shewed him to the Bardioeians, Marius garde, and buried him in steade of their owne master, without suspicion of any man that it was a fained thing: and so Cornutus being hidden by his seruauntes, was safely conueyed into the contrie of Gavle. Marke Anthony the Orator had also founde out a faithfull frende, yet was he vnfortunate. This faithfull frend of his, was a poore simple man, who hauing receiued one of the chiefest men of Rome into his house to kepe him close there: he being desirous to make him the best chere he could with that litle he had, sent one of his men to the next tauerne to fetche wine, and tastinge the wine more curiously then he was wont to do, he called for better. The drawer asked him, why E the new ordinary wine would not serue him, but he must needes haue of the best and dearest: the foolish fellow simply aunswered him (telling him as his familiar frend) that his master did feast Marke Anthony, who was hidden very secretly in his house. He was no sooner gone with his wine,& his backe turned, but the vile traiterous drawer ranne vnto Marius, who was set at supper when he came. The drawer beinge brought to him, promised him to deliuer Marke Anthony into his handes. Marius hearing that, was so ioconde, that he cried out, and clapt his handes together for ioye: and would haue risen from the borde, and gone thither him selfe in persone, had not his frendes kept him backe. But he sent Annius one of his Captaines thither with a certaine number of souldiers, and commaunded them to bringe him his heade quickely. So they went thither, and when they were come to the house which the drawer had F brought them to, Annius taried beneath at the dore, and the souldiers went vp the stayers into the chamber, & finding Anthony there, they beganne to encorage one an other to kill him, not one of them hauing the harte to lay handes vppon him. For Anthonyes tongue was as ſweete as a Sirene, and had ſuch an excellent grace in ſpeaking, that when he began to ſpeake vnto the ſouldiers, and to pray them to ſaue his life: there was not one of them ſo hard harted, as once to touch him, no not onely to looke him in the face, but looking downewardes, fell a weeping. Annius perceiuing they tarried long, and came not downe, went him ſelfe vp into the chamber, and found Anthony talking to his ſouldiers, and them weeping, his ſweete eloquent tongue had ſo melted their hartes: but he rating them, ranne furiouſly apon him, and ſtrake of his head with his owne handes. And Catulus Luctatius alſo, that had bene Conſull with Marius, and had triumphed ouer the CIMBRES with him, ſeeing him ſelfe in this perill, ſet men to intreate Marius for him: but his aunſwere was euer, he muſt needes dye. So Catulus locked him ſelfe into a litle chamber, and made a great fire of charcole to be kindled, and with the ſmoke thereof choked him ſelfe. Now after their heades were cut of, they threw out the naked bodies into the ſtreetes, and trodde them vnder their feete: the which was not only a pitiefull, but a fearefull ſight to all that ſawe them. But after all this yet, there was nothing that grieued the people ſo much, as the horrible lechery & abhominable cruelty of this gard of the BARDIÆIANS, who comming into mens houſes by force, after they had ſlaine the maſters, defiled their young children, and rauiſhed their wiues and maides, & no man would once reproue their crueltie, lecherie, and vnſatiable auarice: vntill Cinna and Sertorius in the end ſet apon them as they ſlept in their campe, and ſlewe them euery one. But in this extremitie, as if all thinges had bene reſtored vnto their firſt eſtate, newes came againe from all partes to ROME, that Sylla hauing ended his warre againſt king Mithridates, and recouered the prouinces which he had vſurped: returned into ITALIE with a great power. This cauſed theſe euills and vnſpeakeable miſeries to ceaſe a litle, bicauſe the wicked doers of the ſame looked they ſhould haue warres on their backes ere it were long. Whereuppon Marius was choſen Conſull the ſeuenth time. He going out of his houſe openly the firſt day of Ianuarie, being the beginning of the yeare, to take poſſeſſion of his Conſulſhippe: cauſed one Sextus Lucinus to be throwen downe headlong from the rocke Tarpeian, which ſeemed to be a great ſigne and certaine token of the euills and miſeries, that fell out afterwards the ſelfe ſame yere apon them of their faction, and vnto all the citie beſide. But Marius being ſore broken with his former troubles, and his minde oppreſſed with extreame ſorow and griefe, could not now at this laſt time of neede plucke vp his harte to him againe, when he came to thinke of this newe toward warre that threatned him, and of the daungers, griefes, and troubles he ſhould enter into, more great and perillous then any he had paſſed before. For through the great experience he had in warres, he trembled for feare when he beganne to thinke of it, conſidering that he had to fight, not with Octauius, nor with Merula, Captaines of a companie of rebells gathered together: but with a noble Sylla, that had driuen him out of ROME before, and that came now from driuing the puiſant king Mithridates, vnto the furdeſt parte of the realme of PONT, and of the ſea Euxinum. Thus, deepely waying and conſidering the ſame, and ſpecially when he looked backe vppon his long time of banithment, how vacabondlike he wandered vp and downe in other contries, and remembred the great misfortunes he had paſſed, and the ſundrie daungers he fell ſo often into, being purſued ſtill by ſea and by land: it grieued him to the harte, and made him ſo vnquiet, that he coulde not ſleepe in the night, or if he ſlept, had fearefull dreames that troubled him, and ſtill he thought he heard a voyce buſſing in his eares.

Marius ſhoughes and feare.

A Lyons very denne, is dreadfull to behold:
Though he him ſelfe be gone abroade, and be not therein hold.

But fearing moſt of all that he ſhould no more ſleepe and take his reſt, he gaue him ſelfe to make vnreaſonable banckets, and to drinke more then his yeres could beare, ſeeking to winne ſleepe by this meanes, to auoyde care the better. But at the length there came one from the ſea, that gaue him certaine intelligence of all: & that was an increaſe of a new feare vnto him. And thus he being now extreamely troubled, partely for feare of the thing to come, & partely alſo for the ouer heauie burden of his preſent ill, there neded but litle more aggrauation, to fall into the diſeaſe whereof he dyed, which was a plewriſie: as Poſidonius the Philoſopher wryteth, who ſayeth plainly that he went into his chamber when he was ſicke, and ſpake vnto him

Deuiſe to winne ſleepe.

A him about matters of his Ambaſſade, for the which he came to Rome. Yet an other hiſtoriographer Caius Piſo wryteth, that Marius walking one day after ſupper with his frendes, fell in talke of his fortune from the beginning of his life, telling them at large how often fortune had turned with and againſt him: concluding, that it is no wiſe mans parte to truſt her any more. So when he had done, he tooke his leaue of them, and layed him downe vpon his bed, where he lay ſicke ſeuen dayes together, and on the ſeuenth day dyed. Some wryte that his ambition appeared plainly, by a ſtraunge rauing that tooke him in his head during his ſickenes. For he thought that he made warres with Mithridates, and ſhewed in his bed all his geſtures and mouings of his bodie, as if he had bene in a battell, crying the ſelfe ſame cryes out alowde, which he was wont to crie when he was in the extreameſt fight. The deſire he had to haue taken this B charge in hande againſt Mithridates, was ſo deepely ſetled in his minde through extreame ambition and iealouzy that poſſeſt him: that being then three ſcore and ten yeare old, after he had bene the firſt man that euer was choſen ſeuen times Conſull in Rome, and alſo after that he had gotten a world of goodes and richeſſe together that might haue ſuffiſed many kinges: yet for all this he dyed for ſorrowe, lamenting his harde fortune, as if he had dyed before his time, and before that he had done and ended that which he had deſired. But this was cleane contrarie vnto that the wiſe Plato did, when he drewe neere to his death. For he gaue God thankes for his fatall end and good fortune. Firſt, for that he had made him a reaſonable man, and no brute beaſt: ſecondly, a Greke and no barbarous man: and furthermore, for that he was borne in Socrates time. It is reported alſo, that one Antipater of Tharsis, calling to mind
C a litle before his death the good fortune he had in his life time, did not forgette amonge other thinges, to tell of the happie nauigation he made, comming from his contrie vnto Athens: which did witneſſe that he put vpon the ſyle of his good accompts for a ſingular great grace, all fauor fortune had ſhewed him, and that he kept it in perpetuall memorie, being the onely and moſt aſſured treaſure a man can haue, to kepe thoſe giftes that nature or fortune doe beſtowe vpon him. But contrariwiſe, vnthankefull fooles vnto God and nature both, doe forget with time the memory of their former benefittes, and laying vp nothing, nor keping it in perpetuall memory, are alwayes voyde of goods and full of hope, gaping ſtill for things to come & leauing in the meane time the things preſent, though reaſon perſwades them the contrary. For fortune may eaſily let thē of the thing to come, but ſhe can not take that from thē which D is already paſt: and yet they vtterly forget the certaine benefit of fortune, as a thing nothing belonging vnto thē, & dreame alwayes of that which is vncertaine. And ſure it chaunceth to them by great reaſon. For, hauing gathered outward goodes together, and locking them vp before they haue built and layd a ſure grounded foundacion of reaſon through good learning: they can not afterwardes fill nor quenche their vnſatiable greedie couetous minde. Thus ended Marius his life, the ſeuenteenth day of his ſeuenth Conſulſhippe, whereof all the citie of Rome was not a litle glad, and tooke harte againe vnto them, ſuppoſing they had then bene deliuered from a bloodie cruell tyranny. But within few dayes after they knew it to their coſt, that they had chaunged an olde maſter taken out of the worlde, for a younger that came but newly to them: ſuch extreame vnnaturall cruelties, & murders did Marius the younger com-E mit, after the death of his father Marius, murdering in manner all the chiefeſt noble men of Rome. At the firſt, they tooke him for a valliant and hardy young man, whereuppon they named him the ſonne of Mars: but ſhortly after his deedes did ſhew the contrary, and then they called him the ſonne of Venus. In the end he was ſhut in, and beſieged by Sylla in the city of Perusia, where he did what he could poſſible to ſaue his life, but all was in vaine: & laſtly, ſeeing no way to eſcape, the city being taken, he ſlewe him ſelfe with his owne handes.

THE LIFE OF Lyſander.

IN the treaſorie of the ACANTHIANS, which is in the temple of Apollo at DELPHES, there is this inſcription: Braſidas, and the ACANTHIANS, with the ſpoile of the ATHENIANS. That inſcription maketh many men thinke, that the image of ſtone that ſtandeth within the chamber by the dore therof, is the image of Braſidas: howbeit in truth it is the liuelie image of Lyſander him ſelfe, made with a great buſh of heare, & a thicke long beard after the old auncient facion. And where ſome ſay that the ARGIVES, after they were ouercome and had loſt a great battell, did all of them ſhaue them ſelues in token and ſigne of common ſorrow: and that the LACEDÆMONIANS on thother ſide to ſhewe the ioy of their victory, did all let their heares growe, that is not true. No more then this is true which other do reporte of the BACCHIADES: who being fled from CORINTHE vnto LACEDÆMON, the LACEDÆMONIANS founde them ſo ill fauoredly diſguiſed and deformed, bicauſe their heads were all ſhauen, that thereupon they had a deſire to let their heare and beards grow. For that was one of the ordinaunces of Lycurgus, who ſayd that the long buſhe of heare, maketh them that are naturally fayer, the pleaſaunter to looke vppon: and thoſe that are ill fauored, more ougly and fearefull to ſee to. And furthermore, it is ſayd that Ariſtoclitus, the father of Lyſander, was not of the royall blood of the kinges of SPARTA, though he came of the race of the Heraclides: and that his ſonne Lyſander was very meanely and poorely brought vp, being as obedient to the lawes and ſtatutes of his contrie, as any other man was, ſhowing him ſelfe alwayes very ſtrong and conſtant againſt all vanitie and pleaſure, ſauing only in matters of honor and curteſie, which they offer vnto thoſe that deſerue well. For they thinke it no ſhame nor diſhoneſty in SPARTA, that the young men doe ſuffer them ſelues to be ouercome with that delite and pleaſure: but doe ſo bring vp their children, that from their youth they would haue them to haue ſome taſt and feeling of honor, deliting to be praiſed, and ſorie to be diſcōmended. For they make no accompt of him that is not moued with the one nor the other, but take him to be of a baſe cowardly nature, that hath no manner of minde to doe good. And therefore it is to be thought, that the ambition and ſtowtneſſe that was bred in Lyſander, proceded

A sadded of the LACEDÆMONIAN discipline and education he had, and not so much of his owne nature. But in dede of his owne nature he was a right courtier, & could tell how to entertaine and flatter great states and nobility, farre better then the common manner of the natural SPARTANS: and moreouer for his priuate benefit, he could easily beare with the slowtons of greater men of authority then him selfe, which some iudge to be a great poynt of wisedome, to know how to deale in matters of state. Aristotle in a place where he sayeth, that the greatest wittes commonly are subiect vnto melancholye, (as Socrates, Plato, and Hercules were) whereth, that Lysander in his later age fell into the melancholy disease, but not in his youth. He had also this singular gift aboue all other, that in his pouerty he alwayes kept that honest modesty with him, as he would neuer be ouercome nor corrupted with gold nor siluer: and yet he filled his con- B trie with riches and couetousnes, which lost him the reputation he had wonne, bicause him selfe made none accompt of riches nor getting. For bringing store of golde and siluer into his contrie after he had ouercomen the ATHENIANS, he reserued not vnto him selfe one Drachma only. And furthermore, when Dionysius the tyran of SYRACVSA, had on a time sent goodly riche gownes out of SICILIA to his daughters: he refused them, saying, that he was afrayed such gownes would make them fowler. Neuertheless, shortly after being sent Ambassador out of his contrie vnto the same tyranne, Dionysius sending him two gownes, praying him to choose which of the two he would cary to his daughter: he answered, that she her selfe could best choose which was the fitter, and so caried both with him. But now to come to his doings in warlike causes: the warres of PELOPONNESVS fell out maruelous long. For after the ouer- C throw of the armie which the ATHENIANS had sent into SICILIA, when euery man thought they had vtterly lost all their force by sea, and that by all coniecture they shoulde soone after loose all by lande also: Alcibiades returning from his exile to deale againe in matters of the state, made an exceding great chaunge and alteration. For he set the ATHENIANS a flote againe, and made them as strong by sea as the LACEDÆMONIANS: who thereupon beganne to quake for feare, and to looke eftsoones for a freshe warre, perceiuinge that they stoode in neede of a greater power, and of a better Captaine then euer they had before. Whereuppon they made Lysander their Admirall, who arriuing in the citie of EPHESVS, founde them very well affected towardes him, and maruelous willing and ready to take the LACEDÆMONIANS parte: howbeit otherwise in very poore state, and ready almost to take vp all the barbarous ma- D ners and facions of the PERSIANS, bicause they did continually frequent them, being enuironned round about with the contry of LYDIA, where the king of PERSIANS Captaines were euer resident. Wherefore, hauing planted his campe there, he brought thither marchauntes shippes out of all partes, and sette vp an arsenall or store house to builde gallies in: so that in shorte space, by oft recourse of marchauntes that beganne to trade thither, he quickened their hauens, and set vp their staple againe for trafficke of marchaundise, and filled euery priuate artificers house with an honest trade to make them riche by, so that euer after it grewe in continuall hope to come vnto that florishinge state and greatnes, in the which we see it at this present. Furthermore, Lysander being aduertised that Cyrus, one of the great king of PERSIANS sonnes, was come vnto the city of SARDIS, he went thither to speake with him, and to com- E plaine of Tisaphernes: who hauing commaundement geuen him from the king to aide the LACEDÆMONIANS, and to helpe to expulse the ATHENIANS, and to driue them from the sea, seemed to deale but coldly and faintly against them, for the fauor he bare to Alcibiades. For, furnishing the LACEDÆMONIANS very scantly with money, was an occasion that all their armie by sea went to wracke. Cyrus for his owne parte was very glad that he heard complaintes of Tisaphernes, and that they spake against him: bicause he was an ill man, and the rather for that he had him selfe a litle odde grudge to him. Wherfore he loued Lysander maruelous well, as well for the complaintes he made of Tisaphernes, as also for the pleasure he tooke in his companie, bicause he was a man that could wonderfully please & delite noble men: by which meanes hauing wonne the fauor of this young Prince, he did perswade, and also incorage him F to follow this warre. And when Lysander was vpon his departure to take his leaue of him, Cyrus feasted him, and afterwardes prayed him not to refuse the offer of his liberalitie, and that was: that he would freely aske him what he would, assuring him he should not be denied any thing. Whereunto Lysander answered him. Sithence I see (Cyrus) you are so willing to please vs, I beseeche you, and doe also counsell you then to increase the ordinarie pay of our mariners, one halfe penny a day: to the end that where now they haue but three halfe pence, they may thenceforth receaue two pence a day. Cyrus was glad to heare Lysanders bounty, and the increase that he would make, and caused tenne thowsande Darickes to be deliuered him: by meane whereof he added to the ordinary pay of the maryners, the increase of a halfe penny a day. This liberality, within few dayes after, emptied all their enemies gallies of their men. For, the most parte of their maryners & galley men went where they might haue the best pay: and such as remained behinde, became very dull, lasie, and seditious, dayly troubling their Captaines and gouernors. Now though Lysander had drawen his enemies men from them by this policie, and had done this great hurte, yet he durst not fight it out by sea, fearing the worthines of Alcibiades: who was a valliant man, and had greater store of shippes then he had, and besides that, was neuer ouercome by lande nor by sea, in any battell where he was Generall. So it chaūced, that Alcibiades went out of the Ile of SAMOS, vnto the city of PHOCEA, which standeth vpon firme lande directly ouer against SAMOS, and leauing the whole charge of his fleete in his absence, with Antiochus his pylot: he being more hardie then wise, in scorne and derision of Lysander, went with two gallies only into the hauen of EPHESVS, and went by the arsenall (where all their shippes lay in docke) with great noyse and laughing. This put Lysander in such a heate and chafe, that first of all he put a fewe gallies to the sea, and had him in chase with them. But afterwardes, perceiuing that the other Captaines of the ATHENIANS came out one after an other to the rescue, he armed other gallies also: so that supplying still with a few on either side, at the length they came to a maine battell, which Lysander warne, & hauing taken fifteene of their gallies, he set vp a token of triumphe and victory. When the people at ATHENS heard the newes of this ouerthrow, they were so angrie with Alcibiades, that they discharged him presently of his charge: and the souldiers also that lay in campe in the Ile of SAMOS, beganne to mislike him, and to speake ill of him. Whereuppon he presently left his campe, and went into the contrie of CHERRONESVS in THRACIA. This battell was more spoken of then there was cause, by reason of Alcibiades reputacion. Furthermore, Lysander causinge the stowtest and boldest men of euery city, aboue the common sorte, to come to EPHESVS vnto him: layed there secret foundacions of great chaunge and alteracion, which he stablished afterwardes in the gouernmentes of cities. For he perswaded his priuate frendes to make tribes amongest them selues to winne them frendes, and to practise to gette the rule of their cities into their handes: promising them, that so soone as the ATHENIANS were ouerthrowen, they them selues also should be deliuered from subiection of their people, and euery one of them should beare chiefe rule in their contry. And this he performed to them all, and made euery one of them proue his wordes true. For he preferred all them that had bene his olde frendes, vnto the best offices and charges: not sparing to doe against all right and reason, so that they were aduaunced by it. And thus by this meanes, euery man came to take his part, and they all sought and desired to gratifie and please him: hoping, that what great matter soeuer fell out, they assured thēselues in maner that they should obtaine it of him, when he came to haue the gouernment in his owne hands. And therefore they nothing reioyced at Callicratidas comming, who came to succeede him in the office of the Admirall: neither afterwards also, when they saw by experience that he was as honest and iust a man as coulde be. Neither did they like his manner of gouerninge which was plaine, and without any arte or cunning. But they commended the perfectiō of his vertue, as they would haue done the image of some demy god made after the olde facion, which had bene of singular beawty. But in the meane time, they wished for Lysander, as well for the tender loue and good will he bare to his frends and them, as also for the profit and commodity they got by him. So when Lysander tooke the seas to returne home againe, all they that were in the campe, were as sory as could be possible, insomuch as the teares stoode in their eyes: and he on thother side, studied to make them worse affected vnto Callicratidas. For amongest many other thinges, he sent the rest of the money backe againe to SARDIS, which Cyrus had geuen him to pay the maryners: saying, that Callicratidas should go him selfe to aske it, if he would haue it, and finde the meanes to entertaine his

A his men. And lastly, when he was ready to imbarke, he protested before all them that were present, that he did deliuer, leaue, and assigne ouer the armie into his handes, commaunding all the sea. But Callicratidas, to ouercome his false ambicion, and fowle boasting lye aunswered him againe, and saied. If that be true thow saiest, come then and deliuer me the gallies in the city of MILETVM, as thou goest by, before the Ile of SAMOS: for sith thou commaundest all the sea, we shall not neede to feare our enemies that are in SAMOS. Lysander thereto replied, that the armie was no more at his commaundement, and that he had the charge ouer them: and so departed thence, taking his course directly vnto PELOPONNESVS, and left Callicratidas in great perplexity. For he had brought no money out of his contrie with him, neither would he compell the cities to furnishe him with any, seeinge that they were at that time too much B troubled already. Then had he no other way but to goe to the Lieutenauntes of the king of PERSIA, to aske them money as Lysander had done. But he was the vnmeeteste man for it that could be possible: for he was of a noble and liberall nature, and thought it lesse dishonor & reproache vnto the GREECIANS, to be ouercome by other GREECIANS, then to goe flatter the barbarous people, and seeke to them that had gold & siluer enough, but otherwise, no goodnes nor honesty. In the end notwithstanding, making vertue of necessity, he tooke his iorney towards LYDIA, and went directly to Cyrus courte: where at his first comming he willed them to let him vnderstand, that Callicratidas the Admirall of the LACEDÆMONIANS would speake with him. One of the souldiers that warded at the gate, told him: my frende, syr straunger, Cyrus is not at leasure nowe, for he is set at dinner. Callicratidas aunswered him plainely againe: C no force, I will tary here till he haue dined. The barbarous PERSIANS hearing this, tooke him for some plaine lowte, and so he went his waye the first time with a mocke at their handes. But the second time when they would not let him come in at the gate, he fell in a rage, and retorned backe (as he came) to the citie of EPHESVS, cursing and banning them that at the first had so much imbased them selues, as to goe sue to the barbarous people, teaching them to be prowde and stately for their goodes and riches: swearing before them all that were present, that so soone as he came to SPARTA againe, he would doe all that he could possible to pacifie the GREECIANS, & set them at peace one with an other, to the end they might be fearefull to the barbarous people, & also that they should medle with them no more, nor neede their aide to destroy one an other. But Callicratidas hauing the noble harte of a SPARTAN, and being to D be compared in iustice, valliancy, and greatnes of corage, with the most excellentest GREECIANS in his time, dyed shortly after in a battell by sea, which he lost vppon the Iles ARGINVSES. Wherefore, the confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS seeing that their state was in declining, they all together sent an Ambassade vnto SPARTA, by whom they made request to the counsell, that they would send Lysander againe for their Admirall, promising that they would do all things with better corage & goodwill vnder his conduction, then they would vnder any other Captaine they could sende them. So much did Cyrus also wryte vnto them. But bicause there was an expresse law forbidding that one man should be twise Admirall, and besides, they being willing to graunt the request of their confederats, made one Aracus their Admirall, but in effect gaue Lysander the whole authoritie of all thinges. Who was maruelous welcome vn- E to them, and specially vnto the heades and rulers of cities, which long before had wished for his comming: bicause that by his meanes they hoped to make their authority greater, and altogether to take away the authority from the people. But they that loued plaine dealing, and open magnahimitie in the manners of a gouernor and generall, when they came to compare Lysander, with Callicratidas: they founde that Lysander had a fine subtill head, and did more in warres with his policy and subtiltie, then by any other meanes. And moreouer, that he esteemed iustice, when it fell out profitable: and tooke profit, for iustice and honestie, not thinking that plaine dealing was of better force then crafte, but measuring the value of the tone and thother, by the profit that came out of them, and mocking of them that sayed that the race of Hercules should not make warres with craft and subtilty. For sayd he, when the lyons skin F will not serue, we must help it with the case of a foxe. And hereunto agreeth that, which they wryte he did in the citie of MILETVM. For his frendes and familiars to whome he had promised aide for destruction of the peoples authority, and to driue their enemies out of the city:

they hauing chaunged their mindes, and being reconciled vnto their aduerſaries, he openly made great ſhowe of gladnes, and ſeemed as though he would helpe to agree them together: but ſecretly being alone, he tooke them vp ſharply, and told them that they were cowards to doe it, and did procure them to the contrarie, to ſet apon the people. And then when he vnderſtoode that there was commocion among them in the citie, he ranne thither ſo dainly as it were to appeaſe it. But when he was alſo comen into the citie, the firſt he met with of them that would alter the ſtate of gouernment, and take the authority from the people: he fell out withall, and gaue them rough wordes, commaunding with extreamitie that they ſhould follow him, as though he would haue done ſome great puniſhment. And againe, meeting with them on the contrary parte, he willed them alſo that they ſhould not be afrayed, nor dout that any man ſhould doe them hurte where he was. This was a wicked and malicious practiſe of him, to ſtay the chiefeſt of them that were moſt affected to the popular faction, to the ende that afterwardes he might, put them all to death as he did. For they that truſting to his words remained quiet in the city were all put to death. Moreouer, Androclidas touching this matter, hath left in wryting that which Lyſander was wont to ſay: by the which it appeareth, that he made very litle reckening to be periured. For he ſayd, that children ſhould be deceiued with the play of kayles, and men with othes of men, following therein Polycrates, the tyran of Samos, but without reaſon: for he was a lawfull Captaine, and the other a violent vſurper of tyrannicall power. Furthermore, it was not done like a true Laconian, to behaue him ſelfe towardes the goddes none otherwiſe, then towardes men, but rather worſe, & more iniuriouſly. For he that deceiueth his enemy, & breaketh his othe to him: ſheweth plainly that he feareth him, but that he careth not for God. Cyrus therefore hauing ſent for Lyſander to come to Sardis to him, gaue him money largely, and promiſed him more: and bicauſe he would more honorably ſhewe the good will he had to gratifie him, tolde him, that if the kinge his father would geue him nothing, yet he would geue him of his owne. And furthermore, whē all other meanes fayled to helpe him with money, that rather then he ſhould lacke, he would melt his owne chayer to make money of (which he ſate in when he gaue audience in matter of iuſtice) being altogether of gold and ſiluer. And to be ſhorte, when he was going into Media to the king his father, he gaue Lyſander power to receiue the taxes and ordinary tributes of the cities vnder his gouernment, and made him Lieutenaunt of all his contry. And laſtly, bidding him farewell, praied him that he woulde not geue battell by ſea vnto the Athenians, vntil he returned from the courte: and that before his comming againe he woulde haue authoritie to leauie a greate nomber of ſhippes, aſwell out of Phœnicia, as out of Cilicia. Wherefore whileſt Cyrus was in his iorney, Lyſander not being able to fight with his enemies with like nomber of ſhippes, nor alſo to lye ſtill and doe nothing with ſo good a number of gallyes, went and ſcowred the ſeas, where he tooke certaine Ilandes, and robbed alſo Ægina and Salamina. From thence he went & landed on the firme lande in the contrye of Attica, and did his dutie there vnto Agis king of Lacedæmonia, who came purpoſely from the forte of Decelea to the ſea ſide to ſee him, bicauſe their armye by lande alſo ſhoulde ſee what power they had by ſea, and howe it ruled more by ſea then they woulde. Neuertheles, being aduertiſed that the fleete of the Athenians followed harde after him, he tooke an other courſe to flye backe againe into Aſia by the Iles: and returninge againe, founde all the contry of Helleſpont without men of warre. So he laied ſiege before the citie of Lampſacvs, and did aſſault it with his gallies by ſea: and Thorax being come thither alſo at the ſelfe ſame time in great haſt with his armie by land, gaue thaſſault on his ſide. Thus was the citie taken by force, which Lyſander left to the ſpoile of the ſouldiers. Now in the meane time the fleete of the Athenians (which was a hundred and foure ſcore ſaile) came to an ancker before the citie of Elevnte, in the contrie of Cherronesvs: and newes being broughte them that the city of Lampſacvs was taken, they came with all ſpede poſſible vnto the citie of Sestos, where getting freſhe acates and vittelles, they coaſted all alongeſt the coaſt vnto a certaine place called the goates riuer, directly ouer againſt the fleete of their enemies, which lay yet at ancker before the citie of Lampſacvs. Now there was a captaine of the Athenians mongeſt other called Philocles, he that perſwaded the Athenians to cut of the priſoners thumbes

A thumbes of their right handes that were taken in the warres, to thend they ſhould no more handle the pyke, but only ſerue to pull the ower. Both the tone and the tother reſted that day, hoping to haue battel without faile the next morning. But Lyſander hauing an other meaning with him, commaunded the maiſters and maryners notwithſtanding, that they ſhould haue their gallies ready to geue battell the next morninge by breake of day, bicauſe euery man ſhould get a bord betimes, and ſhould keepe them ſelues in order of battell, making no noiſe at all, attending what he would commaunde them: and further, made the armie by lande alſo to be ranged in battell ray, by the ſea ſide. The next morning at funne riſing, the ATHENIANS beganne to row with all their gallies ſet in order of battell in a fronte. But Lyſander, though he had his ſhippes in order to fight, the proes lying towardes the enemies before day, towed not B for all that againſt them, but ſending out pynnaſies vnto the firſt gallies, commaunded them ſtraightly that they ſhould not ſtirre at all, but keepe them ſelues in order, making no noyſe, nor rowing againſt the enemy. Though the ATHENIANS alſo were retyred in the night, he would not geue the ſouldiers leaue to come to lande out of the gallies, before he had ſent firſt two or three gallies to diſcrie the fleete of his enemies: who brought him word that they had ſeene the ATHENIANS take lande. The next morning they did the like, the third day, and the fourth alſo all in one ſorte: ſo that the ATHENIANS beganne to be bold of them ſelues, and to deſpiſe their enemies, imagining they lay thus cloſe for feare of them, and durſt not come forward. In the meane time, Alcibiades (who lay at that time in the contrie of CHERSONESVS, in certaine places which he had conquered) came ryding to the campe of the ATHENIANS, C to tell the Captaines and generalls of the armie, the great faultes they committed. Firſt, for that they had caſt ancker, and kept their ſhippes in an open place, where there was no maner of ſuccor, nor harber to retyre vnto vpon any ſtorme: and worſt of all, bicauſe that they were ſo fete the their vittells farre of, at the citie of SESTOS, vnto which hauen they ſhould rather draw them ſelues vnto, conſidering that they had but a litle way to go, & alſo that they ſhould haue the citie to backe them, which would furniſh them with all thinges neceſſarie: and beſide that, they ſhould be further of from their enemies, which were gouerned by one generall onely that did commaund them all, and were ſo well trained, that at a whiſtle they were ready ſtraight to execute his commaundement. Alcibiades perſwaſions to theſe Captaines of the ATHENIANS were not only miſliked, but furthermore there was one called Tydeus, that an- D ſwered him very lewdly: that he had nothing to doe to commaunde the armie, but other that had the charge of them. Alcibiades miſtruſting thereby ſome treaſon, quietly went his way. The fift day, the ATHENIANS hauing made the ſame countenaunce to preſent battell vnto their enemies, and retyring the ſame night as of cuſtome very negligently, and in ill order, as men that made no reckening of their enemies: Lyſander ſent againe certaine galliots to diſcrie them, commaunding the Captaines of the ſame, that when they perceiued the ATHENIANS had left their gallies and taken lande, they ſhould then returne backe with all poſſible ſpeede they could, and being mid way ouer the ſtraightes, that they ſhould lift vp a copper target into the ayre, apon the top of a pyke in the foredecke, for a ſigne to make all the whole fleete to row in battell. Now Lyſander him ſelfe in the meane time went in perſone from galley to gal- E ley, perſwading & exhorting euery Captaine that they ſhould put their galliots, maryners, and ſouldiers in good readines, to thend that when the ſigne ſhould be lifted vp, they ſhould rowe with all their might in battell againſt the enemies. Wherefore, ſo ſoone as the copper target was ſet vp in the ayer, and that Lyſander had made his trompet ſound out of the Admiral, for a token to hale out into the ſea: the gallies immediatly beganne to row for life in enuy one of an other, and the footemen that were apon the lande, ranne with ſpeede alſo to the toppe of a high cliffe neere vnto the ſea, to ſee what would be the ende of his fight, bicauſe the diſtaunce from one ſide to the other in that place was not fully two myles, which they had ſone cut ouer, and in a litle ſpace, through the great diligence & force of rowing with their owers. So Conon the chiefe Captaine of the ATHENIANS perceiuing from the ſhore this great fleete F comming with a full force to aſſault them: he then cried out to the ſouldiers that they ſhould runne to their ſhippes, and being in a rage to ſee thinges in this daunger, called ſome by their names, others he intreated, and the reſt he compelled to take their gallies. But all his diligence was to no purpose, bicause the souldiers were wholly scattered here and there. For so soone as they were set a lande out of their gallies at their returne, some went to buy prouision, other went a walking in the fieldes, some were set at supper in their cabines, and other were layed downe to sleepe, nothing mistrusting that which happened to them, through their Captaines ignoraunce and lacke of experience. But when the enemies were ready to ioyne and fall vpon them with great cries and noyse of owers, Conon hauing eight gallies, stale secretly out of the fleete, and flying vnto Euagoras, saued him selfe in the Ile of CIPRVS. In the meane time, the PELOPONNESIANS falling apon the other gallies, tooke some of them emptie, and brake the others as the souldiers beganne to come aborde apon them. And as for the men, some were slaine by their shippes as they ranne vnto them like naked men without weapon, and out of order, thinking to haue saued them selues: other were killed in flying, bicause the enemies landed and had them in chase. And there were taken aliue of them, three thowsand prisoners with the Captaines. Lysander moreouer tooke all the whole fleete of their shippes, the holie galley excepted called Paralos, and the eight that fled with Conon: and after he had destroyed all the campe of the ATHENIANS, he fastened the gallies that were taken, vnto the keele of his gallies, and returned with songes of triumphe, with the sound of flutes and hoboyes, towards the citie of LAMPSACVS, hauing wonne a great victory with litle labor, and had cut of in a small time, the long continuing and most diuerse warre that euer was, and had brought forth so many sundrie straunge euentes of fortune, as are vncredible. For there had bene infinite battells fought both by sea and lande, and had altered many sundry times, and there was slaine at that time moe Captaines, than in all the other warres of GREECE together: all which were at the length brought to ende and determined, by the good wisedome and conduction of one onely man. And therefore some thought, that this great ouerthrowe was geuen by the gods, and sayd: that at the departure of Lysanders fleete out of the hauen of LAMPSACVS, to goe set apon the fleete of the enemies, they perceaued ouer Lysanders galley the two fires, which they call the starres of Castor and Pollux: the one on the tone side of the galley, and the other on thother side. They say also, that the fall of the stone was a token, that did signifie this great ouerthrow. For about that time, (as many hold opinion) there fell out of the ayer a maruelous great stone, in the place they call the goates riuer, which stone is seene yet vnto this day, holden in great reuerence by the inhabitauntes of the citie of CHERRONESVS. It is sayd also that Anaxagoras did prognosticate, that one of the bodies tyed vnto the vaulte of the heauen, should be pluckt away, and should fall to the ground by a slyding & shaking that should happen. For he sayd, that the starres were not in their proper place where they were first created, considering that they were heauy bodies, and of the nature of stone: howebeit that they did shine by reflection of the fire elementory, & had bene drawen vp thither by force, where they were kept by the great violēce of the circuler motion of the element, euen as at the beginning of the world they had bene stayed & let from falling downe beneath, at that time when the separation was made of the colde and heauy bodies, from the other substaunce of the vniuersal world. There is an other opinion of certaine Philosophers, where there is more likelyhoode then in that. For they say, that those which we call falling starres, be no fluxions nor deriuacions of the fire elementorie, which are put out in the ayer, in a manner so soone as they be lighted: nor also an inflammation or cōbustion of any parte of the ayer, which by her to ouermuch quantity doth spread vpwardes: but they are celestiall bodies, which by some slackenes of strength, or falling from the ordinary course of heauen, are throwen and cast downe here beneath, not alwayes in any parte of the earth inhabited, but more ofter abroade in the great Occean sea, which is the cause that we do not see them. Notwithstanding, Anaxagoras words are confirmed by Damachus, who writeth in his booke of religion, that the space of three score and fifteene yeares together, before that this stone did fall, they saw a great lumpe of fier continually in the ayer like a clowde inflamed, the which taried not in any one place, but went and came with diuerse broken remouings, by the driuing whereof there came out lightnings of fire that fell in many places, and gaue light in falling, as the starres do that fall. In the end, when this great body of fire fell in that parte of the earth, the inhabitants of the contrie, after that they were a litle boldened from their feare and wonder, came to the place to see what it

A was: and they found no manner of ſhew or apparaunce of fire, but only a very great ſtone lying vpon the ground, but nothing in comparilon of the leaſt parte of that which the compaſſe of this bodie of fire did ſhew, if we may ſo name it. Sure herein, Dicearchus wordes had neede of fauorable hearers. But againe if they be true, then he vtterly confuteth their argumentes, that maintaine that it was a peece of a rocke, which the force of a boyſterous winde did teare from the toppe of a mountaine, and caried in the ayer, ſo long as this hurle winde continued: but ſo ſoone as that was downe, and calme againe, the ſtone fell immediatly. Neither doe we ſay that this lightning bodie, which appeared ſo many dayes in the element, was very fire in deede, which comming to diſſolue and to be put out, did beget this violent ſtorme and boyſterous wind in the element, that had the force to teare the ſtone in ſunder, & to caſt it downe.

An other opinion of the ſtone that fell.

B Neuertheles, this matter requireth better diſcourſe in ſome other booke then this. But now to our ſtory. Whē the three thouſand ATHENIANS that were taken priſoners at that ouerthrow, were condemned by the counſell to be put to death: Lyſander calling Philocles, one of the Captaines of the ATHENIANS, asked him what paine he would iudge him worthy of, that gaue the citizens ſo cruell & wicked counſell. Philocles being nothing abaſhed to ſee him ſelfe in that miſerie, aunſwered him. Accuſe not them that haue no iudge to heare their cauſe: but ſince the goddes haue geuen thee grace to be conqueror, doe with vs, as we would haue done with thee, if we had ouercome thee. When he had ſayd ſo, he went to waſhe him ſelfe, and then put on a fayer cloke vpon him, as if he ſhould haue gone to ſome feaſt: and went luſtely the formeſt man to execution, leading his contrie men the way, as Theophraſtus wryteth. After Philocles cōſtancy, Captaine of the Athenians.

C this done, Lyſander with all his fleete went by all the cities of the ſea coaſt, where he commaūded ſo many ATHENIANS as he founde, that they ſhould get them to ATHENS, letting them vnderſtand that he would not pardone a man of them, but put them all to death as many as he found out of their city. And this he did of policie to bring them all within the precinct of the walles of ATHENS, bicauſe he might ſo much the ſooner famiſh them for lacke of vittells: for otherwiſe they would haue troubled him ſore, if they had had wherewithall to haue maintayned a long ſiege. But in all the cities as he paſſed by, if they were gouerned by the authority of the people, or if that there were any other kinde of gouernment, he left in euery one of them

D a LACEDÆMONIAN Captaine or gouernor, with a counſell of tenne officers, of them that had bene before in league and amity with him: the which he did as well in the cities that had euer bene confederates and frendes vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, as in them that not long before had bene their enemies. So he went ſayling all alongeſt the coaſtes, fayer and ſoftely making no haſte, ſtabliſhing in manner a generall principality ouer all GREECE. For he did not make them officers that were the richeſt, the nobleſt, or honeſteſt men, but ſuch as were his frendes, out of thoſe tribes which he had placed in euery citie: & to them he gaue authority to puniſh, and reward ſuch as they liked of, and would be preſent him ſelfe in perſone to helpe them to put thoſe to death, whome they would execute, or otherwiſe expulſe or baniſh their contrie. But this gaue the GREECIANS ſmall hope of good or gratious gouernment vnder the rule of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Wherefore, me thinkes that Theopompus the comicall Poet doted, when he compared the LACEDÆMONIANS, vnto tauerners wines, ſaying: that they had ge-

E uen the GREECIANS a taſt of the ſweete drinke of libertie, and that afterwardes they had mingled it with vineger. For, the taſt they gaue the GREECIANS of their gouernment from the beginning, was very ſharpe vnto them: bicauſe Lyſander tooke the rule and authority of gouernment out of the peoples handes, and gaue it vnto a fewe of the boldeſt, and moſt ſeditious men in euery citie. Thus hauing ſpent a great time in this voyage, to make theſe alterations: he ſent newes before to LACEDÆMON, that he was comming with two hundred ſaile. He ſpake alſo with the kinges Agis and Pauſanias, in the contry of ATTICA, perſwading him ſelfe that he ſhould winne the city of ATHENS at the firſt aſſault. But when he ſaw his expectation failed, & that the ATHENIANS did valliantly reſiſt him: he returned once againe with his fleete into ASIA, where he made an end of chaunging and altering the maner of gouern-

F ment through euery city in equall maner, ſtabliſhing a counſell of tenne officers only in euery one of them, & putting euery where many citizens to death, and baniſhing many alſo. Among others, he draue all the SAMIANS out of their contry, and reſtored againe all them that had

bene baniſhed before: and the city of SESTOS alſo, being yet in the ATHENIANS handes, he tooke it from them. And furthermore, he would not ſuffer the naturall SESTIANS to dwell there, but draue them away, and gaue their citie, their houſes, and landes, vnto ſhippe maiſters, officers of gallies, and galley ſlaues, that had bene in the warres with him. But therein the LACEDÆMONIANS were againſt him, and this was the firſt thing that they did forbid him: for they reſtored the SESTIANS, againſt his will, vnto their landes and goodes againe. But as the GREECIANS were very much offended, to ſee the partes Lyſander played: ſo were they all very glad againe, to ſee theſe others which he afterwardes did. For he reſtored the ÆGINETES againe to their landes and houſes, who had bene put from them a long time. He reſtored alſo the MELIANS, and the SCIONÆIANS to their landes againe, which the ATHENIANS had gotten from them, and draue out the ATHENIANS. Furthermore, Lyſander being aduertiſed, that the citizens and inhabitantes of ATHENS were pinched ſore for lacke of vittells, he returned againe, and came into the hauen of PIRÆA: by meanes whereof he kept the citie ſo ſtraight, that he made them yeelde vppon ſuch condicions as he him ſelfe would. Howbeit there are certaine LACEDÆMONIANS that ſay, Lyſander wrote vnto the EPHORES; the city of ATHENS is taken. And that the Ephori wrote againe vnto him: it is well that it is taken. But this is but a tale deuiſed to make the matter ſeeme better: for in deede the capitulacions which the Ephori ſent vnto him, were theſe. The Lordes of the counſell of LACEDÆMON haue thus decreed: that ye doe raſe the fortification of the hauen of PIRÆA. That ye do ouerthrow alſo the long wall that ioyneth the hauen to the citie. That ye yeelde vp and redeliuer all the cities which ye doe holde, and content your ſelues with your liues and contry only. This doing, ye ſhall haue peace, ſo that ye performe our demaundes. That ye ſhall receiue thoſe which are baniſhed: & for the number of ſhippes, ye ſhall diſpoſe of them as we ſhall will you. The ATHENIANS agreed vnto the articles contained in that bill, following the counſell of Theramenes, the ſonne of Agnon. Who when a young orator called Cleomenes, did openly aske him in anger, if he were ſo bold to dare to doe, or ſay, any thing contrary vnto that, which Themiſtocles had done before time, to aſſent vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, that the walle which he built in deſpite of them, ſhould by their cõmaundement now be raſed: he aunſwered him openly againe, young man, my frend, I doe nothing contrary to Themiſtocles doinges. For like as he heretofore did build the walle, for the ſafety and benefit of all the citizens and people that were in ATHENS at that time: euen ſo doe we that are here nowe, for the ſelfe ſame cauſe plucke it downe and raſe it. And if it be true that walles doe make cities happy, then it muſt needes follow that the city of SPARTA which neuer had any walles, ſhould be the vnfortunateſt of all other. So Lyſander hauing receiued all the ATHENIANS ſhippes but twelue, & the walles of the city alſo to vſe them at his pleaſure: on the ſixteenth day of march (on which day in olde time the ATHENIANS had wonne the battell by ſea, within the ſtraight of SALAMINA, againſt the king of PERSIA) he counſelled them ſtraight to chaunge the forme of their gouernment. The people could not brooke that motion, and were maruelouſly offended withall. Whereuppon Lyſander ſent to declare vnto them, that they had broken the articles of the peace made betweene them, for that their walles were yet ſtanding, the tenne dayes being expired in which they had promiſed to ouerthrowe them: and therefore that he would once againe referre it to the determination of the counſell, howe they ſhould be vſed, that had broken the articles and couenaunts of the firſt peace. Other ſay, that immediatly he referred it vnto the deliberacion of the counſell of their confederates, that is to ſay: whether they ſhould altogether deſtroy the city, and make the inhabitantes thereof, ſlaues, and bondmen or no. In this counſell, it is reported that there was a THEBAN called Erianthus, whoſe opinion was, that they ſhould vtterly raſe the city, & make the contry a deſert: ſo that it ſhould neuer after ſerue for other thing, but for paſturage of beaſtes. But during this dyet & counſell, there was a banket made, whereunto all the Captaines and chiefe officers of the army being bidden, there was a PHOCIAN, a ſinger of ſonges, that ſang the entry of the Chorus to the tragedy of Electra, made by the Poet Eurtpides, which beganne in this ſorte.

The Athenians yeelde vp Athens to Lyſander.

I come nowe to your courtes, which lye both wide and waste:
By spoyle of warres depopulate, destroyed, and defaste.

These words moued all the hearers with cõpassion, so that the most parte of them thought it were too great a sinne to destroy so noble a city, which brought forth so many famous wise men, & great persones. Wherefore Lysander, when the ATHENIANS had submitted the selues altogether to his will, caused all the women players of pipes or shalmes to come out of the city, and gathered all those together which he had in his owne campe also, and with the sound of their instruments he made the walles and fortifications of the city of ATHENS to be pulled downe to the very ground, and set all their gallies on fire, & burnt them in the presence of the confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS, who daunced and played in the meane season with garlandes of flowers on their heades, in token that that day was a beginning of their full and perfect liberty. Immediatly after he chaunged also the state of the gouernment, establishing a counsell of thirty Magistrates in the city, and other tenne also in the hauen of PIRÆA, hauing all equall and like authority: and therewithall made Callibius a gentleman of SPARTA Captaine of the castell there, and left a good garrison of the LACEDÆMONIANS with him. This Callibius one day lift vp his staffe he had in his hande to strike Autolycus withall, a strong made man to wrestle: whereuppon Xenophon the Philosopher made his booke in olde time, called Conuiuium. But Autolycus that was a cunning wrestler, hauing all the sleights of wrestling, sodainly tripped Callibius with his legge, and lifting him vp at the armes ende, cast him to the ground. Howbeit Lysander was not angry with Autolycus for it, but reproued Callibius, telling him that he should haue remembred (if he had bene wise) that he had the gouernment ouer free men, and not of bonde men. Notwithstanding, shortly after the thirty gouernors of the city, to satisfie Callibius, put this Autolycus to death. When Lysander had done all these things, he tooke sea againe, and went into the contry of THRACIA, and sent by Gylippus before vnto SPARTA (who had bene Captaine and generall of the SYRACVSANS in SICILIA) all the golde and siluer that was left in his handes, with all the presentes besides which had bene priuately geuen him, and with the crownes also that had bene presented him: which were maruelous in number as it is to be thought, for that many came to present him, considering the great power he had, and that in maner he was chiefe and sole prince of all GREECE. This Gylippus did rippe the seames of euery bagge in the bottome where the money was, and tooke a good summe out of euery of them: and afterwardes sowed them vp againe, not thinking that there had bene a border vppon euery bagge, apon the which was declared, the number and kindes of gold and siluer that were therein. Now when he was come to SPARTA, he hid the money he had stolen, vnder the house eauinges, and went and deliuered the bagges he had brought, into the handes of the Ephori, shewing them Lysanders seale, which he had set to euery one of them. The Ephori hauing opened the bagges, & told the money, found that the summe agreed not with the borders of the contentes: and yet coulde not tell where the fault was. But a seruaunt of Gylippus told them in darke wordes, saying: that vnder the tyles of his masters house there lay a great number of owles. Nowe the greatest parte of the coyne of golde and siluer which was currãt through GREECE, was stamped with the marke of an owle, by reason of the ATHENIANS. Thus Gylippus after so many noble exploytes done in warres, committing so shameful & vile a dede, was banished out of his cõtry of LACEDÆMONIA. But the wisest men of SPARTA, and of deepest iudgement, fearing the power of golde and siluer, and seeing by proofe of Gylippus doinges, that it had such power to make one of their chiefest men to fall through couetousnes: they greatly blamed Lysander for bringing of it into LACEDÆMON, beseeching the Ephori that they would send all this golde and siluer out of SPARTA, as a plague, prouocation, and wicked baite, to make them do euill: declaring vnto them, that they should vse no other money, but their owne only. Whereupon they referred all, to the wisedome and determination of the counsell. Theopompus writeth, that Sciraphidas was he that did moue the counsel of the Ephori in it. Howbeit Ephorus calleth him Phlogidas, who was the first that spake against it in the counsell, that they should not admit, nor receiue into the city of SPARTA, any money of golde or siluer: but should onely content them selues with their owne contry iron coyne, the which first of all, comming from the fire redde hotte, was quenched with vineger, to thend they ſhould be forged no more, nor employed vnto any other vſe. For it was ſo eger and brittle by meanes of this temper, that they coulde no more conuert it to any other purpoſe: and beſide, it was very heauie and vnhandſome to remoue, conſidering that a great heape and quantitie of it, was but of ſmall value. And it ſeemeth they did vſe of olde time, certaine litle iron money, and in ſome places copper money, called Obeliſci, from whence the ſmall peeces of money now extant are called Oboli, whereof ſix make a Drachma, ſo termed, for that it was as much as the hand could gripe. Neuertheleſſe, at the earneſt ſute of Lyſanders frendes that ſtoode againſt it, and held hard with him: it was decreed in the counſell, that the money ſhould remaine in the city, and ordained that it ſhould be currant onely but for thafayres of the common wealth. And if it were found, that any priuate man did either locke vp, or kepe any money, that he ſhould ſuffer death for it: as if Lycurgus when he made his lawes feared gold and ſiluer, and not the couetouſnes and auarice which the golde and ſiluer bringeth with it. The which was not taken away ſo much, prohibiting priuate men to haue it: as it was ingendred only by a common tolleracion of getting it. For, the profit which they ſawe it brought withall, made it to be eſteemed and deſired. For it was vnpoſſible they ſhould deſpiſe a thing priuately for vnprofitable, which they ſaw reckened of commonly, as a thing very neceſſary: and that they ſhould thinke it would not ſerue their turne priuately, ſeeing it ſo commonly eſteemed and deſired. But we are rather to thinke, that priuate mens manners are conformed according to the common vſes and cuſtomes of cities: then that the faultes and vices of priuate men doe fill cities and common weales with ill qualities. And it is more likely, that the partes are marred & corrupted with an infection of the whole, when it falleth out ill: then that the partes corrupted ſhould drawe the whole vnto corruption. For to the contrary, the faultes of a parte deſtroyed, which might be preiudiciall vnto the whole, are oftentimes redreſſed and corrected by thother partes, whole and entier. But they that tooke this reſolucion in their counſell at that time, to haue money in the common wealth: made feare of puniſhment, and of the law, to be the outward watchmen of citizens houſes, to keepe that no money ſhould come in to them. But all this while they made no inwarde prouiſion, to kepe the entry of their ſoules from all paſſion & greedy deſires of money: but to the contrary, they made them all to haue a couetous deſire to be rich, as if it were a great and honorable thing. But for that we haue hertofore in other places reproued the LACEDÆMONIANS. And moreouer Lyſander cauſed a ſtatue of braſſe to be made like him ſelfe of the ſpoile he had gotten of the enemies, to ſet it vp in the citie of DELPHES, and for euery priuate Captaine of the gallies in like caſe: and the two ſtarres of Caſtor & Pollux in golde beſides, which vaniſhed away a litle before the battell of Leuctres, and no man knewe what became of them. Againe, in the chamber of the treaſory of Braſidas, and of the ACANTHIANS, there was alſo a galley made of gold and iuory, of two cubittes long, which Cyrus ſent vnto him after the victory he had wonne by ſea, of the ATHENIANS. And furthermore, Alexandrides the hiſtoriographer borne at DELPHES, wryteth, that the ſelfe ſame Lyſander had left there to be kept ſafe, a tallent of ſiluer, two & fifty Minas, and eleuen peeces of gold called Stateres. But all this accordeth not with that which all the other hiſtoriographers write, agreeing of his pouerty. But Lyſander being aloft then, and of greater power then euer any GREECIAN was before him: caried a greater porte and countenaunce then became his ability. For, as Duris writeth, he was the firſt of the GRECIANS vnto whome they did euer erect any aulters, and offer ſacrifice vnto as a god, and in honor of whom they did firſt ſing any hymnes: and at this day there is yet good memory of one which beganne in this maner.

The SAMIANS by publicke decree ordained, that the feaſtes of Iuno, which were called in their city Hercea, ſhould be called Lyſandria. Lyſander had euer one Chœrilus a SPARTAN Poet about him, to wryte and ſet forth all his doinges in verſe. An other Poet called Antilochus, one day made certaine verſes in his praiſe: which pleaſed him ſo well, that he gaue him his hatte full

A full of siluer. There were two other Poets, Antimachus COLOPHONIAN, and Nicerates borne at HERACLEA, which did both wryte verses to honor him, striuing whether of them should ab beste. Lysander iudged the crowne and victory vnto Nicerates: wherewith Antimachus was so angry, that he rased out all that he had writte of him. But Plato who at that time was young, & loued Antimachus bicause he was an excellent Poet, did comforte him, and tolde him that ignorance did blinde the vnderstanding of the ignorant, as blindenes doth the sight of the blinde. Aristonous an excellent player of the citerne, & one that had sixe times wonne the prises of the Pythian games: to winne Lysanders fauor, promised him, that if euer he wanne the prise of his arte againe, he would cause him selfe to be proclaimed Lysanders slaue. This ambition of Lysander was very odious and grieuous, only vnto great personnes, and men of his estate: but

Ignorance cõpared with blindenes.

B besides his ambition, in thende he became very prowde and cruell, through the flatteries of his followers, and them that courted him: so that he exceeded in recompencing his frendes, as also in punishinge of his enemies. For, to gratifie his frendes and familiars, he gaue them absolute power and authority of life and death in their townes and cities: and to pacifie and appease his anger where he once hated, there was no other way but death, without all possibilitie of pardon. And that he plainly shewed afterwards in the city of MILETUS, where, fearing least they would flie that tooke parte with the people, & bicause he would haue them appeare that hid them selues: he gaue his word, and sware that he would doe them no hurt at all. The poore men gaue credit to his worde. But so soone as they came out, and did appeare, he deliuered them all into the handes of their aduersaries, (which were the chiefest of the nobility)

Lysanders ambition, pryde, and cruelty.

C to put them all to death: & they were no lesse then eight hundred men one with an other. He caused great murders of people to also be done in other cities: for he did not only put them to death that had priuatly offended him, but numbers besides, onely to satisfie and reuenge the priuate quarrells, enmities and couetousnes of his frendes, whom he had in euery place. And therefore was Eteocles LACEDAMONIAN greatly commended for his saying: that GREECE could not abide two Lysanders. Theophrastus wryteth also, that the very like was spoken of Alcibiades by Archestratus. Howbeit in Alcibiades there was nothing, but his insolency, and vaine glory that men misliked: but in Lysander, a seuere nature, and sharpe condicions, that made his power fearfull & intollerable. Neuertheless, the LACEDAMONIANS passed ouer all other complaintes exhibited against him: saiuing when they heard the complaints of Pharnabazus,

Lysander brake his word & othe, and procured the death of eight hundred persons.

D who purposely sent Ambassadors vnto them, to complaine of the wrongs and iniuries Lysander had done him, spoyling and destroying the contry vnder his gouernment. Then the Ephori being offended with him, clapped vp Thorax in prison, one of his frendes and Captaines that had serued vnder him: and finding that he had both gold and siluer in his house contrary to the law, put him to death. And to him selfe they sent immediatly that which they call Scytala, (as who would say, the scrolle wrytten apon a rounde staffe) commaunding him that he should retorne immediatly apon receite thereof. The Scytala is in this sorte. When the Ephori doe sende a Generall, or an Admirall to the warres, they cause two litle rounde staues to be made of the like bignes and length, of which the Ephori doe keepe the tone, and thother they geue to him whome they sende to the warres. These two litle staues they call Scytales. Nowe

E when they will aduertise their Generall secretly of matters of importaunce, they take a scrolle of parchement, long and narrowe like a leather thonge, and wreath it about the round staffe, leauinge no voyde space betwene the knottes of the scrowle. Afterwardes when they haue bound them fast together, then they wryte vppon the parchment thus rolled what they will, and when they haue done wryting, vnfolde it, and sende it to their Generall, who can not else possibly read it to know what is writte, (bicause the letters are not ioined together, nor follow in order, but are scattered here and there) vntill he take his litle rowle of wodde which was geuen him at his departure. And then wreathing the scrowle of parchment about it which he receaueth, the folding and wreathes of the parchement falling iust into the selfe same place as they were first folded: the letters also come to ioyne one with an other, as they ought to doe.

F This litle scrowle of parchment also is called as the rowle of wodde, Scytala: euen as we commonly see in many places that the thing measured, is also called by the name of the measure. When this parchement scrowle was brought vnto Lysander, who was then in the contrie of Hellespont, he was maruelously troubled withall, fearing aboue all other thinges the accusations of Pharnabazus: so he sought meanes to speake with him before he departed, hoping thereby to make his peace with him. When they were together, Lysander prayed him he would write an other letter vnto the Lordes of Sparta, contrary to his first, how that he had done him no hurt at all, and that he had no cause to complaine of him: but he did not remember that he was a Cretan, (as the common prouerbe sayeth) that could deceaue an other Cretan. For Pharnabazus hauing promised him that he would performe his desire, wrote a letter openly, purporting the effect of Lysanders request: but behinde he had an other of contrary effect, so like on the out side vnto the other, that by sight no man could discerne the one frō the other. And when he came to put his seale, he chaunged the first with the last that was hidden, & gaue it him. When Lysander came vnto Sparta, he went as the maner is, straight to the pallace where the Senate kept, and gaue his letters vnto the Ephores, thinking that by thē he should haue bene cleared from all daunger of the greatest accusations they could haue burdened him withall: bicause that Pharnabazus was very well thought of of the Lords of Lacedæmonia, for that he did euer shew him selfe willing and ready to helpe them in all their warres, more then any other of the kinges Lieutenauntes of Persia. The Ephori hauing red this letter, they shewed it vnto him. Then did Lysander plainly see, that the common prouerb was true:

Lysander carieth letters against him selfe.

That Vlysses vvas not subtill alone.

Thereuppon he went home to his house maruelously troubled. But within few dayes after returning to the pallace againe to speake with the Lords of the counsell, he told them that he must needes make a voyage vnto the temple of Iupiter Ammon, to discharge certaine sacrifices which he had vowed and promised to him before he had wonne the battells. Some say, that in deede Iupiter Ammon appeared to him in a dreame as he did besiege the city of the Aphydnians, in the contry of Thracia, and that by his commaundement he raised the siege, and charged them of the city, that they should thanke Iupiter Ammon, and doe sacrifice vnto him: by reason whereof, they thinke that he ment good faith, when he sued for licence to make this voyage into Libya, to performe the vowes which he had made. But the most parte did certainely beleue that he made sute to goe this iorney, for a cloke and colour only to absent him selfe, bicause he feared the Ephores, and that he coulde not endure the yoke and subiection which he must abide remaining at home, neither could like to be commaunded. And this was the true cause of his sute to goe this voyage, much like vnto a horse taken out of a fresh pasture and goodly meadowes, to bring him into a stable, & make him to be iorneyed as he was before. Neuertheless, Ephorus writeth an other cause, the which I will recite hereafter. In the end, Lysander hauing hardly obtained licence, tooke shippe, and crossed saile. But during his absence, the kinges of Lacedæmon remembring that he kept all the cities at his commaundement, by meanes of the frendes he had in euery city, whom he had made chiefe gouernors of the same, & that by their meanes he came in maner to be absolute prince ouer all Greece they tooke vppon them to redeliuer the gouernment of the townes and cities againe into the handes of the people, and also to put downe his frendes whome he had stablished there. And hereupon fell out great insurrection againe. For first of all, they that were banished from Athens, hauing surprised and taken the castell of Phyla apon the sodaine, did set apon the thirty gouernors tyrans (whom Lysander had placed there) and ouercame them in battell. Whereuppon Lysander straight returned to Sparta, & perswaded the Lacedæmonians to referre the gouernment to the number of a few, and to punish the insolency of the people. So by his procurement, they sent first a hundred tallents vnto the thirty tyrans for an aide to maintaine this warre, and appointed Lysander him selfe generall. But the two kinges of Sparta enuying him, and fearing least he should take the city of Athens againe: they determined that one of them would go. Whereupon Pausanias went thither immediatly, who in apparaunce seemed to maintaine the tyrannes against the people: but in effect, he did his indeuor to appease this warre, for feare least Lysander by meanes of his frends and followers should once againe come to haue the city of Athens in his power, the which he might easily doe. And thus hauing agreed the Athenians againe one with an other, and pacified all faction and commocion among Lysander goeth to Iupiter Ammon.

King Pausanias reconciled the Athenians with the Spartans.

A mong them, he pluckt vp the roote of Lysanders ambition. But shortly after, the ARGIENS rebelling againe against the LACEDÆMONIANS, Pausanias him selfe was reproued, bicause he yelded so much to the boldnes and insolency of the people, which were bridoled and restrained before, by the authority of the small number of gouernors: and to the contrary, they gaue Lysander the honor to be generall, who ruled not in this rebellion to please mens mindes and to content them, neither with fond ostentation of glory, but seuerely, for the profit and commodity of SPARTA. It is true he would geue great wordes, and was terrible to them that resisted him. As he aunswered the ARGIVES one day, who contended for their confines with the LACEDÆMONIANS, and seemed to alleage the best reasons. Euen they (sayd he) that shall proue the stronger hereby, shewing the his sword shalbe they that shal pleade their cause best B for their confines. An other time, when a MEGARIAN had tolde his minde boldly enough in open counsell, he aunswered him: thy wordes (good frend) had neede of a city, meaning therby that he was of too meane a towne to vse so great words. And to the BOEOTIANS also, who were in dout to professe them selues frends or enemies: he sent vnto thē, to know if he should passe through the contry with his pykes vpwardes or downewardes. And when the CORINTHIANS also were reuolted from their allyance, he brought his army harde vnto their walles: but when he sawe his men were afrayed, and made curtsey whether they should goe to the assault or not: by chaunce spying a hare comming out of the towne ditches, he sayd vnto them: Are ye not ashamed to be afrayed to goe and assault your enemies that are so cowardly and sloothfull, as hares doe keepe their formes at ease within the circuite of their walles? Now king C Agis being deceased, he left behinde him his brother Agesilaus, and his supposed sonne Leotychides. Wherefore, Lysander that had loued Agesilaus aforetime, gaue him counsell to stande for the right of the crowne, as lawefull heire and next of the blood, discending of the race of Hercules: bicause it was suspected that Leotychides was Alcibiades sonne, who secretly had kept Timæa Agis wife, at what time he was banished out of his contry, and came then to remaine in SPARTA. And Agis selfe also, concluding by reckening of the time of his absence, that his wife coulde not be with childe by him: made reckening of Leotychides, (and had openly shewed it all the rest of his life time) that he did not acknowledge him for his sonne, vntill such time as falling sicke of that disease whereof he died, he was caried to the city of HERÆA. And there lying in his death bed, at the humble sute of Leotychides him selfe, and partely at the in- D stant request of his frendes who were importunate with him: he did acknowledge Leotychides for his sonne in the presence of diuers, whome he prayed to be witnesses vnto the Lordes of LACEDÆMON, of his acceptation and acknowledging of him to be his sonne. Which they all did in fauor of Leotychides. For all that, Agesilaus tooke it apon him, by the support and maintenaunce of Lysanders fauor. Howebeit, Diopithes a wise man, and knowen to be skilfull in auncient prophecies, did great hurt to Agesilaus side, by an auncient oracle which he alleaged against a defect Agesilaus had, which was his lamenes.

Lysanders terrible words

The death of king Agis. Lysander deprineth Leotychides of his kingedome.

O Spartan people you, vvhich beare high hawty hartes,
And looke a loft: take heede I say, looke vvell vnto your martes:
Least vvhiles you stande vpright, and guide your state by grace, E Some halting kingdom priuily, come creeping in a pace.
By that meanes might you mouse, great troubles, carke and care,
And mischiefes heape vpon your head, before you be avvare.
And plonged should you be, euen ouer head and eares, VVith vvast of vvarres, vvhich here on earth doth perish many peares.

Many by occasion of this oracle, fell to take Leotychides parte: but Lysander declared vnto them, that Diopithes did not conster the meaning of the oracle well. For God, sayed he, cared not whether he halted of one legge or no, that should come to be king of LACEDÆMON: but in deede, the crowne and kingdome should halte and be lame, if bastardes not lawfully begotten, should come to raigne ouer the true naturall issue and right line of Hercules. By these per- F swasions, Lysander with his great countenaunce and authority besides, wanne all men to his opinion: so that Agesilaus by this meanes was proclaimed king of LACEDÆMON. This done, Lysander beganne straight to counsell him to make warres in ASIA, putting him in hope that he ſhould deſtroy the kingdome of PERSIA, and ſhould come to be the greateſt man of the world. Moreouer, he wrote vnto his frendes in the cities of ASIA, that they ſhould ſend vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS to require king Ageſilaus for their generall, to make warres againſt the barbarous people. Which they did, and ſent Ambaſſadors purpoſely vnto SPARTA to ſue that they might haue him: the which was no leſſe honor procured vnto Ageſilaus by Lyſander meanes, then that he did, in making him to be choſen king. But men ambitious by nature, being otherwiſe not vnapt nor vnfit to commaunde, haue this imperfection: that through the iealouſie of glory, they doe commonlie enuie their equalles, the which doth greatly hinder them for doing any notable thinges. For they take them for their enemies, enuying their vertue: whoſe ſeruice and meanes might helpe them to doe great matters. Thus Ageſilaus being choſen generall of this enterpriſe, tooke Lyſander with him in this iorney, amongeſt the thirty counſellers which were geuen vnto him to aſſiſt him: and made ſpeciall choyce of him, as by whoſe counſell he hoped moſt to be gouerned, and to haue him neereſt about him, as his chiefeſt frende. But when they were arriued in ASIA, they of the contry hauing no acquaintaunce with Ageſilaus, ſeldome ſpake with him, or but litle: and to the contrary, hauing knowen Lyſander of long time, they followed him, and waited vppon him to his tent or lodging, ſome to honor him, bicauſe they were his frendes, others for feare, bicauſe they did miſtruſt him. Euen much like as it falleth out oftentimes in the Theaters, when they play tragedies there: that he that ſhall play the perſon of ſome meſſenger or ſeruaunt, ſhalbe the beſt player, and ſhall haue the beſt voyce to be heard aboue all others: and to the contrary, that he which hath the royall bande about his heade, and the ſcepter in his hande, a man doth ſcant heare him ſpeake. Euen ſo fell it out then: for all the dignitie due vnto him that commaundeth all, was ſhewed only vnto the counſeller: and there remained to the king no more, but the royall name only of a king, without any power. Therefore me thinkes that this vndiſcreete and importunate ambition of Lyſander, did well deſerue reproofe perhappes, to make him only to be cõtented with the ſecond place of honor next vnto the king. But for Ageſilaus againe, through extreame couetouſnes and iealouſie of glory, to caſt Lyſander altogether of, and to ſet ſo light by his frende and benefactor, that ſurely became not him neither. For firſt of all, Ageſilaus neuer gaue Lyſander occaſion to doe any thinge, neither did commit any matter of weight vnto him, that might be honorable for him: but which is worſt of all, if he perceiued that he had taken any mens cauſes in hand, and that he did fauor them, he did alwayes ſende them backe againe into their contry, denying their ſute, without that they coulde obtaine any thing they ſued for, leſſe then the meaneſt perſones that could haue come, extinguiſhing Lyſanders credit by litle, and litle, and taking from him all authority by this meanes. Wherefore, Lyſander perceiuing howe he was thus refuſed and reiected in all thinges, ſeing that the countenaunce and fauor which he thought to ſhew vnto his frendes, fell out hurtfull vnto them: left of to ſolicite their matters any more, and prayed them to forbeare to come vnto him, or to followe him, but to go to the king, and vnto thoſe that could doe them better pleaſure then him ſelfe, and ſpecially thoſe that honored them. When they heard that, many deſiſted to trouble him any more in matters of importaunce, but not to doe him all the honor they could, and continued ſtill to accompanie him, when he went out to walke, or otherwiſe to exerciſe him ſelfe: the which did aggrauate and increaſe Ageſilaus anger more againſt him, for the enuy he bare vnto his glory. And where he gaue very honorable charge & commiſſion in the warres, oftentimes vnto very meane ſouldiers to execute, or cities to gouerne: he appointed Lyſander ſurueyor generall of all the ordinary prouiſion of vittells, and diſtributer of fleſh. And then mocking the IONIANS that did honor him ſo much: let them go now, ſayd he, and honor my fleſh diſtributer. Wherefore, Lyſander ſeeing it high time to ſpeake: went vnto Ageſilaus, and tolde him in few wordes after the LACONIAN manner: Truely Ageſilaus, thou haſt learned well to abaſe thy frendes. In deede ſayed he againe, ſo haue I, when they wilbe greater then my ſelfe: and to the contrary, they that maintaine and increaſe my honor and authority, it is reaſon that I eſteeme of them. Yea mary, ſayd Lyſander, but perhappes I haue not done as thou ſayſt. Yet I pray thee geue me ſuch an office, as I may be leaſt hated, & moſt profitable for thee: though it be but in reſpect of ſtraungers eyes that looke apon vs both. After this talke betwene them,

Through Lysanders working, Agesilaus was made king.

Lyſander ſurueiour of the vittells.

Lyſanders talke with king Ageſilaus, after the Laconian maner of ſpeaking.

A Agesilaus sent him his Lieutenaunt into the contry of Hellespont, where Lysander still kept this anger secret in his hart against him, but for all that, did not leaue to doe all that he could for the benefit of his masters affaires. As amongest many other thinges, he caused a Persian Captaine called Spithridates, to rebell against his master, who was a valliant man of his hands, and a great enemy of Pharnabazus, and had an army also which he brought with him vnto Agesilaus. Now concerning this warre, this was all that he did in that iornay. Wherefore, he returned againe to Sparta not long after, with litle honor, being maruelously grieued and offended with Agesilaus; and hating more then before, all the state and gouernment of the citie of Sparta: by reason whereof, he determined to put that in practise, which he had long time thought vppon, concerninge the alteracion of gouernment, and his enterprise was this. A- Lysander seeketh innouation in the state of Sparta.

B mongest the offspring and issue of Hercules, who were mingled with the Dorians, and returned againe into the contrie of Peloponnesvs, the greatest number and chiefest of them, dwelled in the city of Sparta: howbeit, all they that came of that race had no right of succession to the crowne, sauing two families only, the Eurytiontides, and the Agiades. The other families, albeit they were all for nobility of blood descended out of one selfe house, yet had they no more right nor interest vnto the realme, then the residue of the people: for, the dignities that were attained vnto by vertue, were geuen vnto the inhabitauntes that could deserue them. Lysander then being one of those which was discended of the true race of Hercules, who notwithstanding had no interest in the crowne: when he saw him selfe aloft, and called to great honor through his famous actes and merites, and that he had wonne many frendes, and great The Families of the kinges of Lacedemon.

C credit and authority by dealing in matters of the state: it grieued him much, to see that they which were no nobler then him selfe, should be kinges in that city, which he had increased by his vertue, and that he could not haue so much power as to take from these two houses, the Eurytiontides, and the Agiades, the prerogatiue that the kinges should be chosen onely out of one of those two houses, and to cast it apon the offspring of Hercules. Some say againe, that he would not only haue enlarged that prerogatiue vnto the issue of Hercules, but vnto all the naturall Spartans also: bicause that Hercules race should not only desire this reward of honor, but euen they also that followed his steps in vertue, which had made him equal with the gods in honor. For he douted not, but if they would dispose the crowne in this sorte, that there was

D no man in the city of Sparta that should sooner be chosen king then him selfe: whereupon he attempted first to perswade his citizens by very good reasons; & to bring this about the better, he conned an oration without booke, penned by Cleon Halicarnasseus, made him for this purpose. But afterwardes weying with him selfe, that so great and straunge a chaunge as he would bring in, had neede of some better and stronger helpe: he beganne to frame a deuise as they say, to moue the people by, much after the manner they vse in tragedies, framing engines to bring some god to come downe from heauen vnto them, and this was his fained inuention. He deuised certaine oracles & prophecies, thinking that all Cleons rethoricke would stand him in no steade, if first of all he did not fill the citizens hartes with some superstition & Lysander deuiseth false oracles, & corrupteth southsayers with money.

E feare of the goddes, that he might bring them afterwardes more easily vnto reason. And Ephorus sayeth, that he proued first to corrupt the Nunne with money, that geueth all the oracles and aunswers in the temple of Apollo at Delphes: and that afterwardes, he woulde haue wonne the Nunne also of the temple of Dodone with money, by Pheretles practise. And that he being reiected by them both, went lastly vnto the temple of Iupiter Ammon: and that there he spake vnto the priestes, and offered them great store of money for the same purpose. But they were so offended with Lysander, that they sent men of purpose to Sparta, to accuse him, that he would haue corrupted them with money. The counsell clearing Lysander of this accusation, the Libyans his accusers at their departing sayd: we will one day iudge more iustly, then you my Lordes of Lacedemon haue done now, when you shall come to dwell in our contry of Libya: supposing there was an auncient prophecy that sayd, the Lacedemonians one day should come to dwell in the contry of Libya. But we shall doe better to wryte

F the whole story at large of this practise, suttelty, and malicious deuise, which was no matter of small importaunce, nor lightly grounded: but as in a mathematicall proposition there were many great coniectures and presuppositions, & many long circumstances to bring it to conclusion, the which I will dilate from point to point, deliuering that which an historiographer and philosopher both hath wrytten. There was in the marches of the realme of Pontus a man that sayed she was gotten with childe by Apollo, the which many (as it is to be thought) would not beleue at all, and many also did beleue it: so that she beinge deliuered of a goodly sonne, diuerse noble men and of great estate were carefull to bring him vp, and to haue him taught. This childe, I know not whereuppon, nor how, was named Silenus: and Lysander seyinge the plat of his deuise from thence, added to all the rest of him selfe, to goe on with his practise. Now he had many (and they no small men) that made his way to frame this ieast, goinge out a rumor of the birth of this childe, without any suspicion gathered out of the intent of this rumor. And furthermore, they brought other newes from Delphes, which they dispersed abroade through the city of Sparta, to wit: that the priestes of the temple kept secret bookes of very auncient oracles, which they them selues durst not touch nor handle, neither might any man read them, onlesse he were begotten of the seede of Apollo, who should come after a long time, and make his birth appeare vnto the priestes that kept these papers, by that by some secret marke & token, which they had amongest them: & thereby being knowen for Apolloes sonne, he might then take the bookes, & read the auncient reuelacions & prophecies of the same. These things prepared in this sorte, there was order taken that Silenus should come and aske for these bookes as though he were the sonne of Apollo: and that the priestes which were priuy to this practise, should make as though they did diligently examine him of euery thing, and how he was borne. And that at the length, after they had seemed to know all, they should deliuer these prophecies vnto him, as if he had bene in deede Apolloes sonne: and that he should openly read them in the presence of many witnesses. And among the rest of the prophecies, that he should read that specially, for the which this long paltry fained drift was framed, touching the kingdome of Lacedæmonia: that it was better, and meetelier for the Spartans they should choose them for their kinges, whome they found the meetest men of all their magistrates. But when Silenus was come of full age, and brought into Greece of purpose to performe this practise, all the mistery was marde by the fainte heart of one of the players and companions of Lysander, who holpe him to countenaunce this deuise: who when the matter should haue taken effect, shroncke for feare, and let the misterie alone. This notwithstanding, nothing was bewrayed in Lysanders life time, till after his death. For he dyed, before king Agesilaus returned out of Asia, being fallen into warres with Boeotia before his death, or rather hauing him selfe made Greece to fall into warres. They doe reporte it either way, and some lay the fault apon him, other apon the Thebans, and other apon them both: and they burden the Thebans withall, bicause they did vtterly ouerthrowe the common sacrifices which Agesilaus made in the city of Aulide. And they say also, that Androclides and Amphitheus did raise this warre among the Greecians, being before corrupted with money by the king of Persia to bring warres apon the Lacedæmonians in Greece: and beganne to inuade and destroy the contry of the Phocians. Other say that Lysander was very angry with the Thebans, bicause they onely of all other their confederates did aske the tenth parte of all the spoyle which was wonne in the warre against the Athenians: and that they were not pleased that Lysander had sent the money away vnto Sparta. But aboue all Lysander did malice them most, bicause they were the first that made way for the Athenians to be deliuered from thoppression of thirty tyrannes, whom he had stablished gouernors in Athens, and in whose fauor (to make them to be dreaded the more) the Lacedæmonians had ordained by a common edict: that they that were banished and did flee from Athens, might lawefully be taken and apprehended in what place soeuer they fled vnto, and that whosoeuer should resist or let them to do it, they should be proclaimed rebells, & open enemies vnto the Lacedæmonians. Againe to contrary this edict, the Thebans made an other very like, & meete for the glorious dedes of Bacchus and Hercules their auncestors, for whom it was made that euery house and city through the contry of Boeotia, should be open for the Athenians that would come thither, & that he that would not helpe a banished man from Athens, against him that would take him away by force, should be fined and amerced at a talent. And also if there were any souldiers that went vnto Athens, through the contrie of Boeotia, that

A that the THEBANS ſhould not ſee nor heare it. This was no diſſimulation to ſpeake of, that they ſhould ordaine thinges with ſo gentle wordes, and ſo meete for the people of GREECE, and then that the dedes ſhould not aunſwer vnto their edicts & proclamations. For Thraſybulus, and his fellowes of the conſpiracie, who kept the caſtell of Phyla, they departed from THEBES, with armor and money, and the THEBANS did helpe them to beginne and practiſe their enterpriſe ſo ſecretly, that it was not diſcouered. Theſe were the cauſes why Lyſander was ſo earneſtly bent againſt the THEBANS, & his choller being ſo extreame, by reaſon of his melancholines that grewe dayly apon him more and more through his age, he ſolicited the EPHORES ſo, that he perſwaded them to ſende a garriſon thither: and him ſelfe taking the charge of them, vndertooke the iorney ſtraight with his men. But afterwardes they ſent kinge Lyſanders iorney vnto Boeotia.

B Pauſanias alſo with an army thither, who was to fetche a great compaſſe about to enter into the contrie of BOEOTIA, by mount Cithæron: and Lyſander ſhoulde goe to meete him through the contry of PHOCIDES, with a great company of ſouldiers beſides. Now as Lyſander went, he tooke the city of the ORCHOMENIANS, who willingly yeelded them ſelues to him as ſoone as he came thither. From thence he went to the city of LEBADIA, which he ſpoyled: & from thence he wrote vnto king Pauſanias, that departing from PLATEES, he ſhould march directly to the city of ALIARTE, where he would not faile to meete him the next morning by breake of day at the towne walles. Theſe letters were intercepted by certaine skowtes of the THEBANS, who met with the meſſenger that caried them. Thus the THEBANS hauing intelligence of their purpoſe, left their citie in cuſtodie vnto the ATHENIANS who were come to Cithæron mons.

C aide them: and departed out of THEBES about midnight, and marched all night with great ſpeede, that they came to ALIARTE in the morning a litle before Lyſander, and put halfe their men into the citie. Now for Lyſander, he was determined at the firſt to keepe his men apon a hill which is nere to the city, and there to tary the comming of king Pauſanias. But afterwards, when he ſawe that the day was farre ſpent, and that he came not, he could tary no lenger, but arming him ſelfe, after he had made an oration vnto the confederates which he had brought with him, he marched on with his men in battell ray, longer then large, by the high way that went vnto the city. In the meane ſeaſon, the THEBANS that were left without the city, leauing ALIARTE on the left hande, did ſet vppon Lyſanders rereward, of his army againſt the fountaine called Ciſſuſa: where the Poets faine that the nurſes of Bacchus did waſhe him, when he Ciſſuſa fons.

D came out of his mothers wombe, bicauſe the water that commeth out of it (though it be very clere and ſweete to drinke) hath notwithſtanding (I can not tell by what meanes) a collour like wine: and not farre from thence there grow great plenty of Styrap trees. The which the ALIARTIANS do alleage, to proue that Radamanthus heretofore dwelt in that parte, & doe ſhew his ſepulchre there yet to this day, which they call Alea. And hard by that alſo, there is the monumẽt of Alcmena, which was buried (as they ſay) in that place, & was maried to Radamanthus, after the death of Amphitryon. But the THEBANS who were within the city with the ALIARTIANS, ſtirred not vntill they ſawe that Lyſander with the firſt of his troupe was neere vnto the towne walles: & then opening the gates on the ſodaine, they made a ſalie out vpon Lyſander, Lyſander ſlaine by the Thebans.

E & ſlue him with his foothſaier & a few other, bicauſe the moſt part of the voward fled, into the ſtrẽgth of the battel. Howbeit the THEBANS gaue thẽ not ouer ſo, but followed thẽ ſo valiantly, that they brake their order, & made thẽ all flie through the moũtaines, after they had ſlaine three thouſand of thẽ in the field: ſo were there three hundred THEBANS alſo ſlaine there, who followed their enemies ſo fiercely, till they recouered ſtraight narrow waies, of great ſtrength for them. Theſe three hũdred were in maner all thoſe that were ſuſpected in THEBES to fauor the LACEDÆMONIANS ſecretly: wherfore, for thẽ deſire they had to take away this opiniõ frõ their citizens, they hazarded thẽſelues to no purpoſe, & were caſt away in this chaſe. King Pauſanias heard newes of this ouerthrow, going frõ PLATEES vnto THESPIES, & went on further, marching ſtill in battel ray towards ALIARTE, where Thraſybulus alſo arriued at the ſelfe ſame time, bringing the aide of the ATHENIANS frõ THEBES. And when Pauſanias was purpoſed to

F ſend to aske licẽce of the enemies to take away the bodies of their men which they had ſlaine, to thintent to bury them: the olde SPARTANS that were in his army, miſliking it much, at the firſt were angry in them ſelues. But afterwardes they went vnto the king him ſelfe, to tell him that he dishonored SPARTA, to offer to take vp Lysanders bodie by his enemies leaue & fauor, A To aske leaue of the enemie to burye the deade is dishonorable. and that he should valliantly recouer him by force of armes, and honorably burie him, after that he had ouercome their enemies: or else if it were their fortune to be ouerthrowē, that yet it should be more honorable for them, to lye dead in the field by their Captaine, then to aske leaue to take vp his body. But notwithstanding all these wordes of the old men, king Pausanias seeing that it was a hard matter to ouercome the THEBANS in battell, now that they had gotten the victory, and furthermore, that the body of Lysander lay hard by the walls of ALIARTE, and that he could not come to take it away without great daunger, although they should win the battell: he sent a herauld to the enemies. And hauing made truce for certaine dayes, he led his army away, and tooke vp Lysanders body with him, and buried him after they were out of Lysanders tombe. the confynes of BOEOTIA, within the territory of the PANOPEIANS: where vntill this day his B tombe remaineth apon the high way, goinge from DELPHES vnto the city of CHÆRONEA. Thus Pausanias campe being lodged there, it is sayd there was a PHOCIAN, who reporting the battell vnto one that was not there, sayd that the enemies came to geue a charge vpon them, as Lysander had passed the Oplites. Thother wondring at that, there was a SPARTAN a very frend of Lysanders by, hauing heard all their talke, asked him what that was which he called Oplites: for that he had not heard that word named before. What? aunswered the PHOCIAN to him againe. Euen there it was where the enemies did ouerthrow the first of our men which were slaine in the fieldes: for the riuer that runneth by the walles of the city, is called Oplites fl. Destinie inevitable. Oplites. The SPARTAN hearing that, burst out of weping for sorrow, saying: then I see it is vnpossible for a man to auoyde his destinie. For Lysander aforetime had an oracle that tolde him C thus.

Lysander, take good heede, come not I thee aduise: Neere Oplites that riuers banckes, in any kinde of vvise.
Nor neere the Dragon he, vvhich is the earth her sonne, VVho at the length vvill thee assault, and on thy backe vvill ronne.

Howebeit some take it, that this riuer of Oplites is not that which passeth by the walles of ALIARTE, but it is the riuer that runneth neere vnto the city of CORONEA, and falleth into Phliarus fl. Hoplia, Isomantus. the riuer of Phliarus, hard by the city: and they say that in olde time it was called Hoplia, but now they call it Isomantus. He that slue Lysander, was an ALIARTIAN called Neochorus, who caried a Dragon painted apon his target: and this was that which the oracle of likelyhoode D Neochorus slue Lysander. did signifie. They say also, that in the time of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, the THEBANS had an oracle from the tēple of Apollo Ismenias: which oracle did prophecy the battell which they wanne by the castell of DELIVM, and the battell of ALIARTE also, which was thirty yeares after that. The effect of that oracle was this.

VVhen thou thy nets shalt spread, the vvolues for to intrappe: Beevvare thou come not neere vnto, a litle hill by happe,
Of Orchalide. Nor neere, to any his confynes:
For there, the crafty foxes keepe, their dennes and priuy mines.

He calleth the territory that is about DELIVM, the vttermost confynes, bicause BOEOTIA Orchalide mons. doth confine there with the contry of ATTICA: and the hill Orchalide which is now called A- E Helicon mons. lopecon (to say the foxe denne) which lieth on that side of the citie of ALIARTE, that looketh towardes mounte Helicon. Lysander being slaine, the SPARTANS tooke his death so ill, that Pausanias exile. they would haue condemned king Pausanias of treason by law: who durst not abide the tryall, but fled vnto the citie of TEGEA, where he ended the rest of his life within the sanctuarie of the temple of Minerua. When Lysander was dead, his pouertie appeared to the world which Lysanders cleane handes and pouertie commended after his deathe. made his vertue farre more famous, than when he liued. For then they sawe, that for all the gold & siluer which had passed through his hands, for all his great authority & countenaunce that he had caried, and for all that so many cities & townes did come to honor him, & briefly, for al that he had so great & puissant a kingdom in maner in his hands: yet he did neuer enrich nor increase his house with so much, as one farthing. So writeth Theopompus, whom we should F rather beleue when he praiseth, then when he discommendeth: for commonly he taketh more delite to dispraise, then to praise any. It fortuned not longe after, as Ephorus writeth, that the

A LACEDEMONIANS and their confederats fel at variance together, whereupon Lyſanders letters were to be ſeene that were in his houſe. Kinge Ageſilaus goinge thither to peruſe them, amongeſt other writinges, founde the oration penned by Cleon Halicarnaſſeus which Lyſander had prepared to perſwade the SPARTANS to chaunge their gouernment, and to declare vnto them that they ſhoulde reuoke the prerogatiue which the Eurytiontides and the Agiades had: that the kinges of SPARTA could not be choſen but out of thoſe two families, and to leue the prerogatiue at liberty, that the chiefeſt magiſtrats might be laufully choſen kings of SPARTA. Ageſilaus ſtood indifferēt to haue ſhewed this oratiō openly to the people, that the SPARTANS might ſee what manner a citizen Lyſander had bene in his harte. But Lacratidas, a graue wiſe man, & preſident at that time of the counſel of the Ephori, would not ſuffer him: ſaying, that he B ſhoulde not digge Lyſander out of his graue againe, but rather bury his oration with him, that was ſo paſſingly well, and eloquently penned to perſwade. Yet notwithſtandinge, they did him great honor after his death: and amongeſt others, condemned two citizens in a great ſumme of money, that were made ſure to two of his daughters while he liued, and refuſed to matye them when he was dead, ſeeing their father dyed ſo poore: bicauſe they ſought to matche in his houſe, ſuppoſing he had bene riche, and forſooke them afterwardes for their fathers pouerty, when they ſaw he dyed a good and iuſt man. Thus we ſee, that at SPARTA there was a puniſhment for them that did not mary, or that matyed too late, or that maried ill: and vnto this punithment were they moſt ſubiect, that ſought great matches for couetouſnes of goods. This is all we haue to wryte of Lyſanders life and actes.

THE LIFE OF Sylla.

Vetus Cornelius Sylla was of the race of the Patricians, who be the noble men & gentlemen of ROME: & there was one of his auncesters called Rufinus, that obtained the dignity of Conſul. He notwithſtanding his Conſulſhippe, wanne more diſhonor by defame, then he obtained honor by dignity of Conſull. For they finding in his houſe aboue ten pownds worth of plate, contrary to the lawe at that time expreſſely forbidding it: he was expulſed the Senate, and loſt his place there, after which diſhonor once receiued, his iſſue neuer roſe, nor yet recouered it. And Sylla him ſelfe had very litle left him by his father: ſo

that in his youth he was faine to hyer an other mans houſe, & ſat at a ſmall rent, as afterwards he was twitted in the teeth withall, when they ſaw him richer then they thought he had deſerued. For when he gloried & boaſted of the victory at his returne from the warres of AFRICK, there was a noble man that ſayd vnto him: why, how is it poſſible thou ſhouldeſt be an honeſt man, that hauing nothing left thee by thy father, thou arte now come to haue ſo much? Now, though ROME had left her auncient iuſtice and purenes of life, wherewith ſhe brought vp her people in former times, and that their hartes were poyſoned with couetous deſire of vaine ſuperfluous delites: yet notwithſtanding, it was as fowle a reproche to them that did not maintaine them ſelues in the pouerty of their fathers, as vnto them that did conſume their patrimony, and bring all to naught which their parentes had left them. But afterwardes alſo when he caried the whole ſway in ROME, and that he had put ſo many men to death: a free man being borne of the ſlaues infranchiſed, & being ready to be throwen downe the rocke Tarpeian, bicauſe he had ſaued and hidden one of the outlawes and men proclaimed to be put to death, whereſoeuer they were found: caſt it in Syllaes teeth, how that they had liued and dwelt together a long time in one ſelfe houſe, he hauing payed thowſande Nummos for the rent of the vppermoſt roomes of the ſame houſe, & Sylla three thowſand for all the neathermoſt roomes beneath. So that betwene both their wealthes, there was but onely two thowſande and fiftie Drachmas of ATHENS difference. And this is that we finde in wryting of his firſt wealth. As for his ſtature and perſone, that appeareth ſufficiently by the ſtatues and images that were made for him, which yet remaine. But for his eyes, they were like fire, and wonderfull redde: and the colour of his face withall, made them the more fearefull to beholde. For he was copper noſed, and that was full of white ſtreakes here and there: whereuppon they ſay that the ſurname of a Sylla was geuen him, by reaſon of his colour. And there was a ieaſter at ATHENS that finely mocked him in his verſe:

It is not amiſſe to ſearch out the naturalll diſpoſition of this man by ſuch outward markes and tokens. It is ſayd alſo that he was ſo naturally geuen to mocke & ieaſt, that being a young man vnknowen, he would neuer be out of the company of players, fooles, and tomblers, but ſtill eating and tippling with them in diſſolute manner. And afterwardes alſo when he was in his chiefeſt authoritie, he would commonly eate and drinke with the moſt impudent ieaſters and ſcoffers, and all ſuch rakehelles, as made profeſſion of counterfeate mirth, & would ſtriue with the baddeſt of them to geue the fineſt mockes: wherin he did not only a thing vncomely for his yeres, & diſhonored the maieſty of his office & dignity, but therby alſo grew careleſſe & negligent in matters of great importance, wherunto he ſhould haue taken good regard. For after he was once ſette at his table, he was not to be moued any more in matters of weight. Now, though from the table he was commonly found both very actiue, painefull, and ſeuere: yet falling into ſuch cõpany by drinking, bowſing, & making good chere, he ſodainly became an other maner of man. So that without all compaſſe of modeſty and iudgement, he was too familiar and conuerſaunt with players, ieaſters, tumblers, and daunſers: who when they had him in that vaine, might doe what they would with him. Of this ryoting came (in mine opinion) his vice of letchery, whereunto he was greatly geuen, and eaſily drawen after loue and pleaſure: in ſuch ſorte, as his gray heares could not reſtraine his voluptuous life. His vnlawfull luſting loue beganne in his young yeares, with one Metrobius a common player, which ſtretched on increaſing his amorous deſire vntill his latter age. For at the firſt he loued Nicopolis a rich curtiſan: and frequenting her company by oft acceſſe, and beſides that he ſpent the prime of his beawty and youth in feaſting her with great delight and paſſing pleaſure, ſhe afterwardes became in loue with him, ſo that when ſhe dyed, ſhe made Sylla her heire of all ſhe had. He was heire alſo vnto his mother in lawe, who loued him as her owne begotten ſonne: and by theſe two good happes he was ſtept vp to pretie wealth. Afterwardes beinge choſen Quæſtor (to ſay treaſorer) the firſt time that Marius was Conſull, he embarked with him in his iorney into AFRICKE, to warre with kinge Iugurthe. When he was arriued at the campe, he ſhewed him ſelfe a man of great ſeruice in all other thinges, but in this eſpecially, that he could wiſely vſe the benefit of any occaſion offered him, and thereby wanne Bocchus kinge of the

A the NVMIDIANS to be his fast and faithfull frende: whose Ambassadors, that scaped from a company of NVMIDIAN theeues he curteously entertained, and hauing geuen them goodly presentes, sent them backe againe with a safe conuoy. Now concerninge kinge Bocchus, he had of long time both hated and feared king Iugurthe his sonne in law: insomuch, that after he was ouercome in battell, and came to him for succor, Bocchus practised treason against him, and for this cause sent secretly for Sylla, desiring rather that Iugurthe should be taken by Sylla, then by him selfe. Sylla brake this matter vnto Marius, of whom hauing receiued a small number of souldiers to accompany him, (without respect of perill or daunger) went and committed him selfe to the faith and fidelity of one barbarous king, to take an other: considering also that the king whom he trusted was so vniust of his word, euen vnto his neerest frends and con-

Now Bocchus hauing Iugurthe and Sylla both in his power, and brought him selfe to that pinch that of necessity he must betray the one or the other: after he had taken good breath to resolue which of the two he should deale withall, in thend went on with his first plat & deuise of treason, and so deliuered Iugurthe into Syllaes handes. In deede Marius triumphed for taking of king Iugurthe: but his euill willers, for the spight and grudge they bare him, did attribute the glory and honor of Iugurthes taking wholy vnto Sylla. That secretly went to Marius harte, and specially for that Sylla being high minded by nature (comming then but newly from a base, obscure, and vnknowen life to be knowen & well accepted of the people in ROME, and to tast also what honor ment) became so ambitious and couetous of glory, that he caused the story to be grauen in a ring, which he did euer after vse to weare & seale withall. Iugurthe deliuered vnto Sylla by kinge Bocchus.

C Bocchus was deliuering of Iugurthe vnto Sylla, and Sylla also receiuing Iugurthe prisoner. These thinges misliked Marius much: but notwithstanding, iudging that Sylla was not so much enuied as him selfe, he tooke him with him vnto the warres. Marius in his seconde Consulshippe made Sylla one of his Lieutenauntes: and in his third Consulshippe, he had charge vnder him of a thowsand footemen, and did many notable and profitable exployctes for him. When Sylla was his Lieutenaunt, he tooke one Copillus, a generall of the GAVLES Tectosages. And when he was Colonell of a thowsande footemen, he brought the MARSIANS (a maruelous great contry of people in ITALIE) and perswaded them to remaine good frendes, and confederates of the ROMAINES. For this his good seruice, he founde that Marius grewe in great misliking with him, bicause from thence forth he neuer gaue him any honorable charge, or occasion to D shewe good seruice: but to the contrary, did what he could to hinder his rising. Wherefore, Sylla afterwardes tooke Catulus Luctatius parte, who was companion with Marius in his Consulshippe. This Catulus was a very honest man, but somwhat slacke and colde in marshall matters, which was the cause that in deede he did committe vnto Sylla all the speciall seruice, and matters of weight in his charge: whereuppon he gaue him occasion not onely to increase his estimacion, but also his credit and power. For, by force of armes, he conquered the most parte of the barbarous people which inhabited the mountaines of the Alpes: and Catulus campe lacking vittells, hauing commission, he made a maruelous great quantity of prouision to be brought thither, insomuch as Catulus campe being plentifully vittelled, they sent their store & surplusage vnto Marius souldiers, the which Sylla him selfe wryteth, did much mislike Marius.

Sillaes doings vnder Catulus.

E And this is the first cause of their enmity. The which being grounded vpon so light occasion, was followed with ciuill warres, great effusion of blood, and with incurable factions and dissentions: that it ended at the length with a cruell tyranny, and confusion of all the ROMAINE state and Empire. This doth proue that Euripides the Poet was a wise man, and one that foresaw the ruines of common weales, when he counselled, and also commaunded gouernors to flie ambition, as a most pestilent and mortall furie vnto them that are once infected withall.

The first cause of enmity betwext Sylla and Marius.

Ambition is to be fled, as a mortall furie.

Now Sylla thinking that the reputation he had gotten already in the warres would haue made his way open to preferre him to some honorable office in the city of ROME: he was no sooner returned from the warres, but he would needes proue the peoples good willes vnto him, and procured his name to be billed among them that sued for the Prætorshippe of the city (that is to say, the office of the ordinary iudge that ministreth iustice vnto the citizens) but he was re-

F iected by the voyce of the people. For the which he layed the fault vppon the meaner sorte, saying, that the communalty knew well enough the frendshippe he had with king Bocchus, and that therefore they hopinge that if he were made Ædilis before he came to be Prætor, he would make them see noble huntinges and great fightinges of wilde beastes of Libya. And that therefore they did choose other Prætors, and put him by his sute, in hope to compel him by this meanes to be first of all Ædilis. Howbeit it seemeth that he doth not confesse the truth of his refusall, for his owne act doth condemne him selfe: bicause the next yere following he was chosen Prætor, partely for that he wan the people with curtesie, and partely with money. So he fallinge out with Cæsar apon that occasion, in his anger threatned him that he would vse the power and authority of his office apon him. But Cæsar smiling, answered him: thou hast reason to call it thine office, for in deede it is thine, bicause thou hast bought it. But after the time of his Prætorshippe was expired, he was sent with an army into Cappadocia, colouring his voyage thither with commission to restore Ariobarzanes into his kingdom again: howbeit thonly cause of his iorney was in deede to suppresse kinge Mithridates a litle, who tooke too many thinges in hande, and increased his power and dominion with a new signiory of no lesse greatnes, then that which he had before. In troth he brought no great army out of Italie with him, but he was faithfully holpen by the confederates of the Romaines in euery place, through whose aide he ouerthrewe a great number of the Cappadocians, and afterwardes also a greater number of the Armenians, which came in like case to aide them: so that he expulsed Gordius king of Phrygia out of Cappadocia, and restored Ariobarzanes to his realme againe. After which victory, Sylla remained by the riuer of Euphrates, and thither came vnto him one Orobazus a Parthian, Ambassador of Arsaces, king of the Parthians. Now these two nations, the Romaines, and the Parthians, were neuer frendes before: and that with other thinges shewed the great good fortune Sylla had, that the Parthians came first to him by his meanes to seeke frendshippe with the Romaines. They say, that receiuing this Ambassador Orobazus, he made three chayres to be brought out, the one for king Ariobarzanes, the other for Orobazus the Ambassador, and the third for him selfe, which he placed in the middest betwene them both, and sitting downe in the same, gaue audience vnto the Ambassador: for which cause the king of Parthia afterwardes put Orobazus to death. Some doe commend Sylla for this acte, for that he kept his state in such maiesty among the barbarous people. Other do reproue his ambition in it, shewing him selfe stately out of time, and to no purpose. We doe read that a soothsayer of Chaldea being in Orobazus traine, hauing diligently viewed and considered the phisiognomy of Sylla, and all his other mouinges and gestures of minde and body, to iudge not by the clymate of the contry, but according to the rules of his arte what his nature should be: all well considered of, he sayed that Sylla one day must needes come to be a great man, and that he marueled how he could suffer it that he was not euen then the chiefest man of the worlde. When Sylla was returned againe to Rome, one Censorinus accused him of extorcion, that he had caried away a great summe of money with him, contrary to the lawe, out of one of their confederates contry: howbeit he prosecuted not his accusation, but gaue it ouer. In the meane time, the enmity begonne betwixt him and Marius, kindled againe vppon a new occasion of king Bocchus ambition: who partely to creepe further into the peoples fauor of Rome, and partely also for to gratifie Sylla, gaue and dedicated certaine images of victory carying tokens of triumphe, vnto the temple of Iupiter Capitolin, and next vnto them also the image of Iugurthe, which he deliuered into the handes of Sylla, being all of pure golde. This did so offende Marius, that he attempted to take them away by force: but others did defend the cause of Sylla. So that for the quarrell of these two, the city of Rome taking armes, had like to haue brought all to ruine: had not the warres of the confederats of Italie bene, which of long time did kindle and smoke, but at the length brake out into open flame and sedition for that time. In this maruelous great warre which fell out very daungerous, by sundry misfortunes and great losses to the Romaines, Marius did no notable exployte: whereby it appeareth, that the vertue of warlike discipline hath neede of a strong, lusty, and able body. For Sylla to the contrary, hauing done notable seruice, and obtained many profitable victories, wanne the fame and estimacion among the Romaines, of a noble souldier, and worthy Captaine: and among thenemies them selues, of a most fortunate man. Notwithstanding, Sylla did not as Timotheus Athenian, the sonne of Conon had done:

Who,

A Who, when his aduerſaries and ill willers did attribute his noble deedes vnto the fauor of fortune, and did painte fortune in tables, that brought him all the cities taken and ſpared in warre whileſt he ſlept: he tooke it in very ill parte, and was maruelous angrie with them that did it, ſaying, that they robbed him of the glory that iuſtly belonged vnto him. Wherefore one day when this Timotheus was returned from the warres with great victories, after he had openly acquainted the ATHENIANS with the whole diſcourſe of his doings in his voyage, he ſayd vnto them: my Lordes of ATHENS, fortune hath had no parte in all this which I haue told vnto you. Hereupon the goddes it ſhould ſeeme were ſo angry with this fooliſh ambition of Timotheus, that he neuer afterwardes did any worthy thing, but all went vtterly againſt the heare with him: vntill at the length he came to be ſo hated of the people, that in the end they bani-

B ſhed him from ATHENS. But Sylla to the contrary, did not only paciently abide their wordes that ſayed, he was a happy man, and ſingularly beloued of fortune: but alſo increaſinge this opinion, and glorying as at a ſpeciall grace of the goddes, did attribute the honor of his doings vnto fortune, either for a vaine glory, or for that he had in fanſy, that the goddes did proſper him in all his doinges. For he wrote him ſelfe in his commentaries, that the enterpriſes which he hazarded moſt hottely, according to the ſodaine occaſion offered, did better proſper with him, then thoſe which by good aduiſe he had determined of. Furthermore, when he ſayd that he was better borne vnto fortune, then to the warres: it ſeemeth that he confeſſed all his proſperity came rather by fortune, then by his worthineſſe. And to conclude, it appeareth that he did wholly ſubmit him ſelfe vnto fortune, acknowledging that he did altogether

C depend vpon her: conſidering that he did attribute it to the ſpeciall grace and fauor of the goddes, that he neuer diſagreed with Metellus his father in law, who was a man of like dignitie and authoritie as him ſelfe was. For where it was thought he woulde haue bene a greate hinderer of his doings, he found him verie curteous and gentle in his behalfe, in all that they had to deale in together, by reaſon of the ſocietie of their office. And furthermore, in his commentaries which he dedicated vnto Lucullus, he counſelled him to thincke nothing more certaine and aſſured, then that which the goddes ſhould reueale vnto him, and commaunde him in his nightes dreame. He wryteth alſo that when he was ſent with an army vnto the warres of the confederates, the earth ſodainly opened about LAVERNA, out of the which immediatly came a maruelous bright flame of fire that aſcended vp to the element. The wiſe men be-

D ing asked their opinions about the ſame, made aunſwere: that a very honeſt, and alſo a maruelous fayer man of complexion taking ſoueraine authoritie in his handes, ſhould pacifie all tumultes and ſedition which were at that time in ROME. Whereupon Sylla ſayed it was him ſelfe whome the goddes ment, bicauſe that amongeſt other things he had that ſingular gift of beawty, that his heare was yellow as golde: and he was not aſhamed to name him ſelfe an honeſt man, after he had wonne ſo many notable great victories. Thus haue we ſufficiently ſpoken of the truſt he had in the fauor of the goddes. And furthermore, he ſeemed to be very contrary in his manners, and vnlike to him ſelfe. For if he tooke away much in one place, he gaue as much more alſo in an other. Some he preferred without cauſe: and others he put downe without reaſon. He would be very gentle to them, of whome he would haue ought

E and vnto thoſe that ſought of him, he would ſtand much apon his honor, and looke for great reuerence. Wherby men could hardly decerne his nature, whether pride or flattery did more abound in him. And as for the inequality he vſed in puniſhing of them that had offended him: ſometimes he hanged vp men for very ſmall and light cauſes: Some other times againe to the contrary, he paciently aboade the moſt grieuous offences in the worlde: and lightly pardoned and forgaue ſuch faultes as were in no wiſe to be forgiuen. And afterwards againe would puniſh right ſmall crimes, with murders, effuſion of blood, and confiſcation of goodes. This iudgement may be geuen of him: that by nature he had a malicious and a reuenging minde: yet notwithſtanding he qualified that naturall bitternes with reaſon, geuing place to neceſſity, and his benefit. For in this warre of the confederates, his ſouldiers ſlue Albinus one of his

F Lieutenauntes, beating him to death with ſtaues and ſtones, being a man of good quality, and one that had bene Prætor. This great offence he paſſed ouer with ſilence, vſing no manner of puniſhment, and turned it to a boaſt in the end, ſaying, that his men were the more obedient and diligent in any peece of ſeruice that was to be done, and that he made them amende their faultes by worthy ſeruice. And furthermore, he did not regarde them that did reprone him: but hauinge determined with him ſelfe to deſtroy Marius, and to procure that he might be choſen generall in the warres againſt king Mithridates, bicauſe that this warre of the confederats was now ended: for this cauſe he flattered & curried fauor with his ſouldiers that ſerued vnder him. At his returne to Rome from theſe warres of the confederates, he was choſen Conſull with Q. Pompeius, being then fifty yeare olde, and maried with Cæcilia a noble Ladie, and Metellus daughter, who was then chiefe biſhoppe of Rome, for which mariage the common people ſang ſonges and ballades vp and downe Rome againſt him: and many of the noble men enuied him for it, thinkinge him vnworthy of ſo noble a Ladie, whom they thought worthy to be Conſul, as Titus Liuius ſayth. Now ſhe was not his only wife, for he had a young wife before called Ilia, by whom he had a daughter. After her he maried AElia, then a third called Cælia, whom he put away bicauſe ſhe brought him no children. But notwithſtanding ſhe went honorably away from him with very good wordes of her, beſides many other goodly riche giftes he gaue her: howbeit ſhortly after he maried Metella, which made the world ſuſpect that Cælia was put away for her naughtines. Howſoeuer it was, Sylla did euer honor and loue Metella: inſomuch as the people of Rome afterwardes making ſute, that they that were baniſhed for Marius faction might be called home againe: and being denied, and refuſed by Sylla, they cried out with open voyce for Metella, praying her to helpe them to obtaine their requeſt. And it ſeemeth alſo that when he had taken the city of Athens, he delt more cruelly with them, bicauſe that ſome of them had ſcoffed at Metella from the walles: howbeit that was afterwardes. So Sylla making his reckening at that time that the Conſulſhippe was a ſmall matter, in compariſon of that which he looked for in time to come: was maruelous deſirous to go againſt Mithridates. But therein Marius alſo, of a mad furious ambition and couetouſnes of glory ſtoode againſt him, and ſued to goe that iorney in like manner, being ſubiect to thoſe paſſions, which neuer waxe olde, as we may dayly ſee by experience. For being now a heauy man, ſickly of body, and broken in ſeruice abroade in the warres, from the which he came but newly home, and bruſed moreouer with age: did notwithſtanding yet aſpire to haue the charge of the warres ſo farre of beyond the ſeas. Wherfore, to obtaine his purpoſe, whileſt Sylla was gone a litle vnto the campe to geue order for certaine thinges that were to be done, he remaining in the city, did practiſe this peſtilent mortall ſedition, which alone did more hurte vnto the city of Rome, then all the enemies that Rome euer had: the which the goddes themſelues had foreſhewed by many ſignes and tokens. For fire tooke of it ſelfe in the ſtaues of the enſignes, which they had much a doe to quenche. Three rauens brought their young ones into the high way, and did eate them vp in the ſight of many people, and afterwardes caried the garbage they left of them into their neaſtes. Rats alſo hauing gnawen ſome iuells of golde in a church, the ſextens ſetting a trappe for them, a rat was taken full of young, and kendled fiue young rats in the trappe, of the which ſhe ate vp three. But more yet, on a fayer bright day whē there was no clowde ſeene in the element at all, men heard ſuch a ſharp ſound of a trompet, that they were almoſt all out of their wittes, for feare of ſo great a noyſe. Whereuppon the wiſe men and ſoothſayers of Thvscan being asked their opinions, tolde them: that this ſo ſtraunge and wonderfull ſigne did pronounce the chaunge of the worlde, and the departure out of this into an other life. For they holde opinion, that there ſhould be eight worldes, all contrary one vnto an other, in manners and facions of life: vnto euery one of the which ſayd they, God hath determined a certaine time of continuance. Howbeit they all came to ende their courſe within the ſpace of the reuolution of the great yeare: and that when the one is ended, and the other ready to begin, there are ſeene ſuch wonderfull ſtraunge ſignes on the earth, or in the element. And ſuch as haue ſtudied that ſcience, doe certainely know, as ſoone as men be borne, which are meere contrary vnto the firſt in their liues & maners, and which are either more or leſſe acceptable vnto the goddes, then thoſe which liued in former age. For they ſay, that amongeſt great chaunges and alteracions which are done in thoſe places from one age vnto an other, the ſcience of diuination, and foretelling of thinges to come doth grow in reputacion, and meeteth in their predictions, when it pleaſeth God to ſend

Wonderfull ſignes ſeene before the ciuill warres.

The Thuſcās opinion of eight worldes.

A sudden sott ermine and manifest signes, to know be and foretell things to come. And in some manner also in another age it grew to the same, and lost her reputation, for that it was very rathe, and faileth to concate with the most parte of her predictions, because she hath but obscure meanes, and all her instrumens defaced, to knowe what should come. And these be the fables which the wisest soothsayers of Italy so much reported abroade, & they specially, who seemed to base some inguisitive speculation aboue others. But as the Senate were talking with the soothsayers of these wonders, being assembled together within the temple of the goddesse Vesta, a sparrow came flying into the churche in sight of them all, and caried a grasshopper in her bill, and parted it in the middest, and left one parte within the temple, and caried the other away with her. Whereupon the wise men and interpreters of such wonders, saied, that they doubted a commotion and rising of the country men against the commons of the citie, because the common people of the citie doe crye out continually like grasshoppers, and the husbandmen doe kepe them selues vpon their landes in the country. Thus Marius grew great and very familiar, with Sulpitius, one of the Tribunes of the people, who in all kindes of wickednes and mischiefe that a man can reckon, would geue place to no liuing creature: so that a man bede not to seeke or demaund any where for a worse then he, but the question is rather wherein he him selfe was not the worste of all others. For he was full replet with all kindes of cruelty, auarice, and rashnesse, and that soe extreamely, as he cared not what villany and wickednes bd openly committed, so that the same might turne to his profit. For he had set vp a table in the open market place, where he solde freedome, making slaues and straungers denizens of Rome for their money: and for that purpose he entertained a garde of three thowsand about him, besides a band of young gentlemen of the order of knightes that attended alwayes vpon his person ready at commaundement, whome he called the garde against the Senate. And further more, him selfe hauing passed a law by the voyce of the people, that no Senator should borrow, nor owe, about two thowsande Drachmas: it was founde that at the hower of his death, he dyed three millions of Drachmas in debt. This man nowe like a furious raging beast, being left by Marius amongest the people, turned all thinges topsie turuey, by force of armes and maine strength. He made also many wicked lawes to passe by voyce of the people, and amongest others, that one specially, whereby he gaue Marius commission to make warres against king Mithridates. For which extreame oppressions and dealinges of Sulpitius, the two Consuls (Sylla and Quintus Pompeius) left of to heare publike causes, and ceased the common course of law and iustice. And as they were one day occupied about the adiornement of the same in an open assembly in the market place, before the temple of Castor and Pollux: Sulpitius the Tribune came vpon them with his souldiers, and slue many people, and among others, the Consull Pompeius by the sonne, and the father him selfe being Consull, had much a doe to saue his life by flying. And Sylla the other Consull, was also pursued euen into Marius house, where he was compelled to promise before his departure, presently to goe and reuoke the adiornement of the law which he had before commaunded. Thus Sulpitius hauing deprined Pompeius of his Consulshippe, did not depose Sylla, but only tooke from him the charge he had geuen him to make warres against Mithridates, and transferred that vnto Marius. And sending counsells to the city of Nola to reduce the army that lay there, and to bring the same vnto Marius: Sylla preuented their, and fled to the campe before them, and told the souldiers all what had past, as it was in deede. Who when they heard it, fell all to commun, and slue Marius counsells with stones. Marius on the other side put all Sullaes friends to death he could, and tooke the spoyle of their goodes and houses. So was there nothing else but flying from the campe to Rome, and from Rome to the campe againe. The Senate were in manner beside them selues, not being able to gouerne as they would, but inforced to obey Marius and Sulpitius commaundementes. Who being aduertised that Sylla was comming towardes Rome, sent straight two Praetors vnto him, Brutus and Seruilius, to commaund him as from the Senate, to approche no nearer. These two Praetors spake a little to boldly vnto Sylla: whereupon the souldiers fell to a mutiny in such sorte, that they stoode indifferent whether to kill them presently in the field or no. Howbeit they brake their axes and bundells of roddes which were caried before them, and spoke their purples robes wherewith the Praetors were appatelled as magistrates, from them, and sent them home thus shamefully handled and intreated. Vpon their returne now [illegible] their sadde silence only, and them selues so stripped besides, of all their markes and [illegible] Prætoriall dignities, made all men then to iudge that they brought no other newes, but [illegible] as were the worst that possibly could be: and that there was no way then left to pacifie this [illegible] dition, which was now altogether vncurable. Wherefore Marius and his followers beginne to make them selues strong by force: and Sylla, with his companion Q. Pompeius, departed [illegible] meane time from the city of Nola, and brought six entier legions on with him, who desired no other thing but to make haste to march to Romeward. How beit Sylla stoode in doubt with him selfe what to do, thinking of the great daunger that might follow. Vntill such time as his soothsayer Posthumius hauing considered the signes & tokens of the sacrifices, which Sylla had made vpon this determination, gaue him both his handes, and bad him binde them hard, and shut him vp fast, vntill the day of battell should be past: saying, that he was cõtented to suffer death, if he had not good successe, and that out of hande, to his great honor. And it is saied also, that the same night there appeared vnto Sylla in a dreame, the goddesse Bellona, whome the Romaines do greatly honor, following therein the Cappadocians: and I knowe not whether it be the moone, Minerua, or Enyo the goddesse of battells. So he thought, that she comming to him did put lightning into his hande, commaunding him that he should lighten vpon his enemies, naming them one after an other by their proper names: and that they being striken with his lightning, fell downe dead before him, and no man knew what became of them. This vision encoraged Sylla very much, and hauing reported the same to Pompeius his fellow Consull & companion, the next morning he marched with his army to Rome. When he was at Picines, there came other Ambassadors vnto him, to pray him in the name of the Senate that he would not come to Rome in this heate and fury, declaring therwithall that the Senate would graunt him all thinges that should be meete and reasonable. When Sylla had heard the message, he aunswered them, that he would campe there: and so commaunded the marshalls to deuide the squadrons according to their maner. The Ambassadors beleeuing that he would so haue done in deede, returned againe to Rome: howebeit their backes were no sooner turned, but Sylla straight sent Lucius Basillus, and Caius Mutumius before to seaze on the gates of Rome, and the walles which were on the side of mount Esquilin, and he him selfe also in persone with all possible speede marched after them. Basillus entred Rome, and won the gate by force. But the common people vnarmed, got them vp straight to the top of their houses, and with tyles and stones stayed, and kept him, not onely from entring any further but also draue him backe againe, euen to the very walles of the city. In this hurly burly came Sylla him selfe to Rome, who seeing apparantly in what state thinges stoode, cried out to his men, and bad them set fyre on the houses: and him selfe taking a torche light in his hand, shewed them the way what they should doe, appointing his archers and darters to whurle & bestow their dartes, and other fiery instruments, to the toppes of the houses. Herein he was too much ouercome with vnreasonable choller, passion, and desire of reuenge. For, seeking only to plague his enemies, he tooke no regard to frends, to parentes, or confederates, neither had he yet any maner of remorse, or pity: such and so fiery was his anger then, that he put no kind of difference betwene those that had offended, and them that had done him no hurt at all. By this meanes was Marius driuen into the city, vnto the temple of the Earth, where he made open proclamation by sounde of trompet, that he would make free all the slaues that would come to his parte. But forthwith came his enemies, set vpon him, and preste him so neere, that he was constrained vtterly to flie and forsake the city. Then Sylla assembling the Senate, caused Marius, and certaine others, together with Sulpitius Tribune of the people, to be condemned to death. Sulpitius was betrayed by a slaue of his owne, whom Sylla made free according to his promise past by publike edict: but when he had made him free, he caused him to be throwen downe headlong from the rocke Tarpeian. And not contented with this, he proclaimed by promise a great summe of money to him that would kill Marius. A very ingrate and vnthankefull parte, considering that Marius not many dayes before hauinge Sylla in his owne house, in his handes and custody, deliuered him from perill, and set him in safety. Which if at that time he had not done, but had suffered Sulpitius to haue slaine him, him selfe had been

A soueraine Lord of the whole without all contradiction, and might haue ruled all things at his owne will and pleasure. But Sylla shortly after vpon the like aduantage, vsed no such manner of requitall or gratuitie towardes him, which bred a secret mislikinge amongest the Senate: howbeit the common people made open shewe of the euill will they bare vnto Sylla, by reiecting one Nonius his neuiew, and one Seruius, who vppon confidence of his fauor, presented themselues to sue for certaine offices. And besides the shame of this refusall, to spyte him the more, they chose others in their steedes, whose honor and preferrement they right well knew that Sylla would not onely mislike, but be much offended withall. Howbeit he wisely dissembling the matter, seemed to be very glad, saying, that by his meanes the people of Rome enioyed a full & perfit liberty, that in such cases of election, they might freely do what the selues
B listed. And to mitigate somwhat the peoples euill will towards him he determined to choose Lucius Cinna Consull, who was of a contrary faction to him: hauing first bounde him by solemne othe and curse to fauor his doings & whole procedings. Wherupon Cinna went vp to the Capitoll, and there holding a stone in his hand, did solemnly sweare and promise, that he would be Syllaes faithfull frende: beseeching the goddes if he did the contrary, that he might be throwen out of Rome, euen as he threw that stone out of his hand: and with those words, threw it to the ground before many people. But notwithstanding all these curses, Cinna was no sooner entred into his Consulshippe, but presently he beganne to chaunge and alter all. For amongest other thinges, he would needes haue Sylla accused: and procured Verginius, one of the Tribunes of the people, to be his accuser. But Sylla left him with his iudges, & went C to make warres against Mithridates. And it is said, that about the time that Sylla tooke shippe, and departed out of Italie: there fortuned many tokens and warninges of the goddes vnto kinge Mithridates, who was at that present in the city of Pergamvm. As amongest others, that the Pargamenians to honor Mithridates withall, hauing made an image of victory, carying a garland of triũphe in her hand, which was let downe from aloft with engines: so soone as she was ready to put the garland vpon his head, the image brake, and the crowne fell to the grounde in the middest of the Theater, and burst all to peeces. Whereby all the people that were present, were striken with a maruelous feare, and Mithridates him selfe beganne to mislike this euill lucke: although all things at that time fell out more fortunately, then he looked D for. For he had taken Asia from the Romaines, and Bithynia and Cappadocia, from the kinges which he had driuen out: and at that time remained in the city of Pergamvm, to deuide the riches and great territories among his frendes. As touching his sonnes: the eldest was in the realme of Pontvs, and of Bosphorvs, which he inherited from his predicessors, euen vnto the desertes beyonde the mariss̃es of Mæotides, without trouble or molestation of any man. The other also, Ariarathes, was with a great army, in conquering of Thracia and Macedon. His Captaines and Lieutenauntes moreouer, did many notable conquestes in diuers places, with a great power: amongest the which, Archelaus being Lord and master of all the sea, for the great number of shippes he had, conquered the Iles Cyclades, and all those beyond the hed of Malea, and specially amongest others the Ile of Eveoea. And beginning at the city of Athens, had made all the nations of Greece to rebell, euen vnto Thessalie, E sauing that he receiued some losse by the city of Chæronea. Where Brutius Sura, one of the Lieutenauntes of Sentius gouernor of Macedon (a man of great wisedome and valliantnes) came against him, and stayed him for goinge any further, ouerrunning the whole contry of Boetia, like a furious raging riuer. And setting vpon Archelaus by the city of Chæronea, ouerthrewe him in three seuerall battells: repulsed, and inforced him to take the seaes againe. But as Brutius was following him in chase, Lucius Lucullus sent him commaundement to geue place vnto Sylla, to follow those warres against Mithridates, according to the charge and commission in that behalfe geuen him. Whereupon Brutius Sura went out of the contry of Boetia, and returned towardes his generall Sentius: notwithstandinge his affaires prospered better then he could haue wished, and that all Greece were very willing to reuolt, for the repu-
F tacion of his wisedom and goodnes. Howbeit the thinges that we before haue spoken of, were the most notable matters that Brutius did in those partes. Sylla now vpon his arriuall, recouered immediatly all the other cities of Greece: who being aduertised of his comming, sent presently to pray him to come to their aide, the city of Athens onely excepted, which was compelled by the tyran Aristion, to take parte with Mithridates. Sylla thereuppon with all his power went thither, besieged the hauen of Piræa rounde, causing it to be battered and assaulted on euery side, with all sortes of engines and instrumentes of battery: whereas if he could haue had pacience but a litle lenger, he might haue had the high towne by famine, without putting him selfe in any manner of daunger, the same being brought to such extreame dearth and scarsity of all kinde of vittells. But the hast that he made to returne againe to Rome, for feare of the new chaunge which he heard of daily from thence, compelled him to hazard this warre in that sorte with great daunger, many battells, and infinite charge: consideringe also, that besides all other prouision and furniture, he had twenty thowsand mules and mulets laboring dayly to furnishe his engines of batterie. And when all other woode fayled him, bicause his engines were oftentimes marred after they were made, some breaking of them selues by reason of their waight, others consumed with fire throwen from the enemies: at the length he fell to the holy wood, and cut downe the trees of the Academia, being better stored and furnished, thē any other parke of pleasure in all the suburbes of the city, & feld downe also the wod of the parke Lycæum. And standing in neede of a great summe of money to entertaine this warres withall, he delt also with the holyest temples of all Greece, causing thē to bring him from the temples of Epidavrvm and Olympvs, all the richest and most pretious iuels they had. He wrote moreouer vnto the counsell of the Amphictyons holden in the city of Delphes, to bring him the ready money they had in the temple of Apollo, for that it should be kept in better safety with him, thē if it still remained there: promising besides, that if he should by occasion be compelled to vse it, he would restore as much againe vnto them: and for this purpose he sent Caphis Phocian, one of his very frends & familiars, and commaunded him to wey all that he tooke. So Caphis went vnto Delphes: but when he came thither, being afraied to touch the holy things, in presence of the counsell of the Amphictyons, he wept, that the teares ran downe by his cheekes, as a man compelled to doe such an act against his will. And when some that were present told Caphis that they heard the sound of Apolloes citherne in the temple: whether he beleued it was so in dede, or bicause he would put this superstitious feare into Syllaes head, he wrote to him of it. But Sylla mocking him, sent him word, that he marueled he could not consider, that singing and playing of the citherne, were tokens rather of ioye then of anger: and therefore that he should not faile to procede further, and bring him those things which he commaunded, for that (said he) Apollo did geue them him. Now for the other iuells of the temple of Apollo, the common people knew not that they were sent vnto Sylla but the siluer tonne, which only was that that remained of the offeringes of the kings, the Amphictyons were faine to breake that in peces, bicause it was so great & massie, that the beastes of draught could not draw it whole as it was. This act made them to remember the other auncient Romaine Captaines, as Flaminius, Manius Acilius, and Paulus Æmilius: of the which, the one hauing driuen king Antiochus out of Greece, and the rest also hauing ouerthrowen the kings of Macedon, they neuer once touched the gold and siluer of the temples of Greece but contrarily sent their offerings thither, and had them all in great honor and reuerence. But as to them, they were all Captaines lawfully chosen and sent to their charges: their souldiers wel trained, & obedient at commaundement, voide of rebellion, or any maner of mutiny. And for them selues, were kings in greatnes of corage and magnanimity of minde: but in expence of their persones, very spare and scant, without any lauish, but nedefull and necessary, proportioned by reason, and thinking more shame to flatter their souldiers, then feare their enemies. Now the Captaines contrarily in Syllaes time, sought not their preferrement in the common wealth by vertue, but by force, and hauing greater warres one with an other, then with straungers their enemies: were compelled to flatter their souldiers whom they should commaund, and to buy their paines & seruice, feeding them still with large & great expences, to please & content them. Wherein they did not consider, that they brought their contry into bondage, & made themselues slaues of the vilest people of the world, whiles that in the meane time they sought to commaund by all meanes possible those, which in many respectes were farre better then them selues. And this was the cause that both draue Marius out of Rome, & made him also to returne againe against Sylla. This selfe same cause made Cinna to kill Octauius, and Fimbria

The commendacion of the auncient Romaine Captaines, for ordering of their souldiers, and also for their modest expences.

A brit to slay Flaccus: of which euills, Sylla was the very first and only author, spending out of all reason, and geuing the souldiers largely that serued vnder him, to winne their good willes the more, and thereby also to allure them. By reason whereof, Sylla had nede of mountaines of money, and specially at the siege where he was: both to make straungers traytors, and besides, to furnishe and satisfie his owne dissolute souldiers. For he had such an earnest desire to take the city of ATHENS, that he could not possibly be disswaded from it. And either it was of a certen vaine ambition he had to fight against the auncient reputacion of that city, being then but a shadow to that it had bene: or els of a very anger, for the mockes & gibes which the tyran Arision gaue in his speches from the wals, against him & Metella, to spite him the more withall. This tyran Arision was full of all cruelty & wickednes, hauing taken vp all the worst qualities
B and greatest imperfections of king Mithridates, & heaped them wholly together in him selfe: by reason whereof the poore city of ATHENS which had escaped from so many warres, tyrannies, & ciuill dissentiõs vntil that present time, was by him, as by an vncurable disease, brought vnto all extreamity. For a bushell of wheate was worth a thowsand Drachmas, and men were driuen for famine to eate feuerfew that grew about the castell: & they caused old shoes & old oyle pots to be sodden, to deliuer some sauor vnto that they did eate, whilest the tyran himselfe did nothing all day long but cramme in meate, & drinke dronke, daunse, maske, scoffe & flowte at the enemies, suffering the holy lampe of Minerua in the meane season to go out for lacke of oyle. And when the Nunne of the same tẽple sent vnto him for a quarter of a bushel of wheate, he sent her a quarter of a bushell of pepper. And when the counsellers of the city, the priestes C & religious came to the castell, holding vp their hands, & beseeching him to take some pity of the city, & fall to cõposition with Sylla: he made thẽ to be driuen away, & scattered with slings. In the end, very late, & yet with great a do, he sent two or three of his quaffing cõpanions vnto Sylla, who when they were come to him, made no demaund of composition for the towne, but began to praise & magnifie the dedes of Theseus, of Eumolpus, & of the ATHENIANS against the MEDES. Whereupon Sylla made them this aunswere. My goodly orators, returne you againe with all your rethoricke: for the ROMAINES sent me not hither to learne nor to study, but to ouercome & conquer those that are rebelled against them. In the meane time there were certaine spyes in the city that heard old men talking together in a place called Ceramicus, blaming the tyran bicause he kept no better watch on that side of the wal that was directly ouer against D the Heptachalcon, which was the only place where the enemies might easiliest get vp vppon the walls. Those spies went straight vnto Sylla, & told him what they had heard the old mẽ say. Sylla tracted no time, but came to the place in the night to see it: & perceiuing that it was to be taken, set the matter straight abroach. And him selfe wrytes in his commentaries, that the first mã that scaled the walls, was Marcus Teius: who finding a souldier ready to resist him, gaue him such a sore blow with his sword vpon his head peece, that his sword brake in two, and yet notwithstanding that he saw him selfe naked & diformed of a sword, did not for all that giue back, but stoode still to it, & kept the place so long, till through him the city was takẽ, & all apon the talke of these old men. So Sylla caused the wall to be pulled downe betwene the hauẽ of Piræa, & the holy hauẽ: & hauing before made the breach very plaine, entred into the city about mid-
E night with a wonderfull fearefull order, making a maruelous noise with a nũber of hornes, & souding of trompets, & all his army with him in order of battel, crying, to the sack, to the sack: kill, kill. For he had geuen them the towne in spoyle, and to put all to the sword. The souldiers therefore ran through the streetes with their swords drawen, making an vncredible slaughter: so that to this daye they be not acknowen, nor doe not declare what nomber of persons were slaine, but to shew the greatnes of the murder that there was committed, the place is yet extãt to be seene where the blood ranne. For besides them that were slaine through all the city, the blood of them only that were slaine in the market stede, did wet all the ground of Ceramicus, euen vnto the very place called Dipylon: and some say also, that it ranne by the gates into the suburbes of the citie. But if the multitude of the people that were slaine in this sorte were F great, much more (or so many at the least) it is sayd were those that slue thẽ selues, for the sorrow & cõpassion they had to see their cõtry in such pityful state, supposing certainly that their city was now come to vtter ruine & destruction. This opiniõ made the noblest men of the city to dispaire of their owne safety, & feared to liue any lenger: bicause they thought they should finde no mercy, no moderacion of cruelty in Sylla. Notwithstanding, partely at the requestes of Midias and Calliphon, who were banished men from ATHENS, and fell at Syllaes feete vpon their knees: and partely also at the requests of the ROMAINE Senators that were in his campe, who prayed him to pardon the body of the city, and the rather for that he had already quenched the thirst of his rauening mind sufficiently well, after that he had somwhat sayd in praise of the auncient ATHENIANS, he concluded in the end, to geue the greater number vnto the smaller, and the liuing to the dead. Sylla wryteth him selfe in his commentaries, that he tooke the city of ATHENS on the very selfe day of the calendes of march, which commeth to agree with the first day of the moneth that we call Anthesterion, on the which day by chaunce many thinges are done at ATHENS in memory of Noes flood, and of the vniuersall destruction of the whole world that was in olde time by rage of waters, falling out euen in that very moneth. When the city was thus taken, the tyran Aristion fled into the castell, where he was besieged by Curio, whome Sylla left there of purpose about that matter. And after he had a great time kept it, at the last, constrained thereunto for lacke of water, yelded. The castell was no sooner geuen vp, but immediatly by goddes prouidence, the weather miraculously altered. For the selfe same day, and at the very selfe instant that Curio caried the tyran Aristion out of the castell: the element being very fayer and clere, the clowdes sodainly gathered together, & there fell such a maruelous glut of raine, that all the castell was full of water. Shortly after also, Sylla hauing gotten the hauen of Piræa, burnt the greatest parte of the buildinges: amongest others was the arsenall and armory, which Philo in old time had caused to be built, being of a straunge and wonderfull edifice. In the meane time, Taxilles, one of the Lieutenaunts of king Mithridates, comming from THRACIA and MACEDON, with a hundred thowsand footemen, tenne thowsand horsemen, and foure score and tenne thowsand carts of warre all armed with sythes: sent vnto Archelaus to ioyne with him, lying yet at ancker in the hauen of Munychia, and not willing to leaue the sea, nor come to fight with the ROMAINES, but seeking rather to draw these warres out in length, and to cut of all vittells from his enemies. Sylla vnderstanding this drift better then him selfe, departed out of the contry of ATTICA (a very barren soyle, and in deede not able to keepe him in time of peace) and went into BOEOTIA: wherein most men thought he committed great error, to leaue ATTICA, which is a very hard contry for horsemen, and to go into BOEOTIA, a plaine champion: and so much the rather, bicause he knew well enough that the chiefest strength of the barbarous people consisted in their horsemen and their armed cartes with sythes. But to auoyd famine, and lacke of vittells as we haue sayd, he was compelled to seeke battell. Furthermore, he had an other cause also that made him afrayed, and compelled him to go: and that was Hortensius, a famous Captaine, and very valiant also, who brought him aide out of THESSALIE, and the barbarous people lay in waite for him in his way, in the straight of Thermopyles. And these were the causes that made Sylla take his way into BOEOTIA. But in the meane time, Caphis that was our contry man, deceiuing the barbarous people, guided Hortensius an other way by mount Parnassus, and brought him vnder the city of TITHORA, which was not then so great a city as nowe at this present it is, but was a castell only, scituated vpon the point of a rocke, hewen all about: whether the PHOCIANS in olde time flying king Xerxes comming vpon them, retyred them selues for their safety. Hortensius lodged there, and there did also both defend and repulse his enemies, so long as day light lasted: and when the night came on, got downe through very hard stony wayes, vnto the city of PATRONIDE, where he ioyned with Sylla, who came to meete him with all his power. Thus being ioyned together, they camped vpon a hill that standeth about the middest of the plaine of Elatea: the soyle was very good, and well replenished with great store of trees, and water, at the foote of the same. The hill is called Philobæotus, the nature & scituacion whereof, Sylla doth maruelously commend. When they were camped, they seemed but a handfull in the eye of their enemies: and no more were they in deede, for they had not aboue fifteene hundred horse, and lesse then fifteene thowsand footemen. Whereupon the other Captaines their enemies, against Archelaus minde, brought out their bandes into the field, and filled all the valley and plaine thereabouts with horsemen, with cartes, with shieldes and targettes, so that the ayer was euen cut a sunder as it were with the violence of the noyse & cries of so many

A ny ſundry nations, which altogether did put themſelues in battell ray. The ſumptuouſnes of their furniture moreouer, was not altogether ſuperfluous and vnprofitable, but ſerued greatly to feare the beholders. For the gliſtering of their harneſſe, ſo richly trimmed and ſet foorth with gold and ſiluer, the cullers of their arming coates vpon their curaces, after the facion of the MEDES and SCYTHIANS, mingled with the bright gliſtering ſteele and ſhining copper, gaue ſuch a ſhow as they went and remoued to and fro, that made a light as clere as if all had bene on a very fire, a fearefull thing to looke apon. Inſomuch as the ROMAINES durſt not ſo much as once goe out of the trenches of their campe, nor Sylla with all his perſwaſion coulde take away this great conceiued feare from them: wherefore, (and bicauſe alſo he would not compell them to go forth in this feare) he was driuen not to ſtirre, but cloſe to abide, (though B it grieued him greatly) to ſee the barbarous people ſo prowdly and villanouſly laugh him and his men to ſcorne. Howbeit the diſdaine & ſcoffing of his enemies, ſtoode him to great good purpoſe afterwards. For they making now none accompt of him, kept ſmall watche & ward, ſtrayed vp and downe diſorderly beſides, though otherwiſe they were not very obedient vnto their Captaines, being many commaunders, and fewe good followers: by reaſon whereof, a ſmall number kept in the campe, and all the reſt of the great multitude intiſed with the gaine they made by ſpoyling and ſacking of townes thereabouts, diſperſed them ſelues many dayes iorney from their campe. For it is ſayd, that at that very time they deſtroyed the city of PANOPÆIA, ſacked the city of LEBADIA, and ſpoyled the temple without commaundement or licence of any of all their Captaines to doe it. In the meane while, Sylla ſeeing ſo many ci- C ties and townes ſpoyled and deſtroyed, tooke it both grieuouſly, and alſo angrily: howbeit he ſuffered not his men to lie idlely, but kept them in labor, to turne the courſe of the riuer of Cephiſus, and to caſt great trenches, not ſuffering any man to take eaſe or reſt, but contrarily with great ſeuerity puniſhed ſuch as went faintly and laſely to worke, to thend that being wearied with the paine they tooke after ſo many workes, they would rather proue to hazard battell, as it fell out in deede. For the third day after they had begonne thus to labor, as Sylla paſſed by them, they cried out vnto him to leade them againſt their enemies. But his aunſwere was vnto them againe: that thoſe were but cries of men wearied rather with labor, then deſirous to fight. Notwithſtanding, if it be ſo in deede, and that you haue ſo good a will to fight as you make ſhowe of: then I will ſayd he, that you arme your ſelues preſently, and get D you to yonder place, ſhowing them therewithall where the caſtell of the PARAPOTAMIANS ſtoode in olde time, which then (the city being deſtroyed) was no more but the toppe of a ſtony mountaine cut all about, and ſeuered from the mount of Edylium by the breadth of the riuer of Aſſus that runneth betwixt, and which at the very foote of the ſame mountaine falleth into the riuer of Cephiſus, and both theſe riuers running in one, carying a ſwift ſtreame, doe make the knappe of the ſayd hill very ſtrong of ſcituacion to lodge a campe vpon. And therefore Sylla ſeeing the ſouldiers of his enemies campe, marching with their copper targets to take vp that place to lodge in: to preuent them, and to get it before them (as in deede he did) he marched thither in all haſt poſſible, & got it euen with the earneſt good will of all his ſouldiers. Archelaus being ſo repulſed from thence, turned his way towards the city of CHÆRO- E NEA. Whereupon certaine of the CHÆRONEANS that were in Syllaes campe, beſought him that he would not forſake their city, aud leaue it to their enemy. Sylla deſiring to gratifie them therein, ſent one of his Colonells Gabinius with a legion, and therewithall gaue the CHÆRONEANS leaue to go thither, who did what they could poſſible to get into their city before Gabinius: but that they could not, ſuch was the diligence and honeſty of the man, as he ſeemed more deſirous of their ſafety, then they were them ſelues. Neuertheleſſe, Iubas doth not call the Colonell that was ſent thither Gabinius, but Hircius. And thus was our city of CHÆRONEA preſerued from the daunger it ſtoode in at that time. In the meane time came very good newes to the ROMAINES, both of oracles and prophecies, which promiſed them victory from the temple of LEBADIA, and the caue of Trophonius: of which prophecies, thoſe countreymen F make great mencion. But Sylla in his tenth booke of his cõmentaries writeth, that Quintus Titius, a man of quality & name amongeſt them that traffiked into the contry of GREECE, came vnto him after he had wonne the battell of CHÆRONEA, to tell him that Trophonius gaue him to vnderstand, that shortly after he should haue a second battell, and that he should yet againe haue an other victory in the same place. After him an other mã of warre called Saluenius, told him also what successe he should haue in the warres of ITALIE, saying, that he knew it by reuelation: and both these men agreed in the manner of the reuelation. For they sayd, that they had seene a god, in maiesty, beawty, and greatnes, like vnto the image of Iupiter Olympius. Sylla hauinge passed the riuer of Assus, went to lodge at the foote of mount Edylium, hard by Archelaus, who had placed and fortified his campe betwene the two moũtaines of Acontium, and of Edylium, ioyninge to the city of the ASSIANS. The place where Archelaus camped, beareth his owne name Archelaus vnto this day. One day after Sylla had chaunged his lodging, he left Muræna in his campe with a legion, and two cohortes, to keepe the enemies still occupied that were in great trouble, and he him selfe in the meane time went and sacrificed by the riuer of Cephisus. His sacrifice being ended, he marched towards the city of CHÆRONEA, to take the force he had there vnder Gabinius, & to know the mountaine also called Thurium, which the enemies had taken. It is a knappe of a mountaine very steepe and sharpe of all sides, with a narrowe point like a pine apple, by reason whereof we doe call it Orthopagum. At the foote of the same runneth the riuer called Morion, and there is also the temple of Apollo surnamed Thurias: and they say that this surname of Thurias was geuen vnto him of the name of Thuros, who was mother of Chæron, the founder and builder of the city of CHÆRONEA. Other thinke, that the cow which was geuen to Cadmus for a guide, came to him in that place: which hath euer since kept the name, for that the PHENICIANS call a cow, Thor. Now when Sylla came neere vnto CHÆRONEA, the Colonell Gabinius whome he had sent thither with a garrison to defend the same, went to meete him with his men very well armed, wearing a lawrell garland: and Sylla after he had saluted him, and his souldiers, made an oration vnto them, exhorting them to do their duty in fighting. And as he was in his oration, there came two citizens of CHÆRONEA to him, one, his name was Omoloichus, and the other Anaxidamus, who promised him to driue the enemies from mount Thurium which they had taken, if he would but geue thẽ some small number of souldiers. For there was a litle path way, which the barbarous people mistrusted not, beginning at a place called Petrochus, hard by the temple of the Muses, by the which they might easily go to the toppe of this mountaine Thurium: so that following that pathe, it would bring them ouer the barbarous peoples heads, and they might easily kill them with stones, or at the least they should driue them mawgre their heads downe into the valley. Gabinius assuring Sylla that they were both very valliant men, and such as he might boldly trust vnto, Sylla gaue them men, and commaunded them to execute their enterprise: and he him selfe in the meane season went and set his men in order of battell in the plaine, deuiding his horsemen on the winges, placed him selfe in the right wing, appointinge the left vnto Muræna. Galba & Hortensius his Lieutenauntes, were placed in the tayle with certaine bandes of the reregard which they kept vpon the hils, to watch and let that the enemies should not inclose them behinde: bicause they perceiued a farre of that the enemies put forth a great number of horsemen and footemen light armed in the wings, to thend that the poynts of their battell might the more easily bowe and enlarge them selues, to compasse in the ROMAINES on the backe side. Now in the meane time, these two CHÆRONEIANS whome Sylla had sent vnder Hircius their Captaine, hauing compassed about the mountaine Thurium, before the enemies were aware of them: sodainly came to shew them selues vppon the toppe of the mountaine, which did so feare the barbarous people, that they began immediatly to flie, one of them for the most parte killing an other. There was no resistaunce, but flying downe the mountaine, fell apon the pointes of their owne partisans and pykes, and one of them thrusting in an others necke, tombled hedlong downe the mountaine together, hauing their enemies besides on their backes, which draue them from the hill, and strake them behinde where they lay open vnto them: so as they were slaine a three thowsande of them about this mountaine Thurium. And as for them that sought to saue them selues by flight, Muræna that was already set in battell ray, met with some, cut them of by the way, and slue them downe right. The other fled directly to their campe, and came in great companies, thrusting into the battell of their footemen, put the most parte of them quite out of order, & marueilously troubled their

A their Captaines before they could ſet them againe in order: which was one of the chiefeſt cauſes of their ouerthrowe. For Sylla went and gaue a charge vppon them in this trouble and diſorder, and had quickely wonne the ground that was betwene both armies, wherby he tooke away the force of all their armed cartes with ſythes, which are then of greateſt force, when they haue the longeſt courſe, to geue them a ſwift and violent ſtroke in their chaſe: whereas when their courſe is but ſhort, the blow is ſo much the weaker, and of leſſe ſtrength, euen as arrowes are, that a farre of enter not deepe into the thing they be ſhot at: as at that time it fell out with the barbarous people. For their firſt cartes ſet foorth ſo faintly, and came on with ſo feeble a force, that the ROMAINES ſent them backe, & eaſily repulſed them, with great ſlaughter and clapping of handes one to an other, as they commonly vſe in the ordinarie games of B horſe running at ROME. When they had thus repulſed the cartes, the battell of Syllaes footemen beganne to charge the barbarous people, who baſing their pykes, ſtoode cloſe one to an other bicauſe they would not be taken: & the ROMAINES on thother ſide beſtowed firſt their dartes among them, and then ſodainly drewe out their ſwordes in the heate they were in, and put aſide the enemies pykes, whereby they might come neerer to their bodies. There were fifteene thowſand ſlaues in the fronte of the battell of the barbarous people, whom Mithridates Lieutenaunt had made free by open proclamation, and had deuided them by bandes amongeſt the other footemen. By occaſion whereof there was a ROMAINE Centurion, ſpake pleaſauntly at that time, ſaying, that he neuer ſaw ſlaues before haue liberty to ſpeake and do like free men, but only at Saturnes feaſtes. Neuertheleſſe, they againſt the nature of ſlaues, were C very valliant to abide the ſhocke, and the ROMAINE footemen could not ſo readily breake nor enter into them, nor make them geue backe, bicauſe they ſtoode very cloſe one to an other, and their ranckes were of ſuch a length beſides: vntill ſuch time as the ROMAINES that were behinde the firſt ranckes, did ſo pelt them with their ſlinges, hurling ſtones, beſtowing their dartes & arrowes apon them, that in thend they compelled them all to turne their backes, and flie a maine. And when Archelaus did firſt thruſt out the right wing of his army, ſuppoſing to encloſe the ROMAINES behinde: Hortenſius ſtraight wayes cauſed the bands he had with him to run & charge vpon the flanckes. Which Archelaus perceiuing, made the horſemen he had about him turne their faces forthwith, which were in nũber aboue two thowſand: inſomuch as Hortenſius, being ſet apon with all his trowpe, was compelled to retyre by litle and litle to-D wardes the mountaine, perceiuing him ſelfe farre from the battell of his footemen, and enuironned round about with his enemies. Sylla ſeeing that, being in the right wing of his battell, and hauing not yet fought, went ſtraight to the reſcue of Hortenſius. But Archelaus coniecturing by the duſt which the horſes raiſed, what the matter was: left Hortenſius there, and with ſpeede returned againe towardes the right wing of his enemies from whence Sylla was gone, hoping he had left it vnfurniſhed of a ſufficient Captaine to cõmaund them. Taxilles on thother ſide, cauſed his copper targets alſo to march againſt Murena: ſo as the noyſe they made on both ſides, cauſed the mountaines to ring againe, wherewithall Sylla ſtayed, ſtanding in dout which way to take. At the laſt he reſolued, to returne to the place frõ whence he came, & ſent Hortenſius with foure enſignes to aide Murena: and him ſelfe with the fift in great ſpeede, went E towardes the right wing of his army, the which was now already bickering, and ioyned with their enemies, fighting hand to hand with Archelaus. By reaſon whereof, when Sylla was comen with his aide, they did eaſily diſtreſſe them: and after they had broken their array, they chaſed them flying for life to the riuer, & vnto the mountaine Acontium. But Sylla notwithſtanding forgate not Murena, but went againe to his reliefe: and finding that he on his ſide had alſo put the enemies to flight, followed with him the chaſe of them that fled. There was a maruelous ſlaughter made in that field of the barbarous people, and many of them ſuppoſing to haue recouered their campe, were ſlaine by the way: ſo as of all that infinite multitude of fighting men, there eſcaped only tenne thowſande, who ſaued them ſelues by flying vnto the city of CHALCIDE. Sylla for his parte wryteth, that he could make reckening of no more but F fourteene of his ſouldiers onely that were ſlaine, whereof there came two againe to him the ſame night. Wherefore in the markes of triumphe which he ſet vp for tokens of that victory, he cauſed to be wrytten on the toppe thereof, Mars, victory, and Venus: ſignifying thereby, that he had ouercome in these warres as much by good fortune, as by force, policie, or martiall shall discipline. These markes of triumphe were set vp for the battell which he wanne in the plaine field, in that place where Archelaus beganne to flie, euen vnto the riuer of Molus. And he set vp an other also in the toppe of mount Thurium, where the barbarous people were set vpon behinde: and there is wrytten in Greeke letters, that the valliant deedes of Omoloichus and Anaxidamus, gaue way to the winning of this victorie. Sylla for the ioy of this great worke battell, caused musitians to play in the city of THEBES, where he builded a stage for all the musitians, neere vnto the fountaine OEdipus, and certaine noble GREECIANS were appointed iudges of that musicke, whom he caused to be sent for out of other cities, bicause he mortally hated the THEBANS: insomuch as he tooke from them halfe their landes, which he consecrated vnto Apollo Pythias, and Iupiter Olympias, appointing that of the reuenue thereof, they should redeliuer and pay backe the money which he had taken and caried away from out of their temples. Sylla after this hauing intelligence that Flaccus, one of his enemies, was chosen Consull at ROME, and had passed the sea Ionium with an army, vnder pretext to make warre against king Mithridates, but in deede to make warre with him selfe: tooke his iorney towards THESSALIE to meete him. But when he was in the citie of MELITEA, there came newes to him out of all partes, that there was a new and second army of the kings arrived, no lesse then the first, the which spoyled and destroyed all the contry which he had left behinde him. For Dorylaus, one of king Mithridates Lieutenauntes, was arriued in the city of CHALCIDE with a great fleete of shippes, hauing brought thither with him foure score thowsand fighting men, the best trained, the best armed and appointed souldiers, that were in all his kingdom of PONTVS in ASIA: and from thence went into BOEOTIA, had all that contry at commaundement, and sought to fight with Sylla, notwithstanding that Archelaus alleaged many reasons to dissuade him from it: and furthermore, gaue it out in euery place, that so many thowsandes of souldiers coulde not haue bene cast away in the first battell, without some notable treason. Wherupon Sylla returned with all possible speede, & made Dorylaus know before many dayes passed ouer his head, that Archelaus was a wise man, and knew well enough the worthines and valliant corage of the ROMAINES. And Dorylaus hauing had but a litle proofe only in certaine light skirmishes which he made against Sylla, about TILPHOSSION in THESSALIE: himselfe was the first that could say then, it was not for them to hazarde battell, but rather to draw out the warres in length, and supplant the ROMAINES with charge & expence. And yet notwithstading, the commodity of the great large plaine that lyeth all about ORCHOMENE, where they were encamped, gaue great encoragement to Archelaus, who iudged it a very fit place to geue battell in, specially bicause he was the stronger of horsemen in the field. For of all the plaines that are within the contry of BOEOTIA, the greatest & largest of them, is the plaine nere to the city of ORCHOMENE: which is altogether without trees, and runneth out in length vnto the marisses, where the riuer of Melas disperseth it selfe abroade. The head of the same riuer is not farre from the city of ORCHOMENE, & that riuer only of all other riuers in GREECE from the very head whence it commeth, is nauigable: and hath besides an other singular property, that it riseth & swelleth euen in the longest sommer dayes, as the riuer of Nilus doth, and bringeth forth the selfe same plantes and trees, sauing that they beare no frute, neither are they so great as those of Ægypt. This riuer hath no longe course, bicause that the most parte of the water runneth into lakes and marisses, couered with brambles and briars, and there is but a very litle parte of it that falleth into the riuer of Cephisus, in the place where the redes grow that they make good flutes withal. When they were camped one nere to an other, Archelaus lay quietly and sturred not. But Sylla presently cast great trenches from one side to an other, to stoppe the way against their enemies, that they could not come into that great plaine where they might haue taken what ground they would for their men of armes, and haue driuen the ROMAINES into the marisses. The barbarous people not being able to endure that, so soone as their Captaines had geuen them liberty, discharged with such a fury, that they did not only scatter them that wrought in Syllaes trenches, but put the most parte of their gard also that stoode in battell ray to defend them, in a maruelous feare, who also beganne to flie. Which Sylla perceiuing, lighted straight from his horse, and taking an ensigne in his hande, ran through the middest of his

his men that fled, vntill he came to his enemies, and crying out, saying: Whether will you flie, O my fellow souldiers, mine honor doth maunde me to dye here, and therefore if you will follow me, I will make you where you forsooke your Captaine, remember that you haue sworne to be true vnto me. They were so ashamed at these wordes, that he made them runne besides that there came two cohortes vnto him from the right wing of his battell, who vnder his leading gaue such a horse charge vpon their enemies, that they fled forthwith apon it. That done, Sylla returned with his men, and made them dine and then vpon by and by set them againe to the trenches to enclose his enemies campe, who then came out on better order then they did before. There was Diogenes, Archelaus wiues sonne slaine, fighting valiantly before them all in the right wing of their battell. And the bowe men being preſſed sonneest by the Romaines, that their bowes would doe no good: tooke their arrowes in their handes in stead of swordes, and strake their enemies with them to force them to geue backe, vntil such time as at the last they were all driuen into their campe, where they passed that night in great sorow, as well for the losse of them that were slaine, as also for the number of those that were hurt. The next morning, Sylla leading his men againe towardes the campe of his enemies, went on still continuing his trenches: & certaine of them being come out to skirmish with them, he set apon them so lustely, that at the first charge he put them to flight. That brought such a feare to all the whole campe of the enemies, that not a man durst abide any lenger: so as Sylla valiantly following on his victory, shuffled in among them as they fled, and in the ende tooke all together. Straight way all the marisses were filled with blood, and the lake full of dead bodies: so that vntill this present day they find there in that place many bowes of the barbarous people, morrions, peeces of tasses, and swordes drowned in the mudde of the marisses, notwithstanding that it is well neere two hundred yeres agoe since this battell was stricken. And thus much for the warres about the cities of Chaeronea, and Orchomene. Now the warres being past in this sorte in Greece, Cinna, and Carbo dealt very cruelly and vnnaturally at Rome with the noble men and greatest persons: by reason whereof, many flying their cruelty, went to Sylla's campe, as vnto the hauen of their health and fulnes of felicity, so that in short time Sylla had an assembly of a Romaine Senate about him. Metella her selfe, his wife, hauing stollen away very hardly with her children, came to bring him newes that his houses in the citie and country both, were all burnt and destroyed by his enemies: praying him that he would go and help them that yet remained at Rome. Sylla vpon hearing of these newes, fell in great perplexity. For on the one side, it grieued him to see his contry so miserably afflicted: and on the other side he knew not well how he might go, leauing so great an enterprise as that warre was, and specially against a king of such might and power as Mithridates shewed him selfe to be. And being in these dumpes, there came one Archelaus a marchant to him, borne in the city of Dyrrhachium, who brought him a secret message from the other Archelaus, king Mithridates Lieutenaunt: the which pleased Sylla so well, that he desired that Archelaus & him selfe might meete and talke together. So at the length they met by the sea side, neere vnto the city of Dyrrhachium, where there is a temple of Apollo. Archelaus beganne to enter the talke with him, declaring vnto Sylla that he would wish him to leaue the conquest of Asya, & of the realme of Pontus, and to returne into his contry to the ciuill warres at Rome: and in so doing, the king would furnish him, not onely with as much money, but with as many shippes and men, as he him selfe would desire. Sylla apon this motion told him againe: that he would wish him to forsake Mithridates seruice, and to make him selfe king, offering to proclaime him a friend and confederate of the Romaines, so that he would deliuer him all his armie which then he had in his handes. Archelaus seemed much to abhorre to heare him speake of treason. But Sylla going on with his tale, replyed againe vnto him: why Archelaus, sayd he, thinkest thou that a Cappadocian, and seruaunt to a barbarous king, or his frend at the least: hast thou so good a hart with thee, that for all the benefits I offer thee, thou wilt not once commit an ill act? And art thou indeede so bolde to speake to me of treason, which am the Romaines lieutenaunt generall, and Sylla? As if thou were not he, that at the battell of Chaeronea didest saue thy selfe by flying, with a small number left thee of six score thowsand fighting men, which thou before hadst in thy campe: and that hid thy selfe two dayes together in the marisses of Orchomene, leauing the fielde all ouer with such heapes of dead bodies, that no man could passe by them. After this replye, Archelaus altered his speeche, and falling downe at Sylla's feete, humbly beseought him to ende this warre, and to make peace with Mithridates. Whereunto Sylla aunswered, that he was very well contented withall. And thereupon peace was concluded betwene them vnder condicions, that Mithridates should departe from ASIA the lesse, and from PAPHLAGONIA, that he should restore BITHYNIA vnto Nicomedes, and CAPPADOCIA vnto Ariobarzanes, that he should pay two thousand talents to the ROMAINES, & geue them three score and tenne gallies, with all their furniture. And vpon this, Sylla would also assure him the rest of his realme: and would cause him to be proclaimed a frende of the ROMAINES. These articles being past by agreement betwixt them, Sylla taking his iorney through THESSALY and MACEDON into the contry of HELLESPONT, caried Archelaus with him, whom he honorably intreated. For Archelaus falling daungerously sicke of a disease in the citie of LARISSA, he stayed there for him, and was very carefull to recouer him, as if he had bene one of his chiefest Captaines and companions. And this was the cause that made Archelaus to be blamed for the battell of CHAERONEA, as if he had not faithfully fought it out, nor Sylla truly won it, but by treason. And againe, Archelaus was the more suspected, bicause Sylla reddelyuered Mithridates all his seruaunts and frends which he had prisoners, sauing the tyran Aristion that kept ATHENS, whome he poysoned, bicause he was Archelaus enemie: but specially, for the lands Sylla gaue vnto this CAPPADOCIAN. For he gaue him tenne thousand Iugera, (or acres of lande) within the Ile of EUBOEA, and gaue him moreouer the title of a frende of the ROMAINES for euer. But Sylla denyeth all these thinges in his commentaries. In the meane time, Ambassadors came from king Mithridates vnto Sylla, who told him that the king their maister did ratifie and accept all the articles of peace, sauing that he onely prayed him he would not take the contry of PAPHLAGONIA from him: and as for the gallies, he would not so much as once say he would promise them. Sylla being offended herewith, angerly aunswered them again. Then Mithridates, as ye say, meaneth to kepe PAPHLAGONIA still, and refuseth to geue the shippes I demaunded: where I looked that he would haue humbly thancked me on his knees, if I left him his right hand only, with the which he put so many ROMAINE citizens to death. But I hope to make him tell me an other tale, if I come once into ASIA: but nowe at PERGAMVM, he speaketh his pleasure of this warre which he hath not seene. The Ambassadors being afrayed of his wordes, replied not againe. Whereupon Archelaus spake, and besought him with teares in his eyes to be contented, and tooke him by the hande. By intreating in thende he obtained of Sylla to sende him vnto Mithridates: promising that he would either bring him to agree to all the articles & condicions of peace that he demaunded, or if he could not, he would kill him selfe with his owne handes. Vpon this promise Sylla sent him away, and in the meane while entred with his armie into the contrie of MEDICA: and after he had destroyed the most parte thereof, returned backe againe into MACEDON, where Archelaus being returned from Mithridates, founde him neere vnto the citie of PHILIPPES, bringing him newes that all should be well, howebeit that his maister Mithridates prayed him he might speake with him in any case. Now, the matter that made Mithridates so earnest to speake with Sylla, was chiefely for Fimbria, who hauing slaine Flaccus the Consull, being of the contrarie faction vnto Sylla, and certaine of Mithridates Lieutenauntes also, went him selfe against him to fight with him. Mithridates fearing his comming, chose rather to make him selfe Sylla's frend. So Mithridates and Sylla met together in the contry of TROADE, in the citie of DARDANE: Mithridates being accompanied with a fleete of two hundred saile of shippes without at sea, with twenty thousand footemen, fiue thousande horse, and a number of armed carres with sythes besides by land. Sylla hauing onely but foure ensignes of footemen, and two hundred horsemen. Mithridates went to Sylla, and offering to take him by the hande, Sylla asked him first, if he did accept the peace with the condicions which Archelaus had agreed vnto. Mithridates made him no aunswere. Sylla following on his tale, sayd vnto him, It is for soldiers to speake first, that haue requested peace: but for conquerors, it is enough to hold their peace, and heare what they will say. Then began Mithridates to excuse him selfe, and to lay the occasion of the warre, partly vpon the ordinaunce of the goddes that so had appointed it, & partly also

A also vppon the ROMANES them selues. Whereunto Sylla replyed, that he had heard of long time that Mithridates was an eloquent Prince, and that he knew it now by experience, seeing that he lacked no comely words, to cloke his fowle and shamefull dedes: but withall he sharply reproued him, and draue him to confesse the cruelties he had committed. And afterwardes asked him againe, if he did confirme that which Archelaus had done. Mithridates made aunswer that he did. Then Sylla saluted, embraced, and kissed him: and calling for the kinges Nicomedes, and Ariobarzanes, reconciled them together, and made Mithridates their frende againe. In conclusion, after Mithridates had deliuered Sylla three score and tenne gallies, and fiue hundred bow men, he returned by sea into his realme of PONTVS. But Sylla hearing that his souldiers were angrie with this peace made with Mithridates, bicause they could not abide B to behold that king, whom they accompted for their most cruell and mortall enemy, (hauing in one selfe day caused a hundred and fifty thowsand ROMANE citizens to be slaine, that were dispersed abroade in diuers places of ASIA) so to departe, and go his way safe, with the riches and spoyles of the contry, which he had bereft them of, and vsed at his pleasure, the space of forty yeares together: aunswered them in excuse of him selfe, that he was not able to make warres with Mithridates, & Fimbria both, if once they were ioyned together against him. And so Sylla departing thence, went against Fimbria, who then was encamped neere to the city of C THYATIRA, and lodged him selfe as neere vnto him as he conueniently might. Nowe whilest he was compassing in his lodging with a trench, Fimbriaes souldiers came out of their campe in their coates without any armor or weapon, to salute Syllaes souldiers, and holpe them very frendly to make vp their trenche. Which Fimbria seeing, and perceiuing his souldiers mindes so chaunged, of an extreame feare which he had of Sylla, at whose handes he looked for no mercy: killed him selfe in his owne campe. Sylla hereuppon condemned the whole contry of ASIA the lesse, to pay the summe of twenty thowsand talentes amongest them, and presently also he vndid many poore householders through his insolent souldiers, lying long vpon their charge, which he left in garrison there. For he ordained that euery householder should geue the souldier that lodged in his house, foure Tetradrachmas a day, & should be bound to geue him and his frendes (as many as he would bring with him) their supper also: and that euery Captaine should haue fifty Drachmas a day, a night gowne for the house, and a garment to goe abroade into the city when he thought good. When he had geuen this order, he depar- D ted from the city of EPHESVS with all his fleete, and in three dayes sayling arriued in the hauen of Piræa at ATHENS, where he was receiued into the fraternity of the mysteries, and reserued for him selfe the librarie of Apellicon Teian: in the which were the most parte of Aristotle and Theophrastus workes, not then thought meete to come in euery mans handes. And they say, that this librarie being brought to ROME, Tyrannion the grammarian founde the meanes to extract a great parte of them: and that Andronicus the RHODIAN hauing recouered the originalls into his hands, put them in printe, and wrote the summaries which we haue at this present. For the auncient Peripatetick Philosophers were of them selues very wise and learned men, but they had not all Aristotles workes, nor Theophrastus amongest them, and yet those fewe they had, were not by them seene all whole and perfect together: bicause that the E goodes of Neleus SCEPSIAN (to whom Theophrastus left all his bookes by will) came to fall into the hands of meane ignorant men, who knew not the vertue and estimacion of them. And furthermore, Sylla being at ATHENS had such a paine and numnesse in his legges, and was so heauy withall, that Strabo calleth it a spice of the gowte, that is to say, a feeling or entring therinto, which then beganne to roote and take hold of him. Vpon which occasion he tooke the seaes, & went vnto a place called ADIPSVM, where there are naturall hotte bathes: and there remained a while solacing him selfe all the day long with musicke, seeing of playes, and entertaining such kinde of people. Vpon a day as he was walking by the sea side, certaine fisher men made him a present of fish, which pleased him maruelous well, & demaunding of the whence they were: they aunswered him againe, that they were of the city of ALES. What? of ALES F sayd he: is there any of them yet left aliue? speaking it, bicause that after the battell of ORCHOMENE when he followed the chase of his enemies, he had taken and destroyed three cities of BOEOTIA all at one selfe time, to wit ANTHEDON, LARYMNA, and ALES. fisher men were so amazed with his wordes, that they stoode still, and could not tell what to say. Sylla fell a laughing thereat, & bad them go their wayes a gods name, and be not affrayed, for they brought no small intercessors with them, which were worth the reckening of. When Sylla had geuen them these wordes, the ALLEIANS went home with a mery harte, to gather them selues together againe in their city. Sylla so passing through THESSALIA & MACEDON, came to the sea side, intending to go from the city of DYRRACHIVM vnto BRVNDVSIVM, with twelue hundred sayle. The city of APOLLONIA is hard by DYRRACHIVM, and thereabout is a parke consecrated vnto the nymphes, where in a fayer goodly greene meadowe in many places there commeth out great bubles of fire that flame continually: and it is sayd that there was a Satyre taken sleeping, euen in the very selfe same forme the painters and image graners haue set him out. He was brought vnto Sylla, and being asked by all sortes of interpreters what he was, he made no aunswere that a man could vnderstand: but only put forth a sharpe voyce like the neying of a horse, or whynnying of a goate. Sylla wondering at it, abhorred him, and made him to be caried from him as a monstrous thing. Furthermore, when Sylla had imbarked his men to passe the sea, he was afrayed that so soone as they were landed in ITALIE, they would shrinke from him, and euery man go home to his owne. But they sware and promised first of them selues, that they would tary and keepe together, and by their willes would doe no hurt in ITALIE. Moreouer, perceiuing that he stoode in neede of money, they offred him of theirs, & euery man to lend him as his ability serued. But Sylla would none, yet thanked them for their goodwill: and after he had exhorted them to fight like valliant souldiers, he went against fifteene generalls of armies of his enemies, who had foure hundred and fifty ensignes of footemen well armed, as he him selfe wryteth in his commentaries. But the goddes promised him good fortune in his warres, by many sundry apparant signes. For in a sacrifice he made by TARENTVM, after he was come a lande, the liuer of a certaine beast sacrificed, was altogether facioned after the maner of a crowne or garland of laurell, out of the which did hang two bandes or rolles. And a litle before he went into CAMPANIA, neere vnto the mountaine Epheum, there appeared two great goates in the day time fighting together, euen as two men do when they fight: which neuertheless was no matter of trueth, but a vision onely that appeared, and rising from the earth dispersed it selfe by litle and litle here and there in the ayer, and in thende vanished quite away, as clowdes which come to nothing. Shortly after, in the selfe same place, Marius the younger, and Norbanus the Consull, who brought two great armies against him, were ouerthrowen by him, before he had set his men in battell, or had appointed any man his place where he should fight: and this proceeded onely vpon the corage and life of his souldiers, whose goodwill to serue against them was such, as following this victory, he compelled the Consull Norbanus after he had slaine sixe thowsande of his men, to take the city of CAPVA for his refuge. This noble exployte, (as him selfe reported) was the cause that his men kept so well together, that they neither went home to their houses, nor made any reckening of their enemies, although they were many against one. And he sayth furthermore, that in the city of SYLVIVM, there was a slaue of one Pontius a citizen, who beinge inspired with a propheticall spirite, came to tell him from the goddesse Bellona, that he should grow in strength, & cary away the victory of these wars: howbeit that if he did not hye him the sooner, the Capitoll at ROME should be burnt. And so it fell out the same day according to his wordes, being the sixteene day of the moneth called Quintilis, and now Iuly. And furthermore also, Lucullus (one of Syllaes Captaines) being neere vnto the city of FIDENTIA with sixteene ensignes only, against fifty ensignes of his enemies, knowing his men to be very well affected to serue, bicause the most parte of them were naked & vnarmed, was afrayed to hazard the battel: and as he was euen bethinking him selfe what was best to determine therof, there rose a litle winde out of a goodly meadow that blewe a wonderfull sorte of flowers apon the souldiers on euery parte of them. These flowers stayed of them selues as they fell, some apon their targets, and others apon their moryans, without falling to the grounde: so that it seemed to their enemies a farre of, as if they had bene garlandes of flowers vpon their heades. This made Lucullus souldiers more lusty a great deale, then they were before, and with this good will they determined to geue a charge vpon their enemies: whom they ouerthrew, slue

A fiue eighteene thowſand of them in the field, & tooke their campe. This Lucullus was brother vnto the other Lucullus, that afterwards ouerthrew the kings Mithridates, & Tigranes. Neuertheles, Sylla perceiuing that his enemies lay round about him with many great puiſant armies, thought good to vſe policy with force: & therefore practiſed with Scipio, one of the Conſulls, to make peace with him. Scipio was willing to it: & thereupon were oft meetings & aſſemblies of both ſides. Now Sylla draue of the concluſion of the peace as long as he could, ſtill ſeeking occaſion of delay, to thend that his ſouldiers which were throughly acquainted with craft and ſubtilty as well as him ſelfe, might in the meane time corrupt Scipioes ſouldiers by repayre into his campe: for they comming into Scipioes campe, being very conuerſaunt with thē, ſtraight corrupted ſome of them with ready money, other with promiſes, & other with fayer flattering
B words, & many goodly tales they told them. At the length, after this practiſe had continued a while, Sylla comming nere vnto Scipioes campe with twenty enſignes only: all his men ſaluted Scipioes ſouldiers, & they reſaluting them again, yelded them ſelues vnto Sylla, ſo as Scipio was left poſte alone in his tente where he was taken, but they afterwards let him goe. So Sylla with his twenty enſignes, like vnto the fowlers, that by their ſtales draw other birds into their netts, hauing gotten forty enſignes from his enemies by his craft, brought them away with him into his campe. There it was that Carbo ſayd of Sylla, that he had to fight with a foxe & a lyon both: but that the foxe did him more hurte & miſchiefe, then the lyon. After this, Marius the younger hauing foureſcore and fiue enſignes in his campe neere vnto the citie of SIGNIVM, preſented battell vnto Sylla: who hauing very good deſire to fight, and ſpecially on that day, bi-C cauſe the night before he had ſeene this viſion in his dreame, that he thought he ſawe Marius the father (who was deceaſed long before) warning his ſonne that he ſhould come to him. Sylla for this reſpect deſired maruelouſly to fight that day: and thereuppon cauſed Dolobella to come vnto him, that was before lodged farre from him. But the enemies ſtept betwene him and home, and ſtopped his paſſage to keepe him from ioyning with Sylla. Syllaes ſouldiers to the contrarie, fought to keepe the way open for him, with ſo great labor and paine, that they were all wearie and ouerharried. And furthermore, there fell a maruelous great ſhower of raine vpon them as they were buſie, opening the way, that troubled them more, then the labor they had in hande. Whereuppon the priuate Captaines of the bandes went to make Sylla vnderſtande it, and to pray him to deferre the battell vntill an other day: ſhowing him howe
D the ſouldiers wearied with labor, lay downe vpon their targettes on the grounde to take their eaſe. Sylla perceiuing this, was contented withall, though greatly in deede againſt his will. But when he had geuen the ſignall to lodge, and that they beganne to trenche and fortifie their campe: Marius the younger commeth a horſe backe marching brauely before all his compa-nie, hoping to haue ſurpriſed his enemies in diſorder, and by that meanes to haue ouerthrowen them eaſily. But farre otherwiſe did fortune then performe the reuelation which Sylla had in his foreſayed dreame: for his men fallinge in a rage withall, left their worke in the trenche where they wrought, ſtucke their dartes vppon the bancke, ranne vppon their enemies with their ſwordes drawen, and with a maruelous crie ſet apon them ſo valliantly, that they were not able to reſiſt their furie, but ſodainly turned their backes and fled, where there was a great E and notable ſlaughter made of them. Marius their Captaine fled to the citie of PRÆNESTE, where he found the gates ſhut: but they threw him downe a rope from the wall, which he tied about his midle, and ſo was triced vp by it. Yet ſome wryters ſay, and Feneſtella among other, that Marius neuer ſawe the battell: for beinge wearied with labor, and verie ſleepie, he laye vnder ſome tree in the ſhadowe to reſt a litle, after he had geuen the ſignall and word of the battell, and ſlept ſo ſowndly, that he coulde ſcant awake with the noyſe and fleeinge of his men. Sylla him ſelfe wryteth, that he loſt at this battell but three and twentie men, ſlewe twentie thowſande of his enemies, and tooke eight thowſande priſoners. His Lieutenauntes alſo had the like good ſucceſſe in other places, Pompeius, Craſſus, Metellus, and Seruilius: which without any loſſe of their men, or but with a verie ſmall, ouerthrewe ma-
F ny great mightie armies of their enemies. Inſomuch as Carbo, the heade and chiefe of all the contrarie faction, and he that moſt maintained it, fled one night out of his campe, and went beyonde the ſeaes into AFRICKE. The laſt battell that Sylla had, was againſt Thebeſinus Thelesinus the Samnyte put Sylla in great daūger.

Samnyte, who comming like a fresh champion to set apon him, when he was already wearied, and had fought many battells, had almost slaine him euen at Rome gates. For Thelesinus hauinge gathered together a great number of souldiers with one Lamponius Lvcanian, marched with all speede towards the city of Prænestɛ, to deliuer Marius the younger that was besieged there. But vnderstandinge that Sylla on the one side, came in great haste also to meete him, and that Pomponius came behinde him on the other side, & perceiuing, moreouer that the way was so shut vp, that he could neither go forward nor backeward: being a valliant souldier, and one that had bene in many great foughten fieldes, most daungerously ventured to go straight to Rome. And so stale away by night with all his whole power, and marching to Rome ward, had almost taken it at his first comming, for that there was neither watch nor ward kept: but he stayed happely tenne furlonges from the gate Collina, bragging with himselfe, and beleuing that he should doe wonders, for that he had mocked so many great Captaines. The next morning betimes came diuerse young noble men and gentlemen out of the citie to skirmishe with Thelesinus: who slue a great number of them, and among others one Appius Claudius a young gentleman of a noble house, and very honest. Whereuppon (as you may easily imagine) the city trembled for feare, and specially the women, who fell a shreeking, and running vp and downe, as if they had bene all taken. But in this great feare and trouble, Balbus (whom Sylla had sent) came first with seuen hundred horse vpon the spurre, and staying but a litle to coole and geue them breath, brideled straight againe, and went to set apon the enemies thereby to stay them. Soone after him came Sylla also, who commaunded his men that came first, quickely to eate somwhat, and that done, put them straight in battell ray: notwithstanding that Dolobella and Torquatus perswaded him to the contrary, and besought him not to put his souldiers wearied with their iorney, to so great and manifest a daunger, and the rather, bicause they had not to fight with Carbo and Marius, but with the Samnytes and Lvcanes, who were (both) warlike nations & good souldiers, and those besides that most deadly hated the Romanes. But for all that, Sylla draue them backe, and commaunded his trompets to sounde the alarome, being almost within foure houres of night: and this battell was sharper and more cruell, then any other that euer he fought before. The right wing where Crassus was, had the better much: but the left wing was very sore distressed, & stoode in great perill. Sylla hearing thereof, and thinking to helpe it, got vp vppon a white courser that was both swift, and very strong. The enemies knewe him, and there were two that lifted vp their armes to throw their dartes at him, whom he saw not: but his page gaue his horse such a lash with his whippe, that he made him so to gird forward, as the very pointes of the dartes came hard by the horse tayle, and stucke fast in the grounde. Some say that Sylla had a litle golden image of Apollo, which he brought from the city of Delphes, and in time of warres ware it alwayes in his bosome, which he then tooke in his hand, and kissing it, sayd: O Apollo Pythia, hast thou so highly exalted Cornelius Sylla, so fortunate hitherto through so many famous victories, and wilt thou now with shame ouerwhelme him wholly, euen at the very gates of his owne naturall city among his contrymen? And so crying out to Apollo for helpe, thrust into the prease among his men, intreating some, threatning others, and layinge apon the rest to stay them. But for all he coulde doe, all the left winge of his army was broken and ouerthrowen by his enemies: and him selfe amongest them that fled, was compelled to recouer his campe with speede, hauing lost many of his frendes and familiars. There were moreouer many citizens slaine and troden vnder feete (both with horse and men) that came only to see the battell fought: so that they within the city thought them selues vtterly vndone. Lucretius Ofella furthermore (he that besieged Marius in the citie of Prænestɛ) had almost raised his siege, vpon the wordes of them that fled and came thither from the battell, who wished him to remoue with all speede possible, for Sylla was slaine, and Thelesinus had taken Rome. Now about midnight came certaine souldiers from Crassus to Syllaes campe, & asked for meate for Crassus supper, and his mens, who hauing chased his flying enemies whom he had ouerthrowen, vnto the city of Antemna (which they tooke for refuge) had lodged his campe there. Sylla vnderstāding that, & being aduertised that the most parte of his enemies were ouerthrowen at this battell: went him selfe the next morning betimes vnto Antemna, where three thowsand

Sylla fled. Lucretius Ofella besieged Marius in Prænestɛ.

In the ende of Marius life it is reported contrarie, that Sylla besieged Marius the younger in Perusia, and not in Prænestɛ.

A thowſand of his enemies ſent to know if he would receiue them to mercy, if they yelded them ſelues vnto him. His aunſwer was, that he would pardon their liues, ſo as they would do ſome miſchiefe to their fellowes before they came to him. Theſe three thowſand hereupon truſting to his promiſe, fell apon their companions: and for the moſt parte one of them killed an other. Notwithſtãding, Sylla hauing gathered all thoſe togethe̅ that remained of his enemies, as wel the three thowſand, as the reſt, amounting in all to the number of ſix thowſand men, within the ſhow place where they vſed to run their horſes: whileſt he him ſelf held a counſell in the tẽple of the goddeſſe Bellona, & was making his oratiõ there, he had appointed certẽ to ſet vpõ thoſe ſix thowſand, & put them to the ſword euery man. Great and terrible were the cries of ſuch a number of men ſlaine in ſo ſmall a roome, as many may eaſily coniecture: inſomuch as the Se-B nators ſitting in counſell heard them very eaſily, and marueled what the matter was. But Sylla continuing on his oration which he had begon with a ſet ſteady countenance, without chaũging of colour, willed thẽ only to hearken what he ſayd, & not to trouble them ſelues with any thing done abroade: for they were but certen offenders & lewd perſons that were puniſhed by his cõmaundemẽt. This was enough to ſhew the ſimpleſt ROMANE in ROME, that they had but only chaunged the tyran, but not the tyranny. Now for Marius, that had bene euer of a churliſh & ſeuere nature euen from his childhood, he neuer chaũged for any authority, but did rather hardẽ his natural ſtubbornes. Where Sylla cõtrarily in the beginning, was very modeſt & ciuill in all his proſperity, & gaue great good hope that if he came to the authority of a prince, he would fauor nobility wel, & yet loue notwithſtanding the benefit of the people. And being C moreouer a man in his youth geuẽ all to pleaſure, deliting to laugh, ready to pity, & weepe for tender hart: in that he became after ſo cruell & bloody, the great alteraciõ gaue manifeſt cauſe to condemne the increaſe of honor & authority, as thonly meanes whereby mens maners continue not ſuch as they were at the firſt, but ſtill do chaunge & vary, making ſome fooles, others vaine & fantaſticall, & others extreame cruel & vnnaturall. But whether that alteracion of nature came by chaunging his ſtate & condicion, or that it was otherwiſe a violent breaking out of hidden malice, which then came to ſhewe it ſelfe, when the way of liberty was layed open: this matter is to be decided in ſome other treatiſe. So it came to paſſe, that Sylla fell to ſheading D of blood, & filled all ROME with infinite & vnſpeakeable murthers: for diuerſe were killed for priuate quarrels, that had nothing to do with Sylla at any time, who ſuffered his frends & thoſe about him to worke their wicked wills. Vntil at the length there was a young man called Caius Metellus, that was ſo bold to aske Sylla in open Senate, when all theſe miſeries ſhould end, and when they ſhould know that all the miſchieues were finiſhed, the which they dayly ſawe. For ſaid he, we will not intreate you to pardõ life, where you haue threatned death: but only to put thẽ out of dout, whom you haue determined to ſaue. Wherunto Sylla made aunſwer, that he was not reſolued whom he would ſaue. Metellus replied, thẽ tell vs quod he, who they are that ſhall dye. Sylla anſwered he would. Howbeit ſome ſay it was not Metellus, but Auſidius one of E his flatterers, that ſpake this laſt word vnto him. Wherefore Sylla immediatly without making any of the magiſtrats priuy, cauſed foure ſcore mens names to be ſet vp vpon poſtes, whom he would put to death. Euery mã being offẽded withal, the next day following he ſet vp two hundred & twenty mens names more: & likewiſe the third day as many more. Herupon, making an oration to the people, he told thẽ openly that he had appointed all them to dye, that he could call to remẽbraunce: howbeit that hereafter he would appoint them that ſhould dye by daies, as he did call them to minde. Whoſoeuer ſaued an outlaw in his houſe, for reward of his kindnes, he himſelfe was condẽned to dye: not excepting thẽ that had receiued their brothers, their ſonnes, their fathers, nor mothers. And the reward of euery homycide & murtherer that killed
F one of the outlawes, was two talentes: though it were a ſlaue that had killed his maſter, or the ſonne that had ſlaine the father. But the moſt wicked & vniuſt act of all was, that he depriued the ſonnes, & ſonnes ſonnes of them whom he had killed, of all credit & good name, & beſides that, had takẽ all their goods as cõfiſcate. And this was not only done in ROME, but alſo in all thẽ cities of ITALIE through out: & there was no tẽple of any god whatſoeuer, no auter in any bodies houſe, no liberty of hoſpital nor fathers houſe, that was not embrued with blood & horrible murder. For the husbãds were ſlaine in their wiues armes, & the childrẽ in their mothers laps:

and yet they which were slaine for priuate hatred & malice, were nothing in respect of those that were murdered only for their goods. And they that killed them might well say, his goodly great house made that man dye, his goodly fayer garden the other: and his hotte bathes the other. As amongest others, Quintus Aurelius, a man that neuer medled with any thinge, and least looked that these euills should light vpon him, and that only pitied those which he saw so miserably murdered: went one day into the market place, and reading the bill set vp of the outlawes names, found his owne name amongest the rest, and cried out alowde: alas the day that euer I was borne, my house of Alba maketh me to be put to death. He went not farre from the market place, but met with one that killed him presently. In the meane time, Marius the younger seeing he could by no meanes escape if he were taken, slue him selfe. And Sylla comming to Prænestæ, did first execute them by one and by one, keeping a certaine forme of iustice in putting them to death: but afterwardes as if he had no lenger leasure to remaine there, he caused them all to be put in a place together, to the number of twelue thowsand men, whom he caused to be put to the sword euery man, sauing his host only, vnto whom he sayd, that he shewed him specially fauor to saue his life. But his host aunswered him stowtly againe, that he would not be beholding vnto him for his life, seeing he had slaine all the rest of his contry men: and so thrusting in amongest the citizens, was willingly slaine with them.

Marius the younger slue him selfe at Præneste.

Sylla slue 12. thowsand men in Præneste, being put all into one place together.

Lucius Catilina slue his owne brother.

They thought the act of Lucius Catiline also very straunge, who had slaine his owne brother before the ciuill warre was ended: and then prayed Sylla to put him in the number of the outlawes, as if his brother had bene aliue. Sylla performed his desire. Catiline thereuppon to shewe his thankefulnesse for the pleasure Sylla had done him, went presently, and slue Marcus Marius, who was of the contrary faction: and brought him his head for a present before all the people, in the middest of the market place where he was sitting. When he had so done, he went and washed his handes all bloodied in the hallowed font of the temple of Apollo, that was hard by. But besides so many murders cõmitted, yet were there other things also that grieued the people maruelously. For he proclaimed him selfe Dictator, which office had not bene of six score yeares before in vse, and made the Senate discharge him of all that was past, geuing him free liberty afterwardes to kill whom he would, and to confiscate their goodes: to destroy cities, and to build vp new as he lifted: to take away kingdomes, and to geue them where he thought good. And furthermore, he openly sold the goodes confiscate, by the crier, sitting so prowdly and stately in his chayer of state, that it grieued the people more to see those goodes packt vp by them, to whome he gaue and disposed them: then to see them taken from those that had forfeited them. For somtimes he would geue a whole contry, or the whole reuenues of certaine cities, vnto women for their beawty, or vnto pleasaunt iesters, minstrells, or wicked slaues made free: and vnto some, he would geue other mens wiues by force, and make them to be maried against their willes. For he desiring (howesoeuer it happened) to make alliance with Pompey the great, cõmaunded him to put away his wife he had maried: and taking AEmylia (the daughter of AEmylius Scaurus, & of Metella his wife) from the great Glabrio, caused him to mary her great with childe as she was by Glabrio: but she dyed in childbed, in Pompeyis house. Lucretius Offella also that had brought Marius the younger to that distresse at the city of Prænestæ: suing to be Consull, Sylla commaunded him to cease his sute. But he notwithstandinge that expresse commaundement, went one day into the market place, with a great traine of men following him that fauored his cause. Whither Sylla sent one of his Centurions that slue Offella before all the people: him selfe sitting in a chayer of estate in the temple of Castor and Pollux, and seeing from aboue the murder done. The people that were about Offella, layed hold of the murderer straight & brought him before Sylla. But Sylla bad them be quiet, that brought the Centurion with tumult, and that they should let him goe, bicause he commaunded him to do it. Furthermore as touching his triumphe, it was a sumptuous sight to behold, for the rarenes of the riches, and princely spoyles which were shewed at the same. But yet was it so much the better set out, and worth the sight, to see the banished Romanes, who were the chiefest noble men of all the city of Rome, following his charet triumphant, wearing garlandes of flowers on their heades, calling Sylla their father, and sauior: bicause that by his meanes they returned to their contry, and recouered their goods, wiues, and children.

Sylla Dictator.

Lucretius Offella slaine.

A drum. In the end of his triumphe, he made an oration in open assembly of the people of ROME, in the which he did not only declare vnto the (according to the custome) what thinges he had done, but did as carefully tell them also as well of his good fortune and successe, as of his valiant deedes besides: and to conclude his oration, told them that by reason of the great fauor fortune had shewed him, he would from thenceforth be called by the, Felix, to say, happy, or fortunate. And he him selfe when he wrote vnto the GREECIANS, or that he had any thing to do with them: surnamed him selfe Epaphroditus, as who would say, a pleasaunt man, beloued and fauored of Venus. His tokens of triumphe which are yet in our contry, haue this superscription. Lucius Cornelius Sylla Epaphroditus. And when his wife Metella had brought him two twinnes, a sonne and a daughter: he named his sonne Faustus, signifying fortunate, Sylla's twinnes, named Faustus and Fausta.
B and his daughter Fausta: bicause the ROMANES call Faustum that, which falleth out prosperously, and happely. To be short, he trusted so much vnto his good fortune and doinges, that notwithstanding he had killed and put so many men to death, and had made so great a chaunge and innouation in the common wealth, yet of him selfe he left of his office of Dictator, and restored the people to the authority of election of Consulls againe, without his presence at the election: and frequented the market place as a priuate man among the citizens, offering him selfe to euery man that would aske him accompt of his doings past. It happened that a stowt and rash enemy of his was Chosen Consull against his will, called Marcus Lepidus, not for any deuotion the people had to Lepidus, but onely to gratifie Pompey, who gaue countenaunce and fauor vnto him. Sylla seeing Pompey come mery homewardes from the election, and ioyfull that he had obtained his frendes sute from all other suters: tooke him a side, & told him. In deede thou hast great cause to reioyce, young man my frende, for thou hast done a goodly acte: to choose Marcus Lepidus Consull, the veriest asse in all ROME, before Catulus the honestest man. But I tell thee one thing, thou haddest not nede to sleepe: for thou hast strengthened an enemy, that will be thine owne destruction. And Sylla proued a true prophet: for Lepidus being bent to all cruelty immediatly after, flatly fell at defiaunce with Pompey. Now Sylla consecratinge the dishes of all his goodes vnto Hercules, made exceeding sumptuous feastes vnto the ROMANES, the prouision whereof was so vnreasonable great, that euery day they threwe a great deale of meate into the riuer, and they dranke wine of forty yeares olde and aboue. During these feastes which continued many dayes, his wife Metella sickened, and dyed, Marcus Lepidus chosen Consull. Sylla feasted the people. Wine of forty yeares olde & vpward.
D and in her sickenes the Priestes and Soothsayers willed Sylla he should not come neere her, nor suffer his house to be polluted and defiled with mourning for the dead. Whereupon Sylla was diuorsed from her in her sickenes, and caused her to be caried into an other house, whilest she liued. And thus did Sylla curiously obserue the superstition and ordinaunce of the Soothsayers: but yet he brake the law which he made him selfe, touching the order of funeralls, sparinge no cost at Metellaes buriall. So did he also breake an other order him selfe had made, touching the reformation of banckets: comforting his sorrow with ordinary feastes, full of all vanity and lasciuiousnes. Within a fewe monethes after, he had fensers games at the sharpe: and the roomes of the Theater being open and vnseuered, men and women sitting together, it fortuned that there was a fayer Lady, and of a noble house, that sat hard by Sylla, called Va- Sylla brake his owne lawes he made.
E leria: she was the daughter of Messala, and sister of Hortensius the orator, and had bene diuorsed not long before from her husbande. This Lady passing by Sylla behinde him did softly put her hand on his shoulder, and tooke a heare from of his gowne, and so went on to her place, and sat her downe. Sylla marueling at this familiarity, looked earnestly vpon her: it is nothing my Lord, (quod she) but that I desire with others to be partaker a litle of your happines. Her words misliked not Sylla, but contrarily he shewed that she had tickled him with them: for he sent straight to aske her name, and enquired of what house she was, and how she had liued. But after many slye lookes betwene them, they turned their faces one to an other vpon euery occasion, with prety smyling countenaunces: so that in the ond, they came to promise & contract mariage together, for the which Valeria was not to be blamed. For though she was as F wise, as honest, and as vertuous a Lady as could be possible, yet the occasion that made Sylla mary her, was neither good nor commendable, bicause he was taken straight with a looke and a fine tongue, as if he had bene but a young boy: which commonly shew forth the filthiest pas- Valeria, desirous to be partaker of Sylles happines. Sylla maried Valeria, the sister of Hortensius the Orator.

sions of the minde, to be so caried, and with such motions. Now, notwithstanding he had this fayer young Lady in his house, he left not the company of women minstrells & tumblers, but to haue pleasaunt iesters and musitians about him, with whome he would lye wallowing and drinking all the day long, vppon litle cowches made for the noneſt. For, his companions that were in greateſt estimacion with him at that time, were these three: Roscius a maker of common playes, Sorex a prince of scoffers, and one Metrobius a singing man, whom he was in loue withall while he liued, & yet did not dissemble his loue, though he was past age to be beloued. This wicked life of his was cause of increasing his disease, the originall cause whereof had a light foundacion at the first. For he liued a great time before he perceiued that he had an impostume in his body, the which by processe of time came to corrupt his flesh in such sorte, that it turned all to lice: so that notwithstanding he had many men about him, to shift him continually night and day, yet the lyce they wiped away were nothing, in respect of them that multiplied still vpon him. And there was neither apparell, linnen, bathes, washing, nor meate it selfe, but was presently filled with swarmes of this vile vermine. For he went many times in the day into the bathe to washe and clense him selfe of them, but all would not serue: for the chaunging of his flesh into this putriture wanne it straight againe, that there was no clensing nor shifting of him, that could kepe such a nũber of lyce from him. Some say, that in old time (amongest the most auncientest men, whereof there is any memory) Acastus the sonne of Pelias, dyed of the lowsie euill: and long time after also, the Poet Alcman, and Pherecides the diuine: and so did Callisthenes Olynthian in prison, and Mutius a wise lawyer. And if we shall make mencion of those that are famous men, although it be not in any good matter: we finde that a bonde man called Eunus, he that was the first procurer of the warres of the bondmen in Sicilia, being taken and caried to Rome, dyed also of the same disease. Furthermore, Sylla did not only foresee his death, but he wrote some thing of it also: for he made an end of writing the two and twenty booke of his commentaries, two dayes before he dyed. In that booke he sayth, that the wise men of Chaldea had told him long before, that after he had liued honorably, he should ende his dayes in the flower of all his prosperity. And there he sayth also, that his sonne (who departed a litle before his mother Metella) appeared to him in his sleepe, apparrelled in an ill fauored gowne, and that comminge vnto him, he prayed him he would go with him vnto Metella his mother, thenceforth to liue in peace and rest with her. But for all his disease, he would not geue ouer to deale in matters of state. For tenne dayes before his death he pacified a sedition, and tumult, risen among the inhabitantes of the city of Puteolanvm (in Italian called Pozzolo) and there he gaue them lawes and ordinaunces, whereby they should gouerne them selues. And the day before he dyed, hearing that Granius who was in debt to the common wealth deferred payment of his money looking for his death: he sent for him, and made him come into his chamber, and there caused his men to compasse him about, and commaunded them to strangle him in his sight. The passion of his anger was so vehement against him, that by the extreame straining of him selfe, he brake the impostume in his body, so as there gushed out a wonderfull deale of blood: by reason whereof his strength failing him, he was full of paine and panges that night, and so dyed, leauing the two litle children he had by Metella. For Valeria, was brought to bed of a daughter after his death, which was called Posthumia, bicause the Romanes call those children that are borne after the death of their fathers, Posthumi. Now when Sylla was dead, many gathered about the Consull Lepidus to let that his body should not be honorably buried, as they were accustomed to bury noble men & men of quality. But Pompey, though he was angry with Sylla, bicause he had geuen him nothing in his will, and had remembred all his other frendes: yet he made some for loue, some by intreaty, and others with threatning to let it alone, and accompanying the corps to to Rome, gaue both safety and honor vnto the performance of his funeralls. And it is sayd also, that the Romane Ladies, amongest other things, bestowed such a quantity of perfumes & odoriferous matter towardes the same: that besides those which were brought in two hundred and tenne great baskets, they made a great image to the likenes of Sylla him selfe, and another of a sergeaunt carying the axes before him, all of excellent incence & synamon. When the day of the funeralls came, fearing least it would raine in the forenone, all the element be-

A ingso clowdy: they deferred to cary forth the body to be burnt, vntill past three of the clocke in the afternone. And then rose there such a sodaine boysterous winde, that it set all the stake of wodde straight a fire, that the body was burnt at a tryce, and the fire going out, fell a great shower of raine that held on till night: so that it seemed good fortune following him euen to his ende, did also helpe his obsequies after his death. His tombe is to be seene in the fielde of Mars, and they say that he him selfe made his owne epitaphe that is wrytten vpon it, which was: that no man did euer passe him, neither in doing good to his frendes, nor in doing mischiefe to his enemies. Syllaes epitaphe.

THE COMPARISON OF Sylla with Lysander.

A NOw that we haue at large also set forth the life of the ROMANE, let vs come to compare them both together. In this they are both a like, that both of them grew to be great men, rising of thē selues through their owne vertue: but this only is proper to Lysander, that all the offices & dignities which he attained vnto in the common wealth, were layed apon him through the peoples good wills and consents. For he compelled them to nothinge, neither vsurped he any extraordinarie authoritie vppon them, contrarie to lawe: for, as the common saying is:

VVhere partialitie, and discorde once doe raigne:
B There vvicked men are most esteemde, and rule vvith greatest gaine.

As at that time in ROME, the people being corrupted, and the state of gouernment vtterly subuerted and brought to nought: to day there rose vp one tyranne, to morow an other. And therefore we may not wonder if Sylla vsurped and ruled all, when such fellowes as Glaucia and Saturninus, did both banish and driue out of ROME such men as Metellus was: and where also in open assembly they slue Consuls sonnes in the market place, and where force of armes was bought & sold for gold and siluer, with the which the souldiers were corrupted: & where they made new lawes with fire and sword, and forced men to obey the same. Yet I speake not this in reproache of him that in such troublesome times founde meanes to make him selfe the greatest man: but to shew that I measure not his honesty by the dignity he grew vnto in so vnfortunate a city, although he became the chiefe. And as touching him that came from SPARTA (at what time it florished most, and was the best gouerned common weale) he in all great C causes, and in most honorable offices, was reputed for the best of all bests, and the chiefe of all chiefes. Wherefore it happened, that the one resigned vp the authority to his contry men, the citizens, which they had geuen him, who also restored it to him againe many and sundry The chiefe person is not alwayes the honestest.

times: for the honor of his vertue did alwayes remaine, and made him iuſtly accompted the worthieſt man. Where the other being once only choſen generall of an army, remained tenne yeares continually in warres and hoſtilitie, making him ſelfe by force, ſometime Conſull, ſomtime vice Conſull, and ſomtime Dictator, but alwayes continued a tyranne. Indede Lyſander attempted to chaunge, and alter the ſtate of gouernment in his contrie, howbeit it was with greater lenity, and more lawfully then Sylla did. For he ſought it by reaſon, and good perſwaſion, not by the ſword: neither would he make a chaunge of the whole at one ſelfe time as Sylla did, but ſought only to reforme the election of kinges. The which thing according to nature, doubtleſſe ſeemed very iuſt: that he which was the beſt amongeſt good men, ſhould be choſen king of that citie, which was the chiefe ouer all Greece, not for her nobility, but for her vertue only. For like as a good hunter doth not ſeeke for the whelpe of a good dogge, but for the good dogge him ſelfe: nor a wiſe man of armes alſo, the colte that commeth of a good horſe, but the good horſe him ſelfe. Euen ſo, he that taketh vpon him to ſtabliſh a ciuill gouernment, committeth a fowle fault: if he looke of whom his Prince ſhould be borne, and not what the Prince him ſelfe ſhould be, conſidering that the Lacedæmonians them ſelues haue depriued diuerſe of their kinges from their crowne and realme, bicauſe they were not Princely, but vnprofitable, and good for nothing. Vice, although it be in a noble man, yet is it alwayes ill of it ſelfe: but vertue is honored for her ſelfe alone, and not bicauſe ſhe is placed with nobility. Now for the wronges and iniuries they both committed, the one did worke only to pleaſure his frendes, and the other to offend them to whom he was bounden. For it is certaine, that Lyſander did great wronges to gratifie his familliars: and the moſt parte of them whom he put to death, was to eſtabliſh the tyrannicall power of certaine his frendes. Where Sylla ſought for ſpite to take away his army from Pompey, and the Admirallty from Dolobella, which he him ſelfe had geuen, & cauſed Lucretius Offella to be ſlaine openly in his owne ſight, bicauſe he ſought to be Conſull, for recompence of the good ſeruice he had done: for which cruelty of his, cauſinge his owne frendes to be ſlaine in ſuch ſorte, he made euery man afeard of him. Furthermore, their behauiors touching couetouſnes and pleaſure doth ſhew, that the intent of the one was the deſire of a good Prince, and the other, that of a tyranne. For we doe not finde that Lyſander, for all his great Princely authority, did euer vſe any inſolency or laſciuiouſnes in his deedes, but alwayes auoyded as much as a man might, the reproache of this common prouerbe: Lyons at home, and Foxes abroade: He led ſuch a true Laconian life, ſtraightly reformed in all poyntes. Where Sylla could neuer moderate his vnlawfull luſtes, neither for pouerty when he was young, nor yet for age, when it came vpon him. But whileſt he gaue lawes to the Romanes touching matrimoniall honeſtie and chaſtitie: him ſelfe in the meane time did nothing but follow loue, and commit adultries, as Saluſt wryteth. By meanes whereof he ſo much impoueriſhed Rome, and left it ſo voyde of gold and ſiluer: that for redy money he ſold abſolute freedome vnto the cities their confederates, yet was it his dayly ſtudy to confiſcate and take for forfeit, the richeſt and moſt wealthieſt houſes in all the whole citie of Rome. But all this ſpoyle and hauoke was nothing in compariſon of that which he dayly caſt away vpon his ieaſters & flatterers. What ſparing, or meaſure may we thinke he kept, in his giftes at priuate banckets: when openly in the day time (all the people of Rome being preſent to ſee him ſell the goodes which he had cauſed to be confiſcate) he made one of his frendes and familiars, to truſſe vp a great deale of houſehold ſtuffe, for a very litle price. And when any other had out bidden his price, & that the crier had cried it out alowde: then was he angry, and ſayd: My frendes, I haue great wrong done me here, not to ſuffer me ſell the ſpoile I haue gotten at mine owne pleaſure, and diſpoſe it as I liſt my ſelfe. Where Lyſander contrarily ſent to the common wealth of Sparta, with other money, the very preſentes that were geuen to him ſelfe. And yet I do not commende him in that deede. For, peraduenture he did more hurt to Sparta, bringing thither that gold & ſiluer: then Sylla did to Rome, in waſting and conſuming that he conſumed. Howbeit I alleage this onely, for proofe and declaration that Lyſander was nothing couetous. They both haue done that vnto their citie, which neuer any other but them ſelues did. For Sylla being a riotous and licentious man, brought his citizens notwithſtanding to good order and gouernment: and Lyſander contrarily filled his citie with

Lyſanders temperance and moderate life.

Syllaes licentious and prodigall life.

Syllaes tyrannicall ſaying.

A with vice, yet not infected withall him ſelfe. Thus were they both offendors, the one for breaking the law he commaunded to be kept, and the other in making the citizens worſe then he was him ſelfe: for he taught the SPARTANS to deſire thoſe thinges, which he aboue all things had learned to deſpiſe. And thus much concerning peace and ciuill gouernment. Now for matters of warre and battells fought, there is no compariſon to be made of Lyſander to Sylla, neither in number of victories, nor in hazard of battell. For Lyſander wanne only but two battells by ſea, beſides the taking of the citie of ATHENS: which (though I graunt him) being rightly conſidered, was no great exployte of warre, howbeit it was a noble act, conſidering the fame he wan by it. And as for things which happened to him in BOEOTIA, hard by the citie of ALIARTE: a man might ſay peraduenture that he had ill lucke. But yet me thinkes alſo there B was a fault in him, for that he ſtayed not for king Pauſanias aide (the which came from PLATEES immediatly after his ouerthrow) and bicauſe he went in a geere in fury, and in a vaine ambition to runne his head againſt a wall: ſo that men of all ſortes making a deſperate ſalye out of ALIARTE vpon him, ſlue him there to no purpoſe. Farre vnlike to Cleombrotus that died at the battell of LEVCTRES, reſiſting his enemies that diſtreſſed his men: nor yet like Cyrus, nor Epaminondas, who to keepe his men from flying, and to geue them aſſured victory, receiued his deadly wounde: for all theſe men dyed like noble kings, & valliant Captaines. Where Lyſander raſhly caſt him ſelfe away, to his great diſhonor, by too much venturing: prouing thereby, that the auncient SPARTANS did like wiſe men, to auoyde the fight with walles. For the nobleſt and valliantest man that is, or poſſible can be, may eaſily be ſo ſlaine, not onely by C the firſt ſouldier that commeth, but by euery ſeely woman or childe. As they ſay that the worthy Achilles was killed by Paris within the very gates of TROIA. Now to the contrarie againe, the victories that Sylla wanne in ſet battells, and the thowſandes of enemies which he ſlue, are not eaſily to be numbred, beſides alſo that he tooke the citty of ROME twiſe, and the hauen of ATHENS: not by famine as Lyſander did, but by force, after he had by many great battells driuen Archelaus out of firme land, into the maine ſea. It is to be conſidered alſo, againſt what Captaines they made warres. For me thinkes it was but a paſtime, as a mā might ſay, for Lyſander to fight with Antiochus, a pylot of Alcibiades, or to ſurpriſe and deceiue Philocles, a common orator at ATHENS,

Much vvorſe then tvvo edged ſvvord, his buſie tongue did ſeeme:
D VVhich pratled ſtill, and honeſtie did neuer once eſteeme,

And whom Mithridates (in my opinion) would not vouchſafe to compare with his horſe-keeper, nor Marius with one of his ſergeauntes or maſebearers. But to leaue a ſide the particular names of all other Princes, Lordes, Conſulls, Prætors, Captaines, and Gouernors that made warres with Sylla: what ROMANE Captaine was there more to be feared, then Marius? what king liuing was there of ſuch power as king Mithridates? And of Generalls and Lieutenauntes of armies in all ITALIE, were there any euer more valliant, then Lamponius and Theleſinus: of the which Sylla draue the one away, and brought the other to obey him, and ſlue the two laſt? But the greateſt matter of all that we haue ſpoken of yet, in my opinion was, that Lyſander did all his noble actes, with the aide of his whole contrie: where Sylla to the contrarie E did his, (being baniſhed from his contry) by his enemies. And at the ſelfe ſame time that they draue Syllaes wife out of ROME, that they ouerthrewe his houſes, and ſlue his frendes alſo in ROME: he notwithſtanding made warres in the meane time with infinite thowſandes of fighting men in BOEOTIA, and ventred his perſon in manifold daungers, ſo that in the end he conquered them all to the honor & benefit of his contry. Furthermore, Sylla would neuer ſtoupe to king Mithridates, for any particular allyance he offred him, neither yeelde vnto him for any aide of men, or money, to warre againſt his enemies: but a thing moſt chiefely to be noted aboue the reſt, he would not vouchſafe to ſpeake to Mithridates, nor to take him by the hande onely, before he had ſpoken it with his owne mouth, and faithfully promiſed, that he would forgoe ASIA, deliuer him his gallies, and geue vp the realmes of BITHYNIA and CAPPADO-F CIA vnto their naturall kinges. This me thinkes was the goodlieſt act that euer Sylla did, and proceeded of the greateſt magnanimity, to haue preferred the benefit of the common wealth in that ſorte, before his priuate cōmodity. For therin he was like vnto a good greyhoūd that firſt

pincheth the deare, and holdeth him faſt, till he haue ouerthrowen him: and then afterwarde followeth the recouery of his owne priuate quarrell. And laſtly, me thinkes it is eaſily iudged what difference there was betwene their two natures, in that they did both towardes the cite of ATHENS. For Sylla hauing taken it, after the citizens had made fierce warres with him for the increaſe of king Mithridates greatnes: yet he left it free vnto them, enioying their owne lawes. Where Lyſander to the contrary, ſeing ſuch a mighty ſtate and Empire as that, ouerthrowen from the great rule it bare, had no pity of it at all, but tooke away the libertie of popular gouernment, whereby it had bene gouerned of long time before: and eſtabliſhed there very cruell and wicked tyrans. And therfore in myne opinion, we ſhall not much ſwarue from troth, if we geue this iudgement: that Sylla did the greater acts: and Lyſander committed the fewer faultes. And that we geue to the one the honor of a continent and modeſt man: and to the other, the commendacion of a valliant and skilfull ſouldier.

Plutarkes iudgement of Sylla and Lyſander.

Peripoltas & his poſterity.

PEripoltas the Soothſayer, he that brought king Opheltas out of THESSALIE into the contry of BOEOTIA, with the people which were vndre his obedience: left a poſterity after him that long time floriſhed in that contry, the more parte of the which were euer reſident in the city of CHÆRONEA, bicauſe it was the firſt city that was cõquered from the barbarous people whom they expulſed thence. All they that came of that race, were commonly men of great corage, and naturally geuen to the warres: who were ſo forward and aduenturous in all daungers therof (in the inuaſions of the MEDES into GREECE, & in the battells of the GAVLES) that they were ſlaine all of them, but onely Damon (a litle childe left fatherleſſe and motherleſſe) ſurnamed Peripoltas that eſcaped, who for goodly perſonage and noble corage excelled all the luſty youthes of his time, though otherwiſe he was very rude, and of a ſeuere nature. Now it fortuned, that when Damon was growen of full age, a ROMANE Captaine of an enſigne of footemen (lying in garriſon for the winter ſeaſon in the citie of CHE-

The maners & lewd partes of Damon Peripoltas.

A Chæronea) fell in great loue with Damon: and bicauſe he could not reape the frutes of his dishoneſt loue by no intreaty nor giftes, there appeared vehement preſumptions that by force he went about to abuſe him, for that Chæronea at that time (being my naturall city where I was borne) was a ſmall thing, and (being of no ſtrength nor power) little regarded. Damon miſtruſting the Captaines villanie, and deteſting his abhominable deſire watched him a ſhrewd time, and got certaine of his companions (not many in number, bicauſe he might the more ſecretly compaſſe his enterpriſe) to be a counſel with him, and take his parte againſt the Captaine. Now there were a ſixteene of them in conſort together, that one night blacked their faces all with ſoote, & the next morning after they had dronke together, by the breake of day ſet vpon this Romane Captaine, that was making ſacrifice in the market place, and ſlue him
B with a good number of his men: and when they had done, fled out of the citie, which was ſtraight in a great vprore for the murther committed. Thereuppon they called a counſell, and in the market place condemned Damon and his confederates to ſuffer paines of death: hoping thereby to haue cleared their innocencie for the fact done to the Romaines. But the ſelfe ſame night, as all the magiſtrates and officers of the city were at ſupper together in the towne houſe according to their cuſtome: Damon & his followers ſtale vpon them ſodainly, ſlue them all, & fled againe vpon it. It chaunſed about that time, that Lucius Lucullus being ſent on ſome iorney, paſſed by the city of Chæronea with his army: & bicauſe this murther was but newly done, he ſtayed there a few dayes to examine the troth & originall thereof. And found that the commons of the citie were in no fault, but that they them ſelues alſo had receiued hurte:
C whereupon he tooke the ſouldiers of the Romanes that remained of the garriſon, & caried thē away with him. In the meane time, Damon deſtroyed all the contry thereabout, and ſtill houeted neere to the citie, inſomuch as the inhabitantes of the ſame were driuen in the end to ſend vnto him, and by gentle wordes and fauorable decrees handled him ſo, that they intyſed him to come againe into the city: and when they had him amongeſt them, they choſe him Gymnaſiarchus, to ſay, a maſter of exerciſes of youth. But ſhortly after, as they were rubbing of him with oyle in his ſtoone or hotte houſe, ſtarke naked as he was, they ſlue him by treaſon. And bicauſe that there appeared ſprights of long time after in that place, & that there were heard D groninges & ſighings as our fathers tolde vs, they cauſed the dore of the hotte houſe to be walled vp: yet for all that, there are viſions ſeene, and terrible voyces and cries heard in that ſelfe place vnto this preſent time, as the neighbours dwellinge by doe teſtifie. Now they that were diſcended of this Damon (for there are yet of his race in the contrie of Phocians, neere vnto the citie of Stiris, who do only of all other both keepe the language and maners of the Æolians) are called Asbolomeni, ſignifyinge blacke, and beſmered with ſoote: bicauſe that Damon and his fellowes did blacke their faces with ſoote, when they ſlue the Romane
E Captaine. But the Orchomenians being neere neighbors vnto the Chæronians, and therfore their enemies, hyered an informer of Rome, a malitious accuſer, to accuſe the whole citie, (as if it had bene one priuate perſon alone) for the murther of the Romanes, whome Damon and his companions had ſlaine. The inditement was drawen, and the caſe pleaded before the gouernor of Macedon, for that the Romanes did ſend no gouernors at that time into Greece: and the counſellers that pleaded for the citie of Chæronea, relied vpon the teſtimonie of Lucius Lucullus, referring them ſelues to his reporte, who knew the troth, & how it was. Thereuppon the gouernor wrote vnto him, and Lucullus in his letter of aunſwere aduer-
F tiſed the very troth: ſo was our city cleared of the accuſation, which otherwiſe ſtoode in daunger of vtter deſtruction. The inhabitantes of the city of Chæronea, for that they had eſcaped the daunger by teſtimonie of Lucius Lucullus, to honor him withall, they ſet vp his image in ſtone in the market place, next vnto the image of Bacchus. And we alſo that be liuing at this preſent, though many yeares be gone and paſſed ſence, do notwithſtanding recken our ſelues partakers of his forepaſſed benefit. And bicauſe we are perſwaded, that the image and portraiture that maketh vs acquainted with mens manners and condicions, is farre more excellent, then the picture that repreſenteth any mans perſon or ſhape only: we will comprehend his life and doinges according to the troth, in this volume of noble mens liues, where we doe compare and ſorte them one with an other. It ſhalbe ſufficient for vs therefore, that we ſhew our ſelues thankefull for his benefit, and we thinke, that he himſelfe would miſlike for reward of his true teſtimonie, to be requited with a fauorable lye told in his behalfe. But like as when we will haue a paſſinge fayer face drawen, and liuely counterfeated, and that hath an excellent good grace withall, yet ſome manner of bleamiſhe or imperfection in it: we will not allowe the drawer to leaue it out altogether, nor yet too curiouſly to ſhewe it, bicauſe the one would deforme the counterfeate, and the other make it very vnlikely. Euen ſo, bicauſe it is a hard thing (or to ſay better, peraduenture impoſſible) to deſcribe a man, whoſe life ſhould altogether be innocent, and perfect: we muſt firſt ſtudy to wryte his vertues at large, and then by ſeeke perfectly to repreſent the troth, euen as the life it ſelfe. But where by chaūce we finde certaine faultes and errors in their doinges, proceeding either of paſſion of the minde, by neceſſity of the time or ſtate of the common wealth: they are rather to be thought imperfections of vertue not altogether accompliſhed, then any purpoſed wickednes proceeding of vice, or certaine malice. Which we ſhall not neede too curiouſly to expreſſe in our hiſtory, but rather to paſſe them lightly ouer, of reuerent ſhame to the meere frayelty of mans nature, which can not bringe foorth a man of ſuch vertue and perfection, but there is euer ſome imperfection in him. And therefore, conſidering with my ſelfe vnto whome I might compare Lucullus, I thought it beſt to compare him with Cimon, bicauſe they haue bene both valliant ſouldiers againſt their enemies, hauing both done notable exploytes in warres againſt the barbarous people: and moreouer, they haue both bene curteous & mercifull vnto their citizens, & were both the only men that pacified the ciuill warres and diſſention in their contrie, and both the one & the other of them wan notable victories of the barbarous people. For there was neuer Greecian Captaine before Cimon, nor Romane Captaine before Lucullus, that had made warres ſo farre of from their contrie leauing a parte the deedes of Bacchus and of Hercules, and the deedes alſo of Perſeus, againſt the Æthiopians, the Medes, and the Armenians, and the deedes of Iaſon alſo: if there remaine any monument extant ſince their time, worthie of credit in theſe our dayes. Furthermore, herein they are to be likened together: that they neuer ended their warres, they only ouerthrewe their enemies, but neuer ouercame them altogether. Againe, they may note in them a great reſemblaunce of nature, for their honeſtie, curteſie and humanitie, which they ſhewed vnto ſtraungers in their contrie: and for the magnificence and ſumptuouſnes of their life and ordinarie expence. It may be we doe leaue out ſome other ſimilitudes betwene them: howbeit in the diſcourſe of their liues they will eaſily appeare. Cimon was the ſonne of Miltiades and of Hegeſipyle, a Thracian woman borne, and the daughter of king Olorus, as we finde wrytten in certaine poeticall verſes which Melanthius and Archelaus haue wrytten of Cimon. The father of Thucydides the hiſtoriographer him ſelfe, who was of kinne alſo vnto Cimon, was called in like manner Olorus, ſhowing by the agreeing of the name, that this king Olorus was one of his aunceſters, and did alſo poſſeſſe mines of gold in the contry of Thracia. It is ſayd moreouer that he dyed in a certaine place called the ditchie forreſt, where he was ſlaine: howbeit that his aſhes and bones were caried into the contrie of Attica, where his tombe appeareth yet to this day, amongeſt the tombes of them of the houſe and family of Cimon, neere vnto the tombe of Cimons owne ſiſter called Elpinice. Notwithſtanding, Thucydides was of the village of Alimvs, and Miltiades of the village of Lacia. This Miltiades Cimons father, being condemned by the ſtate to pay the ſumme of fifty talentes, was for non payment caſt into priſon, and there dyed: and left Cimon and his ſiſter Elpinicè aliue, both Orphanes, and very young. Now, Cimon in his firſt young yeares had a very ill name and reporte in the city, being counted a riotous young man, & a great drinker, following his grandfather Cimons facions vp and downe, as he had alſo his name: ſauing that his grandfather for his beaſtlines was ſurnamed Coalemos, as much to ſay as foole. Steſimbrotus Thasian, who was about Cimons time, wryteth, that Cimon neuer learned muſike, nor any other of the liberall ſciences accuſtomably taught to young noble mens ſonnes of Greece, & that he had no ſharpe wit, nor good grace of ſpeaking, a vertue proper vnto children borne in the contry of Attica: howbeit that he was of a noble minde, and plaine, without diſſimulacion, ſo that he rather liued Peloponnesian like, then like an Athenian. For he was euen ſuch as the Poet Euripides deſcribed Hercules to be:

As honest eke in thinges of weight, as wit could well deuise.

This serued fitly to be applied vnto Stesimbrotus wordes wrytten of him: but notwithstanding, in his first younge yeares he was suspected of incontinency with his sister, who in deede otherwise had no very good name. For she was very familiar with the painter Polygnotus, who painting the TROIAN Ladies prisoners, vpon the walls of the gallery, called the Plesianaction, and now Pœcile: (to say, set out and beawtified with diuers pictures) he drue (as they say) LAODICES face vpon Elpinices picture. This painter Polygnotus was no common artificer nor hireling, that painted this gallery for moneys sake, but gaue his labor franckely to the common wealth, as all the historiographers that wrote in that time do witnesse: and as the Poet Melanthius also reciteth in these verses.

Polygnotus the painter.

At his owne proper charge, great cost he hath bestowed:
In decking vp our temples here with gilted roofes embowed,
For honor of the goddes. And in our town like wise,
He hath adorn'd the common place, with many a fine deuise.
Painting and setting forth, in stately show to see,
The images of demy goddes that here amongest vs be.

Yet some say that Elpinice did not secretly companie with her brother Cimon, but lay with him openly as his lawfull maried wife, bicause she could not for her pouerty haue a husband of like nobilitie and parentage to her selfe. Howbeit, that a certaine man called Callias, being one of the richest men of the citie, did afterwardes fall in fansie with her, and desired to mary her, offering to pay her father Miltiades fine of fiftie talents, wherein he stoode condemned a debter to the state, so that he might haue her to his wife. Cimon was contented, and vpon that condicion maried his sister Elpinice vnto Callias. This notwithstandinge, it is certaine that Cimon was somewhat amorous, and geuen to loue women. For Melanthius the Poet in certaine of his elegies, maketh mencion for his pleasure of one Asteria borne at SALAMINA, and of an other called Mnestra, as if Cimon had bene in loue with them. But vndoutedly, he loued his lawfull wife Isodice maruelous well, the daughter of Euryptolemus, Megacles sonne, and tooke her death very grieuously, as we may coniecture by the elegies that were wrytten vnto him, to comforte him in his sorowe. Panætius the Philosopher is of opinion, that Archestratus the Phisitian wrote those elegies: and sure it is not vnlikely, considering the time in which they were wrytten. But furthermore, Cimons nature and condicions deserued great commendacion. For his valliantnesse he gaue no place vnto Miltiades, and for his wisedome and iudgement, he was not inferior vnto Themistocles: and it is out of all doubt that he was a iuster and honester man, then either of them both. For he was equall with the best of either of both in the discipline of warres, and for the valliantnesse of a noble Captaine: and he did much excell them both in the properties of a good gouernor, and in thadministracion of the affayres of a citie, when he was but a younge man, and had no experience of warres. For when Themistocles at the comminge in of the MEDES counselled the people of ATHENS to goe out of the citie, to leaue their landes and contrie, and to shippe into gallies, and fight with the barbarous people by sea in the straight of SALAMINA: as euerie man was wonderinge at his bolde and venturous counsell, Cimon was the first man that went with a lyre and iolitie through the streete Ceramicus, vnto the castell, accompanied with his younge familiars and companions, caryinge a bitte of a bridle in his hande to consecrate vnto the goddesse Minerua, signifyinge thereby, that the citie had no necde of horsemen at that time, but of mariners and seamen. And after he had geuen vp his offering, he tooke one of the targettes that honge vppon the wall of the temple, and hauinge made his prayer vnto Minerua, came downe to the hauen, and was the first that made the most parte of the citizens to take a good harte to them, and coragiously to leaue the land, and take the sea. Besides all this, he was a man of a goodly stature, as Ion the Poet testifieth, and had a layer curled heare and thicke, and fought so valiantlie at the day of the battell, that he wanne immediatly great reputacion, with the loue and good will of euerie man. So that many were still about him to encourage him, to be lucky and valliant, and to thinke thence foorth to doe ſome actes worthie of the glorie that his father had gotten at the battell of MARATHON. And afterwardes, ſo ſoone as he beganne to deale in matters of ſtate, the people were maruelous glad of him, and were wearied with Themiſtocles: by meanes whereof Cimon was preſently aduaunced and preferred, to the chiefeſt offices of honor in the citie, being very well thought on of the common people, bicauſe of his ſoft and plaine nature. Moreouer, Ariſtides alſo did greatlie furder his aduauncement, bicauſe he ſawe him of a good gentle nature, and for that he would vſe him as a countrepeaſe to controll Themiſtocles craft and ſtowtneſſe. Wherefore after the MEDES were fled out of GREECE, Cimon being ſent for by the ATHENIANS for their generall by ſea, when the citie of ATHENS had then no manner of rule nor commaundement, but followed kinge Pauſanias and the LACEDÆMONIANS: he euer kept his contrie men and citizens in maruelous good order in all the viages he made, and they were readier to doe good ſeruice, then any other nation in the whole armie whatſoeuer. And when kinge Pauſanias had practiſed with the barbarous people to betraye GREECE, had wrytten alſo to the kinge of PERSIA about it, and in the meane time delt very cruelly and ſtraightly with the confederates of his contry, and committed many inſolent partes by reaſon of the great authority he had, & through his fooliſh pride whereof he was full: Cimon farre otherwiſe, gently entertained them whom Pauſanias iniured, and was willing to heare them. So that by this his curteous manner, the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing no eye to his doinges, he ſtale away the rule and commaundement of all GREECE from them, & brought the ATHENIANS to be ſole Lordes of all, not by force and cruelty, but by his ſweete tongue, and gracious manner of vſing all men. For the moſt parte of the confederates being no lenger able to away with Pauſanias pride and cruelty, came willingly and ſubmitted them ſelues vnder the protection of Cimon and Ariſtides; who did not only receiue them, but wrote alſo to the counſell of the Ephores at LACEDÆMON, that they ſhould call Pauſanias home, for that he diſhonored SPARTA, and put all GREECE to much trouble and warre. And for proofe hereof, they ſay that king Pauſanias being on a time in the citie of BYZANCE, ſent for Cleonice, a young maiden of a noble houſe, to take his pleaſure of her. Her parentes durſt not keepe her from him, by reaſon of his crueltie, but ſuffered him to cary her away. The young gentlewoman prayed the groomes of Pauſanias chamber to take away the lighte, and thinking in the darke to come to Pauſanias bed that was aſleepe, groping for the bed as ſoftly as ſhe could to make no noyſe, ſhe vnfortunately hit againſt the lampe, and ouerthrew it. The falling of the lampe made ſuch a noyſe, that it waked him on the ſodaine, and thought ſtraight therewithall that ſome of his enemies had bene comen traiterouſly to kill him, whereupon he tooke his dagger lying vnder his beddes head, and ſo ſtabbed it in the young virgine, that ſhe dyed immediatly vpon it. Howbeit ſhe neuer let Pauſanias take reſt after that, bicauſe her ſpirite came euery night and appeared vnto him, as he would faine haue ſlept, and ſpake this angrily to him in verſe, as followeth:

Cimon Generall for the Athenians by ſea.

King Pauſanias through his inſolency and pride, loſt the Lacedæmonians all their rule of Greece.

Pauſanias killed the young Byzantine virgine.

Keepe thou thy ſelfe vpright, and iuſtice ſee thou feare,
For vvoe and ſhame be vnto him, that iuſtice dovvne doth beare.

This vile fact of his did ſo ſtirre vp all the confederates harres againſt him, that they came to beſiege him in BIZANTIVM vnder the conduction of Cimon: from whom notwithſtanding he eſcaped, & ſecretly ſaued him ſelfe. And bicauſe that this maidens ſpirite would neuer let him reſt, but vexed him continually; he fled vnto the city of HERACLEA, where there was a temple that coniured dead ſpirites, & there was the ſpirite of Cleonice coniured, to pray her to be contented. So ſhe appeared vnto him, & told him that he ſhould be deliuered of all his troubles ſo ſoone as he came to SPARTA; ſignifying thereby (in my opinion) the death which he ſhould ſuffer there. Diuers wryters do thus reporte it. Cimon being accompanied with the confederates of the GREECIANS, which were come to him to take his parte; was aduertiſed that certaine great men of PERSIA, & allyed to the king himſelfe, who kept the city of EION vpon the riuer of Strymon in the contrie of THRACIA, did great hurt and damage vnto the GREECIANS inhabiting thereabouts. Vpon which intelligence he tooke the ſea with his armie, and went thither; where at his firſt comming he vanquiſhed and ouerthrewe the barbarous people in battell: & hauinge ouerthrowen them, drave all the reſt into the citie of EION.

A That done, he went to inuade the THRACIANS that dwelt on the other ſide of the riuer of Strymon, who did commonly vittell them of EIONE: and hauing driuen them to forſake the contrie, he kept it, and was Lord of the whole him ſelfe. Whereupon he held them that were beſieged at EIONE ſo ſtraightly from vittells, that Butes the king of PERSIANS Lieutenaunt, diſpayringe of the ſtate of the citie, ſet fire on the ſame, and burnt him ſelfe, his frendes, and all the goodes in it. By reaſon whereof, the ſpoyle taken in that citie was but ſmall, biecauſe the barbarous people burnt all the beſt thinges in it with them ſelues: howebeit he conquered the contrie thereaboutes, and gaue it the ATHENIANS to inhabite, being a verie pleaſaunte and fertyle ſoyle. In memorie whereof, the people of ATHENS ſuffered him to conſecrate and ſet vp openly three Hermes of ſtone, (which are foure ſquare pillers) vpon

E Now, though Cimons name be not compriſed in theſe inſcriptions, yet they thought that this was a ſingular honor to him at that time: for neither Miltiades nor Themiſtocles had euer the like. For when Miltiades requeſted the people one day that they woulde licence him to weare a garland of olyue boughes vpon his head: there was one Sochares, borne in the towne of DECELEA, that ſtanding vp in open aſſembly ſpake againſt him, and ſayd a thing that marueloully pleaſed the people, though in deede it was an vnthankeful recompence for the good ſeruice he had done to the common wealth. When you haue Miltiades, (ſayd he) ouercome the barbarous people alone in battell, then aske to be honored alone alſo. But howe was it then, that Cimons ſeruice was ſo acceptable to the ATHENIANS? Yt was in myne opinion, bicauſe they had with other Captaines fought to defende them ſelues and their contrie
F onely: and that vnder the conduction of Cimon, they had aſſulted and driuen their enemies home to their owne dores, where they conquered the cities of EIONE and of Amphipolis,

which afterwardes they did inhabite with their owne citizens, and wanne there also the Ile of Scyros, which Cimon tooke vpon this occasion. The Dolopians did inhabite it, who were idle people, and liued without labor or tillage, and had bene rouers of the sea of a wonderfull long time, vsing pyracie altogether to maintaine them selues withall: so that in the end they spared not so much as the marchaūts & passengers that harbored in their hauens, but robbed certaine Thessalians that went thither to trafficke. And when they had taken their goodes from thē, yet would they cast them in prison besides. Howbeit the prisoners found meanes to escape, & after they had saued them selues, repayred to the parlament of the Amphictyons, which is a generall counsell of all the states and people of Greece. The Amphictyons vnderstandinge the matter, condemned the citie of the Scyrians to pay a great summe of money. The citizens refused to be contributaries to the payment of the fine, & bad them that robbed the marchauntes and had the goodes in their handes, pay it if they would. And therfore, bicause there was no other likelyhood, but that the theeues them selues should be driuen to aunswer the fine, they fearing it, wrote letters vnto Cimon, and willed him to come with his army, and they would deliuer their city into his handes: the which was performed. And thus Cimon hauing cōquered this Iland, draue out the Dolopians thence, & ryd the sea Ægeum of all pirates therby. That done, remembring that the auncient Theseus, the sonne of Aegeus, flying from Athens came into that Iland of Scyros, where king Lycomedes suspecting his comming had traiterously slaine him. Cimon was maruelous carefull to seeke out his tombe, bicause the Athenians had an oracle and prophecie, that commaunded them to bring his ashes and bones backe againe to Athens, and to honor him as a demy god. But they knewe not where he was buried, for that the inhabitantes of the Ilande would neuer before confesse where it was, nor suffer any man to seeke it out, till he at the last with much a doe founde the tombe, put his bones abord the Admirall galley sumptuously decked and set foorth, and so brought them againe into his contry, foure hundred yeares after Theseus death. For this, the people thanked him maruelously, and thereby he wanne exceedingly the Athenians good willes: and in memorie of him they celebrated the iudgement of the tragicall playes of the Poets. For when Sophocles the Poet, being a young man had played his first tragedy, Aphepsion the president perceiuinge there was great strife and contention amongest the lookers on, would not draw them by lottes that should be iudges of this play, to geue the victorie vnto that Poet that had best deserued: but when Cimon & the other Captaines were come into the Theater to see the same, (after they had made their accustomed oblatiōs vnto the god, in honor of whom these playes were celebrated) he stayed, and made them to minister an othe vnto tenne, (which were of euery tribe of the people, one) and the othe being geuen, he caused thē to sit as iudges to geue sentēce, which of the Poets should cary away the prise. This made all the Poetes striue and contend who best shoulde doe, for the honor of the iudges: but Sophocles, by their sentence bare away the victory. But AEschilus (as they say) was so angry and grieued withall, that he taried not long after in Athens, and went for spight into Sicilia, where he dyed and was buried neere vnto the citie of Gela. Ion wryteth that he being but a young boy, newly come from Chio vnto Athens, supped one night with Cimon at Laomedons house, and that after supper when they had geuen the goddes thankes, Cimon was intreated by the company to sing. And he did sing with so good a grace, that euery man praised him that heard him, & sayd he was more curteous then Themistocles farre: who being in like company, and requested also to play vpon the citherne, aunswered them, he was neuer taught to sing nor play vpon the citherne, howbeit he could make a poore village to become a rich and mighty city. After that done, the company discoursing from one matter to an other, as it falleth out commonly in speeche, they entred in talke of Cimons doinges: and hauing rehearsed the chiefest of them, he him selfe told one, which was the notablest and wisest parte of all the rest that euer he played. For the Athenians and their confederates together, hauing taken a great number of barbarous people prisoners, in the cities of Sestos and of Bizantium: the confederates to honor him withall, gaue him the preheminence to deuide the spoyle amongest them. Whereuppon he made the diuision, and set out the bodies of the barbarous people all naked by them selues, and layed the spoyles and their apparell by them selues. The confe-

A confederates founde this distribution very vnequall: but neuertheleſſe Cimon gaue them the choyce to chooſe which of the two they would, and that the ATHENIANS ſhould be contented with that which they left. So there was a SAMIAN Captaine called Herophytus, that gaue the confederats counſel rather to take the ſpoiles of the PERSIANS, then the PERSIANS themſelues, and ſo they did: for they tooke the ſpoile of the priſoners goodes and apparell, and left the men vnto the ATHENIANS. Wherupon Cimon was thought at that time of the common ſouldiers to be but an ill deuider of ſpoyle, becauſe that the confederats caried away great ſtore of chaines, karkanets, and braſelets of gold, & goodly rich purple apparell after the PERSIAN facion: and the ATHENIANS brought away naked bodies of men, very tender and vnacquainted with paine and labor. But ſhortly after, the parentes and frendes of theſe priſoners, came B out of PHRYGIA and LYDIA, and redeemed euery man of them at a great raunſome: ſo that Cimon gathered ſuch a maſſe of readie money together by their raunſome, as he defrayed the whole charges of all his gallies with the ſame, for the ſpace of foure monethes after, and left a great ſumme of money beſides in the ſparing treaſure of ATHENS. Cimon by this meanes being nowe become riche, beſtowed the goodes which he had thus honorably gotten from the barbarous people, more honorably againe, in relieuing his poore decayed citizens. For he brake vp all his hedges and incloſures, and layed them plaine and open, that trauellers paſſing by, and his owne poore citizens, might take as much frute thereof as they would, without any maner daunger. And furthermore, kept a continuall table in his houſe, not furniſhed with many diſhes, but with meate ſufficient for many perſons, and where his poore contrie men were C dayly refreſhed, that would come vnto that ordinary: ſo as they needed not otherwiſe care to labor for their liuing, but might be the readier, & haue the more leaſure to ſerue the common wealth. Yet Ariſtotle the Philoſopher wryteth, that it was not for all the ATHENIANS indifferently, that he kept this ordinarie table: but for his poore townes men onely in the village of LACIA, where he was borne. Furthermore, he had alwayes certaine young men waiting on him of his houſehold ſeruauntes well apparelled, & if he met by chaunce as he went vp and downe the citie, any olde citizen poorely arrayed, he made one of theſe younge men ſtrip himſelfe, and chaunge apparell with the olde man: and that was very well thought of, and they all honored him for it. Moreouer, theſe young men caried euer good ſtore of money about them: and when they met with any honeſt poore citizen in the market place, or elſe where, D knowinge his pouertie, they ſecretly gaue him money in his hande, and ſayd neuer a worde. Which the Poet ſelfe Cratinus ſeemeth to ſpeake of, in a comedie of his intituled the Archiloches.

the goodes to be in common amongeſt them, as the Poets ſay they were in the old time of Saturnes raigne. And now, where ſome accuſed this honeſt liberality of Cimon, obiecting that it was but to flatter the common people withall, and to winne their good willes by that meanes the maner of life he led, accompanying his liberality, did vtterly confute and ouerthrow their opinions that way of him. For Cimon euer tooke parte with the nobilitie, and liued after the LACEDÆMONIANS manner, as it well appeared, in that he was alwayes againſt Themiſtocles, who without all compaſſe of reaſon encreaſed the authority and power of the people: and for this cauſe he ioyned with Ariſtides, and was againſt Ephialtes, who would for the peoples ſake haue put downe and aboliſhed Ariopagus courte. And where all other gouernors in his time were extorcioners, and bribetakers: (Ariſtides and Ephialtes only excepted) he to the contrarie led an vncorrupt life in adminiſtracion of iuſtice, & euer had cleane hands, whatſoeuer he ſpake or did, for the ſtate and common wealth, and would therefore neuer take money of any man liuing. And for proofe hereof, we finde it wrytten, that a noble man of PERSIA called Reſaces, being a traitor to his maſter the king of PERSIA, fled on a time vnto ATHENS: where being continually bayted and wearied, with the common accuſations of theſe tale bearers & picke thanks, that accuſed him to the people, he repayred at the length vnto Cimon, & brought him home to his owne dore two bowles, thone full of darickes of gold, and the other of darickes of ſiluer, which be peeces of money ſo called, bicauſe that the name of Darius was written vpon them. Cimon ſeeing this offer, fell a laughing, and asked him whether of the two he would rather chooſe: to haue him his frende, or his hierling. The barbarous noble man aunſwered him, that he had rather haue him his frend. Then ſayd Cimon to him againe, away with thy golde and ſiluer, and get thee hence: for if I be thy frend, that gold and ſiluer ſhall euer be at my commaundement, to take and diſpoſe it as I haue neede. About that time beganne the confederates of the ATHENIANS to be weary of the warres againſt the barbarous people, deſiring thenceforth to liue quietly, and to haue leaſure to manure and husband their grounds, and to trafficke alſo, conſidering that they had driuen their enemies out of their contrie, and that now they did them no more hurte: by reaſon whereof they payed the money they were ſeſſed at, but they would furniſh no moe men nor ſhippes as they had done before. But the other Captaines of the ATHENIANS compelled them to it by all the meanes they could, and proſecuted law againſt them that failed payment, condemning them in great fines, and that ſo cruelly, that they made the ſeigniorie and dominion of the ATHENIANS hatefull vnto their confederates. Howbeit Cimon tooke a contrary courſe to them: for he compelled no man, but was content to take money and voyde ſhips of thē that would not, or could not ſerue in their perſons, being very glad to ſuffer them to become ſlothfull mongrells in their houſes, by too much reſt, and to tranſpoſe them ſelues from good ſouldiers which they had bene, to laborers, marchauntes, and farmers, altogether altered from armes and warres, through the beaſtly ſlothfull deſire they had, to liue pleaſauntly at home. And contrarily, cauſing a great number of the ATHENIANS one after an other to ſerue in gallies, he ſo acquainted them with continuall paines in his viages: that he made them in ſhorte ſpace become Lordes and maſters ouer them, that gaue them pay, and entertainment. For they beganne by litle and litle to flatter and feare the ATHENIANS, whom they ſaw trained continually in the warres, euer bearing armor, & carying their weapons in their hands, becomming expert ſouldiers at their charge, by reaſon of the pay they gaue them: ſo that in the end, they became ſubiects & contributaries as it were vnto thē, where before they were their frendes & cōpanions. So as there neuer was GREECIAN Captaine that brideled more the crueltie and power of that mightie PERSIAN king, then Cimon did. For, after he had driuen him out of all GREECE, he left him not ſo, but following him foote hotte, as we cōmonly ſay, before the barbarous people could take breath, or geue wiſe and direct order for their doinges: he made ſo great ſpeede, that he tooke ſome of their cities from them by force, and other ſome by practiſe, cauſing them to rebell againſt the king, and turne to the GREECIANS ſide. A for the king of PERSIA, in all ASIA, from the contrie of IONIA, directly downe to PAMPHYLIA. And furthermore, being aduertised that the kinges Captaines were vppon the coast of PAMPHYLIA with a great armie by sea, bicause he would feare them in such sorte, that they should not braue any more to shewe them selues apon the sea, on this side of the Iles of the CHELIDONIANS: he departed from the Ile of GINDOS, and from the citie of TRIOPIVM, with two hundred gallies, the which at the first had bene excellently well made and deuised by Themistocles, as well for swift sayling, as for easie turning. Howbeit Cimon made them to be enlarged, to the end they might carie the greater number of men of warre in battell, to assault the enemies. And so went first against the PHASELITES, who were GREECIANS borne, and yet notwithstanding would neither take the GREECIANS parte, nor receiue their armie into in Cimons armie at that iorney: did somewhat pacifie his anger, and gaue aduertisement to them of the citie of their doinges by letters, which they tyed to their arrowes, and shotte ouer the walles. So as in the end they procured their peace with condicion, that the PASELITES Cimon wanne the city of Paselis.

should pay ten talentes for a fine: and furthermore should also follow the armie of the GREECIANS, and from thencefoorth fight with them, and for them, against the barbarous people. Now Ephorus sayth, that the PERSIAN Captaine that had charge of the armie by sea, was called TITHRAVSTES, and the Captaine of the armie by lande, PHERENDATES. But Callisthenes wryteth, that Ariomandes the sonne of Gobrias, was the kinges Lieutenaunt, hauinge chiefe desire to fight, bicause they looked for a new supply of foure score sayle of the PHENICIANS, that should come to them from CYPRVS. But Cimon contrarily, sought to fight before these gallies of the PHENICIANS came to ioyne with them, and put his gallies in order of battell, determininge to geue a charge, and compell them to fight, would they, or would they not. Which the barbarous people perceiuing, drew neerer into the mouth of the riuer Eurymedon, bicause they should not compasse them in behinde, nor force them to come to battell against their willes. Which notwithstanding, when they saw the ATHENIANS come to set apon them where they lay, they made out against them, a fleete of sixe hundred sayle, as Phanodemus declareth: or as Ephorus wryteth, three hundred and fifty sayle only. But they did noproues streight to the riuer: where such as coulde recouer the mouth thereof in time, saued them selues, flying to their armie by lande, which was not farre from that place set also in order of battell. But the rest that were taken tardy by the way, they were slaine, and their gallies sonke or taken: whereby we may know that there were a great nũber of them, for many were saued as it is likely, and many also were splitted to peeces, and yet the ATHENIANS tooke two Cimon tooke two hundred sayle prisoners at the battell fought by the riuer of Eurymedon.

hundred of them prisoners. In the meane season, their armie by lande came neerer to the sea side: which Cimon perceiuing, stoode in some doubt whether he should lande his men or not, bicause it seemed a hard & daungerous thing vnto him, to land in spight of his enemies: and to put forth the GREECIANS already wearied with the first battell against the barbarous peo-

E ple, who were altogether whole, freshe, and lustie, and withall many in number against one. Neuertheless, perceiuing that his men trusted in their force, besides the corage which the first victorie gaue them, and that they desired none other thing but to fight with the enemies: he put them a lande while they were whotte yet with the first battell. And so with great furie and lowde cries they ranne immediatly against the barbarous people, who stoode still & sturred not, & receiued their first charge very valliantly: by reason wherof, the battell grew sharpe and bloody, insomuch as there were slaine all the greatest personages & men of best accompt of all the ATHENIANS armie. But the other fought it out so valliantly, that in the ende they wanne the field, and with maruelous difficultie made the barbarous people flye, whereof they slue a great number in the place, and tooke the rest prisoners with all their tents & pauilions, Cimon ouercame the battell of the barbarous people also by lande.

F which were full of all sortes of riches. Thus Cimon like a valliant champion of the holy games, hauing in one selfe day wonne two victories, and hauing excelled the battell by sea also which the GREECIANS had wonne within the channell of SALAMINA, with that which he wanne then vpon the lande: and the battell which the GRÆCIANS wanne by lande before the cities of PLATEES, with that which he wanne the day before on the sea: yet he was not contented with all this. For, after two so famous victories obteined, he would once againe fight for the name nor of the tokens of triumphe: and being aduertised that the foure score sayle of the PHOENICIANS (comming too late to be present at the first battell by sea) were arriued at the head of Hydra, he sayled thither with all possible speede. Now the Captaines of this fleete, knewe no certainty of the ouerthrow of their chiefest armie, but stoode in doubt of it, and would not be perswaded that it was ouerthrowen in that sorte: and therefore were they so much the more affrayed, when they descried a farre of the victorious armie of Cimon. To conclude, they lost all their shippes, & the greatest parte of their men, which were either drowned or slaine. This victorie against the PERSIANS did so dawnte and plucke downe the pride and loftie minde of the barbarous PERSIAN king, as he made that condicion of peace so much spoken of in ancient histories, in the which he promised and sware, that his armies thenceforth should come no neerer to the GRÆCIAN sea, then the carrere of a horse, and that he would sayle no further forward, then the Iles CHELIDONIANS, and CYANEANS, with any gallies or other shippes of warre. Howbeit the historiographer Callisthenes wryteth, that it was no parte of any article cõprised within the condicion of peace, but that the king kept it for the feare he had of this so great an ouerthrow: and that afterwardes he kept so farre from the GRÆCIAN sea, that Cimon with fiftie saile, and Ephialtes with thirty only, did sayle beyonde the Iles CHELIDONIANS, and no barbarous fleete euer came against them. Yet notwithstanding all this, amongest the common actes of ATHENS, which Craterus hath gathered together, the articles of this peace are found wrytten at large, as a thing that was true in deede. And it is sayd, that for this occasion the ATHENIANS built an aulter of peace, and that they did Callias great honor, for that he was sent Ambassador vnto the king of PERSIA to take his othe for confirmation of this peace. So whē all these spoiles of the enemies were sold to thē that would geue most, there was such store of gold and siluer in the sparing cofers of their treasurie, that there was enough to serue their turne for any seruice they would employ it to, & besides that, they had sufficient to build vp the side of the wall of the castell which looketh towardes the south, this voyage and great spoyle did so enrich them. And it is sayd moreouer, that the building of the long walles that ioyne to the citie with the hauen, which they call the legges, was built & finished afterwardes: howbeit the first fundacions thereof were built with the money Cimon gaue towardes it, for that the worke met with moorish and watery places, by meane whereof they were driuen to fill vp the marisses, with force of flyntes & great logges, which they threw vnto the bottome. It was he also that first did beawtifie and set forth the citie of ATHENS, with places of liberall exercise and honest pastime, which shortly after were much esteemed. For he caused plane trees to be set in the market place: and the Academie which before was very drye and naked, he made it now a pleasaunt groue, and full of goodly springes which he brought into it, and made fine couered arbors to walke in, and goodly long smooth allies to runne a good course in. On a time he had newes brought him, that certaine PERSIANS dwelling in CHERRONESVS, (to say a demy Ile of the contrie of THRACIA) would not be gotten out, but sent to the people of high THRACIA, to pray their aide to defend them selues against Cimon: of whome they made but litle accompt, bicause he was departed from ATHENS with a very few shippes, who set vpon them only with foure gallies, and tooke thirteene of theirs. And so hauing driuen the PERSIANS out of CHERRONESVS, and subdued the THRACIANS, he conquered all the contrie of CHERRONESVS, from THRACIA vnto his owne contrie. And departing from thence went against them of the Ile of THASOS, that had rebelled against the ATHENIANS: and hauing ouercome them in battell by sea, he wanne three and thirtie of their shippes, and besides that tooke their citie by siege, and wanne the mynes of golde lying beyonde the same to the ATHENIANS, with all the lands that belonged vnto them. This conquest made his way open into MACEDON, and gaue him great oportunitie to haue taken the best parte thereof at that present time. But bicause he let it alone, and followed not that oportunitie, he was suspected to haue taken money, and to haue bene bribed by presentes of king Alexander: whereupon, his secret enemies layed their heades together, and accused him. But Cimon to clere him

Cimon accused and discharged.

A him selfe before the iudges of this accusation, sayd vnto them: I haue practised frendshippe neither with the IONIANS, nor yet with the THESSALIANS, both which are very riche and wealthie people: neither haue I taken their matters in hand, as some other haue done, to receiue both honor and profit by them. But in deede I am a frende to the LACEDÆMONIANS, for I confesse I loue them, and desire to followe their sobrietie, and temperaunce of life, the which I preferre and esteeme aboue any riches or treasure: although I am very glad notwithstandinge to enrich our state and common wealth with the spoyles of our enemies. Stesimbrotus reporteth this accusation, and sayth: that his sister Elpinice went to Pericles house, (who was the sharpest and straighteste accuser of his) to pray him not to deale so extreamely with her brother: and that Pericles laughing on her, sayd, alas, thou art too old, Elpinice, thou, now to ouercome these matters. Yet for all that, when Cimons cause came to hearinge, he was a more gentle aduersarie, then any other of his accusers, and rose vp but once to speake against him, and that for manners sake only: so that Cimon thereby escaped, and was cleared of this accusation. And furthermore, so long as he was present in ATHENS, he alwayes kept the seditious people in obedience, who would euer crosse and thwart the authoritie of the nobilitie, bicause they would haue all the sway and rule in their owne handes. But when Cimon was sent abroade any whither to the warres, then the common people hauing no bodie to gainesay them, turned, and altered the gouernment of the citie topsie turuey, and confounded all the auncient lawes and customes which they had obserued of long time, and that by the procurement and setting on of Ephialtes. For they tooke away all hearing of causes in maner from C the court of * Areopagus, & put all authoritie of matters iudiciall into the handes of the people, and brought the state of the citie into a pure Democratia, to say: a common weale ruled by the sole and absolute power of the people, Pericles being then in great credit, who altogether fauored the peoples faction. Wherefore Cimon at his returne, finding thauthority of the Senate and counsell so shamefully defaced and troden vnder foote, was marueilously offended withall, and sought to restore thauncient state of iudgement againe as it was before, and set vp the gouernment of the nobility (called Optimacia) that was established in the time of Clisthenes. But then beganne his enemies againe with open mouth to crye out vpon him, reuiuing the olde former naughty rumor that ranne of him before, that he kept his owne sister: & furthermore accusing him, that he did fauor the LACEDÆMONIANS. And amongest other D thinges there ranne in the peoples mouthes the verses of the Poet Eupolis, which were made against Cimon.

No vvicked man he vvas, but very negligent,
And therevvithall to vvyne much more, then vnto money bent.
He stale somtimes avvay, at Sparta for to sleepe:

And if it be so, that being thus negligent & geuen to wyne, he haue gotten so many cities, and wonne such sundry great battells: it is out of doubt then that if he had bene sober & carefull, there had neuer bene before him nor since any GRÆCIAN Captaine, that had passed him in glorie of the warres. In deede it is true, that from the beginning he euer loued the manner E of the LACEDÆMONIANS: for of two twynnes which he had by his wife Clitoria, he named thone of them Lacedæmonius, and thother Eleus, as Stesimbrotus wryteth, saying that for that cause Pericles did euer twit them in the teeth with their mothers stocke. Howbeit Diodorus the Geographer wryteth, that both those two, and an other third called Thessalus, were borne of Isodice, the daughter of Euryptolemus, the sonne of Megacles. How soeuer it was, it is certaine that Cimons credit grew the greater, by the fauor and countenaunce which the LACEDÆMONIANS gaue him, who had hated Themistocles of long time, and for the malice they bare him, were glad that Cimon being but a yoūg man, did beare more sway in ATHENS then he. Which the ATHENIANS perceiued well enough, and were not offended withall at the beginning: bicause the goodwill of the LACEDÆMONIANS towardes him, did bring them great commo- F dity. For when the ATHENIANS beganne to growe of great power, and to practise secretly that the confederats of the GRÆCIANS should forsake the LACEDÆMONIANS to ioyne with them: the LACEDÆMONIANS were not angrie withall, for the honor and loue they bare vn-

to Cimon, who did alone in maner manedge all thaffayres of GRÆCE at that time, bicause he was very curteous vnto the confederates, and also thankefull vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. But afterwardes when the ATHENIANS were aloft and of great power, and that they saw Cimon stucke not for a litle matter with the LACEDÆMONIANS, but loued them more then they would haue had him: they beganne then to enuy him, bicause in all his matters he had to do, he euer highly praised and extolled the LACEDÆMONIANS before them. But specially, when he would reproue them of any fault they had committed, or that he would perswade them to do any thing: the LACEDÆMONIANS, sayd he, I warrant ye do not so. That, as Stesimbrotus sayth, made him maruelously to be maliced of the people. But the chiefest thing they accused him of, and that most did hurt him, fell out vpon this occasion. The fourth yeare of the raigne of Archidamus, the sonne of Zeuxidamus king of SPARTA, there fortuned the wonderfullest and most fearefull earthquake in the citie of LACEDÆMON, and thereabouts, that euer was heard of. For the earth in many places of the contrie opened, and fell as into a bottomlesse pit. The mountaine Taygetum shooke so terribly, that points of rockes fell downe from it. All the citie was layed on the ground and ouerthrowen, fiue houses only excepted, the rest being wholy destroied. And it is said also, that a litle before this earthquake came, the young men of that citie were playing with the young boyes exercising thē selues starke naked vnder a great galery couered ouer: & as they were sporting together, there started vp a hare hard by them. The young men spying her, ranne after the hare starke naked and oyled as they were, with great laughter. They were no sooner gone thence, but the top of the gallery fell downe apon the boyes that were left, and squashed them all to death. And in memorie of the same, the tombe where they were afterwardes buried, is called vnto this day Sismatias, as much to say, as the tombe of those which the earthquake had slaine. But king Archidamus foreseeing straight vppon the sodaine the daunger that was to come, by that he saw present, perceiuing his citizens busie in sauing their householde stuffe, and that they were running out of their houses: made the trompetters to sound a hotte alarome vpon it, as if their enemies had come stealingly vpon them to take the citie, to thende that all the inhabitantes should presently repayre vnto him (settinge all busines aparte) with armor and weapon. That sodaine alarome doubtlesse saued the citie of SPARTA at that time: for the ILOTÆ, which are their slaues and bondmen in the contrie of LACONIA, and the contrie clownes of litle villages thereaboutes, came running armed out of all partes, to spoyle and robbe them vpon the sodaine, that were escaped from this earthquake. But when they found them well armed in order of battell, they returned backe againe as they came: and then beganne afterwardes to make open warres vpon them, when they had drawen certaine of their neighbors vnto their confederacie, & specially the MESSENIANS, who made hotte warres vpon the SPARTANS. Whereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS sent Periclidas vnto ATHENS to demaunde ayde: whome Aristophanes the Poet mocking, sayed.

With visage pale and vvanne, he on the aulter sate,
In skarlet govvne requiring ayde, to succor their estate.

Against whom Ephialtes also spake very much, protesting that they should not ayde nor relieue a city that was an enemy vnto ATHENS, but rather suffer it to fall to the ground, and to spurne the pride and arrogancy of SPARTA vnder their feete. But Cimon (as Critias saieth) being more carefull for the benefit of SPARTA, then for thenlarging and encreasing of his contry: brought it to passe by his perswasion, that the ATHENIANS sent him thither with a great power to helpe them. And furthermore Ion rehearseth the very selfe wordes that Cimon spake to moue the people to graunt his request. For he besought them that they woulde not suffer GRÆCE to halte, as if LACEDÆMON had bene one of her feete, and ATHENS the other: not to suffer their citie to lose an other citie their frend, and subiect to the yoke and defence of GRÆCE. Hauing therfore obteyned ayde, to leade vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, he went with his army through the CORINTHIANS contry: wherwith Lachartus a Captaine of CORINTHE was maruelously offended, sayinge, that he should not haue entred into their contrie with an armie, before he had asked licence of them of the citie. For sayd he, when one knocketh at a mans dore or gate, yet he commeth not in, before the master of the house commaundeth him.

Cimon procured ayde for the Lacedæmonians.

A him. But ye CORINTHIANS (ſayed Cimon to him againe) haue not knocked at the gates of the CLEONÆIANS, nor of the MEGARIANS, to come in, but haue broken them open, and entred by force of armes, thinkinge that all ſhould be open vnto them that are the ſtronger. Thus did Cimon ſtowtely aunſwere the CORINTHIAN Captaine againe, bicauſe it ſtoode him vppon, and ſo went on with his armie through the contrie of CORINTHE. Afterwardes the LACEDÆMONIANS ſent againe vnto the ATHENIANS, to require ayde againſt the MESSENIANS and the ILOTES, (which are their ſlaues) who had wonne the citie of ITHOME. But when the ATHENIANS were come, the LACEDÆMONIANS were afrayed of the great power they had brought, and of their boldnes beſides: wherefore they ſent them backe againe, and would not imploy them of all other their confederats that came to their ſuccor, bicauſe they B knew them to be men very tickle, deſiring chaunge and alteracions. The ATHENIANS returned home, miſliking much that they were ſent backe againe: inſomuch as euer after they hated them that fauored the LACEDÆMONIANS in any thing. And for the LACEDÆMONIANS ſake therefore, taking a ſmall occaſion of offence againſt Cimon, they baniſhed him out of their contrie for tenne yeres: which was the full terme appointed and limited vnto them that were baniſhed with the Oſtraciſmon baniſhment. Now within the terme of theſe ten yeares, the LACEDÆMONIANS fortuned to vndertake the deliuery of the citie of DELPHES, from the ſeruitude and bondage of the PHOCIANS, and to put them from the cuſtodie and keeping of the temple of Apollo, which is in the ſayd city. Wherfore, to obtaine their deſire and purpoſe, they came to plante their campe neere vnto the citie of TANAGRE in PHOCIDE, where the C ATHENIANS went to fight with them. Cimon vnderſtanding this, although he was in exile, came to the ATHENIANS campe armed, with intent to do his duety to fight with his contrie men againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, and ſo went into the bandes of the tribe Oeneide, of the which he was him ſelfe. But his owne contry enemies cried out againſt him, and ſayd, that he was come to none other ende, but to trouble the order of their battell, of intent that he might afterwardes bring them to the city ſelfe of ATHENS. Whereuppon the great counſell of the fiue hundred men were afrayed, and ſent to the Captaines to commaunde them they ſhould not receiue him into the battell: ſo that Cimon was compelled to departe the campe. But before he went, he prayed Euthippus ANAPHLYSTIAN, and his other frendes that were ſuſpected as him ſelfe was, to fauor the LACEDÆMONIANS doinges: that they ſhould doe their D beſt endeuor to fight valliantly againſt their enemies, to thintent their good ſeruice at that battell might purge their innocencie towardes their contry men: and ſo they did. For the ATHENIANS keeping the ſouldiers Cimon had brought with him, which were a hundred in all, they ſet them aparte by them ſelues in a ſquadron, and fought it ſo valliantly and deſperatly, that they were ſlaine euery man of them in the field, leauing the ATHENIANS maruelous ſory for them, and repenting them that they had ſo vniuſtly miſtruſted them as traitors to their contrie. Wherefore they kept not their malice long againſt Cimon, partely as I am perſwaded, bicauſe they called his former good ſeruice to minde which he had done to their contrie aforetime, and partely alſo, bicauſe the neceſſitie of the time ſo required it. For the ATHENIANS hauing loſt a great battell before TANAGRE, looked for no other about the ſpring of the E yeare, but that the PELOPONNESIANS would inuade them with a great power: wherefore, they reuoked Cimons baniſhment by decree, whereof Pericles ſelfe was the only author & procurer. So ciuill and temperate were mens enmities at that time, regarding the common benefit of their publicke ſtate and weale: and ſo much did their ambition (being the moſt vehement paſſion of all other, and that moſt troubleth mens mindes) geue place, and yeelde to the neceſſities and affayres of the common weale. Now when Cimon was againe returned to ATHENS, he ſtraight pacified the warre, & reconciled both cities together. And when he ſaw that the ATHENIANS could not liue in peace, but woulde be doing ſtill, and enlarge their dominions by warre, for lukers ſake: to preuent them that they ſhould not fall out with any of the GRÆCIANS, nor by ſcowring and coaſting vp and downe the contrie of PELOPON- F NESVS, and the Iles of GRÆCE, with ſo great a nauie, ſhould moue occaſion of ciuill warres amongeſt the GRÆCIANS, or of complaintes vnto their confederates againſt them: he rigged & armed out two hundred gallies to go againe to make warre in CYPRVS, & in EGYPT,

bicauſe he would acquaint the ATHENIANS with the warres of the barbarous people, and thereby make them lawfull gainers by the ſpoyles of thoſe their naturall borne enemies. But when all things were in readines to departe, and the armie preſt to ſhippe and ſayle away: Cimon dreaming in the night had this viſion. It ſeemed vnto him that he ſaw a bitch angrie with him, and barking earneſtly at him, & that in the middeſt of her barking, ſhe ſpake with a mans voyce, and ſayd vnto him:

Cimons dreame.

Come hardily, ſpare not: for if thou come by me, My vvhelpes, and I vvhich here do ſtand, vvill quickely vvelcome thee.

This viſion being verie hard to interpret, Aſtyphilus borne in the citie of POSIDONIA, a man expert in ſuch coniectures, and Cimons familiar frende, tolde him that this viſion did betoken his death, expounding it in this ſorte. The dogge commonly is an enemie to him he barketh at. Againe, nothing gladdeth our enemie more, then to heare of our death. Furthermore, the mingling of a mans voyce with the barking of a bitche, ſignifieth nothing els, but an enemie of the MEDES: bicauſe the armie of the MEDES is mingeled with the barbarous people and the GRÆCIANS together. Beſides this viſion, as he did ſacrifice to the god Bacchus, the Prieſt opening the beaſt after it was ſacrificed, about the blood that fell to the grounde, there aſſembled a ſwarme of antes, which caried the congealed blood of from the grounde by litle and litle, and layed it all about Cimons great toe, a great while together before any man marked it: Cimon at the laſt ſpied it by chaunce, and as he was looking of them to marke what they did, the miniſter of the ſacrifice brought the beaſtes liuer that was ſacrificed, to ſhew him, whereof the biggeſt end that they call the head was lacking, and this they iudged for a very ill token. Notwithſtanding, hauing all things readie for preparation of this iorney, ſo as he could not well goe backe, he launched into the ſea, and hoyſed ſayle, and ſending three ſcore of his gallies into EGYPT, ſayled with the reſt vpon the coaſt of PAMPHYLIA. Where he wanne a battell by ſea of the king of PERSIA, ouercomming the gallies of the PHENICIANS and the CILICIANS, and conquered all the cities thereabouts, making the way very open to enter into EGYPT. For he had no ſmall thoughtes in his minde, but reached to high enterpriſes, and determined vtterly to deſtroy the whole Empire of the mighty kinge of PERSIA, and ſpecially for that he vnderſtoode Themiſtocles was in maruelous credit and reputacion amõgeſt the barbarous people, bicauſe he had promiſed the king of PERSIA to lead his armie for him, and to doe him notable ſeruice whenſoeuer he ſhoulde haue occaſion to warre with the GRÆCIANS. It is thought this was the chiefe cauſe that made Themiſtocles poiſon himſelfe, bicauſe he diſpaired that he could not performe that ſeruice againſt GRÆCI which he had promiſed: aſſuring him ſelfe that it was no eaſie matter to vanquiſhe Cimons corage, and good fortune, who lay at that time with his armie all alongeſt the Ile of CYPRVS, promiſing him ſelfe great matters at that inſtant. But in the meane ſeaſon, Cimon ſent certaine of his men vnto the oracle of Iuppiter Ammon, to aske him ſome ſecret queſtion: for no man euer knew neither then nor ſince, for what cauſe he had ſent them thither, neither did they alſo bring backe any aunſwere. For they were no ſooner come thither, but the oracle commaunded them ſtraight to returne: ſaying vnto them, that Cimon was then comming to him. So Cimons men receiuing this aunſwere, left the oracle, and tooke their iorney backe to the ſeawardes. Now when they were commen againe to the GRÆCIANS campe, which at that preſent lay in EGYPT, they heard that Cimon was departed this worlde: and reckoninge the dayes ſence his death, with the inſtant of their aunſwere receiued by the oracle, that Cimon was then comming vnto him: they knew ſtraight that darkely he had ſignified his death vnto them, and that, at that very time he was with the goddes. He dyed at the ſiege of the citie of CITIVM in CYPRVS, as ſome reporte, or elſe of a hurte he receiued at a skirmiſhe, as other holde opinion. When he dyed, he commaunded them that were vnder his charge, to returne into their contry againe, and in no caſe to publiſhe his death: which commaundement was ſo wiſely and cunningly handeled, that they all came home ſafe, and not an enemie, nor any of their confederates that once vnderſtoode any thing of it. So was the armie of the GRÆCIANS gouerned and led by Cimon, though him ſelfe was dead, the ſpace of thirtie dayes, as Phanodemus wryteth: But after his death, there was no GRÆCIAN Captaine

A raine that did any notable thing worthie of fame against the barbarous people, bicause the Orators and gouernors of the chiefest cities of GRÆCE stirred them vp one against an other, and there was no man that would once steppe in as a mediator to make peace betwene them. And thus the GRÆCIANS now did one destroy and spoyle an other by ciuill warre amongest them selues: which happely gaue the king of PERSIA leasure and time to restore him selfe againe, and contrarily was cause of such vtter ruine and destruction of the whole power and force of GRÆCE, as no tongue can well expresse. In deede a long time after, kinge Agesilaus came with an armie of the GRÆCIANS into ASIA, and beganne a small warre against the Lieutenauntes of the king of PERSIAES gouernors of the lower contries of ASIA. But before he could doe any notable exployte, he was called home againe by occasion of newe troubles B and ciuill warres risinge amonge the GRÆCIANS, and compelled to returne into his contrie, leauing the treasorers of the king of PERSIA, raising of subsidies and taxes vpon the cities of the GRÆCIANS in ASIA, although they were confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Whereas in the time that Cimon gouerned, they neuer sawe any of the kinges sergeauntes at armes, or commissioner, that brought any letters pattentes or commaundement from the king, or any souldier that durst come neere the sea, by fortie furlonges. The tombes which they call vnto this present day Cimonia, doe witnesse that his ashes and bones were brought vnto ATHENS. Neuertheless, they of the citie of CITIVM doe honor a certaine tombe, which they say is Cimons tombe: bicause that in a great dearth and barrennes of the earth, they had an oracle that commaunded them, not to neglect Ciman, as the Orator Nausicrates writeth it, but to honor and reuerence him as a god. Such was the life of this GRÆCIAN Captaine.

Lucullus parentes.

AS for Lucullus, his grandfather was a Conſull, and ſo was Metellus (ſurnamed Numidicus, bicauſe of his conqueſt of NVMIDIA) his vncle by the mothers ſide. His father notwithſtanding was conuict of fellony, for robbing the treaſure of the ſtate whileſt he was officer: and Cæcilia his mother was reported to haue led an vnchaſt life. But for Lucullus ſelfe, before he bare office, or rule in matters of ſtate: the firſt thing he towched and tooke in hande for the cauſe of his contrie was, thaccuſation of Seruilius the ſoothſayer (who before had accuſed his father) for that he alſo had delt falſely in his office, and deceiued the common wealth. And this the ROMANES thought very well handled of him, inſomuch as a pretie while after there was no other talke in ROME but of that matter, as though it had bene a notable valliant acte done by him. For otherwiſe, though priuately they had no iuſt occaſion, yet they thought it a noble deede to accuſe the wicked, and it pleaſed them as much to ſee the young men put lawe breakers in ſute, as to ſee a notable good courſe of a dogge at a hare. Howebeit there followed ſuch ſturre and bandinge vppon this ſute, that ſome were verie ſore hurte, and other ſlaine in the market place: but in fyne, Seruilius was cleared and quite diſmiſſed. Lucullus was verie eloquent, well ſpoken, and excellently well learned in the Greeke and Latin tongue: inſomuch as Sylla dedicated vnto him the commentaries of all his doings which himſelfe had collected, as to one that could better frame a whole hiſtorie thereof, and cowche it more eloquētly together in wryting. For he had not only a ready tongue to vtter that he would ſpeake, and pleade his matters with great eloquence, as other be ſeene to doe, hauing matters of ſute or open audience.

The Romanes thought it a noble dede to accuſe the wicked.

But afterwardes alſo when ye take them out of their common practiſe and pleadinges,

Then are they graueld ſtraight vvithouten grace or skill,

For Lucullus had ſtudied humanitie from his youth, and was well learned in all the liberall ſciences: but when he came to elder yeares, to refreſhe his witte (after great troubles) he

A he fell to the ſtudie of Philoſophie, which quickened the contemplatiue parte of his ſoule, & mortified, or at the leaſt betimes brideled the ambitious and actiue parte, ſpecially after the diſſention betwixt him and Pompey. But to acquaint you better with his learning yet, it is ſaid, that when he was a young man, he layed a great wager with Hortenſius the Orator, and Sylla the hiſtoriographer (in ieſt as it were at the firſt, but afterwardes it fell to good earneſt) that he would write the breuiary of the warres of MARSICVM in verſe or proſe, in the Latin or Greeke tongue, which ſoeuer fell to his lotte: and I thinke his happe was to doe it in proſe in the Greeke tongue, bicauſe we finde a litle Greeke ſtorie extant of the warres of the ROMANES againſt the MARSIANS. He dearely loued his brother Marcus Lucullus, as appeared by many manifeſt proofes: but the chiefeſt and moſt noted proofe among the ROMANES was B this. Him ſelfe was elder then his brother Marcus, and yet for all that would neuer ſue to beare office in the common wealth, nor accept any before his brother, but taried alwayes till he ſhould be choſen, and let his owne time paſſe ouer. This great curteſie to his brother ſo wanne the peoples hartes, as Lucius being abſent, they choſe him Ædilis, and his brother Marcus with him for his ſake. He was in the flower of his youth in the time of the MARSIANS warres, wherein he did many wiſe and valliant deedes. The cauſe notwithſtanding that moued Sylla to make choyce of him, was rather for his conſtancy, & good curteous nature, then for any other reſpect. For when Sylla had once wonne him, he euer after employed him continually in his moſt weightie cauſes: as in a commiſſion ſpecially, he gaue him to coyne money. For in deede parte of the money that Sylla ſpent in the warres againſt king Mithridates, was coyned C by Lucullus commaundement within the contrie of PELOPONNESVS: whereupon they were called Lucullian peeces, and were currant a longe time amongeſt the ſouldiers, to buy ſuch things as they ſtoode in nede of, and neuer refuſed by any. Sylla being afterwards at ATHENS, the ſtronger by land, but the weaker by ſea, ſo as his enemies cut of his vittells from him: ſent Lucullus into EGYPT and LIBYA to bring him ſuch ſhippes as he found in thoſe partes. It was in the deepe of winter, and yet he ſpared not to ſayle with three brigantines of GREECE, and as many galliots of the RHODIANS, putting him ſelfe not only to the daunger of the ſea in ſo long a voyage, but of his enemies in like maner: who knowing them ſelues to be the ſtronger, went ſayling euery where with a great nauie. But for all theſe daungers, he firſt arriued in the Ile of CRETA, and wanne their goodwilles. From thence went to the citie of CYRENE, where D he found the inhabitaunts turmoyled with ciuil warres, and continuall oppreſſions of tyrans: from which troubles he deliuered them, and gaue them lawes to eſtabliſhe gouernment amongeſt them, putting them in remembraunce of Platoes wordes ſpoken to their anceſters in old time, in the ſpirite of a prophecie. For when they prayed Plato to write them lawes, and to appoint them ſome forme of gouernment for their common wealth, he made them anſwere: it was a hard thing to geue lawes to ſo riche and fortunate people as they were. For to ſay truely, as nothing is harder to be ruled, then a rich man: ſo contrarily, nothing readier to receiue counſell and gouernment, then a man in aduerſity. This leſſon framed the CYRENIANS at that time to be more ciuill and obedient to the lawes Lucullus gaue them. When he departed thence, he coaſted towardes EGYPT, where he loſt the moreparte of his ſhippes by E pyrates: but for his owne perſon, ſcaping their handes, he was very honorably receiued in the citie of ALEXANDRIA. For all the kinges armie came to meete him at ſea, gallantly trimmed and appointed, as they were wont to welcome home the kinge when he returned from any voyage by ſea: and king Ptolomye him ſelfe being very young at that time, gaue him as honorable entertainment as he poſſible could. For amongeſt other honors that he did him, he lodged him in his courte, and defrayed his ordinarie dyet, where neuer ſtraunge Captaine was lodged before: and did not only ſpend the ordinary allowance in feaſting of him which he vſed vnto others, but commaunded foure times as much prouiſion more to be made as he had before. Notwithſtanding, Lucullus tooke no more then reaſonable was for his perſon: nor yet would he receiue any maner gift althogh the king had ſent him preſents to the value of foure F ſcore talentes. And which more is, would not ſo much as go ſee the citie of MEMPHIS, nor any other of the famous monumentes and wonderfull ſightes in EGYPT, ſaying: that it was for a man that trauelled vp and downe for his pleaſure, and had leaſure withall, to ſee ſuch thinges, but not for him that had left his Captaine in the field, at the siege of the walles of his enemies. To conclude, this young king Ptolomye would in no case fall in frendshippe with Sylla, fearing least he should thereby put him selfe into warres: but gaue him men and shippes to bring him into CYPRVS. And as he was ready to imbarke, the king bidding him farewell, and embracing him, gaue him a goodly rich emerod set in gold, which Lucullus at the first refused vntill the king shewed him his picture grauen in it: and then accepted the gift, fearing least the vtter refusall might cause the king thinke he went away discontented, and should perhaps therefore lay an ambushe by sea for him. Thus hauing gotten a certaine number of shippes together of the porte townes thereaboutes, ouer and besides such as the pyrates and sea rouers had hidden, being parte of their spoyles, and bestowed with their receitors: went on with them into CYPRVS, where he vnderstoode that his enemies lay close in certaine creekes vnder the foreland, watching to bourde him as he sayled by. Whereuppon he vnrigged and bestowed his shippes in docks, and sent worde to all the porte townes thereabouts, that he was determined to winter there: and therefore willed them to prouide him vittells & other necessarie munition to be in readines against the spring. But in the meane while, when he saw time conuenient, he put his whole fleete againe to the sea with all possible speede, went him selfe away, and in the day time caried a lowe sayle, but in the night packt on all the cloth he could for life: so that by this craftie fetche, he wanne RHODES, and lost not one shippe. The RHODIANS they also furnished him with shippes: & besides thē, he so perswaded the GNIDIANS and the inhabitantes of the Ile of CO, that they forsooke king Mithridates, and went to make warres with him against them of the Ile of SAMOS. But Lucullus him selfe alone draue kinge Mithridates men out of CHIO, restored the COLOPHONIANS againe to libertie: and tooke Epigonus the tyranne prisoner, who had kept them in bondage. Now about that time, Mithridates was compelled to forsake the citie of PERGAMVM, and to retyre to the citie of PITANE, within the which Fimbria kept him besieged very straightly by lande. Wherefore Mithridates hauing the sea open vpon him, sent for his force and nauy out of all partes, not daring to hazard battell against Fimbria, who was very valliant, of a venturous nature, & at that time moreouer was him selfe a conqueror. Fimbria perceiuing what Mithridates ment, and hauing no power by sea of his owne: sent straight to Lucullus to request him to come with his nauie into those partes to his ayde, for thouercomming of this king, the greatest and most cruell enemie that euer the ROMANE people had. Bicause that so notable a praye, which they followed with such daunger and trouble, should not escape the ROMANES, while they had him in their handes, and was come him selfe within their daunger: and that therefore he should so much the more harken vnto it, bicause that if it fortuned Mithridates to be taken, no man shoulde winne more honor and glorie by his takinge, then he that had stopped his passage, and layed handes on him, euen as he thought to haue fled. And thereby should the praise of this noble victorie runne in equalitie betwene them both: the one that had driuen him from lande, and the other that had stopped his passage by sea. And furthermore, that the ROMANES would nothinge regard all the famous battells and victories of Sylla in GREECE, which he had wonne before the cities of CHÆRONEA and ORCHOMENE: in comparison of taking the king. This was the effect of Fimbriaes message sent vnto Lucullus, wherein there was nothing, in the which there was not great likelyhoode. For there is no man that can doubt of it, but if Lucullus would haue beleued him at that time (and haue gone thither with his shippes to stoppe the hauens mouth of the citie, in the which Mithridates was besieged, considering also that he was so neere at hande) this warre had taken ende there, and the worlde besides had then bene deliuered of infinite troubles which fell out afterwardes. But, whether Lucullus preferred the consideration and respect he had vnto Sylla, whose Lieutenaunt he was, before all other due regarde of priuate or common benefit: or that he detested and abhorred Fimbria as a cursed persone, who not long before had through his wicked ambition imbrued his hands in the blood of his Captaine: or else that it was through the secret prouidence and permission of the goddes that he spared Mithridates at that time, to the end he might be reserued as a worthie enemie, against whom he might afterwardes shew his valure: howsoeuer it was, it so fell out that he harkened not vnto Fimbriaes message, but gaue Mithridates time

A and leasure to flye, and finally to scorne all Fimbriues force and power. But Lucullus selfe alone afterwardes ouercame the kinges armie by sea, once neere vnto the head of Lectum, which is on the coast of TROADE: and an other time neere vnto the Ile of TENEDOS, where Neoptolemus, Mithridates Lieutenaunt by sea, lay in wayte for him with a farre greater number of shippes then he had. And yet so soone as Lucullus had discried him, he sayled before all his naue being Admirall, in a galley of the RHODES, at fiue ores to a bancke, whereof one Demagoras was master, a man well affected to the seruice of the ROMANES, and very skillfull in battell by sea. And when Neoptolemus on the other side rowed against him with great force, commaunding his pylot that he should so order his galley, that he might stemme him right in the prowe: Demagoras fearinge the full meetinge of the kinges galley which was very strong and

B heauie, and furthermore well armed with poyntes and spurres of brasse before, durst not encounter her with his prowe, but nimbly made his gallie to winde about, & turned his poupe towardes him. Whereby the galley being low at that end, receiued the blow without hurte, considering that they hit vppon the dead workes, and those partes which are alwayes aboue water. In the meane time Lucullus other shippes were come, who commaunding his master to turne the beakehead of his gallie forward, did many famous actes: so that he made his enemies flye, and draue Neoptolemus away. And departing from thence, went to seeke out Sylla euen as he was readie to passe ouer the seas, about CHERRONESVS: holpe him to waft his armie, and so passed him ouer with safety. Afterwardes when peace was concluded, and that king Mithridates was comen into his realme and contries againe, which lye vpon the sea Ma-

C ior: Sylla condemned the prouince of ASIA to pay the summe of twenty thowsand talentes for a fyne, by reason of their rebellion. And for leauying of this fyne, left Lucullus there with commission to coyne money: which was a great comforte and hartes ease vnto the cities of ASIA, considering the extreamitie that Sylla had vsed towardes them. For in so grieuous and odious a commission vnto them all, as that was: Lucullus did not only behaue him selfe vprightly and iustly, but also very fauorably and curteously. For, as touching the MITYLENIANS that were openly in armes against him, he was very willing they should know their fault, and that for satisfaction of thoffence they had committed takinge Marius parte, they should suffer some light punishment. And seeing that they were furiously bent to continewe in their naughtines, he went against them, and hauing ouercome them in battell, compelled them

D to keepe within their walles, and layed siege vnto their citie, where he vsed this policy with them. At none dayes he launched into the sea, in the view of all the MITYLENIANS, and sayled towardes the citie of ELEA: howbeit in the night time secretly returned backe, and making no noyse, layed an ambushe nere vnto the citie. The MITYLENIANS mistrusting nothinge, went out the next morning very rashly without order, & without any maner watche or ward, to spoyle the campe of the ROMANES, supposing euery man had bene gone: but Lucullus comming sodainly vpon them, tooke a great number prisoners, slue about fiue hundred such as resisted, and wanne sixe thowsande slaues, with an infinite quantitie of other spoyle. Now did the goddes happely preserue Lucullus, that he was no partaker at that time of the wonderfull miseries and troubles, which Sylla and Marius made poore ITALIE suffer, euen then when he

E was occupied in the warres of ASIA: and yet notwithstanding his absence, he was in as good credit and fauor with Sylla, as any of his frendes about him. For as we haue sayd before, he dedicated his commentaries vnto him, for the goodwill he bare him, and by his last will and testament appointed him Tutor vnto his sonne, leauing Pompey out: which seemeth to be the first occasion of the quarrell and grudge that fell out afterwardes betwene them, bicause they were both young men, and vehemently desirous of honor. Shortly after the death of Sylla, Lucullus was chosen Consull with Marcus Cotta, about the three score Olympiade: and then they began to reuiue the matter againe, that it was very needefull to make warres against Mithridates, and specially Marcus Cotta, who gaue out that it was not ended, but only slept for a while. Wherefore, when the Consulls came to draw lottes what prouinces they should take

F charge of, Lucullus was maruelous sorie that the prouince of GAVLE, lying betwene the Alpes and ITALIE, fell to his lotte: bicause he thought it no contrie wherein any great exployte were to be done, and againe, the glorie of Pompey grieued him greatly, whose honor dayly increased by the famous battells he wan in SPAINE. So that it was most certaine, that so soone as Pompey had ended the warres there, they would haue chosen him generall in the warres against Mithridates. Wherefore, when Pompey sent to ROME in earnest maner, to require money to make pay to his souldiers, wryting to the Senate, that if they did not send him money the sooner, he would leaue Sertorius there, SPAINE behinde him, and bring his army backe into ITALIE: Lucullus made all the meanes he could to haue it quickely sent him, fearing least he should returne into ITALIE vpon any occasion, while he was Consul. For he thought that if he returned againe to ROME with so great an armie, he would easily do what him list: and the rather, bicause that Cethegus and he could not agree, who at that time bare all the sway and rule at ROME, bicause he spake and did all that pleased the common people, being a vitious liuer, and dissolutely geuen, for which cause Lucullus hated him. But there was an other common Orator among the people called Lucius Quintius, and he would haue had all Sylas doinges reuoked and broken: a matter to alter euen the whole state of the common wealth, and to turmoyle the citie of ROME againe with ciuill dissention, which then liued quietly and in good peace. This Lucius Quintius Lucullus talked withall a parte to perswade him, and openly reproued him with such words, that he was disswaded from his euell purpose, & by reason ruled his rash ambition, handling it both wisely and as cunningly as he could possible (for the safety of the common wealth) bicause it was the beginning of a disease, from whence infinite troubles were like to growe. While these thinges were thus in hande, newes came that Octauius the gouernor of CILICIA was dead. Straight whereuppon many put forward themselues to sue for this charge, & to courte Cethegus, as the only man who aboue all other might make any man officer whom he thought good. Now for Lucullus, he made no great reckening of the gouernment of CILICIA in respect of the contry, but bicause CAPPADOCIA was hard adioyning to it, and perswading him selfe that if he could obtaine the gouernment thereof, they would geue none other (but him selfe) the authoritie to make warres with Mithridates: he determined to procure all the meanes he could, that none should haue it but him selfe. And hauing proued sundry wayes, was compelled in the ende, against his owne nature, to practise a meane neither comely nor honest, and yet the readiest way he could possibly deuise to obtaine his desire. There was a woman in ROME at that time called Praecia, very famous for her passing beawty, and also for her pleasaunt grace in talke and discourse, howbeit otherwise vnchast after curtisan manner. But bicause she employed the credit & fauor of them that frequented her companie, to the benefit and seruice of the common wealth, and of them that loued her: she wanne the reporte (besides her other excellent commendable graces) to be a very louinge woman, and readie to fauor and further any good enterprise, and it wanne her great fame and reputacion. But after she had once wonne Cethegus, (who ruled all the common wealth at his pleasure) and brought him to be so farre in fancie with her, that he could not be out of her sight: then had she all the whole power & authority of ROME in her hands, for the people did nothing but Cethegus preferred it, and Cethegus did what euer Praecia would will him to. Thus Lucullus sought to come in fauor with her, sending her many presentes, and vsing all other curtesies he could offer vnto her: besides that it seemed a great reward for so prowde & ambitious a woman as she, to be sued vnto by such a man as Lucullus was, who by this meanes came to haue Cethegus at his cõmaundement. For Cethegus did nothing but commend Lucullus in all assemblies of the people, to procure him the gouernment of CICILIE who after it was once graunted him, had then no neede of the helpe neither of Praecia, nor yet of Cethegus. For the people wholly of them selues with one cõsent did graunt him the charge to make warre with Mithridates, bicause he knew better how to ouercome him, then any other Captaine, and bicause that Pompey was in the warres with Sertorius in SPAINE, and Metellus also growen too olde, both which two were the onely men that could deseruedly haue contended for this office with him. Neuertheles, Marcus Cotta his fellow Consull, made such suite to the Senate, that they sent him also with an armie by sea, to keepe the coastes of PONTIDE, and to defende the contrie of BITHYNIA. Thus, Lucullus hauing his commission, went into ASIA with one legyon only, the which he leauied a new at ROME: & when he was come thither, he tooke the rest of the strength he founde there, which were men marred and cor-

The gouernment of Cilicia & the warres against king Mithridates were geuen to Lucullus.

A corrupted altogether of long time, through couetousnes and delicacie of the countrie. For amongest others, were the bandes which they called the Fimbrian bandes, men geuen ouer to selfe will, and very ill to be ruled by marshall discipline, bicause they had lined a long time at their owne libertie, without all obedience to any man. They were those selfe souldiers that together with Fimbria, slue their generall Flaccus, Consull of the ROMANE people, and that afterwardes betrayed Fimbria him selfe, and forsooke him, leauing him vnto Sylla, being mutiners, traitors, and wicked people: howbeit otherwise very vallyant, well trayned, and painefull souldiers. Notwithstanding, Lucullus in shorte time brideled their boldnes meetely well, and reformed the others also, who before had neuer proued (in my opinion) what the value of a good Captaine and Generall ment, that knew how to commaund: but were vsed to flat- B tering leaders, that commaunded the souldiers no more then they them selues liked of. Now concerning the state of the enemies, thus it was with them. Mithridates that in the beginning was very braue and bolde (as these florishing Sophisters commonly are) vndertaking warre against the ROMANES, with a vaine vnprofitable armie, but passing fresh and sumptuous to the eye: but after that he was once foyled and ouercome with no lesse shame then losse, when he came to make this second warre, he cut of all superfluous pompe, and brought his armie into a conuenient furniture to serue for warres at all assayes. For he put by the confused multitude of sundrie nations, the fierce threatninges of the barbarous people in so many sundrie tongues, and clearely banisht also the riche grauen armors with goldesmythes worke, and set with precious stones, as thinges that more enriched the enemies that wanne them, then gaue C strength or corage to those that ware them. And contrariwise, caused long stiffe swords to be made after the ROMANE facion, and great heauy shields, and brought to the field a maruelous number of horse, more ready for seruice, then riche in furniture. Then he ioyned fiue score thowsand footemen together, appointed & set in order like vnto the battell of the ROMANES, with sixteene thowsand horse of seruice, besides those that drue his armed cartes with sithes about, which were in all to the number of a hundred. And besides all this land preparation, he brought also a great number of shippes and gallies together, which were not decked with goodly golden pauilions, as at the first, neither with stooues nor bathes, nor with chambers and cabbons, curiously hanged for Ladies and gentlewomen: but furnished full of armor, artillerie, and slinges, and with money also to pay the souldiers. With all this armie and pre- D paration, he went first to inuade BITHYNIA, where the cities receiued him very gladly, & not those only, but all the other cities of ASIA wholly: the which were fallen againe into their former miseries and diseases, by the crueltie of the ROMANE farmers and vserers, who raising taxes and impostes vppon them, made them abide vntollerable thinges. It is true that Lucullus draue them away afterwardes, like the Harpyæ, which tooke the meate out of the poore mens mowthes: howbeit at that time he did no more, but brought them to be more reasonable by the perswasions he vsed vnto them, and qualified a litle the inclination of the people vnto rebellion, being euery one of them in manner willing to reuolt. Now Lucullus being busie about these matters, Marcus Cotta the other Consull (and his companion) supposing that the ab- E sence of Lucullus was a fit occasion offered him to doe notable seruice, prepared to fight with Mithridates. And although he had newes brought him from sundrie places, that Lucullus was with his armie in PHRYGIA, and comming towardes him: yet notwithstanding, imagining that he had the honor of triumphe assured alreadie in his handes, and bicause Lucullus should be no partaker of it, he aduaunced forwardes to geue battell. But Mithridates ouercame him both by sea and by lande: so that Cotta by sea lost three score of his shippes with all the men in them, foure thowsand footemen by lande, and was after with shame shut vp and besieged in the citie of CHALCEDON, remaining there hopelesse to escape, but by Lucullus onely ayde and meanes. Howbeit there were in Lucullus campe, that were very earnest with him to leaue Cotta, and to go further, assuring him that he should finde the realme of Mithridates both without men of warre, or any defence at all: so that he might easily be Lord of the F whole. And these were the wordes of the souldiers that spyted Cotta, bicause his foolishe rashnes and fonde imagination had not only brought those men to the shambles to be slaine and cast away, whom he had the leading of: but had lost them also, that they could not ouer-come him, and ende this warre without blowes, for that they were driuen to go to his helpe. Howbeit Lucullus making an Oration vnto them, aunſwered, that he had rather ſaue the life of one ROMANE citizen, then winne all that his enemies had in their power. And when Archelaus, (who had bene Mithridates Lieutenaunt in BOEOTIA in the firſt warres againſt Sylla, and now in this ſeconde warre tooke parte with the ROMANES) aſſured him that ſo ſoone as they ſawe him in the realme of PONTVS, they would all riſe againſt Mithridates, and yeelde them ſelues vnto him: Lucullus aunſwered him thus, that he would not ſhewe him ſelfe more fearefull, then the good hunters which neuer ſuffer the beaſt to recouer his denne. And when he had ſo ſayd, he marched with his armie towardes Mithridates, hauing in all his campe thirtie thowſand footemen, and two thowſande fiue hundred horſe. When he came ſo neere vnto his enemies, that he might eaſily at eye diſcerne all their hoaſt, he wondered at the great multitude of ſouldiers that were in their campe, and was in minde to geue battell, ſuppoſing yet that the better way was to prolong time, and drawe theſe warres out in length. But one Marius a ROMANE Captaine, whom Sertorius had ſent out of SPAYNE vnto Mithridates with a certaine number of ſouldiers: came forwardes, and prouoked him to battell. Lucullus for his parte did put his men alſo in a readineſſe to fight. But euen as both battells were prepared to ioyne, the element opened vpon the ſodaine, without any ſhewe of chaunge of weather decerned before, and they plainly ſaw a great flake of fire fall betwene both armies, in forme and ſhape much like to a tonne, and of the colour of molten ſiluer. This celeſtiall ſigne put both tharmies in ſuch a feare, as they both retyred, and fought not a ſtroke: and this wonderfull fight fortuned (as it appeared) in a place of PHRYGIA, called Otryes. Nowe Lucullus afterwards conſidering with himſelfe, that there was no riches nor prouiſion ſo great in the world, that could ſuffice to vittell ſo many thowſandes of people as Mithridates had in his campe a-ny long time together, hauing his enemies campe ſo lying before them: willed that one of the priſoners ſhould be brought into his tent, and firſt of all he enquired of him, how many of them lay together in a cabin, then what corne he had left in their cabbin. And when the priſoner had aunſwered to all his demaundes, he returned him to priſon, and ſent for an other: then for a third, and queſtioned with them all as he had done with the firſt. Then comparing the ſtore of their corne, and other proportion of vittells they had, with the number of men the ſame ſhould maintaine: he founde that all would be ſpent in three or foure dayes at thutmoſt. Whereupon he relied on his firſt determination, to delay time without hazard of battell. So he cauſed a maruelous deale of wheate to be brought into his campe out of euerie quarter, that the ſame being throughly vittelled, he might eaſily tary the occaſion which his enemies neceſſitie ſhould offer him. Mithridates in the meane time, ſought which way he might take the citie of the CYZICENIANS, who had bene ouerthrowen before with Cotta at the battell of CHALCEDON, where they had loſt three thowſande men, and tenne of their ſhippes. And bicauſe that Lucullus ſhould not vnderſtand of his enterpriſe, Mithridates ſtale away by night after ſupper, taking the oportunity of a darke rainy night, and marched thitherwardes with ſuch ſpeede, that he was before the city of CYZICVS by breake of day, and pitched his campe, where the temple of the goddeſſe Adraſtia ſtandeth, which is the goddeſſe of fatall deſtinie. Lucullus receiuing intelligence of Mithridates departure from his campe, followed him ſtraight wayes ſteppe by ſteppe, and being glad that he was not met withall of his enemies in diſorder, lodged his armie in a village called THRACIA, in a place of great aduantage for him, and commodiouſly ſeated alſo vppon the high wayes, and through fare of the neighbors therabouts, by the which they muſt come of neceſſity to vittel Mithridates campe. Wherefore Lucullus wiſely foreſeing what would follow: would not keepe his purpoſe ſecret from his ſouldiers, but after he had well trenched and fortified his campe, called them to counſell, and there making an oration vnto them, tolde them openly by manifeſt demonſtration of aſſured hope, that ere many dayes paſſed, he would geue victorie into their handes, and that without loſſe of one droppe of blood. In the meane ſeaſon, Mithridates enuironned the GRÆCIANS round about by lande, hauing deuided his armie into tenne campes, & ſtopped vp the mouth of the arme of the ſea, which deuideth the citie from firme lande, with his ſhippes from one ſide to an other. Now the CYZICENIANS were valliant men, and determined

A ned to abide all extreamity for the ROMANES ſakes: but one thing only troubled them much, that they knew not what was become of Lucullus, neither could they heare any newes of him, though his campe ſtoode in ſuch a place, where they might eaſily decerne it from the citie. But Mithridates ſouldiers deceiued them, for ſhewing them the ROMANES campe that lay aboue hard by them, ſayd vnto them: doe ye ſee yonder campe there? They are the MEDES, and the ARMENIANS, whom Tygranes hath ſent to the ayde of Mithridates. Theſe wordes put the CYZICENIANS in a maruelous feare, ſeeing ſuch a multitude of enemies diſperſed round about them: that when Lucullus ſhould come to their aide, he could not well tell which way to paſſe. Yet at the length they heard of Lucullus approach, by one called Demonax, whom Archelaus ſent vnto them, but they would not beleue him at the firſt, taking it for a tale, only B to make them be of good corage, and valliantly abide the furie of the ſiege: vntill ſuch time as a litle boy of theirs, eſcaped from the enemies that before had take him priſoner, was come againe vnto them. Of whome they inquired where Lucullus was: the boy laughed at them, thinking they teaſted to aske that queſtiō of him. But when he ſaw they were in good earneſt, he ſhewed them the ROMANES campe with his finger: then they beleued it in deede, and were coragious againe. There is a lake neere vnto the citie of CYZICVS called Daſcylitide, and it is nauigable with conuenient bigge boates. Lucullus tooke one of the greateſt of them, put it in a carte, and ſo caried it to the ſea, and there put as many ſouldiers in her as ſhe could well carry, who by night entred into the citie, the skowte of the enemies neuer diſcoying them. This ſmall ſupply did maruelouſly comforte the beſieged CYZICENIANS: and it ſeemeth that the C goddes, deliting to ſee their noble corage, would further increaſe and aſſure the ſame, by many manifeſt tokens which they ſent from heauen, and ſpecially by one which was this. The day of the feaſt of Proſerpina was at hand, and the citizens had neuer a blacke cowe to offer in ſolemne ſacrifice, as their aunciēt ceremonies required: ſo they made one of paſte, & brought it hard vnto the aulter. Now, the cowe that was vowed to this ſacrifice, & which they reered vp of purpoſe to ſerue for that day, was feeding amongeſt the heard of the citie in the fieldes, on thother ſide of the arme of the ſea. But that day ſhe kept alone from all the reſt of the heard, and ſwamme ouer the arme of the ſea, and came into the citie: where ſhe went of her ſelfe vnto the place of the ſacrifice. Furthermore, the goddeſſe Proſerpina her ſelfe appeared vnto Ariſtagoras in his dreame, ſecretary of the ſtate and common wealth of the CYZICENIANS, and D ſayd vnto him: I am come hither to bring the flute of LIBIA, againſt the tromper of PONT, and therefore tell the citizens from me, that I will them to be of good corage. The next morning when the ſecretarie had tolde them his viſion, the CIZICENIANS maruelled much at the goddeſſes wordes, and could not imagine what they ment. Howbeit at the breake of day there roſe a great whiſtling winde, that made the ſea billowes riſe very high: and the kings engines of batterie which were brought to the walles of the citie to plucke them downe (being wonderfull workes that one Niconides a THESSALIAN enginer had made and deuiſed) began to make ſuch a noyſe, and to breake in peeces by the roughnes of the winde, that a man might eaſily iudge what would follow vpon it. Then all at one inſtant, the ſouthwinde was become ſo vehement bigge, that in a moment it burſt all theſe engines aſunder, and ſpecially a tower E of wodde of the height of a hundred cubittes, which the winde ſhooke ſo vehemently, that it ouerthrewe it to the ground. And it is ſayd furthermore, that in the citie of ILIVM the goddeſſe Minerua appeared vnto diuerſe in their ſleepe, all in a ſweat, and ſhowing parte of her vaile torne, as if ſhe had bene newly returned from geuing ayde vnto the CYZICENIANS: in confirmacion whereof, the inhabitantes of ILIVM haue a piller yet vnto this day, whereupon this matter is written for a perpetuall memorie. Now was Mithridates maruelous ſory for the breaking & loſſe of his engines, by meanes wherof, the CIZICENIANS had eſcaped the daunger of aſſaulte, & of the ſiege in like maner, vntill he truly vnderſtood of the great famine that was in his campe, and the extreame dearth to be ſuch, as the ſouldiers were compelled to eate mans fleſhe, which (his Captaines abuſing him) had for a time kept ſecret from his know- F ledge. But when he was enformed of the troth in dede, he left of his vaine ambition obſtinately to continewe ſiege: knowing well that Lucullus made not warres with threats and braūery, but (as the common prouerbe ſayth) lept on his belly with both his feete, that is to ſay, he did what he could possible to cut of all the vittells from him. And therefore one day when Lucullus was gone to assault a castell that troubled him very neere vnto his campe: Mithridates because he would not lose that oportunity, sent the most parte of his horsemen to get vittels in BITHYNIA, with all his cartes, and beastes of cariage, and his most vnprofitable footemen. Lucullus hearing thereof, returned againe the selfe same night vnto his campe, and the next morninge betimes being in the winter season, followed them by the tracke with ten ensignes of footemen only and all his horsemen. But the snow was so deepe, the cold so terrible sharp, and the weather so rough, that many of his souldiers not being able to abide it, dyed by the way. For all that he marched on still, till he ouertooke his enemies about the riuer of Rindacus, where he gaue them such an ouerthrowe, that the very women came out of the citie of APOLLONIA, and went to steale the vittells they had loden, and strippe the dead, which were a maruelous great number, as a man may iudge in such a case: and neuertheless there were taken sixe thowsande horse of seruice, an infinite number of beastes for cariage, and fifteene thowsande men besides, all which spoyle he brought to his campe, and passed hard by the campe of his enemies. But I wonder much at the historiographer Salust, who wryting of this matter sayth, that here was the first time that euer the ROMANES saw any camells. Me thinkes it straunge how he should thinke so, that they who long before had ouercomen Antiochus the great vnder Scipio, and thothers that a litle before had fought against Archelaus, neere vnto the cities of ORCHOMENE and CHÆRONEA, should not haue seene camells. But to returne againe to our matter. Mithridates being feared with this ouerthrow, resolued with him selfe immediatly to flie, with all the speede he could possibly make: and to entertaine and stay Lucullus for a time behinde him, determined to sende Aristonicus his Admirall with his army by sea, into the sea of GRÆCE. But as Aristonicus was ready to hoyse sayle, his owne men betraied him, and deliuered him into the handes of Lucullus, with tenne thowsand crownes which he caried with him, to corrupt if he could parte of the ROMANES army. Mithridates hearing of this, fled by sea, leauing the rest of his armie by lande in the handes of his Captaines, to be brought away by them as well as they could. Lucullus followed vnto the riuer of Granicus, where he set apon them, and after he had slaine twenty thowsande of them, tooke an infinite number prisoners. And they say there dyed in that warres, what souldiers, what slaues, what lackeis, and other straggelers that followed the campe, about the number of three hundred thowsand people. This done, Lucullus returned to the citie of CYZICVS, where after he had spent some dayes, enioying the glorie due vnto him, and receiued the honorable entertainment of the CYZICENIANS: he went to visite the coast of HELLESPONT, to get shippes together, and to prepare an armie by sea. And passing by TROADE, they prepared his lodging within the temple of Venus: where, as he slept in the night, it seemed to him he saw the goddesse appeare before him, which sayd these verses vnto him.

O Lyon fierce, and stowte: vvhy sleepest thou so sounde?
Since at thy hande so fayre a praye, is ready to be founde.

Herewith he rose incontinently out of his bed, being yet darke night, and calling his frends to him, tolde him the vision he had in his dreame: and about that very time also there came some vnto him from the citie of ILIVM, that brought him newes of fifteene gallies of kinge Mithridates, hauing fiue ores to euery bancke, that were seene in the hauen of the ACHAIANS, and that sayled towards the Ile of LEMNOS. Whereupon Lucullus tooke shippe straight, went and tooke them euery one: for at his first comming he slue the Captaine called Isidorus, and went afterwardes to the other mariners that lay at ancker on the coast side, who seeinge him come, drew towardes land with their shippes, in purpose to runne them all a shore, and fighting aboue hatches, hurt many of Lucullus souldiers, bicause they could not compasse them in behinde, and for that also the place where they had layed their shippes was such, as there was no way to force them before, their gallies floting in the sea as they did, and the others being fastned to the land as they were. Lucullus with much a do all this notwithstanding, found meanes in the end to put a shore certaine of the best souldiers he had about him, in a place of the Ile where they might easily lande. These souldiers went straight and set vpon the enemies behinde, slue some of them euen at their first comming, & compelled the rest to cut a sunder

A the cables that fastned the gallies to the banckes. But when they thought to flie from lande, the gallies brused and brake one an other: and that worst of all was, ranne vpon the poyntes and spurres of Lucullus gallies. And so many of them that stoode aboue hatches were slaine, the rest taken prisoners: amongest whom, Marius the ROMANE Captaine was brought vnto Lucullus, whom Sertorius had sent out of SPAINE vnto Mithridates. He had but one eye, and Lucullus had commaunded his men before they fought, not to kill any of his enemies that had but one eye: bicause Marius should not dye so happy a death, as to be slaine, but that he should dye some shamefull death, and be condemned by order of lawe. That done, Lucullus went in persone with all the speede he could possible to follow Mithridates, hoping to finde him yet vpon the coast of BITHYNIA, where Voconius should haue stayed him: for he had sent B this Voconius before with a certaine number of shippes vnto the citie of NICOMEDIA, to stop him from flying. But he taried so long in the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA sacrificing to the goddes of the same, and to be receiued into the fraternitie of their religion, that he could neuer after come neere Mithridates to stoppe him from flying: hauing alreadie made sayle with all the whole fleete, and hasting with all possible speede to recouer the realme of PONTVS, before Lucullus could returne from whence he went. But in sayling thitherwardes, he met with such a terrible storme, that caried parte of his shippes so away, that they ranne stragling to seeke their fortune, and parte of them splitted and drowned outright: so that all the coastes and riuers thereabouts, for many dayes after, were full of dead bodies and shippewrackes cast a shore by waues of the sea. Nowe for Mithridates owne persone, he was in a shippe of great C burden, the which for her greatnes could not sayle neere the shore, nor recouer land, she was also very euill to be guided by the pylots in so boysterous a storme: the mariners besides were put out of all their skill and knowledge, and the shippe her selfe moreouer tooke in such store of water, and was so heauely charged withall, that they durst no more put her out to the sea. By reason whereof Mithridates was compelled to goe abord a litle pinase of pyrates, and to put him selfe and his life into their handes, by whose helpe in the ende, (beyond all expectation, but not without great daunger) he got to lande, and recouered the citie of HERACLEA in the realme of PONTVS. Now here is to be noted, that the great brauerie Lucullus shewed vnto the Senate of ROME, fell out according to his imagination by the fauor of the goddes. For when the Senate had appointed for ending of these warres to prepare a great nauie of D shippes, and therewithall had geuen order also for three thowsande talentes: Lucullus stayed them by letters that they should not doe it, wryting brauely vnto them, that without all this charge and great preparation he would be strong enough to driue Mithridates from the sea, with the onely shippes he would borrowe of their frendes and confederates. And in deede, through the speciall fauor of the goddes, he brought it so to passe: for they say, that this terrible storme that destroyed the armie of Mithridates, was raised vp by Diana, being offended with the men of the realme of PONTVS, bicause they had destroyed her temple in the citie of PRIAPOS, and had caried away her image. Now there were diuers that counselled Lucullus to deferre the rest of this warre, vntill an other season: but notwithstanding all their perswasions, he went through the contrie of GALATIA and BITHYNIA to inuade the realme of Mi- E thridates. In the which voyage, at the first beginning he lacked vittells, so that there were thirty thowsand men of GALATIA following his campe, that caried euery one of them a bushell of wheate on their shoulders: howbeit entring further into the contrie, and conquering the whole, there was such exceeding plenty of all thinges, that an oxe was sold in his campe but for a Drachma, & a slaue at foure times as much. And of all other spoyle there was such great store, that either they made no reckening of it, or else they made hauoke of it, bicause there was no man to sell it vnto, euery man hauing so much of his owne. For they ranne ouer all the contrie vnto the citie of THEMISCYRA, and to the vallies that lay apon the riuer of Thermodon, and stayed no where lenger then they were a spoyling. Thereupon the souldiers be- F ganne to murmure at Lucullus, bicause he assured all the cities vpon composition, and neuer tooke any of them by force, nor gaue them any meanes to enrich them selues by spoyle: and yet sayd they, he would make vs now go further, and leaue AMISVS a great rich citie which we might easily take by force, if it were but a litle straightly besieged, and lead vs into the de-

" hath caried away their wiues and daughters prisoners by force. This great and mightie kinge Tigranes, king of Armenia, maried Mithridates daughter. is allyed vnto Mithridates, for he maried Mithridates daughter: and it is not likely that when C Mithridates shall come and intreate him to helpe him in his distresse, that Tigranes will refuse him, but rather we must thinke certainly that he will make warres vpon vs in his defence.
And thus, in making hast to driue out Mithridates, we shall bring our selues into great daun-
" ger, to prouoke a new enemie, euen Tigranes against vs, who of long time hath lurked for a
" iust occasion to make warres with vs: and he can haue no honester cause to take armes, then
" to defend and kepe a king his neighbour, and so neere a kinseman, from vtter destruction, and " one that is compelled to seeke vpon him for succor. What needs we then to prouoke him to " procure it, and teache Mithridates (which he purposeth not) to whom he should repayre for " aide, to make warres against our selues, and pricke him forward, or to say better, put him with " our owne handes into the way to go seeke aide of Tigranes: which of him selfe he will neuer
" doe, (thinking it a dishonor vnto him) onlesse we driue him to it for very necessitie. Is it not D

" his owne people, that we might rather fight with the COLCHIANS, TIBARENIANS, CAP-
" PADOCIANS, and with such other people whome we haue so many times ouercome: then " with the MEDES and ARMENIANS? With this determination Lucullus taried a great while before the citie of AMISVS, continuing this siege of purpose, without distressing them at all.
Afterwardes when winter was past, he left Murena there to continue the siege, and him selfe which he put his most confidence and trust, so that he passed ouer the riuer of Lycus, & went E and presented battell to the ROMANES in the plaine field. There the horsemen skirmished, & the ROMANES had the worse: for there was one Pomponius a ROMANE taken, of great estima-stronger of horsemen: and he doubted also on thother side to take his way by the mountaine, bicause it was very high, vneasie to clime, and full of woddes and forrestes. But as he stoode thus doubtfull, they tooke certaine GRÆCIANS by chaunce that were fled, and hidden in a F caue hard by, among the which there was an old man called Artemidorus, who promised Lu- cullus if he would beleue and follow him, he would bring him into a sure strong place to lodge

A his campe, where was a castell aboue the citie of CABIRA. Lucullus beleued the olde mans wordes, wherefore so soone as night came, he raised great fires in his campe, and went his way: and after they had passed certaine straight and daungerous wayes of the mountaines, he came in the morning vnto the place which Artemidorus had promited to bring him. Now the enemies were maruelously amazed when day light came, to see him there ouer them, in a place where if he list to fight, he might come apon them with aduantage: and if he liked not to sturre, it was vnpossible to compell him. For he stoode indifferent then to hazard battell or not. But in the meane season, they say certaine of the kinges campe by chaunce were a hunting the harte. The ROMANES perceiuing that, fell vpon them to cut them of by the way: and they began by this meanes one to charge an other in such sorte, reliefe growing still from ei-
B ther side, as Mithridates men grew the stronger. But the ROMANES seeing their men flie from the trenches of their campe aboue, were in such a rage, that they all ranne in a choller to Lucullus to pray him he would leade them to battell, and geue them a signall to fight. Lucullus, bicause he would shew them by experience how much the presence & eye of a good wise Captaine in time of neede was worth: commaunded them they should not once sturre, and he him selfe in persone went downe into the valley, where he commaunded the first of his men he met withall flying, to stay, and returne to the fight againe with him. Which they presently did, and all the other in like case: and thus gathering them together againe, did easily make their enemies returne, that before had them in chase, and draue them backe, fighting with them euen hard to their owne forte. Afterwardes vppon his returne againe to his campe, he C sette his souldiers that fled, vnto a certaine peece of worke to shame them withall, which the ROMANES are wont to vse in such a case: & that is, that he made them digge a ditch of twelue foote longe, being in their shirtes, all vntrussed, and their other companions present seeinge them doe it. Now there was in king Mithridates campe, one Olthacus, prince of the DARDARIANS (which are certaine barbarous people dwelling vpon the marishes of Mæotin) a noble gentleman of his persone, vallyant, and skilfull in warres, and a man of very good iudgement to doe any great enterprise as any that was in all the armie, and furthermore a prince of great good grace and entertainment in companie, knowing how to facion him selfe with all men. This prince, being alwayes at strife with other Lordes of his contrie, and contending who should haue the first place of honor and fauor about the king: went vnto Mithridates, &
D promised him that he would do him notable seruice, and that was, that he would kill Lucullus. The king was very glad of this promise, and praised him maruelously in secret: howbeit openly of purpose he did him many iniuries, bicause he might haue some colour to counterfeate anger and displeasure, and to geue way for him to goe yelde him selfe vnto Lucullus as he did. Lucullus was maruelous glad of him, bicause he was one of the chiefest men of name in all his campe, and to proue him withall, gaue him charge immediatly: in the which he behaued him selfe so well, that Lucullus greatly esteemed his wisedome, and commended his diligence, in such sorte that he did him this honor, to call him somtimes vnto the counsell, and make him sit at his borde. One day when this DARDARIAN prince Olthacus thought to haue found fit occasion to execute his enterprise, he commaunded his footemen to be ready with his horse
E out of the trenches of the campe: and at none dayes when the souldiers tooke rest, and slept here and there in the campe, he went vnto Lucullus tent, thinking to haue found no body there to kepe him from comming in, considering the familiaritie Lucullus shewed him, saying also he had matters of great importance to talke with him of: and sure he had gone in immediatly vnto him, if sleepe that casteth away so many other Captaines, had not at that time preserued & saued Lucullus that slept. For one of the groomes of his chamber called Menedemus, who by good fortune kept the dore of the tent, told him that he came in very ill time, bicause Lucullus being wearied with trauell and lacke of sleepe, was but then newly layed downe to rest. Olthacus whatsoeuer the other sayd to him, would not be so aunswered, but tolde him he would come in whether he would or not, for he must nedes speake with him in a matter of great im-F portaunce. Menedemus aunswered him againe, that nothing could be of greater importance, nor more necessarie, then the preseruation of his masters life and health, who had neede to take rest: and with these words, he thrust him backe with both his hands. Olthacus was affrayed

then, and withdrew him selfe secretly out of the trenches of the campe, tooke his horse, and rode straight to Mithridates campe without his purpose he came for, which was to Lucullus. And thus it plainly appeareth, that occasion, and oportunity of time, euen in great matters deliuereth meanes, to saue or destroy the life of man, like as drugges and medicines geuen vnto the sicke and diseased persones. Shortly after, Lucullus sent one of his Captaines called Sornatius to get vittells, with tenne ensignes of footemen. Whereof Mithridates being aduertised, sent presently at his tayle one of his Captaines also, called Menander, vnto whom Sornatius gaue battell, and slue him with great slaughter of his men beside. And afterwards Lucullus sent an other of his Lieutenauntes called Adrianus with a great companie of souldiers, to get vittells into his campe more then he should neede. Mithridates did not let slippe this occasion, but sent after him two of his Captaines also called Menemachus and Myro, with a great number of men, as well footemen as horsemen: all which were slaine, two only excepted, that brought newes backe to Mithridates campe: the which he sought to saue as well as he could, saying that the losse was much lesse then it was thought for, and that it fortuned through the ignoraunce and rashnes of his Lieutenauntes. But Adrianus at his returne, passed by Mithridates campe with great pompe and maiestie, carying a huge number of carts loden with corne and spoyles he had wonne: which draue Mithridates selfe into so great a despaire, & all his people into such a feare and trouble, that he presently determined to remoue thence. Whereupon, the nobility and such as had place of credit about him, beganne to send before, and secretly to conuey their stuffe out of the campe, but vtterly prohibiting others to doe the same. The rest of the souldiers seing the stowtnes of the kinges minions, beganne to set vpon them with open force, not suffering them on the other side once to issue out of the campe. This mutinie grewe to such a fury, that they ouerthrewe their cariages and sumpter moyles, and slue them presently downe. Amongest others there was slaine Dorylaus, one of the chiefest Captaines of all their campe, who had nothing about him but a purple gowne, for the which they killed him: & Hermæus the Priest of the sacrifices was troden vnder foote, and smoothered at the campe gate, by reason of the multitude of those that fled in so great disorder. The king him selfe amongest others fled, but hauing neuer a one of his garde about him, nor any of the quiries of his stable to bring him a horse: Ptolomy, one of the groomes of his chamber, perceiuing him in the company of them that fled, lighted of his owne horse, and gaue him the king, but euen in manner too late. For the ROMANES that followed him were then euen hard at his tayle: and it was not for lacke of speede they missed the taking of him, for they were very neere him: but the couetousnes of the souldiers was the losse of the praye they had so long sought for, with so great paine and hazard of battells, and depriued Lucullus of the honor and reward of all his victories. For they were so neere vnto him, that if they had but followed Mithridates neuer so litle further, they had out of doubt ouertaken him, and his horse that caried him away. But one of the moyles that caried his gold and siluer (whether by chaunce, or of pretended policie of Mithridates, as a matter purposely habandoned to them that pursued him) was found in the middest of the high way betwixt him that fled, & the ROMANES that followed: who stayed there to robbe the gold & siluer, fighting about it, that Mithridates by that meanes wanne ground so farre before them, as they could neuer after come neere him againe. And this losse was not all which the couetousnes of the souldiers made Lucullus to lose. For, one of the chiefest secretaries of the king being taken, called Callistratus, whom Lucullus commaunded to be brought vnto him to his campe: they that had the charge of him, hearing tell that he had fiue hundred crownes in a girdle about him, for greedines of them, slue him by the way, and yet notwithstanding Lucullus suffered them to spoyle and destroy the whole campe of their enemies. After Mithridates flight, Lucullus tooke the citie of CABIRA, and many other castells and strong places, where he founde great treasure, and the prisons full of poore prisoners of the GRÆCIANS, & many Princes a kinne vnto the king him selfe, which were thought to be dead long before: and then seeing them selues deliuered from this miserable bondage, by the grace and benefit of Lucullus, thought with them selues they were not only taken out of prison, but reuiued & turned againe vnto a second life. There was also taken one of king Mithridates sisters called Nissa, whose taking fell out profitable for her: bicause

A bicause all Mithridates other wiues and sisters, whome they placed furthest of, as out of all daunger (and sent into a contrie of greatest safety, neere vnto the citie of Pantecapæa) dyed pitiefully, and were miserably slaine. For Mithridates sent one of the groomes of his priue chamber vnto them called Bacchides, to bring them word that they must all dye. Amongest many other noble Ladies, there were two of the kinges sisters, called Roxane & Statira, which were forty yeres old a peece, & yet had neuer bene maried: & two of his wiues also whom he had maried, both of the contrie of Ionia, the one called Berenice, borne in the Ile of Chio, and the other Monime, in the citie of Miletvm. Monime, she was very famous amongest the Græcians: for notwithstanding king Mithridates importunate dealing, being farre in loue with her, insomuch as he sent her fifteene thowsand crownes at one time, yet she would neuer Mithridates slue his sisters and wiues.

B geue eare vnto his sute, vntill such time as the mariage was agreed vpon betwene them, and that he had sent her his Diadeame or royall bande, and called her by the name and title of Queene. This poore Ladie after the mariage of this barbarous king, had long liued a woefull life, bewailing continually her accursed beauty, that in steade of a husband, had procured her a master: and in steade of the matrimoniall companie which a noble woman should enioy, had gotten her a gard and garrison of barbarous men, that kept her as a prisoner, farre from the sweete contrie of Græce: in chaunge whereof, she had but a dreame and shadow of the hoped goods she looked for, hauing vnfortunately left the within her owne contry she happely enioyed before. Now when this Bacchides was come vnto them, & had commaunded them from the king to choose what maner of death they would, & which euery one of the thought

C most easiest, and least painefull: Monime pluckt of the royall bande from her head, and tying it on a knot aboue her necke, hung her selfe, but the band not being strong enough, brake incontinently. Whereupon she cried out: O cursed and wicked tissue, wilt thou not yet serue me to end my sorowfull dayes? And speaking these wordes, cast it on the grounde and spit apon it, and held out her throte to Bacchides to be cut a sunder. The other, Berenice: she tooke a cuppe full of poyson her mother being present, who prayed her to let her haue halfe, the which she did, and they dranke it of betwene them. The force of the poyson was stronge enough to kill the old mother weake with age, but not so quickely to destroy the daughter: bicause she had not taken that proportion which would haue serued her turne, but drue out the paines of her death in length, vntill such time as Bacchides hasting to dispatch her, she in the

D end did strangle her self. As for the kings two sisters, Roxane & Statyra, which were virgines yet vnmaried, they say, that one of them also dranke poison, cursing & detesting the cruelty of her brother: howbeit Statira gaue neuer an euill word, not was fainte harted or sorowfull to dye, but contrarily did commend and thanke her brother highly, that seeing him selfe in daunger, had not yet forgotten them, but was carefull to cause them dye, before they shoulde fall as slaues into the handes of their enemies, and before they could come to dishonor them, or do them villany. These pitiefull misfortunes went to Lucullus hart, who was curteous and gentle of nature: neuertheless he went on further, still following Mithridates at the heeles, vnto the city of Talavra. And there vnderstanding that he was fled foure dayes before vnto Tigranes in Armenia, returned backe againe, hauing first subdued the Chaldeans, and the Tibe-

E renians, taken Armenia the lesse, and brought the cities, castells, and strong places vnto his obedience. That done, he sent Appius Clodius vnto king Tigranes, to summon him to deliuer Mithridates vnto him: & him selfe tooke his iorney towards the citie of Amisvs, which was yet besieged. The cause why this siege continued long, was the sufficiencie and great experience of the Captaine that kept it for the king, called Callimachus, who vnderstoode so well how all sortes of engines of batterie were to be vsed, and was so subtill besides in all inuentions that might serue to defende a place besieged, as he troubled the Romanes much in this attempt: but afterwardes he was not only met withall, and payed home for all his labor, but also outreached by Lucullus for all his finenesse. For where before he had alwayes vsed to sound the retreate at a certaine hower, & to call his men backe from the assaults, to rest them;

F one day he brake that order on the sodaine, and commaunded to assaulte the walles, at the first charge wanne a peece of it, before those within could come in time to resist them. Callimachus seeing that, and knowing it was now impossible to keepe the city any longer, forsooke it.

Callimachus setteth fire of Amisus, and flieth.

But before his departing he set the citie a fire, either for the malice to the ROMANES, because he would not they should enriche them selues with the sacke of so great a citie: or else for a policy of warre to haue the more leasure to saue him selfe, and flie. For no man gaue eye to them that fled by sea, bicause the flame was so great, that it dispersed it selfe euen to the very walles, and the ROMANE souldiers; they only prepared to spoyle. Lucullus seeing the fire without, had compassion of the citie within, and would gladly haue holpen it, and for the purpose prayed the souldiers quickely to quench it: but not a man would harken to him, euery one gaping after the spoyle, making great noyse with classhing of harnesse, and being very lowde besides otherwise, till at the length enforced thereunto, he gaue the city wholly to spoyle, hoping thereby to saue the houses from fire, but it fell out cleane contrary. For the soldiers themselues in seeking all about with torches & linckes lighted, to see if any thing were hidden: they set a number of houses a fire. So as Lucullus comming into the citie the next morning, and seeing the great desolacion the fire had made, fell of weeping, saying vnto his familiar friends about him: he had oftentimes before thought Sylla happy, howbeit he neuer wondred more at his good fortune, then that day he did. For, Sylla sayd he, desiring to saue the citie of ATHENS, the goddes graunted him that fauor that he might do it: but I that would faine follow him therein, and saue this citie, fortune thwarting my desire, hath brought me to the reputacion of Mummius, that caused CORINTHE to be burnt. Neuertheless he did his best endeuor at that time to helpe the poore citie againe. For touching the fire, euen immediatly after it was taken, by Gods prouidence there fell a shower of raine as it was newly kindled, that quenched it: and Lucullus selfe before he left the citie, made a great number of the houses which were spoyled by fire, to be built vp againe, and curteously receiued all the inhabitauntes that were fled, besides them he placed other GRÆCIANS there also, that were willing to dwell amongest them, and increased the boundes and confines of the citie which he gaue them, one hundred and twenty furlonges into the contrie. This citie was a colony of the ATHENIANS, who had built and founded it, in the time that their Empire florished, and that they ruled the seas: by reason whereof, many flying the tyranny of Aristion, went to dwell there, and were made free of the city, as the naturall inhabitants of the same. This good happe fell vpon them, that forsaking their owne goodes, they went to possesse and enioy the goodes of other men: but the very citizens of ATHENS it selfe that had escaped from this great desolation, Lucullus clothed them well, and gaue them two hundred Drachmas a peece, and sent them againe into their contrie. Tyrannion the grammarian was taken at that time, whom Murena begged of Lucullus: and Lucullus hauing graunted him vnto him, he made him free, wherein he dealt very discourteously, and did much abuse Lucullus liberality and gift vnto him. For in bestowing this prisoner vppon him, who was a famous learned man, he did not meane Murena should take him for a bondeman, whereby he should neede afterwardes to make him free. For seeming to make him free, and restore him to libertie: was no more but to take that freedome and liberty from him, which he had from his birth. But in many other thinges, and not in this only, Murena layed him selfe open to the world, that he had not all the partes a worthy Captaine should haue in him. When Lucullus departed from AMISVS, he went to visite the citie of ASIA, to thend that whilest he was not now occupied with warres, they might haue some refreshing of lawes and iustice. For, by reason that law was not executed of long time in ASIA, the poore contry was so afflicted, and oppressed with so many euills and miseries: and man liuing would scant beleue, nor any tongue can well declare. For, the extreame and horrible couetousnes of the farmers, customers, and ROMANE vserers did not only deuoure it, but also kept it in such bondage and thraldome, that particularly the poore fathers were driuen to sell their goodly young sonnes and daughters in mariage, to pay the interest and vsery of the money which they had borowed to discharge their fines withall: & publikely the tables dedicated vnto the temples, the statues of their goddes, and other church iuells: and yet in the end they them selues were also iudged to be bondmen & slaues to their cruell creditors, to weare out their dayes in miserable seruitude. And yet the worst of all was, the payne they put them to before they were so condemned: for they imprisoned them, set them on the racke, tormented them vppon a litle brasen horse, fette them in the stockes, made them stande naked in the greatest heate of sommer, and on the ice in the deepest of winter, so as that bondage seemed vnto them a releise of their miseries, and a rest of their tormentes. Lucullus found the cities of ASIA full of such oppressios, but in a shorte time after he deliuered them all that were wrongfully tormented. For first he tooke order, they should accompte for the vsery that was payed monethly, the hundred parte of the principall der onely, and no more. Secondly he cut of all vseries that passed the principall. Thirdly, which was the greatest matter of all, he ordained that the creditor & vserer should enioy the fourth parte of the profites & reuenues of his dettes. And he that ioyned vsery with the principall, that is to say, tooke vsery vpon vsery: should lose the whole. So that by this order, all dettes were payed in lesse then foure yeares, and the owners landes and reuenues set clere of all maner payments. This surcharge of vseries, came of the twenty thowsande talentes, wherein Sylla had condemned the contrie of ASIA: the which summe they had payed twise before vnto the farmers and collectors of the ROMANES, who had raised it, still heaping vsery vpon vsery, to the summe of sixe score thowsand talents. Wherefore these collectors and farmers ranne to ROME, and cried out vpon Lucullus, saying, that he did them the greatest wrong that could be, and by meanes of money, they procured certaine of the common counsellers to speake against him: which they might easily doe, because they had diuerse of their names in their bookes that delt in thaffaires of the common wealth at ROME. But Lucullus was not only beloued of those contries whom he did good vnto, but was wished for and desired also of others, who thought the contries happy that might haue such a gouernor. Now for Appius Clodius, whom Lucullus had sent before from PALAVRA vnto king Tigranes in ARMENIA, and whose sister at that time was Lucullus wife: he first tooke certaine of the kings men for gindes, who of very malice guided him through the high contry, making him fetch a great compasse about, by many dayes iorneys spent in vaine: vntill such time as one of his infranchesed bondmen that was borne in SYRIA, taught him the right way. Whereupon he discharged these barbarous guides, and leauing the wrong wayes they had led him, within fewe dayes past ouer the riuer of Euphrates, and arriued in the citie of ANTIOCH, surnamed EPIDAPHNE. Where he had commaundement to abide Tigranes returne, who was then in the contry of PHENICIA, where he subdued certaine cities, & had some other yet to conquer. Appius in the meane time wanne secretly diuers of the princes and noble men, that obeyed this ARMENIAN king but for feare, by force, and against their willes, amongest whom was Zarbienus, king of the prouince of GORDIENA: & promised the aide of Lucullus also to many the cities that sent vnto him, (which had not long before bene subdued & brought into bondage) to whom neuertheles he gaue in expresse charge, that for the time they should not once sturre, nor alter any thing. For, the rule of these ARMENIANS was intollerable to the GRÆCIANS, and specially the pride and arrogancie of the king. Who, by reason of his great prosperitie, was growen to such pride and presumption, that whatsoeuer men did commonly esteeme best, & make most reckoning of, he would not only haue it, and vse it as his owne, but also tooke it that all was made for him selfe whatsoeuer: and this great ouerweening grew, by reason of fortunes speciall grace and fauor towardes him. For at the beginning he had but very litle, and yet with this litle (which few made reckoning of) he conquered many great nations, and plucked downe the power of the PARTHIANS as much as any man that euer was before him. He replenished the contry of MESOPOTAMIA with GRECIAN inhabitaunces, which he brought by force out of CILICIA and CAPPADOCIA, compelling them to inhabite there. He made the ARABIANS chaunge their maner of liuing, who are otherwise called the SCENITES, as much to say, as tent dwellers, bicause they are vagarant people that dwell in no other houses but tentes, which they euer vse to carie with them, and brought them out of their naturall contrie, and made them followe him, vsing them for his commodity in trade of marchaundise. There were euer many kings in his courte that waited on him: but amongest others, he had foure kinges that waited continually on his person, as his footemen: for when he rode abroade any whether, they ranne by his stirroppe in their shirtes. And when he was set in his chaire of state to geue audience, they stoode on euery side about his chaire holding their handes togeather, which countenance shewed the most manifest confession and tokens of bondage that they could do vnto him: as if they had shewed thereby that they resigned all their libertie, and offered their bodies vnto their Lord and master, more ready to suffer, then any thing to doe. Notwithstanding, Appius Clodius being nothing abashed nor feared with all this tragicall pompe, when audience was geuen him: tolde king Tigranes boldly to his face, that he was come to carie king Mithridates away with him, who was due to the triumphe of Lucullus: & therefore did summone him to deliuer that king into his handes, or else that he proclaimed warres vpon him selfe. They that were present at this summons, knew well enough that Tigranes (although he set a good countenaunce of the matter openly with a fainte counterfeate laughing) yet hearing these wordes so boldly & gallantly spoken out of this young mans mowth, was galled to the quicke, and hitte at the harte.

For Tigranes hauing reigned, (or to say better tyrannically gouerned) fiue and twenty yeares space, had neuer heard any bold or francke speache but that. Notwithstanding, he aunswered Appius, that he would not deliuer Mithridates: and if the ROMANES made warres with him, that he would defende him selfe. And being greatly offended that Lucullus in his letters gaue him not the title, king of kinges, but only king simply: in the letters he wrote backe to Lucul-lus againe, he did not so much as vowchesaue to call him Captaine onely. But when Appius tooke his leaue, he sent him goodly riche presentes which he refused. Whereupon the king sent others againe vnto him, of the which Appius tooke a cuppe only, bicause the king should not thinke he refused ought of anger, or ill will: and so sending all the rest againe vnto him, made great hast to returne to his Captaine Lucullus. Nowe Tigranes before that time would not once see king Mithridates his so neere kinseman, who by fortune of warres had lost so pu-issant and great a kingdome, but prowdly kept him vnder in fennie, marrishe, and vnhollsome grounds, without any honor geuen vnto him, as if he had bene a very prisoner in deede: howbeit then he sent for him honorably, and receiued him with great curtesie. When they were neere together in the kinges palace, they talked secretly one with an other, & excusing themselues, clearing all suspicions conceiued betwene them, to the great hurt of their seruauntes and frendes, whom they burdened with all thoccasion of vnkindnes betwene them: amongst which number Metrodorus SCEPSIAN was one, a man excellently well learned, eloquent in speache, and one whome Mithridates so much loued and esteemed, that they called him the kinges father. Mithridates at the beginning of his warres had sent him Ambassador vnto Ti-granes, to pray ayde of him against the ROMANES. At which time Tigranes sayd vnto him: but what sayest thou to it Metrodorus: what aduise wilt thou geue me? Metrodorus either bicause he had regard vnto Tigranes profit, or else bicause he was loth Mithridates should escape, answered him againe. As Ambassador, O king, I would wish you should do it: but as a counsellor, that you should not do it. Tigranes now reported this speache vnto Mithridates, not thinking he would haue hurt Metrodorus for it, though in deede he presently put him to death vp-on it. Whereat Tigranes was hartely sorie, and repented him greatly to haue tolde him so much, although he was not altogether the occasion of his casting away, hauing but only reuiued Mithridates euill will before conceiued against him. For he had borne him displeasure of a long time, as appeared amongst his secret papers and writings that were taken from him, where he had ordained that Metrodorus should be put to death: but in recompence thereof Tigranes buried his body honorably, sparing no cost at all vnto the dead body of him, whom liuing he had betrayed. There dyed in king Tigranes courte also, an Orator called Amphicrates, if he deserue that mention should be made of him, for the citie of ATHENS sake whereof he was borne: for it is sayd, that when he was banished out of his contrie, he fled into the citie of SELEVCIA, which standeth vpon the riuer of Tigris. When the inhabitāts of the same praied him to teache them the arte of eloquence in their contrie, he would not vowchesaue it, but aunswered them prowdly: that a platter was too litle to holde a Dolphine in, meaning that their citie was too small a thing to containe it. From thence he went vnto Cleopatra, Mithridates daughter, and king Tigranes wife, where he was quickely suspected and accused so that he was forbidden to frequent the GRAECIANS cōpany any more, which grieued him so much, that he famished him selfe to death, and would eate no meate. And that man was also very honorably buried by the Queene Cleopatra, nere vnto a place called Sapha, as they call it in that contry. Now when Lucullus had quieted all thinges in ASIA, and had established good lawes

A among them, he was not careleſſe alſo of games and pleaſaunt paſtimes, but while he was at leaſure in the city of Ephesvs, he made many games, feaſtes, wreſtlinges and fence playes at the ſharpe for ioy of his victory, delighting all the cities of Asia with them, the which in recompence therof did inſtitute a ſolemne feaſt alſo in the honor of him, which they called Lucolles, and did celebrate it with great ioy, ſhewing a true and no fained frendſhippe and good will towardes him, which pleaſed him better, and was more to his contentation, then all the honor they could deuiſe to geue him. But after that Appius Clodius was returned from his Ambaſſade, and had tolde Lucullus that he muſt make warres with Tigranes: Lucullus went backe againe vnto the realme of Pontvs, where he tooke his armie which he had left in garriſon, and brought it before the city of Sinope to lay ſiege vnto it, or rather to beſiege certaine Ci-

B licians that were gotten into the city in the behalfe of Mithridates. But when they ſawe Lucullus come againſt them, they flue a great number of the citizens, and ſetting fire on the city, fled their way by night. Lucullus being aduertiſed of it, entred the citie, put eight thouſande of the Cilicians to the ſword which he found there, and reſtored the naturall citizens and inhabitantes thereof to all that was theirs. But the originall cauſe that made him to be carefull to preſerue the city, was this viſion he had. He thoughe in his nightes dreame that one came to him, and ſayd: goe a litle further Lucullus, for Autolycus commeth, who is deſirous to ſpeake with thee. This dreame awaked him, but being awake could not imagine what the viſion ment. It was the ſelfeſame day on the which he tooke the city of Sinope, where follow-

C ing the Cilicians that eſcaped by flying, he found an image lying on the ground vpon the ſea ſide, which the Cilicians would haue caried away: but they were taken and followed ſo neere, that they had no leaſure to ſhippe it. This ſtatue (as it is reported) was one of the goodlieſt and notableſt workes of Sthenis the Image grauer. And ſome ſay that it was the image of Autolycus who founded the city of Sinope. For Autolycus was one of the princes that went out of Thessalie with Hercules to go againſt the Amazones, and he was the ſonne of Deimachus. And they reporte that at the returne from this voyage, the ſhippe in the which Autolycus was imbarked, with Deimoleon & Phlogius, made ſhippewracke vpon a rocke on the coaſt of Cherronesvs, where ſhe was caſt away: howbeit that he & his mē eſcaping with all their furniture, came to the city of Sinope, which he tooke from certaine Syrians, who came (as D they ſay) of one Syrus the ſonne of Apolla, and of the nimphe Sinope Aſopus daughter. Lucullus vnderſtanding this matter, called a ſaying of Sylla to minde, which he wrote in his commentaries: that nothing is more certaine, nor that we may geue more credit vnto, then that which is ſignified to vs by dreames. In the meane ſeaſon he was aduertiſed, that Tigranes & Mithridates were ready to come downe into Lycaonia, and Cilicia, becauſe they might firſt enter Asia. Lucullus marueled much at Tigranes counſell, that ſithence he was minded to warre with the Romanes, he did not vſe Mithridates ayde in his warres at ſuch time, as when he was in his beſt ſtrength and force: and that he did not then ioyne his power with Mithridates, rather then ſuffer him to be deſtroyed and ouerthrowen, and afterwards with a cold hope go now to begin a new warre, hazarding himſelfe with thoſe, that could not helpe themſelues.

While theſe thinges paſſed in this ſorte, Machares king Mithridates ſonne, that kept the

E realme of Bosphorvs, ſent a crowne of golde vnto Lucullus, of the waight of a thouſande crownes, praying him that he would name him a frende and confederate of the Romanes. Whereupon Lucullus thought he was then at the very laſt ende of his firſt warre, and leauing Sornatius with ſixe thouſand men to keepe the realme of Pontvs, he departed with twelue thouſand footemen, and leſſe then three thouſand horſemen to go to the ſecond warres. And herein all the world condemned him, and thought it too raſh and light a parte of him to goe with ſo ſmall a company to fight with ſo many warlike nations, and to put himſelfe vnto the hazard of ſo many thouſandes of horſemen, in a maruelous large contry, and of a wonderfull length, enuironned round about with deepe riuers, and mountaines, couered with ſnowe all the yeare through: ſo that his ſouldiers, which otherwiſe were no ſpeciall well trained men,

F nor obedient to their Captaine, followed with an euill will, and did ſtubbornly diſobey him. And on thother ſide, the common counſellers at Rome cried out on him continually, and openly proteſted before all the people, that out of one warre he ſowed an other, which the common wealth had nothing to doe withall, and that he looked after none other thinges but ſtill to raiſe newe occaſions of warres, to the ende he might alwayes haue armies at his maundement, & neuer leaue the warres, bicauſe he would make him ſelfe great with the loſſe and perill of the common wealth. Theſe crying counſellers in the end obtained their purpoſe, which was: to call home Lucullus againe, and to ſubſtitute Pompey in his place. But Lucullus for all that, marched on with his army with all the poſſible ſpeede he coulde, ſo that he came in few dayes vnto the riuer of Euphrates, the which he found very high and rough by reaſon of the winter ſeaſon: which troubled him marueloufly at that preſent, doubting leaſt it would hold him there a long time in finding out of boates, & making of poſtes and planckes to build a bridge to paſſe ouer his army. But towardes night the water beganne to fall a litle, and in the night fell ſo much, that the next morning the riuer was comen to her ordinary ſtreames: and moreouer, the contrie men them ſelues decerning certaine litle Ilandes that appeared vnto them in the middeſt of the water courſe, and the riuer very calme as a marriſhe rounde about them, did honor Lucullus as a god, bicauſe it was a thing they had neuer ſeene chaunce before, as though at his comming the riuer had ſodainly yeelded vnto him, and was become gentle to geue him ſafe and eaſie paſſage. And bicauſe he would not looſe that oportunitie, he paſ-ſed ouer his army immediatly: and was no ſooner on thother ſide, but he met with a happie token of good lucke, which was this. On thother ſide of the riuer, there was a certaine number of kyne conſecrated to Diana Perſica, whom the barbarous people inhabiting beyonde the riuer of Euphrates, do reuerence and honor aboue all the other goddes: and theſe kyne they employ to none other vſe, but only to ſacrifice them vnto this goddeſſe. They wander all about the contry where they will, without any maner of tying, or ſhackling otherwiſe, hauing only the marke of the goddeſſe, which is a lampe printed vpon their bodies, and they are not eaſie to be taken when one would haue them, but with great a doe. One of theſe conſecrated kyne, after that Lucullus army was paſſed ouer Euphrates, came to offer her ſelfe vpon a rock which they ſuppoſe is hallowed or dedicate vnto this goddeſſe, bowing downe her head, and ſtretching out her necke, like thoſe that are tyed ſhorte, as if ſhe had comen euen of purpoſe to preſent her ſelfe to Lucullus, to be ſacrificed as ſhe was. And beſides her, he ſacrificed a bull alſo vnto the riuer Euphrates, in token of thankes for his ſafe paſſage ouer. Lucullus the firſt day did nothing but encampe him ſelfe only, on the other ſide of the riuer: but the next morning, and the other dayes following, he went further into the contry by the way of Sophene, hurting none that came and yeelded vnto him, or that willingly receiued his army. For when his men would haue had him to haue take a caſtell by force, where they ſaid was great ſtore of gold and ſiluer: he ſhewed them mownte Taurus a farre of, and told them it is that which we muſt rather go to take. As for the thinges which be in this caſtell, they be kept for them that vanquiſhe: and going on ſtill with great iorneys, paſſed ouer the riuer of Tigris, and ſo entred the realme of Armenia with a maine armie. Now for Tigranes, the firſt man that ventured to bring him newes of Lucullus comming, had no ioy of it: for he cut of his head for his labor.

And therefore from thenceforth there durſt no man ſay any thing vnto him, vntill ſuch time as he was at the laſt enuironned rounde with fire, which Lucullus army had raiſed about him, before he could heare any thing thereof. For he was ſporting and gauding with his familiars, hearing their flattering tales, that Lucullus in deede were a noble Captaine, if he durſt but tary Tigranes comming downe in the citie of Ephesvs only, and howe he would ſtraight flie out of all Asia, ſo ſoone as he might but heare tell of his comming againſt him with ſo triumphing an army of ſo many thowſand men. And thus may we ſee, that like as all bodies and braines, are not a like ſtrong nor able to cary much wine: ſo in like caſe all wittes be not reſo-lute and conſtant, neuer to doe amiſſe, nor to ſwarue from reaſons bandes in great proſperity.
Howbeit in the end, Mithrobarzanes, one of Tigranes familiars, was the next man that enter-priſed to tell him the troth: whoſe boldnes had litle better reward for his newes, then the firſt that was beheaded. For Tigranes ſent him immediatly with three thowſand horſe, and a good number of footemen, commaunding him that he ſhould bring Lucullus aliue vnto him, and that furthermore, he ſhould marche vpon the bellies of his men. Now was Lucullus alreadie camped with parte of his army, & the other parte comming after, when his skowtes brought

Tigranes ſendeth Mithrobarzanes againſt Lucullus.

A him newes of the barbarous Captaines approache: which at the firſt put him in feare, that if the enemy ſhould come and aſſaile them thus ſcattered in companies, & not ranged in battell, and ready to fight, he might ouerthrow them whiles they were in diſorder. And therefore he remained within his campe to fortifie the ſame, and ſent Sextilius one of his Lieutenaunts, with a thowſand ſixe hundred horſe, and as many footemen (or a few more) as well naked as armed: commaunding him to approach as neere to his enemy as he could without fighting, only to ſtay him there, vntill ſuch time as he heard newes that all his army was come together into his campe. Sextilius went to doe his commaundement, but he was compelled to fight, (though againſt his will) Mithrobarzanes came ſo brauely & luſtely to aſſayle him. So was the battell ſtriken betwene them, in the which Mithrobarzanes was ſlaine valliantly fighting, & all B his men either broken or killed, fewe excepted, that onely by flying ſaued them ſelues. After this ouerthrow, Tigranes forſooke his great royall citie of TIGRANOCERTA that he built him ſelfe, & went to mownt Taurus, where he aſſembled a great number of men out of all partes. But Lucullus would geue him no leaſure to prepare him ſelfe, but ſent Murena on the one ſide to cut them of by the way, and to ouerthrowe thoſe that were aſſembled about him: and on the other ſide Sextilius to ſtoppe a great company of the ARABIANS that were comming to Tigranes, whom Sextilius ſet apon as they were ready to lodge, and ouerthrew them in maner euery man. And Murena following king Tigranes at the heeles, ſpyed an occaſion to geue the charge as he paſſed a long and narrow valley, in the bottome wherof the way was very ill, and ſpecially for an armie of ſuch a length: & taking the oportunity, ſet apon the rereward, which C Tigranes perceiuing, fled ſtraight vpon it, making all his cariage to be throwen downe in the way before the enemies to ſtay them. There were a great number of the ARMENIANS ſlayne in this ouerthrow, and moe taken. Thoſe thinges hauing this ſucceſſe, Lucullus went to the citie of TIGRANOCERTA, the which he beſiegeth round. In that citie were a maruelous number of GRÆCIANS that had bene brought thither by force out of CILICIA, and many of the barbarous people alſo whom they had vſed in the like forcible maner, as they had done the ADIABENIANS, the ASSYRIANS, the GORDIÆNIANS, and the CAPPADOCIANS, whoſe townes and cities Tigranes had deſtroyed, and compelled them to come and inhabite there. By reaſon whereof, this city of TIGRANOCERTA was full of golde and ſiluer, of mettells, ſtatues, tables and pictures, bicauſe euery man (as well priuate, as Princes and Lords) ſtudied to pleaſe D the king, to enrich and beawtifie this city, with all kindes of furniture and ornamentes fit for the ſame. And hereuppon Lucullus ſtraighted the ſiege as much as he could, perſwading him ſelfe that Tigranes would neuer ſuffer, that it ſhould be taken, but (though he had otherwiſe determined) yet for very anger would preſent him battell, thereby to enforce him to raiſe his ſiege. And ſurely he geſſed right, had it not bene that Mithridates had diſſwaded him by expreſſe letters and meſſengers that he ſhould in no caſe hazard battell, and perſwaded him rather to cut of the vittells on all ſides from the ROMANES with his horſemen. The ſelfe ſame counſell and aduiſe did Taxiles (the Captaine whom Mithridates ſent) geue him in his campe, and prayed him very earneſtly, that he would not proue the inuincible force of the ROMANES. Tigranes pacientlie harkened to their reaſons at the firſt. But when the ARMENIANS were E come, and all the force of the contry beſides, and the GORDIÆNIANS, and that the kinges of the MEDES and of the ADIABENIANS were commen alſo with all their power, and that on thother ſide there came a maruelous great hoſt of the ARABIANS that dwell apon the ſea of BABYLON, and a multitude of the ALBANIANS from the CASPIAN ſea, and of the IBERIANS their neighbors, beſides a great company of free people liuing without a king, that dwell by the riuer of Araxes, ſome comming freely to doe him pleaſure, other for their penſions and pay which he gaue them: then was there none other talke neither at his table nor in counſell, but of aſſured hope of victorie, and of great bragges and barbarous threatninges, ſo that Taxiles was in great daũger of him ſelfe, bicauſe he was againſt the determination taken in counſell for geuing of the battell. Now was it thought that Mithridates did enuy the glory of king F Tigranes, and therefore did thus diſſwade him from battell. For which reſpect Tigranes would not ſo much as tary for him, and bicauſe alſo Mithridates ſhould haue no parte of the honor of his victory: but went into the fielde with all this great army, vaunting amongeſt his fami-

liars as they reporte, that nothing grieued him but one, that he ſhould fight with Lucullus alone, and not with all the other ROMANE Captaines. Now this brauery was not ſo fond, nor ſo farre out of ſquare, but that there was great likelyhoode of it when he ſaw ſo many ſundrie nations about him, ſo many kinges that followed him, ſo many battells of armed footemen, and ſo many thowſande of horſemen. For he had in his army of bowmen and ſlinges onely, twenty thowſand: fiue and fifty thowſand horſemen, whereof ſeuenteene thowſande men of armes, armed from toppe to toe, as Lucullus him ſelfe wrote vnto the Senate: and a hundred and fifty thowſand armed footemen, deuided by enſignes and ſquadrons: of pyoners, carpinters, maſons, and ſuch other kinde of handy craftes men, to plaine wayes, to make bridges to paſſe ouer riuers, to ſtoppe ſtreames, to cut wodde, and to make ſuch kinde of workes, of this ſorte of people, the number of fiue and thirty thowſand, who followed in battell ray in the rereward of the army, making their campe ſeme farre greater, & by ſo much the more ſtronger. When Tigranes ſhewed on the toppe of mownt Taurus, and that they might plainly ſee his whole army from the city, and that him ſelfe alſo might eaſily decerne Lucullus armie that beſieged TIGRANOCERTA: the barbarous people that were within the citie were ſo glad of this ſight, that they made wonderfull ſhowtes of ioy, and great clapping of handes, threatning the ROMANES from their walles, and ſhewing them the army of the ARMENIANS. Lucullus in the meane time ſate in counſell to conſider what was to be done: wherein ſome were of opinion that he ſhould raiſe his ſiege, and goe with his whole armie vndeuided againſt Tigranes. But others liked not that he ſhould leaue ſo great a number of enemies at his backe, neither that he ſhould raiſe his ſiege. Lucullus made them aunſwere, that neither of them both did counſell him well, but both together did counſell him right. Whereuppon he deuided his armie, and left Murena at the ſiege of TIGRANOCERTA with ſixe thowſand men: and he with foure and twenty cohortes (in the which were not aboue tenne thowſand armed footemen) and all his horſemen, with a thowſand bowmen and ſlinges or thereabouts, went towardes Tigranes, and camped in a goodly broade fielde by the riuers ſide. The ROMANES ſeemed but a handfull to Tigranes campe, ſo that for a while Tigranes paraſyts made but a may game of them to ſporte withall. For ſome mocked them to ſcorne, other drewe lottes, and played away their parte of the ſpoyles, as if they had already wonne the fielde: and euery one of the kinges and Captaines came and offered them ſelues to Tigranes, and beſought him euerie man for him ſelfe, that he would geue him the honor alone to leade this battell, & that it would pleaſe him to ſit by in ſome place to ſee the ſporte. Tigranes then, bicauſe he would ſhewe that he could be as pleaſaunt as the reſt, ſpake a thing knowen to euery man. If they come as Ambaſſadors, quod he, they are very many: but if they come as enemies, they be but fewe. And thus they played vpon the ROMANES, and tooke their pleaſure of them at that time: but the next morning by breake of day, Lucullus brought all his men armed into the fielde, and put them in order of battel. Now the campe of the barbarous people lay on thother ſide of the riuer towards the Eaſt, and by chaunce the ſtreame of the riuer turned ſodainly towardes the Weſt, where there was a better ford to paſſe ouer. Wherfore Lucullus marching with his army by the riuers ſide, following the ſtreame to meete with ſome forde, haſting to get ouer, Tigranes thought he had marched away, and called for Taxiles, and ſayd vnto him, laughing. Doeſt thou ſee Taxiles, thoſe goodly ROMANE legyons, whom thou praiſeſt to be men ſo inuincible: howe they flie away now? Taxiles aunſwered the king againe. I would your good fortune (O king) might worke ſome miracle this day: for doubleſſe it were a ſtraunge thing that the ROMANES ſhould flie. They are not wont to weare their braue cotes and furniture vppon their armor, when they meane onely but to marche in the fieldes: neither doe they carie their ſhieldes and targets vncaſed, nor their burganets bare on their heades, as they doe at this preſent, hauing throwen away their leather caſes and coueringes. But out of doubt, this goodly furniture we ſee ſo bright and gliſtering in our faces, is a manifeſt ſigne that they intend to fight, and that they marche towardes vs. Taxiles had no ſooner ſpoken theſe wordes, but Lucullus in the view of his enemies, made his enſigne bearer turne ſodainly that caried the firſt Eagle, & the bands tooke their places to paſſe the riuer in order of battell. Then Tigranes ſecretly comen to him ſelfe, as out of dronkennes: cried out alowde twiſe, or thriſe, come they then to vs? But then

A was there no ſmall ſturre and tumult, to put ſuch a world of people into battell. The king Tigranes him ſelfe vndertooke to leade the midle battell, gaue the left wing vnto the king of the ADIABENIANS, and the right vnto the king of the MEDES: in the which were the moſt parte of the complete armed men, who made the firſt front of all the battell. But as Lucullus was ready to paſſe the riuer, there were certaine of his Captaines that came vnto him, to wiſh him to take heede that he fought not that day, bicauſe it was one of thoſe which the ROMANES thought vnfortunate, and call them Atri, to ſay, blacke: for vpon one of thoſe dayes, one Capio was ouerthrowen in a ſet battell with all his army by the CIMBRES. But Lucullus gaue the a prety aunſwere againe, which is not forgotten to this day: I will make this a happy day (ſayd he) for the ROMANES. It was the ſixteenth day of the moneth of October. And ſo with thoſe B wordes encoraging his men, paſſed ouer the riuer, and went him ſelfe the foremoſt man, and marched directly towardes his enemy, armed with an anima of ſteele, made with ſcalloppe ſhelles, ſhining like the ſunne, & vpon that an arming coate fringed round about, holding his ſword drawen in his hand: to let his men vnderſtand, that they muſt ſodainly ioyne with their enemies, and fight at the ſwordes pointe, that were not acquainted to fight but a farre of with ſhotte and ſlinges, and that he would ſo quickely winne the diſtaunce of grounde they had to marche ere they could ioyne, that they ſhould haue no leaſure to ſhoote. And furthermore, perceiuing that the ſtrength of their men of armes (wherof they made ſo great accompt) was ranged in battell vnder a hill, the toppe whereof was very plaine and euen, and the way vp the hill not paſſing foure furlonges trauaill, and not very hard nor ſteepe to clime: he ſent thither C certaine horſemen of the THRACIANS and GAVLES which he had in pay, and commaunded them to geue a charge on the flancke to diſorder them, & aſſay to cut their launces, with their ſwordes. For all the ſtrength of theſe men of armes conſiſteth in their launces, and they can do nothing for them ſelues, nor againſt their enemies, they are ſo heauely armed and loden: ſo as it ſeemeth they are locked vp in their armor, as in an iron priſon. And he him ſelfe therewithall taking two enſignes of footemen, ſtroue alſo to gaine the toppe of the hill, his ſouldiers following him hard at the heeles with a notable corage, bicauſe they ſaw him the formoſt man trauailing a foote, and digging againſt the height of the hill. When he had gotten vp to the toppe, he ſtayed a litle in the higheſt place he could finde, and then cried out with a lowd voyce: oh companions, the victory is ours. And as he ſpake thoſe wordes, he ledde them a- D gainſt theſe men of armes, commaunding them they ſhould not medle with throwing of their dartes, but taking their ſwordes in their handes they ſhould ſtrike at their thighes and legges, bicauſe they haue no other partes of their bodies naked. Howbeit there was no neede of ſuch fight, for they taried not the ROMANES, but with great crying out turned their horſe heades immediatly, and ranne cowardly (them ſelues and their horſes, heauie armed as they were) through the middeſt of the bandes of their footemen, before they had ſtriken a ſtroke. And thus were ſo many thowſandes of men broken without any ſtroke ſtriken, or any man hurt, or one droppe of blood ſeene to be ſpilt. But the great ſlaughter was, when they beganne to flie, or (to ſay better) when they thought to flie: for they could not flie, they ranne ſo one apon an others necke by reaſon of the maruelous length and bredth of their battells. Tigranes a- E mongeſt the reſt was one of the firſt that diſlodged with a ſmall company, & ſeeing his ſonne running the ſame fortune, flying as him ſelfe did, tooke of his diadeame or royall bande from his head, and gaue it him weeping, commaunding him to ſaue him ſelfe as well as he could by ſome other way. But the young prince durſt not put it on his head, but gaue it to one of his truſty ſeruauntes to keepe, who by chaunce was taken and brought vnto Lucullus: ſo that amongeſt the other ſpoyle and priſoners, there was taken Tigranes diadeame. It is thought that there were ſlaine at this ouerthrow, aboue a hundred thowſand footemen, and very few of all the horſemen ſaued. On the ROMANES ſide, there were about a hundred hurt, and fiue ſlaine. Antiochus the Philoſopher ſpeaking of this battell in a treatiſe he made of the gods, wryteth that the ſunne neuer ſaw the like ouerthrowe. And Strabo an other Philoſopher in a certaine F abridgement he made of ſtories ſayd, that the ROMANES were aſhamed, and laughed at them ſelues that they had drawen their ſwordes againſt ſuch daſtardly ſlaues. And Titus Liuius declareth alſo, that the ROMANES were neuer in any battell with ſo ſmall a number of fighting men, against so great a multitude of enemies: for the conquerers were not in all the world the twentith parte (nothing like) of those that were ouercome. Wherefore the oldest and best experienced Captaines of the ROMANES did highly commende Lucullus, bicause he had ouercome two of the greatest & most mighty Princes of the world, by two sundry cōtrary meanes: the one by tract and delay, and the other by spede and swiftnes. For he vndermyned and consumed Mithridates, by holding backe, & delaying, at that time when all his stregth was whole: and to the contrary he destroyed Tigranes with great speede and haste. And thus did he that which few Captaines could euer do: that is, vsed delay of time to execute, and valliant expedition to winne the victory. This was the cause why Mithridates made no hast to come to the battel, thinking still that Lucullus had vsed his wonted policy, to delay and geue backe alwaies: and therefore he came by small iorneys vnto Tigranes campe. But meeting at the first with a fewe of the ARMENIANS that fled as he came on his way, like men that had bene frayed, he straight mistrusted the ouerthrow: but afterwards meeting greater troupes of them naked, & sore wounded, then he knew how the matter went. So he went to seeke out Tigranes, whom he found alone, forsaken of his men, and in very poore estate, yet did not he requite Tigranes in aduersity with that pride and disdaine he had vsed him before in his miserie: but lighted of his horse, to bewaile with him their common misfortune, and gaue him all his officers, and traine of a kings court that followed him to serue him, comforting him, & exhorting him to plucke vp his hart againe, and to be coragious thenceforth. Hereupon they both leauied a freshe the whole force & power they could from all the partes of their dominions. In the meane season there fell out great sedition in the city of TIGRANOCERTA, betwene the GRÆCIANS and the barbarous people: for the GRÆCIANS, they would haue yeelded vp the towne into Lucullus hands. Whereupon, Lucullus geuing an assault to the city at that very instant, wanne it, & seased vpon the kings treasure there, leauing all the rest to the spoile of the souldiers: in the which, besides all other riches, there was eight thowsand talents in ready money. And yet besides all that, he gaue of the spoile that was won ap[illegible] the enemies, eight hūdred Drachmas vnto euery souldier. And vnderstanding that there were diuers musitians, common players, minstrels, and such kinde of people meete for feastes and sporte, whom Tigranes had sent for thither from all partes, to dedicate the Theater he had made in his city: he caused all thē to serue at the sportes and feastes of this victory. After the solempnization whereof, he sent the GRÆCIANS home againe vnto their contry, and gaue them money to defraye their charges by the way, and the barbarous people also that were brought thither by force from their natiue contries. And so it fortuned, that by the desolation and destruction of a city forsaken, many others were built againe, and stored with people: bicause those cities had thereby recouered their naturall inhabitants againe, who euer after did loue & honor Lucullus, as their benefactor and founder. All other things prospered also, according to his vertue and merites. For Lucullus liked better the praise that came of bounty, of iustice, and of clemencie: then that that came by force of marshall prowes & cheualry. For in deedes of armes, he sayd his army partly deserued praise, and fortune also caried the best parte away: but the praise of the other, were onely due vnto him selfe. Whereby he shewed the valor of an excellent good man, well taught and trained vp in vertue: and so reaped the frute of his worthy deserts. For by those good partes, he wanne the hartes of the barbarous people in such sorte, that the kinges of the ARABIANS came of good will to put them selues and their goods into his hands. So did the nation of the SOPHENIANS also yeld them selues vnto him. The GORDIÆNIANS in like maner, they liked Lucullus so well, that they would willingly haue forsaken their cities, houses & contry, to follow him with their wiues & children vpon this occasion. Zarbienus king of these GORDIÆNIANS, as we haue recited before, had priuily entred amity with Lucullus, by meanes of Appius Clodius, who could no lenger away with the tyranny of Tigranes. This practise was bewrayed vnto Tigranes, who put Zarbienus, his wife, & children to death, before the ROMANES mane army came into the contry of ARMENIA. Howbeit Lucullus did not forget it, but passing through his realme, gaue him very royall funeralles. For hauing heaped vp a huge pyle of wodde, sumptuously set out with cloth of gold and siluer, & other rich spoiles of Tigranes: he him selfe in person, would needes set it a fire, and made the funerall effusions and accustomed sprincklinges at burialles, with his frends

A frendes and kinſemen, doing him this honor, as to call him frend and confederate of the Romane people, & appointed alſo a great ſumme of money beſides to erect a ſumptuous tombe for him. For they found great ſtore of gold and ſiluer in the kinges caſtell, and there was plenty of prouiſion alſo of three hundred thowſand buſhells of wheate: the which did enriche his ſouldiers maruelouſly, and made Lucullus to be wondered at, that hauinge receiued not one Drachma from the ſparing coffers at Rome, he had notwithſtanding made the warre entertaine it ſelfe. About the ſelf ſame time alſo, the king of the Parthians ſent Ambaſſadors vnto him to offer him his frendſhippe and allyance: which Lucullus willingly accepted, and ſent Ambaſſadors frō him alſo of acceptation, who made reporte to Lucullus at their returne, that the king of the Parthians ſtoode doubtfull how to reſolue which parte he ſhould take, and B that ſecretly he ſent vnto Tigranes, to aske the realme of Mesopotamia for his reward to aide him againſt the Romanes. Lucullus being truly enformed of the king of Parthiaes' double dealing, determined to leaue Tigranes and Mithridates, as two enemies wearied & ouercome, & a litle to proue the force & power of the Parthians by making warres vpon thē, thinking it great honor vnto him, if he might diſcomfit and ouerthrow three ſo mighty kings one after an other, like a valliant conqueror that had ouercome three famous Captaines togither, and had paſſed through the contries of three of the greateſt Princes vnder the ſunne, alwayes a conqueror, and neuer conquered. Hereupon he wrote immediatly vnto Sornatius and other of his Captaines which he had left to keepe the realme of Pontvs, that they ſhould repayne to him with all ſpeede with the bandes they had vnder their charge, for that he was determi-C ned to departe out of the contry of Gordiæna, to go againſt the Parthians: howbeit his purpoſe altered by occaſion. For his Lieutenauntes that had many times before founde their ſouldiers mutinous, and rebelling at their commaundements, knew plainly then their cancred ſtomakes & incorrigible diſobedience. For they could not poſſibly get them from thence, by any compulſion or perſwaſions they could vſe: but contrarily they cryed out, and tolde them plainly, that they would no lenger tary where they were, but would goe home to their contry, and leaue the realme of Pontvs without gard or garriſon at all. And further, that worſt of all was, when theſe newes were brought to Lucullus campe, they gaue a full example of boldnes to his ſouldiers there, to mutiny in ſuch ſorte, hauing good will and diſpoſition thereunto of themſelues before. For their purſes being full, and they acquainted with finenes, were become D ſo dull and laſie, that they could endure no paines nor hardnes of warres, but deſired to liue in all idlenes and eaſe. And hearing the reporte of their fellowes ſtowteneſſe, called them luſtie laddes, ſaying, they muſt needes take the like courſe, and doe as they taught them, vaunting of their good ſeruice of long time done, which well deſerued leaue nowe to departe home with ſafety, and thenceforth take their reſt. Lucullus hearing of this their talke, & many other their words worſe, and fuller of ſedition then theſe: brake of his enterpriſe againſt the Parthians, and went againe in the middeſt of ſommer to meete with Tigranes. But when he was come to the top of mount Taurus, it grieued him to ſee the fields ſo full of wheate yet ſtanding, which came by the ſeaſon of the yeare, and coldnes of the ayer, being ſo ſlacke and ſlowe in all thoſe partes. Neuertheles, he came downe into the valley, and at two or three skirmiſhes ouerthrew
E the Armenians, that ventered to abide his comming downe. And ranne ouer all the valley, and deſtroyed the whole contry, without let or ſtoppe of any man, taking away the prouiſion of corne that was made for Tigranes campe: wherby he ſtraighted his enemies vnto that nede and neceſſity of vittells which him ſelfe feared, & yet ceaſed not to prouoke them (by all other meanes) to come to battell. Somtime encloſing their cāpe with trenches about, as if he ment to famiſh them: ſomtime againe deſtroying and ſpoyling the whole contry before their face. But bicauſe they had ſo ofte bene diſcomfited, they would no more ſtirre, nor once mone againſt him. Lucullus perceiuing that, in the end raiſed his campe, & went and layed ſiege vnto F Artaxata, the chiefe city of the kingdom of Armenia, in the which were Tigranes lawfull wiues & young children, hoping that Tigranes would rather hazard an other battell, then ſuffer that city to be loſt. It is ſayd that Hannibal of Carthage (after king Antiochus was ouerthrowen in battell by the Romanes) went vnto king Artaxes, whom he taught many neceſſary and profitable things for his realme: & amongeſt others, conſidering that one of the goodlieſt and pleaſaunteſt places of all his kingdom lay waſt, and no reckoning made of it, drewe A plat of a city, brought the king thither, and cauſed it to be built and inhabited. The king liked his deuiſe maruelous well, and prayed him to take the charge vpon him to ſee the worke finiſhed. And thus was this noble and famous city built, and called after the kings name, Artaxata: and held euer after the reputacion of the chiefeſt place of the whole realme of ARMENIA. Tigranes being aduertiſed that Lucullus went to laye ſiege thereunto, could not endure it, but went with all his army to follow the ROMANES, and the fourth day came and camped hard by them: inſomuch as there was but the riuer of Arſanias betwene them, which the ROMANES of neceſſitie muſt paſſe ouer to goe to ARTAXATA. Lucullus hauinge firſt ſacrificed vnto the goddes, aſſuring him ſelfe of the victorie, as if he had it already in his handes: made his armie paſſe ouer in order of battell, putting twelue cohortes in the fronte, and the other behinde, B fearing leaſt the enemies hauing a great number of men of armes ſhoulde enuironne them at their backes. They had againſt them alſo the MARDIAN bow men a horſe backe, and the IBERIANS with their lances, in whom Tigranes truſted more then in any other, as in the beſt ſouldiers he had in pay: and yet for all that they did no notable ſeruice. For when they had skirmiſhed but a litle with the horſemen of the ROMANES, they durſt not tarie the legyonaries or footebands that came behinde them, but diſperſed them ſelues, ſome flying one way, ſome an other, which intiſed the ROMANE horſemen to follow the chaſe. But when the men of armes that were about Tigranes perſon, ſawe the horſemen ſo ſcattered abroade, they began ſtraighe to breake vpon the footemen. Lucullus ſeeing the great multitude of them, and how paſſingly they were armed and appointed, being ſomewhat affrayed thereof: ſent in haſt to call in his C horſemen that followed the chaſe, and in the meane time him ſelfe marched foremoſt, againſt theſe Lordes and Satrapes, which were in the fronte before him with all the nobility of their hoaſt, whom he put in ſuch a feare, that before he could come to hand ſtrokes, they all turned taile and fled. There were three kinges ranged in battell one hard by an other, howbeit of the three, he that fled moſt ſhamefully and cowardly, was Mithridates king of PONTVS, who had not the hart ſo much as to abide the cries of the ROMANES. The chaſe was very long: for it continued all night vntill ſuch time as the ROMANES were wearied with killing, taking of priſoners, and packing vp of all kindes of ſpoyles. Titus Liuius ſayeth, that there were ſlaine moe men in the firſt battell: but greater perſonages in the ſeconde, and the chiefeſt of the enemies were all taken. After this battell Lucullus hart being bigge, and fearing nothing, determined to D goe further into the contry, euen vtterly to deſtroy this barbarous king. But in the time of the equinoctiall autumne, (when the weather waxed more bitter then any man would in that ſeaſon haue thought) there fell out ſo great a cold, that for the moſt part it did nothing but ſnow: and if the element did any thing cleere, then froſe it ſo hard, that the horſe could come by no water, the riuers were ſo extreamely congealed with iſe. And there could no man paſſe ouer by forde: for they did not ſo ſoone enter, but the iſe brake, and cut the vaines & ſinewes of the horſe legges a ſunder, they were ſo hard and thicke withall. And furthermore, the contry being full of trees, woddes and forreſtes, and the wayes very narrowe, not being able to paſſe by the fieldes, they were through wet with ſnow that fell vpon them: & when they came to their lodging, then it was worſe, for there were they conſtrained to lye in ſoft & moyſt places. And E therefore the ſouldiers had followed but few dayes after this battell, but they refuſed to goe any further. And firſt they ſent their Collonells and Captaines to intreate Lucullus to leaue of this iorney. Afterwards they gathered together more boldly in trowpes, and in the night time beganne to murmure and groyne in their tents (which is a certaine ſigne and token of a mutinous armie, that hath a minde to rebell againſt their Generall) although that Lucullus vſed all gentle perſwaſions to winne them with pacience to abide this iorney, at the leaſt, till time they might take the citie of CARTHAGE in ARMENIA: to thende they might there deſtroy the worke and memory of the greateſt enemy that euer the ROMANES had in this world, meaning Hannibal. But when he ſaw all this would not preuaile, he brought them backe againe, & paſſed ouer mount Taurus an other way, and came downe into the contry called MYGDONIA, a F very hotte and fertile ſoyle, where there is a great city, and maruelouſly repleniſhed with inhabitauntes: who call it NISIBIS, and the GRÆCIANS call it ANTIOCH, of MYGDONIA. In Niſibis, alias Antiochia, a city of Mygdonia.

A that city Gouras was Gouernor, who was Tigranes owne brother: but for experiẽce in engines of battery, and for sufficiencie and skill in such matters, there was Callimachus also, he that so maruelously troubled Lucullus before at the siege of the city of AMISVS. Lucullus placing his campe before this city, besieged the same by all such meanes as might enforce it, and that so valliantly, that in very shorte time he tooke it by assault. And as for Gouras, who submitted him selfe to Lucullus mercie, he was very curteously intreated. But for Callimachus, he would not once heare him speake, notwithstanding that he promised, if they would saue his life, he would tell them of coffers full of great treasure hidden, which no man knew but him selfe onely. But Lucullus commaunded them to bring him with gyues to receiue the punishment he had iustly deserued, for setting the city of AMISVS a fire, and taking from him the meane to shewe the

B GRÆCIANS his goodnesse, affection and liberality towardes them. Vntill this present time, it might be truely sayd, that good fortune euer fauored & followed Lucullus in all his enterprises and affayres: but from that time forwards, it was quickely seene that the fauorable blast of fortune failed him, he did all his things with so great payne, and all that he did fell out contrarie vnto him, and to very ill purpose. In deede he did euer shew the valiancy, pacience, and great corage that should be in a valliant Generall, or Lieutenaunt of an armie. But his exployts and doinges had neuer after that easie grace, nor shining glory they were wont to haue: but to the contrary, he was like to haue lost all that he had wonne before, through the misfortunes that fell vpon him, and for the brawles and vaine contention he had with his people to no purpose. But the worst was, that they make him selfe thonly author of all these euills, bicause he could

C not, or would not entertaine the goodwill of the multitude of his souldiers: thinking that whatsoeuer a Generall, or any other officer of state or calling doth to please and content them he hath vnder his charge, is to dishonor him selfe, and to geue cause vnto his souldiers to despise his authoritie. But that which made most against him was this: that he gaue no estimacion to gentlemen, and men of like quality to him selfe, but disdained them, and thought them vnworthy to be equall with him. For these they say were his faultes and imperfections, but otherwise that he wanted no vertues, nor naturall giftes & good condicions that could be possibly wished for, or desired. For he was a talle gentleman, of goodly presence, well spoken, wise and discreete, as well in matters of gouernment, as in warres: and as well to perswade the people in peace, as to encorage his souldiers in warre. Salust wryteth of him, that his souldiers be-

D gan to mislike with him, euen from the first entry into these warres, bicause he made them lye out two winters together in the field, one after an other: the one before the city of CIZICVS, and the other before the city of AMISVS. And euen as much did the other winters following vexe and trouble them. For either they lay in their enemies contry, or else if they lay in their frendes, yet he made them campe abroade in the field, and shrowd them selues in their tentes: for Lucullus neuer entred with his army into any city or confederate towne of GRÆCE. Now if the souldiers of them selues misliked Lucullus, the coũsellers at ROME that were his enemies, and enuied his prosperity and glory, gaue them yet greater occasions to mutine against him. For they cõtinually accused him to the people in their orations, that he drew out this warre in length, purposely bicause he would alwayes haue occasion to rule, & meanes to get, hauing in

And they say that it was Lucius Quintius, one of the Prætors, that spake these wordes. It was he also that most moued the people to take order, that Lucullus should be called home, & other sent to succeede him in the charge & gouernmẽt of the contries he had subdued. By the selfe same meane, it was also ordained: that diuers which were vnder his charge, should be dispersed with all for their othes, and licenced to leaue the warres when they thought good. But besides those & such like great causes, there was yet an other more daungerous plague, & that most ouerthrew Lucullus proceedings, pas-

For he tooke him ſelfe equall with the beſt, and would needes haue bene holden for chiefe: when in deede there were many of farre better deſert, he being noted both for a vitious and ill diſpoſed perſon. Whereupon he beganne for ſpight to ſuborne the bandes called FIMBRIANS, and to ſtirre them vp againſt Lucullus, ſowing ſweete and pleaſaunt wordes amongeſt the ſouldiers, which being wonted therunto, looked ſtill to be flattered. For they were thoſe whom Fimbria had procured to kill the Conſull Flaccus, and chooſe him in his ſteede for their Captaine. By reaſon whereof they gaue good eare to Clodius words, and called him a noble Captaine, and a louer of ſouldiers. For when he ſpake vnto them, he made as though he had pittied them, for that they ſhould neuer ſee an end of their great paynes and warres, but ſhould miſerably conſume their dayes in fighting continually, ſometime with one nation, and ſometime with another: and that they wandered through all the contries of the world, receiuing no worthy reward of ſo long and painfull ſeruice, ſeruing only to gard Lucullus cartes & camells loden with plate and veſſell of golde, and ſiluer, and other pretious ſtones. Where the ſouldiers that had ſerued vnder Pompey, tooke nowe their eaſe at home in their contry with their wiues and children, and were landed men, dwelling in goodly fayer cities, as rich burgeſes and wealthy citizens: and yet they had not driuen Mithridates and Tigranes out of their kingdomes, into deſert places vnhabitable, nor had deſtroyed the Princely houſes of ASIA, but only made a litle warre in SPAYNE againſt thoſe that were baniſhed, & in ITALIE againſt fugitiue ſlaues. Shall we then ſayd he, cary harneſſe on our backes all the dayes of our life? Is it not better that we which are eſcaped vntil this preſent, reſerue our ſelues, our bodies & liues for that noble Captaine, who eſteemeth the greateſt honor and glory he can atchieue vnto, is to make his ſouldiers rich that ſerue vnder him? Lucullus army was ſo ſeduced and corrupted, with theſe mutinous and ſeditious accuſations, that the ſouldiers would no lenger follow him, neither againſt Tigranes, nor againſt Mithridates: who went preſently out of ARMENIA into his realme of PONTVS, and beganne to conquer it againe, whileſt the ROMANE ſouldiers mutining againſt their General, remained idle in the prouince of GORDIÆNA, excuſing them ſelues by the winter ſeaſon, & tarying vntill Pompey or ſome other Captaine ſhould quickely come to raiſe the ſiege, and ſucceede Lucullus. Notwithſtanding, when they vnderſtoode that Mithridates had ouerthrowen Fabius, one of Lucullus Lieutenaunts, and that he went againſt Sornatius & Triarius: they were then aſhamed of them ſelues, and became contented to be led by Lucullus. But Triarius in a brauery, when he heard that Lucullus drew neere, made haſt to winne the victory, as if it had bene cocke ſure before Lucullus came: and was him ſelfe ouerthrowen in a great battell, where ſome ſay there dyed aboue ſeuen thowſande ROMANES, amongeſt the which were a hundred and fifty centurions, & foure and twenty Captaines or Collonells of a thowſand men a peece, and yet beſides, Mithridates tooke their campe alſo. Shortly after this ouerthrow, Lucullus came thither, who hid Triarius, whom the ſouldiers ſought in their anger by all the meanes they could to kill. Now when Lucullus was come, he prooued ſundrie meanes to procure Mithridates to battell: but Mithridates would not once ſturre abroade, bicauſe he looked for Tigranes that came downe with a mighty power. Whereuppon he determined againe to goe againſt Tigranes to fight with him, before Mithridates and he ioyned forces together. But as he was in his iorney towardes him, the FIMBRIAN bandes beganne to rebell a new, and would not follow his enſignes, ſaying, and alleaging of them ſelues, that by decree of the people they had leaue to departe, and were diſcharged from their othe: and furthermore that Lucullus had no more to do to commaund them, conſidering that the gouernment of the prouinces which he had, was geuen vnto others. Lucullus perceiuing this, did ſo humble him ſelfe vnto them, ſuppoſing that way to winne them, as there was no kinde of vncomely humility but he ſubmitted him ſelfe vnto it: inſomuch as he went into their tentes to pray and intreate them one after an other, with water in his eyes, and with ſo great lowlineſſe, as euen to ſhake handes with them. But they fiercely reiected all his curteſies and fayer intreaties, caſting their pennyleſſe purſes before him, and angrily bad him fight with his enemies alone, ſince he had with the ſpoile of them all ſo well enriched him ſelfe alone. Neuertheleſſe, at the interceſſion and earneſt requeſt of the other ſoldiers, theſe FIMBRIAN bands were compelled to promiſe, Lucullus forced to humble him ſelfe to his mutinous ſouldiers.

A miſs, that they would yet tary all that ſommer, ſo that if no mã in the meane time offred them battell, at the ende of the tearme, they might go where they would. Lucullus was forced to accepte this condicion, or elſe to remaine alone, & conſequently to forſake the contry of the barbarous people. With much a do thus he kept them together, but in ſuch ſorte, as he durſt no more venter to compell them to come to battell, contenting him ſelfe that they were willing onely to ſtay with him, being forced to ſuffer Tigranes in the meane time to deſtroy and ouerronne the contry of CAPPADOCIA, & Mithridates alſo to bragge againe, of whom he had before wrytten to the Senate that he had vtterly ouercome him: inſomuch as there came commiſſioners & deputies from ROME by his owne procurement, to order the ſtate of the realme of PONTVS with him, as of a kingdom already wonne to the ROMANE Empire. But whē they B were comen, they found him not maſter of him ſelfe, & that his owne ſouldiers ſlowted him, and did him all the ſpight and iniury they could. For they were ſo vnruly towardes their Captaine, and did ſo much diſdaine him, that when the end of the ſommer was come, they armed them ſelues with armor and weapon, and drawing out their ſwordes in mockery, challenged their enemies to battell which were gone out of the fielde: and after they had made the noyſe and cryes accuſtomed when they ioyned battel, and made as though they fought, hurling and ſwinging their ſwords in the ayer, they went from the campe, declaring openly that their time was expired, which they promiſed Lucullus to tary. On thother ſide Pompey had wrytten vnto the other ſouldiers that were yet in campe, to come vnto him: for through the peoples fauor at ROME, the practiſes and flatteries of the common counſellers there, he was ſubſtituted C Generall in Lucullus place. Which much miſliked the Senate and nobility: for they thought Lucullus greatly wronged to haue a ſucceſſor ſent, not to ſucceede him in troubles and daungers, but in honor and glory of triumphe. And that they ſhould compell him not onely to reſigne vp the office of a Generall to an other, but (for the good ſeruice he long time had done) the reward of his honor due for the ſame: and this alſo more miſliked them, that were then about him. That ſo ſoone as Pompey was arriued in ASIA, he tooke all power & authority from Lucullus, to puniſhe or reward any man, for good or ill ſeruice done to the common wealth in thoſe warres, & did moreouer prohibite by publicke bills ſet vp in euery common place, that they ſhould no more repayre vnto him, nor obey ought, that he, or any of the ten cōmiſſioners ſent to diſpoſe of the ſtate of the prouinces wonne by him, ſhould commaund or ordaine: and D bicauſe Pompey came with a greater power and army then his, he was in ſome feare of him. Their frends thought good neuertheleſſe they ſhould meete together: and ſo they did incontinently, in a village of GALATIA, where at their firſt meeting they ſaluted ech other very curteouſly, reioycing together of the noble victories that either had wonne. Lucullus was the elder man, but Pompey of greater dignity, bicauſe he had bene Generall of the ROMANE people in many warres, & had already triumphed twiſe. The bundells of roddes which the ſergeaunts caried before them, were wreathed about with lawrell braunches for the victories they had both atchieued: but Pompeys bundells were withered away, bicauſe they had comen a longe iorney through hotte and drye contries. Lucullus officers ſeeing theirs withered, curteouſly gaue them of theirs freſh and new gathered: which Pompeys frendes tooke for a ſigne of good E lucke. For to ſay truely, the thinges that Lucullus did in the time of his charge, were cauſe of the honor that Pompey afterwardes wanne. Howbeit in the end for all their talke, they were no whit the better frendes: but departed thone from thother more ſtraunge then they met. For Pompey by a plaine edict, brake, reuoked, and diſanulled all Lucullus ordinaunces, and taking from him all his other ſouldiers, left him but only ſixtene hundred to accōpany his triumphe, and yet they followed him with vnwilling mindes: ſuch was Lucullus imperfection & mayme, either by nature, or frowardnes of fortune, that he lacked the chiefeſt thing a Generall ſhould haue, which was, to be beloued of his ſouldiers. For if he had attained to that perfection, amongeſt many other his excellent vertues, and magnanimity, wiſedom, iudgement, & iuſtice: the riuer of Euphrates had not bene the vttermoſt confines of the Empire of ROME on ASIA F ſide, but it had extēded as farre as the ſea Hyrcane, yea euen vnto thutmoſt parte of the world. For king Tigranes had already conquered the other nations that lye beyonde that, ſauing the contrie of PARTHIA, which then was not ſo great nor ſtronge, as it appeared afterwardes in

Craſſus time: nor ſo ioyned and knit together, but (what through ciuill diſſentions amongſt them at home, and forrein warres of their neighbors abroade) was ſo weake, that with great difficulty they could defend themſelues from the ARMENIANS, that continually harried them out of their skinnes. But to take thinges rightly as they be in deede, me thinkes that Lucullus did more hurt vnto his contry by other, then he did benefit the ſame by him ſelfe. For the tokens of triumphe and victories which he wanne in ARMENIA ſo neere vnto the PARTHIANS, the cities of TIGRANOCERTA and of NISIBIS which he had ſacked and ſpoyled, the great treaſure that he brought to ROME, and the Diadeame alſo of Tigranes, which was ſhewed in triumphe as a priſoner with the reſt: moued Craſſus with ſuch a maruelous deſire to paſſe into ASIA, as if all the barbarous people had bene nothing but an aſſured ſpoyle, and a purpoſed pray vnto all thoſe that would come to take them. But Craſſus farre otherwiſe, finding himſelfe galled and troubled with the arrowes of the PARTHIANS, knew then by proofe, that Lucullus had not ſo much ouercome his enemies for that they wanted skill, or were a cowardly people, as he had done through his wiſedom and valliantnes. But that ſhalbe ſeene hereafter. Furthermore, Lucullus being now returned to ROME, found firſt of all his brother Marcus accuſed by one Gaius Memmius, for that he had done in his office of treaſorer, in Sylles time, and by his commaundement, whereof he was cleared by ſentence of the iudges. But Memmius of ſpight turned his anger againſt Lucullus ſelfe, ſtirring vp the people againſt him, and letting them vnderſtand that Lucullus had kept backe and robbed much parte of the treaſure, which ſhould haue comen to the common wealth, and that to worke his feate the better, had prolonged theſe warres as he did: wherefore he perſwaded them flatly to deny him the honor of his triumphe. And truely Lucullus was in great daunger to haue loſt it vtterly: but that the noble men of the city, and they that were of greateſt authority, intermedled themſelues with the tribes when they came to paſſe it by voyces of the people, whome they intreated ſo much through ſute and perſwaſion, that in the end, with much a doe, the people ſuffred him to enter the city in triumphe. So Lucullus made a triumphant entry, not terrible nor troubleſome for the long ſhewe or ſight thereof, nor for the multitude of thinges that he brought thither with him, as many other Captaines had done before him. For he cauſed the ſhowe place (which they call Circus Flaminius at ROME) to be ſet out and furniſhed chiefly with armor and weapons of the enemies to a maruelous number: and with the kinges engynes and inuentions of battering peeces, which was a pleaſant ſight to behold. And in this ſhow, there was a certaine number of his men of armes brauely armed, tenne cartes of warre armed with ſythes that paſſed by, and three ſcore of the chiefeſt frendes and Captaines of the two kinges that were led priſoners through the city. And there were alſo drawen after them, a hundred and tenne gallies all armed in the prooues with ſtrong ſpurres of copper, and a ſtatue of Mithridates all of cleane gold, ſixe foote high, with a rich target ſet with pretious ſtones. Beſides all that, there were twenty cubberds as full of ſiluer plate as could be, and thirty cubberds full alſo of golden veſſell, armor and coyne of gold, caried vpon mens ſhoulders. After them followed eight mules loden with golden beddes, and ſixe and fifty other mules that caried ſiluer bullion, & a hundred & ſeuen other moyles that caried ſiluer coyne, amounting to the ſumme of two hundred three ſcore and tenne thowſand Seſtertios. Furthermore, there were bookes of accompt caried alſo, wherein were particularly wrytten the ſummes of mony which Lucullus had deliuered before vnto Pompey for the warre againſt pyrates on the ſea, & vnto the treaſorers and high treaſors, to put into the ſparing coffers of the common wealth at ROME. And afterwardes in an article by it ſelfe, that he had geuen nyne hundred and fifty Drachmas to euery ſouldier by the polle. After the ſhewe of this triumphe was ended, he made a generall feaſt, in the which he feaſted all the city and villages thereabouts, which the ROMANES call Vicos. And afterwardes forſooke his wife Clodia for her vnchaſt and wanton life, and maried Seruilia Catoes ſiſter: howbeit he wanne nothing by thexchaunge, for he ſped as euill with the ſeconde, as he did with the firſt. For, ſauing that ſhe was not ſlaundred with thinceſt of her owne brethren, otherwiſe ſhe was as diſhoneſt and vnchaſt as Clodia: and yet he bare withall a while for her brothers ſake, but at the length grew weary of her, and put her away as he had done Clodia. A him (who thought they had now got one to encounter and withstande Pompeys tyranny, and to vphold and maintaine the authority of the nobility and Senate against the people, for that by his noble deedes he had atchieued so great fame and reputation) he sodainly gaue ouer all dealinges in thaffayres of the common wealth: either bicause he sawe it so best, being a hard thing now to kepe it from ruine: or else (as other sayd) for that he felt him selfe sufficiently furnished with honor and wealth, and therefore determined from thenceforth to liue quietly all at his ease, after so great paynes, trauailes and troubles, the end whereof fell not out ouer fortunately. And surely some were of his minde, and liked this great chaunge of his maruelous wel: bicause he did not as Marius did, neither happened on the ill successe and end that Marius had. For Marius after the notable victories which he brought from the Cimbres, and af-

Lucullus geueth ouer gouernment of the common wealth.

B ter his valliant actes in warres which had won him great honor, yet would he not so leaue of, when he might haue bene chronicled to his wonderfull glory: but of an vnsatiable minde, and ambitious desire to rule and beare sway, (being withall a very olde man) went and forced him selfe amongest young men desirous of gouernment, who brought him not only to cõmit many outrages, but made him selfe also to suffer greater cruelties. It is thought also that Cicero had ended his aged course more happely, if after he had quenched Catilines cõspiracy, he had then taken his ease. And so had Scipio in like case, if when he had ioyned Numantia vnto Carthage, he would then haue quieted him selfe. And therfore, some say, that there is a certaine reuolution and time appointed, beyond the which no wise man should medle any more with thaffayers of the common wealth: no more then a man whose youth & strength is gone

C and decayed, is any more fit to iust, wrestle, or enter into such exercises of the body. But contrarily, Crassus and Pompey mocked Lucullus, bicause he gaue him selfe so much to pleasure and pastime: as if to liue pleasauntly, & delicatly did not worse become his age, then to cõmaund an army, or to goueme thaffayres of a common weale. And for my parte, reading Lucullus life: me thinkes that I read an auncient comedy, the beginning whereof is tedious, & the latter end ioyfull. For at the beginning of his life, you finde notable exployts done by him in warres, and great good gouernment also in peace: but in the end they all turned into feasts, and banckets, and lacking litle of maskes and mommeries, dauncing with torches, and all other silch delights fitte for young men. For I bring within the compasse and reckoning of his finches and Lucullus buildinges and pleasures.

D pleasures, his sumptuous buildinges, his stately walles and galleries, his home houses and stoues, his tables and pictures, his statues also: and the great workmanshippe and curiositie he had besides of all other cartes by him, gotten together out of all partes to his infinite charge, abusing therein the world of goodes and treasure gotten and wonne in the warres, in time of his charge and office of Generall, and otherwise. Insomuch, that notwithstanding excesse and superfluity hath euer since increased vntil this present time, yet they reckon the gardens Lucullus made, to be the most sumptuous and delicatest places that the Emperors haue. And therfore Tubero the Stoike Philosopher, hauing seene these stately works which Lucullus had caused to be made neere vnto Naples, by the sea side, (where there are mountaines cut through, light as day, and hanged vpon vawtes) and great ditches cast by force to make the sea

Lucullus gardens of great estimacion.

E passe and runne through his houses, to keepe fishe therein, and lodginges also that he built in the sea it selfe: he called Lucullus, Xerxes the gownman, as if he would haue sayd, Xerxes the Romane. For euen so did Xerxes in olde time cause the mountaine Athos to be cut in sunder, and a channell to be digged there to passe his shippes through. He had also many other pleasaunt places within the territories of Rome, neere vnto Tusculum, where there were great large halles set vpon tarrasses to see rounde about farre of in the day time. And Pompey going thither somtime to see him, reproued him greatly, telling him that he had built a maruelous fayer sommer house, but not to be dwelt in, the winter season. Lucullus laughing, answered him: doe ye thinke me to haue lesse wit and reason then storkes or cranes, that I cannot shift houses accordinge to the season? An other time there was a Praetor of Rome, that makinge playes to shewe the people pastime, sent vnto Lucullus to borrow certaine purple clokes to set Lucullus called Xerxes the gowne man.

Xerxes cut through the mountaine Athos, & made a channell for his shippes to passe thorow.

F forth his players: Lucullus made him aunswer, that he would cause his folkes to looke if he had any. And the next morning demaunding of him, how many he should neede: the other aunswered, that a hundred would serue his turne. Whereupon Lucullus told him againe, he would furniſh him with two hundred, if his caſe ſo required. And therefore the Poet Horace wryting this ſtory, addeth to a notable exclamation againſt ſuperfluity, ſaying: that men thinke them poore houſe, where there is no more riches then neceſſary, and where there is not more then appeareth in ſight, and that the maſter knoweth of. He was a vaine man in his ordinarie ſeruice at his borde, not only in that his beddes whereon he ſedde, were couered with rich carpettes of purple, and him ſelfe ſerued in gold and ſiluer veſſell ſet with pretious ſtones, & that there was dauncing, muſicke, playes, and other ſuch like paſtimes of ordinary: but alſo for that he was continually ſerued with all ſortes of fine dainty diſhes, with workes of paſtry, bancketing diſhes, and frute curiouſly wrought and prepared, which only made him to be wondered at of men of ſimple vnderſtanding and meane condicion. Therefore was Pompey marueiouſly eſteemed, and ſpecially for a word he ſpake one day when he was ſicke, and that the Phiſitian had willed him to eate of a thruſhe. For when his ſeruaunts told him they were hard to come by in ſommer, but at Lucullus houſe where they brought them vp all the yeare through: he would in no wiſe they ſhould aske any of him, but ſayd vnto his Phiſitian. What if Lucullus were not geuen to pleaſure: could not Pompey liue? And ſo willed them to get him ſome other ſuch thing, as they might more eaſily come by. Cato was Lucullus frend & kinſeman both, and yet he ſo much miſliked his maner of liuing and ordinary expence: that one day a young man making a long and tedious Oration in open Senate (out of time, and to no purpoſe) touching meane dyet, ſobriety, & temperaunce of life: Cato could no lenger abide him, but roſe vp, and ſayd vnto him. What, wilt thou not leaue babbling to vs all day: thou that art riche as Craſſus, that liueſt as Lucullus, and ſpeakeſt as Cato? Other affirme that theſe words were ſpoken thus, but that it was not Cato that ſpake them: neuertheleſſe it is certaine, by the notable ſayinges they haue gathered of Lucullus, he did not only delight to liue ſo delicately, but alſo he gloried in it. Some wryte that he feaſted certaine GRÆCIANS many dayes together in his houſe, that were come out of GRÆCE to ROME: and that they being men brought vp with the ſobriety and ſimplicity of GRÆCE, after they had bene feaſted there diuers times, were aſhamed, & refuſed to goe thither any more, being afterwards intreated to come to Lucullus, ſuppoſing that he had made them this great chere for their owne ſakes. Lucullus hearing of it, told them: my Lords, I pray you refuſe not to come to me for that. In deede I muſt needes graunt that there is ſomewhat more then ordinary, to welcome you with all: but I tell you truly, the moſt parte is for Lucullus ſake. An other time when he ſupped all alone, and his men had layed but one bord, and prepared but a reaſonable ſupper for him, he was very angry with them, and called for his ſteward to know why he was ſerued ſo: the ſteward aunſwered him. My Lord, bicauſe I ſawe you ſende for no body, I thought this ſupper ſufficient. What, ſayd he againe: kneweſt not thou that Lucullus ſhould ſuppe to night with him ſelfe? In fine, Lucullus fare was cõmonly knowen through ROME, that there was no talke but of Lucullus noble houſekeping. Whereupon, Cicero and Pompey being deſirous to ſee the proofe thereof, came one day to him in the market place ſeeing him at pleaſure: (for Cicero was Lucullus very good frend, and Pompey alſo: and though there was ſome iarre betwene them for matters of warres, he did not let for that to come vnto him, and to ſpeake gently one to an other) and Cicero after he had ſaluted him, asked him if he would be contented they ſhould come and ſee him. Oh, ſayd he, with all my hart: I pray you come to me. Well then, ſayd Cicero, Pompey and I will come and ſuppe with you to night, with cõdicion that you prouide no more then your ordinary. Lucullus told them againe, they ſhould then fare but badly, and therfore it were better they taried till to morrow. But they would none of that, no nor ſuffer him to ſpeake with his men, for feare he ſhould cõmaund them, to prouide ſomewhat more then for him ſelfe. Neuertheleſſe, at his deſire, they ſuffered him onely in their preſence alowde to tell one of his men, that he would ſuppe that night in Apollo: (for ſo was one of his moſt ſtately and ſumpteous halles of his houſe called) and with that word only he finely deceiued them both, and they neuer found him. For euery halle had his certaine ſumme and rate appointed for the charge and expence of euery ſupper they made in them, and the ordinary furniture and ſeruice for the ſame. So that when his ſeruauntes had their watche worde but in what halle he would ſuppe, they knewe ſtraight what charge he would be at for his ſupper, & what orders ſhould be obſerued therin. Now Lucullus

A manner was to ſpende when he made any feaſt in the hall of Apollo, fifty thowſand pence, and that ſelfe day the ſupper was prepared according to that value: inſomuch as Pompey maruelled howe it could be poſſible that a ſupper of ſo exceeding great charge could be ſo ſodainly prepared. In ſuch thinges therefore did Lucullus laiſhly and riotouſly ſpend his goodes, like ſpoyles in deede gotten of ſlaues and barbarous people. But that ſpecially which he beſtowed vppon bookes, was very commendable and honeſt expence. For he had gathered together a great number of notable hiſtories, the vſe wherof was more honor to him, then the hauing of them. For his library was euer open to all comers, and they ſuffred the GRAECIANS to come into his goodly tarraſſes & fayer walkes, or other pleaſaunt places thereabouts conuenient to B ſit and reaſon together, and neuer ſhut dore againſt them: where learned men met commonly, and oftentimes ſpent the whole day in conference together, as in the houſe of the Muſes; being very glad when other matters were diſpatched, they had ſo much leaſure as but to goe thither. And Lucullus ſelfe would alſo many times be amongeſt them, in thoſe tarraſſes and pleaſaunt walkes, delighting much to talke with them: and he did euer helpe to diſpatch them that had any buſines with him, and graunted the thing they requeſted of him. To conclude, his houſe was a common receite for all them that came from GREECE to ROME. He loued all C maner of Philoſophy, and refuſed no ſect of the ſame. But from his youth vpward, he euer loued & eſteemed beſt the ACADEMICKE ſect, not that which they call the new ACADEMICKE (although it floriſhed at that time through Carneades workes, which Philo made ſuch eſtimacion of) but the old ACADEMICKE, which the Philoſopher Antiochus of the city of ASCA-LON did defende and maintaine at that time, being an eloquent rethoritian and well ſpoken, whom Lucullus ſought to win by all meanes to make him his frende, and to haue him in houſe with him: bicauſe he might inuey againſt Philoes hearers and followers, whoſe ſcholler Cicero among the reſt was, that wrote a notable booke againſt this olde ACADEMICKE ſect. And in the ſame he reciteth Lucullus, maintaining the opinion of the old ACADEMICKES: who hold, that a man may certainly know, and comprehend ſomething, and called that Catalepſin: but Cicero defended the contrary. The booke is intituled Lucullus: for they were (as we haue rehearſed before) very good frendes, and had both one ſelfe deſire for gouernment in the commonwealth. For Lucullus did not ſo withdrawe him ſelfe from matters of ſtate, that he would no more medle at all, nor heare ſpeake of them: but he betimes gaue ouer all ambition & con-D tention, as a thing of no ſmall daunger, & breeding great reproache and diſhonor to Marcus Craſſus, and Cato, to be chiefe in authority. And theſe two were they that defended the Senate, and whom they raiſed vp to withſtand Pompeys greatnes, being affrayed of him, after that Lu-cullus had refuſed the chiefe place of authority. But otherwiſe, Lucullus would be in the market place at courtes and common counſells, to pleaſure his frendes when they requeſted him:
and would goe to the Senate alſo, when there was occaſion to breake any new practiſe, or to ouerthrowe Pompeys ambitious policie. For he ouerthrewe all the orders and conſtitutions that Pompey had made, after he had ouercome the kinges, Mithridates and Tigranes: and with the helpe of Cato hindered a diſtribution of money which Pompey had wrytten for to ROME, to be beſtowed amongeſt his ſouldiers. Whereupon Pompey fell in frendſhippe, (or to ſpeake E more plainly, in conſpiracy) with Craſſus and Caeſar, by whoſe helpe and aſſiſtaunce, he filled ROME with armes and ſouldiers: and made the people by force to paſſe and confirme what he would haue done, after he had violently expulſed Lucullus and Cato out of the market place.
Whereat the noble men were much offended, and miſliking the great wrong they had offred Lucullus & Cato, Pompeys followers ſuborned a * BRVTIAN, and ſaid he was taken lying in waite to kill Pompey. Whereupon the ſayd BRVTIAN being examined by the Senate, named certaine:
but when he came before the people, he named Lucullus, ſaying that he had hyered him to kill Pompey. But no man beleued him. For they perceiued openly in the market place, that he was procured by them ſelues falſely to accuſe Lucullus, & Pompeys other aduerſaries. And this was proued more plainly within few dayes after, when they threw the body of this BRVTIAN dead F in the middeſt of the ſtreete, out of the priſone: who they ſay dyed of him ſelfe with ſickenes.
Howbeit the markes being plainly ſeene of the halter wherewith they had ſtrangled him, and the ſtripes appearing alſo which they had geuen him: did plainly ſhew that they them ſelues did it, whom after they had ſuborned to accuſe Lucullus, they ſlue in this maner. This was the cauſe why Lucullus did more thē before abſent him ſelfe from medling in publicke cauſes: but after, when he ſawe that they had ſo wickedly exiled Cicero, and found meanes alſo to conuey Cato farre enough of, vnder pretenced colour to ſende him with charge into the Ile of CYPRVS: then he gaue vp altogether. Some wryte that a litle before his death, he was not perfect in his wittes, decaying through age by litle & litle. Howbeit Cornelius Nepos ſayth, that it was not for age, nor ſickenes, that his wittes did alter: but through poyſon which one of his ſeruants had geuen him, whom he had made free, called Calliſthenes: who gaue it him, not of any euill intent, but bicauſe his maſter ſhould loue him the more, ſuppoſing that this poyſon had power to make him loue him. But he troubled his wits ſo much with this poyſon, that Lucullus while he liued was faine to haue his brother Marcus to ouerſee his goods. Notwithſtāding this, when he was dead, he was as much bewayled and lamented of all the people, as if he had dyed in his beſt credit, and greateſt proſperity. For all the people ranne to honor his funeralls, and his bodie was caried to the place, by the young noble men of the citie. The people would in any caſe haue buried him within the field of Mars, as they had before buried Sylla. But bicauſe no man thought of it before, and alſo for that things neceſſary were not eaſily to be prouided for the place: his brother Marcus beſought the people they would be content his funeralls might be at a towne of his owne, neere vnto the city of THVSCVLVM, where his tombe was prepared, and he him ſelfe liued not long time after. For as Lucullus both in age, and honor, had not left him farre behinde him: ſo did he not much in his death. For as a brother that had alwayes dearely loued him, he could not then long liue, and ſuruiue him.

THE COMPARISON OF Lucullus with Cimon.

NOthing (in my opinion) made Lucullus more happy, then to dye when he did, before he ſawe the chaunge & alteracion of the cōmon weale, which the fatall deſtinies plagued the ROMANES withall, with ſedition & ciuill warres: and that he dyed in his contry yet enioying her liberty, but beginning then to fall to decay. And in that he was likeſt vnto Cimon aboue all other things: who died whileſt the GRÆCIANS were in good loue and peace with other, and not in broyle of diſcorde and ciuill warres. In deede Cimon dyed in his campe, being Generall of his contry, at the ſiege of the city of CITIVM in CYPRVS, not withdrawen to his home, as one wearied, liuing idlely, or leading a voluptuous life in feaſtes and bankets, making that the end and reward of his warres, victories and triumphes: but as Plato ſaid, (when he wiſely blamed and reproued Orpheus, who promiſeth perpetuall dronkenes in the world to come, for reward of their vertue, that liued well in this life) merily. And truely it is a great Lucullus death bleſſed.

A great comfort and contentation of minde, for an old man feebled with age, and compelled by weakenes, to withdraw him selfe from the world, as well in matters of gouernment in peace, as in warres: and quietly to passe his time in studie, where delight is ioyned with honest contemplation. But to finish his vertuous deedes, by referring them to pleasure, a vice to their only end: and moreouer, to grow old by pleasure and vanity, solemnising Venus feast all the rest of his life, after he hath made such warres, & commaunded such armies: that me thinkes a thing vnworthy of an honest Academicke, and altogether vnmeete for one professing olde Xenocrates doctrine, but fit rather for a man geuen ouer altogether to Epicurus discipline. There is a wonderfull thing to be considered of in these two men, that the ones youth was altogether vitious and reproachfull, and the others to the contrary, honest and vertuous. But he is the bet-

B ter that chaungeth for the better: & that nature is alwayes more commendable, in whom vice decayeth, and vertue waxeth young: then that which by continuance of time hath euer bene still the contrary. And furthermore, they both grew rich by one selfe meanes: but they did not both alike vse their riches. For it were to no purpose to compare the buildings of the wall that standeth south within the castell of Athens, which was built with the money Cimon brought thither: with the fine built chambers, and high raised turrets to gaze a farre, & enuironned about with conduits of water, which Lucullus erected by Naples, with the spoyles of the barbarous people. Neither is Cimons table also of moderate fare & dyet, but yet open to euery man, comparable to Lucullus borde: which was sumptuously furnished, and shewed the greatnes of his Lord. For Cimons bord fed many mouthes dayly with a small charge: and Lucullus table exce-

C ded in expence, to feede a few, with superfluous dainties. Onlesse they will say, that time caused this difference betwene them. But who can tell, if Cimon had bene at leasure to haue withdrawen him selfe to quiet in age from gouernment, and armes, he also would not haue ledde a more sumptuous & dissolute life, geuen to all pleasure, then Lucullus did? For of his owne nature he loued wine, banckets, and playes, and was also geuen to women, as we haue told you before. But prosperity, and fortunate successe of thinges doe bring such delight to ambitious men of nature, and borne to great enterprises: that they make them forget to runne after their other voluptuous vaine desires. And therefore had Lucullus dyed abroade in the warres, whilest he commaunded armies: there had not bene that liuing man, how curious soeuer he had bene to reproue other mens faultes, that could haue detected him of any reproacheful vice.

D And thus much for their maner of life. Now furthermore, touching the state of their warres: no doubt both the one and the other were excellent Captaines, as well by sea as by land. And like as in games of prise and exercises of body which are shewed in Grece, they that in one selfe day winne the games at wrestling, and weapons both, are called by a straunge custome, not conquerours only, but victors also, to honor them withall: euen so me thinkes that Cimon in like case hauing in one selfe day crowned Grece with two notable markes of triumphe, for two battels he wanne, the one by sea, and the other by lande, deserueth to haue some place and preferment before other Captaines. And moreouer, Lucullus receiued the authoritie to commaund, of his contry and common wealth: but Cimon gaue his contry both authority & ability to commaund. Lucullus found his contry a commaunding people to all their frends and

E confederats: through whose aide he ouercame his enemies. And Cimon contrarily, found his contry marching vnder an others ensigne, and through his valliantnes did so behaue him selfe, that he made his city goe before her confederats, and triumphe ouer her enemies: compelling the Persians by force to geue them the rule by sea, and perswading the Lacedæmonians willingly to geue place vnto them by lande. Now if the chiefest thing that can be in an excellent Captaine, is to make him selfe to be beloued of his souldiers, that they may delight to obey him: then was Lucullus despised of his souldiers, & Cimon esteemed and wondred at, euen of the confederates them selues. For Lucullus was forsaken of his owne men: and Cimon was followed by very straungers, for the confederates did ioyne together with him. Lucullus returned home into his contry, forsaken of those he caried out with him. Cimon returned againe,

F commaunding them that were sent out with him to obey others: and had at one time done for his contry three notable things, & hard for them to haue compassed: to wit, made peace with the enemies, geuen them authority & rule of their confederats, and ioyned frendshippe with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Both of them vndertooke to destroy great Empires, and conquer all ASIA. But neither of them both could bring their enterprise to passe. The one by reason of his death, which cut him of on the sodaine being Generall, and when his affayres prospered best. The other can hardly be excused, that there was not a great fault in him: either in that he could not, or bicause he would not satisfie the complaints & griefes of his men, which caused them so much to hate and mislike him. And yet it might be layd also, that in this fault he was like vnto Cimon: who was oftentimes accused by his citizens, and at the length banished his countrie for the space of tenne yeares, bicause that in tenne yeares space (as Plato sayth) they should no more heare him speake. For to say truely, it seldom times happeneth, that the graue wittes of noble men do please the multitude, neither are they acceptable vnto the common people: bicause they striuing continually to reforme them when they go awry, do grieue them as much as surgeons doe their pacients when they binde vp their sores with bandes to cure them. For though by that binding they restore & bring to their natural places againe the broken bones or members out of ioynt: yet put they the pacient to great paine and griefe. And therfore me thinkes neither the one nor the other is to be blamed. Furthermore, Lucullus wet a great deale further with his army, then euer Cimon did. For he was the first ROMANE Captaine that passed ouer mount Taurus, and the riuer of Tigris with an army. He tooke and burnt almost in sight of both the kinges, the royall cities of ASIA, TIGRANOCERTA, CABIRA, SINOPE, and NISIBIS. Towards the north, he went as farre as the riuer of Phasis: towards the east, into MEDIA and southward, euen to the redde sea, and vnto the realmes of ARABIA, subduing all vnto the ROMANE Empire. And hauing ouerthrowen all the power of these two mighty kinges, he tooke from them all, but their persons only: who fled and hid them selues like wild beastes, in infinite deserts and vnpassable forrestes. Wherin is easily discerned the difference betwixt the doinges of the one, and of the other. For the PERSIANS, as if they had had no hurt nor ouerthrow at all by Cimon, fought a battell immediatly after against the GRÆCIANS, & ouerthrew the greatest parte of their army in EGYPT: where Mithridates and Tigranes, after Lucullus victories, did neuer any notable act. For the one finding him selfe altogether pulled downe on his knees, and broken by the former battells: durst neuer once only shew his army vnto Pompey, out of the strength of his campe, but fled into the realme of BOSPHORVS, where he dyed. And Tigranes, he went and humbled him selfe on his knees, vnarmed, and without weapon, vnto Pompey: and taking his diadeame of from his head, layed it at his feete, not flattering him for the victories he had won, but for those which Lucullus had triumphed for. By reason wherof he scaped good cheape, & thought him selfe happy, when Pompey gaue him only the marke and title of a king, the which before had bene taken from him. He therefore is to be thought the more worthy Captaine, & stowtest champion, that leaueth his enemy in weake estate for him that followeth, and shall fight afterwardes with him. And furthermore, Cimon found the power of the king of PERSIA ouerharried, the pride and fiercenesse of the PERSIANS layed a grounde, by many great battells they had lost before vnto Themistocles, king Pausanias, & Leotychides, who had ouerthrowen them: and going now againe to fight a fresh with them, it was an easie thing to ouercome the bodies of those, whose harts were already vanquished. Where Lucullus to the contrary, assailed Tigranes, that had neuer bene ouercome, but bare a maruelous lofty minde with him, for the many great battells and conquestes he had wonne. And for the multitude of enemies, there was no comparison betwene those that Cimon ouerthrew, & those that were raunged in battell against Lucullus. So that all thinges weyed and considered, it were hard to iudge which of them two proued the worthiest man: for that it seemeth, that the goddes did fauor both the one and the other, telling the one what he should doe, and the other what he should not doe. And thus it appeareth by testimonie of the goddes, they were both good men, and that they both obtained euerlasting glorie.

I Haue reason (as I thinke) to compare Nicias with Crassus, and the euēts that happened to the one in PARTHIA, with those that befell the other in SICYLE: yet am I to pray them that shall happen to read my wrytinges, not to thinke me in entermeddling with those matters (in the describing and reporting whereof, Thucydides hath gone beyond him selfe, both for variety & liuelines of narration, as also in choice & excellent words) to haue the like intent and opinion, that Timæus the historiographer had. Who, hoping by the grauety & life of his words and reportes, to darken the glorie of Thucydides, and make Philistus (in comparison of him selfe) appeare ignoraunt, & without any grace of historicall narration hath in his history of purpose sought occasion to enter into the describing of those battels by sea and by land, and the reporte of those speches and orations, which are deliuered by them with great iudgement and eloquence. Wherein he commeth as neere them whome he contendes to passe, as doth the footeman to the LYDIAN coche, as sayth Pindarus and besides he weth him selfe fond and of small iudgement, or as Diphilus sayth,

The praise of Thucydides.

Timæus follies.

A lubber laden with Sicylian grease.

And in diuers places, he falleth into Xenarchus follies. As where he sayth, that he thinkes it was an euill token for the ATHENIANS, that Nicias the Captaine (whose name was deriued of this word Nice, signifying victory) disswaded their attempts against SICYLE: and that by the throwing downe and mangling of the Hermes (to say, the images of Mercury) it was foreshewed that they should receiue great ouerthrowes by the General of the SYRACVSANS, called Hermocrates, the sonne of Hermon. And further, that it was not vnlikely that Hercules did fauor the SYRACVSANS, by reason of the goddesse Proserpina, (protector and defendor of the citie of SYRACVSA) to requite her for that she gaue him Cerberus the dogge, porter of hell: and that he did malice the ATHENIANS besides, bicause they tooke the EGESTÆANS partes: (who came of the TROYANS, whom he much hated) for breaking their promise and faith with him, whose city him selfe had ouerthrowen in reuenge of the wrong that Laomedon king of TROY had offered him. Howbeit Timæus shewes as much wit and iudgement, in deliuering vs such toyes in an history: as he doth in correcting the stile of Philistus, or in condēning and railing of Plato and Aristotle. But in my fansie, this ambition & contention to wryte

or to ſpeake more clerkely then others, ſheweth alwayes a baſe enuious minde, like a ſcholler full of his ſchoole pointes. But when it ſtriueth with thinges that are paſt all chalenge & correcting, then is it extreame follie and madnes. Sence therefore I may not paſſe ouer nor omit certaine thinges, which Thucydides and Philiſtus haue already ſet downe, and eſpecially thoſe wherein they lay open Nicias nature and qualities, which the variety of his ſucceſſes and fortune did couer: I muſt lightly touch them, and reporte ſo much as is neceſſary, & conuenient, leaſt men condemne me, for ſlouth and negligence. And in the reſt I haue endeuored to gather and propounde thinges not commonly marked and knowen, which I haue collected as well out of ſundry mens workes & auncient recordes, as out of many olde antiquities: and of them all compiled a narration, which will ſerue (I doubt not) to decipher the man and his nature. Of Nicias therefore may be ſayd that which Ariſtotle hath wrytten of him: that there were three famous citizens of Athens, very honeſt men, & which fauored the cōmunalty with a naturall fatherly loue: Nicias the ſonne of Niceratus, Thucydides the ſonne of Mileſias, and Theramenes the ſonne of Agnon. But of the three, this laſt was of ſmalleſt accompt: for he is flowted as a forrenner borne in the Ile of Ceos, and chalenged beſides for inconſtant & inreſolute in matters of ſtate and gouernment: and inclining ſomtimes to one faction, ſometime to an other, he was called Cothurnus, a kinde of buskin indifferently ſeruing for both legges, and in old time was vſed of common players of tragedies. Of the other two, Thucydides being the elder, did many good actes in fauor of the nobility againſt Pericles, who alwaies tooke parte with the inferior ſorte. Nicias that was the younger, had reaſonable eſtimation in Pericles life time: for he was ioyned Captaine with him, and oftentimes alſo had charge by him ſelfe alone without him. After Pericles death, the nobility raiſed him to great authorite, to be as a ſtrong bulwarke for them, againſt Cleons inſolency & boldnes: and with all, he had the loue of the people, to aduaunce and preferre him. Now this Cleon in troth could do much with the people, he did ſo flatter and dandle them, like an olde man, ſtill feeding their humor with gaine: but yet they them ſelues whome he thus flattered, knowing his extreame couetouſnes, impudency, and boldnes, preferred Nicias before him, bicauſe his grauity was not ſeuere nor odious, but mingled with a kinde of modeſty, that he ſeemed to feare the preſence of the people, which made them thereby the more to loue and eſteeme him. For being (as he was) of a fearefull & miſtruſtfull nature & diſpoſition: in warres he cloked his feare with good fortune, which euer fauored him alike in all his iorneys and exploytes that he tooke in hand where he was Captaine. Now being much affrayed of accuſers, this timorous manner of his proceeding in the citie, was founde to be popular, whereby he wanne him the good will of the people: and by meanes thereof roſe daily more and more, bicauſe the people commonly feare thoſe that hate them, & aduaunce them that feare them. For the greateſt honor nobility can doe to the communalty, is to ſhewe that they doe not deſpiſe them. Nowe Pericles, who through his perfit vertue only, and force of his great eloquence ruled the whole ſtate & common wealth of Athens, he needed no counterfeate colour, nor artificiall flattering of the people, to winne their fauor and good willes: but Nicias lacking that, and hauing wealth enough, ſought thereby to creepe into the peoples fauor. And where Cleon would entertaine the Athenians with pleaſaunt toyes and deuiſes, and could feede the peoples humor that way: Nicias finding him ſelfe no fit man to worke by ſuch encounter, crept into the peoples fauor with liberality, with charges of common playes, and with ſuch like ſumptuouſnes, exceeding in coſt and pleaſaunt ſportes, not only all thoſe that had bene before him, but ſuch alſo as were in his time. There yet remaine monuments of his conſecrating vnto the goddeſs the image of Pallas in the caſtell of Athens, the gilt being worne of: and the chappell which is vnder the feſtiuall table of Bacchus: for he many times had the chiefe priſe in Bacchus daunſes, & neuer went away without ſome game. And touching this matter, there goeth a reporte that at certaine playes whereof Nicias defrayed the charges, one of his men came forth apon the players ſtage before the people, apparelled like Bacchus: & being a goodly tall young man, without any heare on his face, the Athenians tooke ſuch pleaſure to ſee him ſo attired, that they made a clapping of their hands a long time together for ioy. Therewithall Nicias ſtoode vp, and told them, that it were a ſhame for him to leaue the body of a man in bondage, that openly

The nature of the people.

Nicias liberality & magnificence.

A openly was esteemed as a god: and thereupon foorthwith made this young slaue a free man. Men wryte also of certaine sumptuous and deuout acts he did in the Ile of DELOS, where the daunsers and singers which the cities of GRÆCE sent thither to singe rimes and verses in the honor of Apollo, were wont before to arriue disorderly: and the cause was, for the numbers of people that ranne to see them, who made them singe straight without any order, and landing in hast out of their shippes, they left their apparell, and put on such vestements as they should weare in procession, and their garlands of flowers on their heades, all at one present time. But Nicias, being commaunded to go thither to present the singers of ATHENS, landed first in the Ile of RENIA, hard adioyning to the Ile of DELOS, with his singers, his beastes for sacrifice, and with all the rest of his traine, carying a bridge with him, which he had caused to be made
B at ATHENS, vpon measure taken of the channell, betwext the one and thother Ile set out with pictures and tables, with gilding, with nosegayes and garlandes of triumphe, and with excellent wrought tapistry: which in the night he set vp vpon the channell, being not very broade, and the next morning by breake of the day caused his singers to passe ouer apon it, singing all the way as they went in his procession so nobly set forth, euen vnto the very temple of Apollo. And when the sacrifice, the feast, and games that were to be played were finished, he gaue a goodly palme tree of copper, which he offered vp to Apollo, bought landes besides that cost him tenne thowsande Drachmas, which he consecrated also vnto the god Patron of the Ile and ordained, that the profittes of the same should be yearely bestowed by the DELIANS, apon an open sacrifice and feast, in the which they should pray to their god, for the health and C prosperity of Nicias: and so caused it to be wrytten and grauen apon a piller he left in DELOS, as a perpetuall monument and keeper of his offring, and foundation. Afterwards, this copper palme tree being broken by windes, it fell apon the great image of the NAXIANS gift, and threw it downe to the ground. Surely in this ceremony and act of his, there was a maruelous pompe, & great shew of popular ambition: neuertheless, he that shall consider of his life and actions, may easely perswade him selfe that aboue all he did it of very pure zeale & deuotion, and secondly, to geue pleasure and pastime to the people. For by Thucydides reporte of him, he was one that feared the gods with trembling, and was wholly geuen to religion. We finde wrytten in one of the dialogues of Pasiphoon, that Nicias did sacrifice dayly to the goddes, and kept a soothsayer continually in his house, geuing out abroade, that it was to counsayle with D him what should happen about the affayers of the common wealth: but in troth it was to inquier of his owne busines, and specially of his mynes of siluer. For he had many great mynes about LAVRION side, that were very profitable to him: but withall they digged with great daunger, and he was driuen continually to kepe a maruelous number of slaues at worke there. The most parte of Nicias riches was in ready money, and thereby he had many crauers and hangers on him, whome he gaue money vnto: for he gaue as well vnto wicked people that might doe mischiefe, as vnto them that deserued reward, and were worthie of his liberalitie. Thus was his feare a rent to the wicked, as his liberalitie was also a reuenue to the good: and hereof the comicall Poets doe deliuer vs auncient testimony. For Teleclides speaking of a certaine informer sayth thus:

Nicias superstitious.

Nicias mynes of siluer.

And he, whom Eupolis mocketh in his comedy intituled Maricas, bringing a plaine simple man apon the stage, doth aske him:

And Cleon threatning in the comedie of Ariſtophanes, intituled the Knightes, ſayth these wordes.

Then ſure I am, that Nicias ſtreit vvill quake.

Phrynichus ſelfe alſo telleth vs glaunſingly, that he was ſo timorous and eaſie to be frayed, when he ſayd ſpeaking of an other man:

A good ſtovvt man (I knovv full vvell) he vvas,
And not a covvard like to Nicias.

Nicias warenes to offende.

Now Nicias being thus timerous of nature, and fearing to geue any litle occaſion to the Orators to accuſe him: kept him ſelfe ſo warely, that he neither durſt eate nor drinke with any man in the city, nor yet put foorth him ſelfe in companie to talke, or paſſe the time amongeſt them, but altogether auoyded ſuch ſportes and pleaſures. For when he was in office, he would neuer out of the counſayle houſe, but ſtill buſied him ſelfe in diſpatching cauſes, from morning till night, and was euer the firſt that came, and laſt that went away. And when he had no matter of ſtate in hande, then was he very hardly to be ſpoken withall, and would ſuffer no acceſſe vnto him, but kept cloſe in his houſe: and ſome of his frendes did euer aunſwere them that came to his gate, and prayed them to pardon him, ſaying, that he was buſie then about affayers of the common wealth. One Hieron, whom Nicias had brought vp in his houſe, and had him ſelfe taught him both learning & muſicke, was his greateſt procurer and inſtrument to keepe him from ſpeech with any man, and brought him to this reputation of greatnes and grauety. This Hieron (as it is reported) was the ſonne of Dionyſius Chalcus, of whom they finde certaine Poeticall workes at this day: who being Captaine of a certaine number of men that were ſent to dwell in ITALIE, did build there the citie of THVRIES. Hieron I ſay did ſerue his turne, and holpe him ſecretly to inquier what he would vnderſtande of the Soothſayers, and gaue out theſe wordes among the people: that Nicias led too miſerable and painefull a life, for the ouergreat care he tooke to ſerue the common wealth: inſomuch, as though he were in his hotte houſe to waſh him, or at his table at meate, his minde ranne ſtill of ſome matters about the common wealth, and to ſerue the ſtate, did neglect his owne priuate affayers: ſo that he ſcant beganne to ſleepe & take reſt, when others commonly had ſlept their firſt ſleepe, and that he looked like no body. Furthermore, that he was growen crabbed and vncurteous, euen to ſuch as before had bene his familiar frendes. So that, ſayd he, he loſeth them together with his goodes, and all for ſeruice of the common wealth: where others grow rich, and win frendes, by the credit they haue to be heard of the people, and can make mery among them, and ſporte with the matters of ſtate which they haue in their handes. Now in troth, ſuch was Nicias life, that he might truely ſay that which Agamemnon ſpake of him ſelfe in the tragedie of Euripides, called Iphigenie in AVLIDE.

Nicias life.

In outvvard shovv of ſtately pompe all others I exceede,
And yet the peoples vnderling I am in very deede.

And Nicias perceiuing that the people in ſome thinges did ſerue their turnes with the experience of them that were eloquent, & wiſer then others, although they yet miſtruſted their ſufficiency, and had a ſpeciall eye to them, plucking downe their corage, by taking their authority from them: as for proofe the condemnation of Pericles, the baniſhment of Damon, and the miſtruſt they had of Antiphon RHAMNVSIAN, and moreouer by that they did vnto Paches (that tooke the Ile of LESBOS) who being brought before the iudges in open counſell to geue vp an accompt of his charge, drewe out his ſword, and ſlue him ſelfe in preſence of them all.

Nicias

A Nicias I saye, remembring these examples, sought euer to flie from these offices, which were either too great, or too smal, and when he accepted any, had speciall regard to worke surely, & to venture nothing. Whereby all his enterprises that he tooke in hand, as we may easily coniecture, prospered maruelous well: but yet he imputed nothing to his owne wisedom, nor yet to his vertue and sufficiencie, but thanked fortune euer for all, and praying diligently to the goddes, contented him selfe to lessen his glory, and that onely to auoyde enuy. As the euent of thinges falling out euen in his time doe sufficiently witnes vnto vs. For the citie of Athens hauing susteined many great losses and ouerthrowes, he was neuer a party, nor had ought to doe in any of them. As once for example: the Athenians were ouercome in Thracia by the Chalcidonians, howebeit it was vnder the leading of Callirides & Xenophon, who were B their Captaines. An other time, the losse they had in Ætolia vnder the charge of Demosthenes. Moreouer at Delium, a citie of Boeotia, where they lost a thousand men at one conflict, Hippocrates then being there Generall. And as touching the plague, the greatest number layed the fault there of to Pericles, who by reason of warres kept the men that were out of the contry, within the walles of the citie of Athens: and so by chaunging of ayer, and their wonted maner of life, they fell into it. Now with none of all these great troubles and misfortunes, was Nicias euer burdened: but contrariwise he being Captaine tooke the Ile of Cythera, which the Lacedæmonians inhabited, being an excellent place for situation to molest and destroy the contrie of Laconia. He wanne diuers cities againe that had rebelled in Thracia, and brought them once more vnder the obedience of Athens. At his first coC ming, hauing shut in the Megarians within their walles, he tooke the Ile of Minoa: and at his departure thence, shortly after wanne the hauen of Nisæa also. Furthermore, landing in the contry of the Corinthians, he ouercame them that offered him battell, and slue a great number, and among others Lycophron the Captaine. At this battell he chaunced to forget to bury two of his men that were slaine, whose bodies could not be found in gathering vp of the rest: howbeit so soone as he heard of it, he caused all his fleete to stay, and sent an Herauld to the enemies, to pray leaue to fetche away those two bodies. Now, though by law of armes they that sent to aske leaue to take away their deade to bury them, did thereby lose the honor of their victory, & were barred to set vp any marke or token of triumphe, bicause it seemed by the sute, that they which had them in their power were conquerors, and not the petiD cioners that made request for them, which otherwise needed not to haue made demaunde of them: Nicias notwithstanding was contented rather to forsake the honor of his victory, then to leaue the bodies of two of his contrymen in the field without buriall. So, after he had destroyed all the coast of Laconia, and had ouercomen certaine Lacedæmonians that came against him in battell: he tooke the citie of Thyrea, which the Argiues kept against them, whom he brought prisoners vnto Athens. And when the Peloponnesians had prepared great armies both by sea and by land to besiege the forte of Pylos, the which Demosthenes the Captaine had fortified: battell being geuen by sea, it chaunced there remained fourehundred naturall citizens of Sparta, within the Ile of Sphacteria. Now the Athenians thought it a noble exployte of them, (as in deede it was) to take those fourehundred aliue: howbeit the E siege was very sore, bicause they lacked water euen in the middest of sommer, and were forced to fetch a maruelous compasse to bring victells to their campe, which whe winter should be once commen would be very daungerous, and almost an impossible thing to doe. Whereupon, they then became sory, and repented them much that they had sent away the Ambassadors of the Lacedæmonians which came to them to treate of peace, and that they had (through Cleons procurement) suffred them to departe in that sorte without resolucion taken: who was against the altogether, only to do Nicias a despite, being his enemy, & did earnestly solicite the matter the Lacedæmonians requested. This was the cause why Cleon perswaded the Athenians, to refuse their offer of peace. But when the people saw that this siege drewe out in length, and that their campe suffered grieuous wantes and necessities, then fell F they out with Cleon, and he againe burdened Nicias, saying that through his feare he would let the besieged Spartans escape, and that if he had bene Captaine, they should not haue holden out so long. Thereupon the Athenians sayd a lowde to Cleon: and why doest not thou goe thither yet to take them? Moreouer Nicias selfe also rising vp, openly gaue him his authority to take this Pyle, and bad him leauy as many souldiers as he would to goe thither, and not to bragge with such impudent wordes where was no daunger, but to doe some notable seruice to the cõmon wealth. Cleon at the first shronke backe, being amased withall, litle thinking they would haue taken him so sodainly at his word. But in the ende, perceiuing the people vrged him to it, and that Nicias also was importunate with him: ambition so enflamed him, that he not onely tooke the charge apon him, but in a brauery sayd, that within twenty dayes after his departure he would either put all the SPARTANS to the sword, or bring them prisoners vnto ATHENS. The ATHENIANS hearing Cleon say so, had more lust to laugh a good, then to beleue that he spake: for it was their maner euer to laugh at his anger and folly.

A ieast of Cleon.

For it is reported of him, that the people on a time being solẽnly assembled in counsell earely in the morning, to heare what Cleon would say, & hauing taried long for him: at the length he came with a garland on his head, and prayed the assemblie to dismisse the courte till the next morning: for, quod he, I shall not be at leasure to day, bicause I haue sacrificed, and doe feast also certaine straungers my frendes that are come to see me. So the people burst out in a laughing, and brake vp thassembly. This notwithstanding, fortune fauored him at that time,

Cleons victory of the Lacedæmonians.

& he hãdled him selfe so well in this charge with Demosthenes, that he tooke all the SPARTANS that they besieged, within the time he had appointed, sauing such as were slaine: and hauing made them yeelde, brought them prisoners to ATHENS. This fell out greatly to Nicias shame and reproache. For it appeared not only a casting away of his shielde, but worse then that, a voluntary forsaking of his prouince apon a base timerous minde, geuing his enemy occasion thereby to doe some noble exployt, depriuing him selfe of his honorable charge. Wherefore Aristophanes mocketh him againe, in his comedy of birdes, saying:

It is no time to slepe and linger still,
As Nicias doth: vvithout good cause or skill.

Also in an other place of his comedy of plowmen he sayth:

I faine vvould follovv husbandry. VVho lets thee? Mary you.
A thovvsand Dragmaze I vvill geue to be discharged novv Of office in the common vveale. Content, so shall vve haue Tvvo thovvsand Dragmaze iust, vvith those that Nicias lately gaue.

The immoderate liberty of Cleon.

But herein Nicias did great hurt to the cõmon wealth, suffering Cleon in that sorte to grow to credit & estimacion. For after that victory, Cleon grew to so hautie a minde & pride of him selfe, that he was not to be delt withall: wherupon fel out the occasiõ of the great miseries that happened to the city of ATHENS, which most grieued Nicias of all other. For Cleon amongst other thinges tooke away the modesty and reuerence vsed before in publicke Orations to the people: he of all other was the first that cried out in his Orations, that clapped his hand on his thigh, threw open his gowne, & sloong vp & downe the pulpit as he spake. Of which exãple afterwardes followed all licentiousnes, and contempt of honesty, the which all the Orators & counsellors fell into, that delt in matters of state & cõmon wealth, & was in the end the ouerthrow of all together. In that very time began Alcibiades to grow to credit, by practise in the state, who was not altogether so corrupt, neither simply euill: but as they say of the lande of EGYPT, that for the fatnes and lustines of the soyle,

It bringeth forth both holsome herbes, and also noysome vveedes.

Alcibiades diuers wit.

Euen so Alcibiades wit excelling either in good or ill, was the cause and beginning of great chaunge and alteracion. For, it fell out, that after Nicias was ridde of Cleon, he could not yet bring the citie of ATHENS againe to peace and quietnes. For when the common wealth began to grow to some rest and reasonable good order, then was it againe brought into warres, through Alcibiades extreame fury of ambition. And thus it beganne. The only peacebreakers and disturbers of common quiet generally throughout GRÆCE, were these two persones, Cleon & Brasidas the two peacebreakers generally of all Græce.

Cleon and Brasidas: for warre cloked the wickednes of the one, and aduaunced the valiantnes of the other, geuing to either occasion to doe great mischiefe, and also oportunity to worke many noble exploytes. Now Cleon and Brasidas being both slaine together at a battell fought by Amphipolis, Nicias straight perceiuing the SPARTANS had long desired peace, and that the

A ATHENIANS were no more ſo hottely geuen to the warres, but that both the one & the other had their handes full, & were willing to be quiet: deuiſed what meanes he might vſe to bring SPARTA and ATHENS to reconciliation againe, and to rid all the cities of GRÆCE alſo from broyle and miſery of warre, that thenceforth they might all together enioy a peaceable and happy life. The riche men, the olde men, and the husbandmen, he found very willing to harken to peace: and talking priuately alſo with diuers others, he had ſo perſwaded them, that he cooled them for being deſirous of warres. Whereupon, putting the SPARTANS in good hope that all were inclined to peace, if they ſought it: the SPARTANS beleued him, not onely for that they had founde him at other times very ſoft and curteous, but alſo bicauſe he was carefull to ſee that their priſoners of SPARTA, (who had bene taken at the forte of Pylé) were B gently intreated, and had made their miſerable captiuity more tollerable. So, peace was concluded betwene the SPARTANS and the ATHENIANS for a yeare, during which abſtinence, they frequenting one an other againe, and beginning to taſte the ſweetenes and pleaſures of peace, and the ſafety of free acceſſe one to ſee an others frendes that were ſtraungers: began then to wiſhe that they might ſtill continue in peace and amity together, without effuſion of blood of either partie, and tooke great delight in their daunces, to heare them ſinge ſuch ſonges:

Nicias reconcileth the Spartans with the Athenian.

And let my ſpeare lye ouergrovven, vvith duſty ſpyders vvebbes.

They did alſo with great ioy & gladnes remember him which ſayd, that in peace no ſound of trompet, but the crowing of the cocke doth wake them that be a ſleepe: and on the other
C ſide they curſed and tooke on with them that ſayd it was predeſtined, the warre ſhould continue thriſe nine yeares. And ſo, vpon a meeting together to talke of many matters, they made an vniuerſall peace throughout all GRÆCE. Now moſt men thought that ſurely all their ſorrowes and miſeries were come to an ende, and there was no talke of any man but of Nicias, ſaying: that he was a man beloued of the goddes, who for his deuotion towardes them, had this ſpeciall gift geuē him, that the greateſt bleſſing that could come vnto the world, was called after his name. For to confeſſe a troth, euery man was certainly perſwaded that this peace was Nicias worke, as the warre was Pericles procurement, who vpon light cauſes perſwaded the GRÆCIANS to runne headlong into moſt grieuous calamities: and Nicias on the other ſide had brought them to become frends, and to forget the great hurtes the one had receiued
D of the other in former warres. And euē to this preſent day, that peace is called Nicium, as who would ſay, Nicias peace. The capitulacions of the peace were thus agreed vpon: that of either ſide they ſhould alike deliuer vp the cities, and landes, which eche had taken from other in time of warres, together with the priſoners alſo: and that they ſhould firſt make reſtitution, whoſe lot it was to beginne. Nicias (according to Theophraſtus reporte) for ready money ſecretly bought the lot, that the LACEDÆMONIANS might be the firſt that ſhould make reſtitution. And when the CORINTHIANS and BOEOTIANS that diſliked of this peace, ſought by the complaintes they made, to renue the warre againe: Nicias then perſwaded both the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS, that they ſhould adde for ſtrength vnto their contry, the allyance & peace offenſiue and defenſiue made betwene them, for a more ſure knot of frend-
E ſhippe, wherby they might be the better aſſured the one of the other, and alſo the more dredfull to their enemies that ſhould rebell againſt them. Theſe thinges went cleane againſt Alcibiades minde: who beſides that he was ill borne for peace, was enemy alſo vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, for that they ſought to Nicias, and made none accompt of him, but deſpiſed him. Here was the occaſion that cauſed Alcibiades to proue from the beginning what he could doe to hinder this peace, wherein he preuailed nothing. Yet ſhortly after, Alcibiades perceiuing that the ATHENIANS liked not ſo well of the LACEDÆMONIANS, as they did before, and that they thought themſelues iniuried by thē, bicauſe they had lately made league with the BOEOTIANS without their priuity, and had not wholly rendred vp the cities of PANACTVM & AMPHIPOLIS according to the condicions articled betwene them: began then to enlarge and ag-
F grauate the peoples complaintes, and to make them offended with euery one of them. And furthermore he procured Ambaſſadors from the city of ARGOS to come to ATHENS, and ſo handled the matter, that the ATHENIANS made league offenſiue & defenſiue with them.

Ambassadors sent frō Sparta to Athens.

While these matters were thus in hand, there came to Athens also Ambassadors from Lacedæmon, with full power and authority to set all thinges at stay, and to compound all controuersies: who hauing first spoken with the Senate, propounded things vnto them both very honest and reasonable. Whereupon, Alcibiades being affrayed that they letting the people vnderstand so much, should thereby bring them to yeelde to what they desired: he finely deceiued the poore Ambassadors by this deuise. He promised apon his othe to helpe them in that they went about, so farre foorth as they would not confesse them selues to haue absolute power from the Ephores: making them to beleue it was the only way to bring their matters to passe. The Ambassadors geuing credit to his wordes, relied apon him, and so forlooke Nicias. Whereupon Alcibiades brought them before the people being set in counsell, and there demaunded openly of them, whether they had full power and authoritie to accorde all matters yea or no. Whereunto they made him aunswere with a lowde voyce, that they had not. Thereupon Alcibiades, contrarie both to their expectation, and his owne othe and promise made vnto them: beganne to call the counsell to witnes, whether they did not in open Senate say the contrary, and so aduised the people not to trust nor geue credit vnto such men, as were openly taken with so manifest a lye, & that in one selfe matter would one while say one thing, an other while an other. It bootes not to aske whether the Ambassadors were much amased to heare Alcibiades wordes: for Nicias him selfe wist not what to say to the matter, the suddennes of the cause did so confuse and grieue him, being a thing he least looked for. Nowe the people they were so moued besides, that they became indifferent whether to haue sent for the Ambassadors of Argos presently to haue made league with them or not: but there fell out an earthquake apon this matter, that greatly serued Nicias turne, and brake vp the assemblie. The people meeting againe in counsell the next morning, Nicias with all that he could doe, or say, could scant withhold them from making league with the Argives: and to get leaue in the meane time to go to the Lacedæmonians, promising he would make all well againe. Thereupon, Nicias going to Sparta, was receiued and honored there like a noble man, and as one whom they thought well affected towards them: but for the rest, he preuailed nothing, and being ouercomen by those that fauored the Boeotians, returned againe to Athens as he departed thence. Where he was not onely ill welcomed home, and worse esteemed, but was also in daunger of his person, through the fury of the people, that at his request & counsell had redeliuered such men prisoners, and so great a number of them. For in deede, the prisoners which Cleon had brought to Athens from the forte of Pyle, were all of the chiefest houses of Sparta, and their kinsemen and frends were the noblest men of the city. Notwithstanding, the people in the end did none other violence to him, sauing that they chose Alcibiades their Captaine, and made league with the Elians, and Mantinians (which had reuolted from the Lacedæmonians) and with the Argives also: & sent pyrates to the forte of Pyle, to spoyle the contry of Laconia. Vpon these occasions the Athenians fell againe into warres. Now when the quarrell and controuersie was greatest betwene Nicias and Alcibiades, the Ostracismon (to wit, the banishment for a time) came in, by the which the people banished for tenne yeares any such of their citizens as they thought either of too great authority, or that was most enuied for his wealth and substaunce. Alcibiades and Nicias were then not a litle perplexed, considering their present daunger, being sure that thone of them two should not faile but be banished by this next banishment. For the people hated Alcibiades life, & were afrayed of his valliantnes: as we haue more amply declared in the descriptiō of his life. And for Nicias, his wealth made him to be enuied, besides they misliked his straunge maner of dealing, being no more familiar nor conuersant with the people than he was, and compted him too stately: moreouer they hated him also, bicause in many matters he had spoken directly against the thing the people desired, & had enforced them against their willes to agree to that which was profitable for them selues. In fine to speake more plainly, there fell out great strife betwene the young men that would haue warres, and the olde men that coueted peace, some desirous to banish Nicias, and some others Alcibiades: but

A And so fell it out then. For the ATHENIANS being deuided in two factions, gaue authority to certaine of the most impudent & insolent persones that were in all the city: and among them was one Hyperbolus of the towne of PERITHVS, a man of no hauior nor value, why he should be bold: but yet one that grew to some credit & power, dishonoring his contry, by the honor they gaue him. Now Hyperbolus thinking him selfe free at that time from any daunger of banishment, (hauing rather deserued the gallowes) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him well enough that remained behinde: shewed openly, that he was glad of their discorde and variance, and busily stirred vp the people against them both. Nicias and Alcibiades being acquainted with his wicked practises, hauing secretly talked together, ioyned both their factions in one: whereby they brought it so to passe, that neither of them B were banished, but Hyperbolus selfe for tenne yeres. Which matter for the present time made the people very mery, though afterwardes it grieued them much, seeing their ordinaunce of the Ostracismon blemished by the vnworthines of the person: which punishment was an honor vnto him. For this banishment was thought a meete punishment for Thucydides, Aristides, and such like men of accompt as they, or their like: but for Hyperbolus, it was thought too great an honor, & too manifest an occasion of glory to be geuen to him, that for his wickednes had the selfe same punishmēt, which was to be inflicted vpon the chiefest estates for their greatnes. And the comicall Poet Plato him selfe sayth in a place,

Although his lewd behauior did deserue as much or more,
Yet was not that the punishment he should haue had therefore.
C The Ostracie deuised was for men of noble fame,
And not for varlets, whose lewd life deserued open shame.

Hyperbolus.

Nicias and Alcibiades ioyned both their factions against Hyperbolus.

Hyperbolus banished for tenne yeares.

After this Hyperbolus, there was neuer man banished with the Ostracismon. For himself was the last, as Hipparchus CHOLARGIAN, and neareſt kinseman to the tyranne, was the first. Sure fortune is a very vncerten thing, & without cōceit of reason. For had Nicias franckely put him selfe to the hasard of this banishment against Alcibiades, one of these two things must needes haue happened him: either to haue remained in the city with victory, his aduersary being banished: or being conuict by his banishment to haue scaped those extreame miseries and calamities the which he afterwards fell into, besides the fame he had wonne of a wise Captaine, though he had bene ouercomen. I know notwithstanding that Theophrastus wryteth, how Hy- D perbolus not Nicias, was banished through the dissention that fell betwext Phaax and Alcibia-des: albeit most wryters agree with that I haue told you before. Now the Ambassadors of the EGESTANS and LEONTINES being comen to ATHENS, to perswade the ATHENIANS to attempt the conquest of SICILIA: Nicias being against it, was ouercome by Alcibiades craft & ambition. For he, before they were called to counsell, had already through false surmises filled the peoples heades with a vaine hope & perswasion of conquest. Insomuch as the young men meeting in places of exercise, & the old men also in artificers shoppes, and in their com-passed chayers, or halfe circles where they sate talking together, were euery one occupied about drawing the platforme of SICILE, telling the nature of the SICILIAN sea, & reckoning vp the hauens and places looking towards AFRICKE. For they made not their accompt that E SICILE should be the end of their warres, but rather the storehouse and armorie for all their munition and martiall prouision to make warre against the CARTHAGINIANS, and to conquer all AFRICKE, and consequently all the AFRICKE seas, euen to Hercules pillers. Now all their mindes being bent to warres, when Nicias spake against it, he founde very fewe men of quality to stand by him. For the riche, fearing least the people would thinke they did it to a-uoide charge, and the cost they should be at about these warres, they held their peace, though in dede not contented withall: yet would not Nicias leaue still to counsell thē to the contrary.
But when they had past the decree in counsell for the enterprise of SICILE, and that the people had chosen him chiefe Captaine, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to follow the same: at the next session of the counsell holden in the citie, Nicias rose vp againe, to see if he could turne F the people from this iorney with all the protestations he could possibly make, burdening Alcibiades, that for his owne ambition and priuate commodity, he brought the common wealth into so farre and daungerous a warre. But all his wordes preuailed not. Him selfe before all others was thought the meetest man for this charge, partely bicause of his experience, but chiefely for that they knew he would handle their matters with greater safety, when his ominous foresight should be ioyned with Alcibiades valiantnes, and with Lamachus softnes, which in deede most confirmed the election. Now after the matter thus debated, Demostratus one of the Orators that most procured the ATHENIANS to vndertake this enterprise stepped foorth, and sayd. It were good that Nicias left of, and set a side all these excuses and deuises, and preferred a decree, that the people shoulde thorowely authorise the Captaines that were chosen, to set forward & execute what they thought good, as well here as there, and so perswaded the people to passe and authorise it. Yet it is sayd that the Priestes obiected many thinges to hinder the iorney. But Alcibiades also hauing suborned certaine soothsayers, alleged in like case some auncient Oracles that sayd, the ATHENIANS should haue great honor from SICILE: & further had intised certaine pilgrimes, who sayd they were but newly come from the Oracle of Iupiter Ammon, and had brought this Oracle thence, That the Athenians should take all the Syracusans. But worst of all, if any knew of contrary signes or tokens to come, they held their peace, least it should seeme they entermeddled to prognosticate euill for affections sake, seeing that the signes them selues, which were most plaine and notorious, could not remoue them from thenterprise of this iorney. As for example, the hacking and cutting of the Hermes, and images of Mercurye, which in one night were all to be mangled, sauing one image only called the Hermes of Andocides, which was geuen & consecrated in old time by the tribe of the ÆGEIDES, and was set vp directly ouer against a citizens house called Andocides. Furthermore, the chaunce that happened by the aulter of the twelue goddes: where a man leaping sodainly vpon it, after he had gone round about it, cut of his genitories with a stone. And in a temple also in the city of DELPHES, where was a litle image of Minerua of gold, set apon a palme tree of copper, which the citie of ATHENS had geuen of the spoyles wonne of the MEDES. Apon that palme tree sate certaine crowes many dayes together, and neuer left pecking and iobbing at the frute of it which was all of golde, vntill they made the same to fall from the tree. But the ATHENIANS sayd, that the DELPHIANS (whom the SYRACVSANS had subdued) had finely fained this deuise. There was a prophecy also that commaunded them to bring one of Mineruaes Nunnes to ATHENS, that was in the city of CLAZOMENES. So they sent for this Nunne called Hesychia, which is, rest: & it seemeth it was that which the goddes by this prophecy did counsell them vnto, that for that time they should be quiet. Meton the Astronomer hauing charge in the army leauied for the warre of SICILE, being afrayed of this prophecie, or otherwise misliking the celestiall signes, and succesſe of the iorney: fained him selfe mad, and set his house a fire. Others say he counterfeated not madnes, but did one night in deede set his house a fire, and that the next morning looking ruefully on it, he went into the market place as a man brought to pitiefull state, to sue to the people, that in cõsideration of his great misfortune happened him, they would discharge his sonne of the voyage, who was to take charge of a gallie at his owne cost, and ready to make sayle. Moreouer, the familiar spirite of wise Socrates that did vse to tell him before what should happen: told him then that this iorney would fall out to the destruction of ATHENS. Socrates told it to certaine of his very familiar frendes: and from them the rumor became common. And this also troubled a number of them, for the vnluckie dayes on the which they did imbarke. For they were the very dayes on the which the women celebrated the feast and yereday of Adonis death: and there were also in diuers partes of the city, images of dead men caried to buriall, and women following them, mourning & lamenting. So that such as did put any confidence in those signes, sayd they misliked it much, and that they were afrayed least the same signified, that all the goodly preparation of this army, (the which was set out with such pompe & brauery) would come to nothing. Now for Nicias, that he spake against this warre in open counsell, whilest they were deliberating apon it, and that he was not caried away with any vaine hope, nor puffed vp with the glory of so honorable a charge to make him chaunge his minde therein surely he shewed him selfe an honest man, wise, and constant. But when he saw plainly that he could by no perswasions remoue the people from the enterprise of this warre, neither yet by sute nor intreaty get him selfe discharged from being a Captaine thereof, but that they

The madnes of Meton the Astronomer.

A they would in any case make him one of the heades of the army: then was it out of time to be fearefull, and still geuing backe, turning his head so oft like a child to looke apon his gallie behinde him, and euer to be telling that no reason could be heard in determining of this iorney. For in deede this was enough to discorage his companions, & to marre all at their first setting out: where, to say truly, he should sodainly haue set apon his enemies, & haue gone to it with a lusty corage, to haue assayed fortune. But he tooke a cleane contrary course. For when Lamachus thought good at their first comming to goe straight to SYRACVSA, and to geue them battell as neere the walles as might be, & that Alcibiades on the other side was of opinion first of all to goe about to winne the cities that were in league with the SYRACVSANS, and after that they had made them rebell, then to goe against the SYRACVSANS themselues. Nicias to B the contrary spake in counsell, and thought it better to goe on fayer and softly, deseryng the coastes of SICILE round about to view their gallies and preparation, & so to returne straight to ATHENS againe, leauing only a few of their men with the EGESTANS, to helpe to defende them. But this from the beginning maruelously cooled the corage of the souldiers, and quite discoraged them. Shortly after also, the ATHENIANS hauing sent for Alcibiades to answere to certaine accusations, Nicias remaining Captaine with Lamachus (the other Captaine in sight, but Nicias selfe in power and authority the Lieutenaunt generall of all the army) still vsed delayes, running vp and downe, and spending time so long in consultation, till the souldiers were left without both hope and corage: and the feare the enemy had of them at their first C comming to see so great an army, was now in maner cleane gone. Yet Alcibiades being in the army, before he was sent for from ATHENS, they went with three score gallies to SYRACVSA, of the which they placed fifty in battell ray out of the hauen, and sent the other tenne into the hauen to discouer: which approaching neere the city, caused an Herauld to make open proclamation, that they were come thither to restore the LEONTINES to their landes and possessions, and tooke a shippe of the enemies, in the which among other thinges they founde tables, wherein were wrytten the names of all the inhabitants of SYRACVSA, according to their tribes and houses. These tables were kept farre from the citie, in the temple of Iupiter Olympian, but at that time they had sent for them to know the number of men of seruice, and of age to beare weapon. The same tables being taken by the ATHENIANS, and caried to the generalls of the army, the soothsayers seeing this long rolle of names, at the first misliked it, fearing least D the prophecy had bene fulfilled, which promised them, that the ATHENIANS one day should take all the SYRACVSANS. Howbeit it is reported this prophecy came to passe in an other exployte, whē Callippus ATHENIAN hauing slaine Dion, wan also the city of SYRACVSA. Now when Alcibiades was gone from the campe, Nicias bare all the sway and commaunded the whole army. For Lamachus, though otherwise he was a stowte man, an honest man, and very valliant of his handes, and one that would not spare him selfe in time of neede: neuertheles he was so poore and miserable, that euen when he was in state of a Generall, & gaue vp an accompt of his expences, he would not sticke to put into his bookes, so much for a gowne, and so much for a payer of pantophles. Where Nicias authority & reputacion contrary wise was of an other maner of cut, as well for other respectes, as for his riches, and for the honor of maE ny noble thinges which he had done before. As one namely which they tell of him, that on a time being a Captaine with others, and sitting in counsell with his companions in the counsell house at ATHENS, about the dispatch of certaine causes, he spake vnto Sophocles the Poet, then present amongest them, and bad him speake first and say his opinion, being the eldest man of all the whole company. Sophocles answered him againe: in deede I confesse I am the eldest man, but thou art the noblest man, and him whom euery man regardeth best. So hauing at that time Lamachus vnder him, a better Captaine & man of warre then himselfe was, yet by being so slow to imploy the army vnder his charge by detayning of time still, and houering about SICILE as farre from his enemies as he could: he first gaue the enemies time and leasure to be bold without feare of him. And then going to besiege HYBLA, being but a pelF ting litle towne, and raising the siege without taking of it: he fell into so great contempt with euery man, that from thenceforth no man almost made any more reckoning of him. At last, he retyred vnto CATANA with his army, without any other exployte done, deuing that he tooke Hyccara, a baggadge village of the barbarous people, and where it is sayd Lais the courtisane was borne, and that being then a young gerle, she was sold among other prisoners, and afterwardes caried into Peloponnesvs. And in fine, the sommer being farre spent, Nicias was informed that the Syracvsans had taken such corage to them, that they would come and enterprise the charge apon them first: and that their horsemen were approached already before his campe, to skirmish with them, asking the Athenians in mockery, if they were come into Sicile to dwell with the Catanians, or to restore the Leontines to their landes againe. Hereupon with much a do, Nicias determined to goe to Syracvsa and bicause he would campe there in safety, and at ease without hasard: he sent one of Catana

before to Syracvsa, to tell them (as if he had bene a spye) that if they would sodainly come and set apon the campe of the Athenians & take all their cariage, he wished them to come with all their power to Catana at a day certaine which he would appoint them. For the Athenians (sayd he) for the most parte are within the city, wherein there are certaine citizens, which fauoring the Syracvsans, haue determined so soone as they heare of their comming to keepe the gates of the city, and at the same time also to set the Athenians shippes a fire: and how there were also a great number in the citie of this confederacy, that did but looke euery hower for their comming. And this was the noblest stratageame of warre, that Nicias shewed all the time he was in Sicile. For by this deuise he made the Syracvsans come into the fielde with all their power, so that they left their citie without garde: and he him selfe departing in the meane time from Catana with all his fleete, wanne the hauen of Syracvsa at his ease, and chose out a place to campe in, where his enemies could not hurt him: in the which he was both the stronger, and might without let or difficulty set apon them with that, wherein he most trusted. The Syracvsans returning straight from Catana, and offering him battell hard by the walles of Syracvsa, he came out into the field, and ouerthrew them. There were not many of the Syracvsans slaine at this battell, bicause their horsemen did hinder the chase: but Nicias breaking vp the bridges apon the riuer, gaue Hermocrates occasion to mocke him. For, comforting & encoraging the Syracvsans, he told them Nicias deserued to be laughed at, bicause he did what he could that he might not fight, as if he had not purposely come from Athens to Syracvsa to fight. This notwithstading, he made the Syracvsans quake for feare: for where they had then fifteene Captaines, they chose out three only, to whom the people were sworne, that they would suffer them to haue full power & authority to commaund and take order for all thinges. The temple of Iupiter Olympian was hard by the Athenians campe, which they would gladly haue taken, for that it was full of rich iuells and offeringes of gold and siluer, geuen vnto the temple afore time. But Nicias of purpose still draue of time, and delayed so long, till the Syracvsans at last sent a good garrison thither to keepe it safe: thinking with him selfe, that if his souldiers came to take and spoyle the temple, his contry should be nothing the richer by it, and him selfe besides should beare all the blame of sactilege. So, hauing obteined victorie without profit, (which ranne straight through Sicile) within few dayes after he returned vnto the city of Naxos, where he lay all the winter, consuming a wonderfull masse of vittells with so great an army, for the doing of thinges of small moment, vpon certaine Sicilians that yelded to him. The Syracvsans in the meane time being in hart againe, and coragious: returned to Catana, where they spoyled and ouerranne all the contrie, and burnt the campe of the Athenians. Herefore euery man blamed Nicias much, bicause through his long delay, and protracting of time to make all thinges sure, he let slippe sundry occasions of notable exployts, wherein good seruice might haue bene done. Yet when he would do a thing in deede, he did it so thorowly as no man could take exception to his doinges, for that he brought it to so good a passe: and once taking it in hande, he did execute it with all speede, though he was both slowe to determine and a coward to enterprise. Now when he remoued his army to returne to Syracvsa, Nicias besiegeth Syracusa.

he brought it so orderly, & also with such speede & safety: that he was come by sea to Thapsvs, had landed & taken the forte of Epipolis, before the Syracvsans had any intelligence of it, or could possibly helpe it. For the choyce men of the Syracvsans being set out against him, hoping to haue stopped his passage: he ouerthrew them, tooke three hundred prisoners, and

A & made their horsemen flie, which before were thought inuincible. But that which made the SYRACVSANS most afrayed, and seemed most wonderfull also to the other GRECIANS, was this, that in a very short space he had almost enuironned SYRACVSA with a walle, which was as much in compasse about, as the walls of ATHENS, and worse to performe, by reason of the woddy contry, and for the sea also that beateth upon the walles, besides that there were diuers marrises hard by it: and yet (sicke as he was of the stone) he had almost finished it. And sure good reason it is that we attribute the fault of the not finishing of it, vnto his sicknesse. For mine owne parte I wonder at it excedingly both of the care & diligence of the Capteine, and of the valiantnes and dexterity of the souldiers, which appeareth by the notable feates they did. For Euripides after their ouerthrowe and vtter runne, made a funerall Epitaphium verse, and sayth thus.

Nicias wall at the siege of Syracusa.

B Eight times our men did put the men of Syracusa to flight,
So long as with indifference the goddes did of their might.

Conuersion.

But we finde it written, that the SYRACVSANS were not only eight times, but many times more ouerthrowen by them: a time at length there was in deede, that both the gods and fortune fought against them, euen when the ATHENIANS were of greatest power. Now Nicias in his owne person was euer in the greatest and most weighty affayres, striuing with his sicke body. Howbeit one day when his disease grew sore upon him, he was compelled to be lodged in his campe with a few of his men. & Lamachus in the meane time alone hauing charge of the whole army, fought with the SYRACVSANS, who then had brought a walle from the C city, vnto the wall with the which the ATHENIANS had purposed to haue shutte them in, to keepe that they shoulde not compasse it rounde. And because the ATHENIANS commonly were the stronger in these skirmishes, they many times ouer rashely followed the chase of their enemies that fled. As it chaunced one day that Lamachus went so farre, that he was left alone to encounter a company of horsemen of the city, before whom Callicrates marched formest, a valliant man of his handes, who challenged Lamachus hand to hand. Lamachus abode him, and in the conflict was first hurt: but he gaue Callicrates also such a wound therewithall, that they both fell downe dead presently in the place. At that time the SYRACVSANS being the stronger side, tooke vp his body, and carried it away with them: but they sparred out for me to the ATHENIANS campe, where Nicias lay sicke, without any gard or succour at all: ne- D uertheles, Nicias rose with speede out of his bed, and perceiuinge the daunger he was in, commaunded certaine of his frendes to set the wodde a fire which they had brought within the trenches of the campe, to make certaine deuises for battery, and the engines of timber also that were already made. That deuise onely slayed the SYRACVSANS, saued Nicias, and the strength of their campe, together with all the siluer and cariage of the ATHENIANS. For the SYRACVSANS perceiuing a farre off, betwext them and the strength of their campe, such a great flame as rose vp in the ayer: vpon sight of it turned taile straight, and made towardes their city. Thinges falling out thus, Nicias being left sole Captaine of the army without any companion, in great hope notwithstanding to do some good: diuers cities of SICILE yelded vnto him, shippes & aught with corne came out of euery quarter to his campe, and many sub- E mitted them selues, for the good successe he had in all his doings. Furthermore the SYRACVSANS also sent to parle with him of peace, being out of hope that they were able to defende their city any lenger against him. Gylippus also a Captaine of the LACEDAEMONIANS, coming to aide the SYRACVSANS, vnderstanding by the way howe the city of SYRACVSA was shut in with a wall round about, and in great distresse: helde on his voyage notwithstanding, not with any hope to defend SICILE (supposing the ATHENIANS had wonne the whole contry) but with intent neuertheles to helpe the cities of ITALIE if he could possibly. For it was a common rumor abroade, that the ATHENIANS had wonne all, and that their Captaine for his wisedome and good fortune was inuincible. Nicias him selfe now contrary to his wonted wisedom and foresight, trusting altogether to the good successe which he saw to follow him, F but specially beleeuing the reportes that were told him of SYRACVSA, & the newes that were brought him thence by some of them selues, which came secretly vnto him, perswading him selfe that within few dayes he shoulde haue SYRACVSA by composition: tooke no care to withſtand Gylippus comminge hether, neither ſent any men to kepe him from landinge in Sicile. By which negligence, Gylippus landed in a paſſenger, without Nicias knowledge: ſo light reckoning they made of him, and ſo much did they fondly deſpiſe him. Gylippus being thus landed farre from Syracvsa, beganne to gather men of warre together, before the Syracvsans themſelues knew of his landing, or looked for his comming: inſomuch as they had alreadie appointed the aſſemblie of a counſell to determine the articles and capitulacions of peace, which they ſhould conclude vpon with Nicias. Moreouer, there were ſome that perſwaded they ſhould doe well to make haſt to conclude the peace, before the incloſure of Nicias walle was altogether finiſhed, which then lacked not much to perfourme, hauinge all the ſtuffe for the purpoſe brought euen ready to the place. But as theſe thinges were euen thus doing, arriued one Gongylus at Syracvsa, that came from Corinthe with a gally. At whoſe landing, the people apon the peere flocking about him, to heare what newes: he tolde them that Gylippus would be there before it were long, and that there came certaine other gallies after to their aide. The Syracvsans would hardly beleue him, vntill there came another meſſanger alſo ſent from Gylippus ſelfe of purpoſe, that willed them to arme, and come to him into the fielde. Thereupon the Syracvsans being maruelouſly reuiued, went all ſtraight & armed themſelues. And Gylippus was no ſooner come into Syracvsa, but he preſently ranged his men in battell ray, to ſet apon the Athenians. Nicias for his parte had likewiſe alſo ſet the Athenians in order of battell, and ready to fight. When both charmies were now approached neere eche to other, Gylippus threw downe his weapons, and ſent a Herauld vnto Nicias to promiſe them life and bagage to departe ſafely out of Sicilia. But Nicias would make the Herauld none aunſwere to that meſſage. Howbeit there were certaine of his ſouldiers that in mockerie asked the Herauldе, if for the comming of a poore cape and wande of Lacedæmon, the Syracvsans thought themſelues ſtrengthened ſo much, that they ſhould deſpiſe the Athenians, which not long before kept three hundred Lacedæmonians priſoners in irons, farre ſtronger and more heare on their heades, then Gylippus had, and had alſo ſent them home to their citizens at Lacedæmon. And Timæus wryteth alſo, that the Sicilians themſelues, made no reckoning of Gylippus, neither then, nor at any time after. After, bicauſe they ſawe his extreame couetouſneſſe and miſerie: and then, for that he came ſo meanely appartrelled, with a threede bare cape, and a long buſh of heare, which made them ſcorne him. Yet in an other place he ſayth, that ſo ſoone as Gylippus arriued in Sicile, many came to him out of euery quarter with very good will, like birdes wondering at an owle. This ſecond reporte ſeemeth truer then the firſt, for they ſwarmed about him, bicauſe in this cape & wande they ſaw the tokens of the maieſty of the city & ſeigniory of Sparta. Thucydides alſo ſaith, that it was Gylippus only that did all there. And much like doth Philiſtus ſelfe, a Syracvsan confeſſe, who was preſent then in priſon & ſaw all thinges that were done. Notwithſtanding, at the firſt battel the Athenians had the vpper hand, & ſlue a number of the Syracvsans, among the which Gongylus the Corinthian was one. But the next morning following, Gylippus made them know the skill and experience of a wiſe Captaine. For, with the ſelfe ſame weapons, with the ſame men, with the ſame horſes, and in the ſame places, changing only the order of his battell, he ouerthrew the Athenians: and fighting with them ſtill hauing driuen them euen into their campe, he ſet the Syracvsans a worke to build vp a walle ouerthwarte, (with the very ſelfe ſame ſtones and ſtuffe which the Athenians had brought and layed there for the finiſhing of their incloſure) to cut of the other, and to kepe it from going forward, that it ioyned not togither. So, all that the Athenians had done before vntill that preſent, was vtterly to no purpoſe. Things ſtanding in theſe termes, the Syracvsans being coragious againe, beganne to arme gallies, and running vp and downe the fieldes with their horſemen and ſlaues, tooke many priſoners. Gylippus on the other ſide, went in perſone to and fro through the cities of Sicile, perſwading and exhorting the inhabitantes in ſuch ſorte, that they all willingly obeyed him, and tooke armes by his procurement. Nicias ſeeing thinges thus falle out, fell to his olde trade againe, and conſiderings the chaunge of his ſtate and former good lucke, his hart beginning to faint, wrote ſtraight to the Athenians to ſend an other army into Sicile, or rather to call that home which he had there, but in any

A ease to geue him leaue to returne, and to discharge him of his office, for cause of his sickenes.
The ATHENIANS were indifferent before he wrote, to send aide thither: howbeit the nobility bare vnto Nicias good fortune, did euen cause some delay that they sent not vnto him: and then they determined to send with spede. So Demosthenes was ordered to take forth with him speedily after winter, with a great nauy. In the middest of winter, Euripedes went to Nicias, & caried him both money, & newes, that the people had chosen some of them for his companions in the charge, which were already in seruice with him, to wit, Euthydemus, and Menander. Now Nicias in the meane time being sodainly assaded by his enemies, both by sea and lande: though at the first he had fewer gallies in number than they, yet he budged diuers of theirs and suncke them. But by lande againe, he could not aide his men in time, because Syp-
B pus at the first onset had taken a forte of his called Plemmyrion, within the which lay there and tackell for many gallies, & a great masse of ready money which was wholly lost. Besides, in the same conflict also were many men slaine, and many taken prisoners. Yea further, the greatest matter of weight was, that therby he tooke from Nicias the great commodite he had to bringe his victells safely by sea to his campe. For while the ATHENIANS kept this forte, they might at their pleasure bring victels without danger to their campe, being couered with the same: but when they had lost it, then it was hard for them so to do, because they were euer driuen to fight with the enemies, that lay at anchor before this forte. Furthermore the SYRACVSANS did not thinke that their armie by sea was ouerthrowen, because their enemies were the stronger, but for that their men had followed the ATHENIANS disorderedly: and therfore
C were desirous once againe to venter, in better sorte and order than before. But Nicias by no meanes would be brought to fight again: saying, that it were a madnes looking for such a great nauy & a new supply as Demosthenes was comming withall, rashly to fight with a fewer number of shippes than they, and but poorely furnished. But contrarily, Menander, and Euthydemus, newly promoted to the state of Captaines with Nicias, being pricked forwards with ambition against the two other Captaines (Nicias, and Demosthenes that was then comming) desired to preuent Demosthenes, in performing some notable seruice before his arriuall, & thereby also to excell Nicias doinges. Howbeit, the cloke they had to couer their ambition withall was, the honor & reputacion of the city of ATHENS, the which (sayd they) were shamed and dishonored for euer, if they now should shew themselues afraied of the SYRACVSANS, who pro-D uoked them to fight. Thus brought they Nicias against his will to battell, in the which the ATHENIANS were slaine and ouercome, by the good counsell of a CORINTHIAN Pilot called Aristow. For the left wing of their battell (as Thucydides wryteth) was clearely ouerthrowen, and they lost a great number of their men. Whereupon Nicias was wonderfully perplexed, considering on the one side that he had taken maruelous paines, whilest he was sole Captaine of the whole army: and on thother side, for that he had committed a foule fault, when they had geuen him companions. But as Nicias was in this great dispaire, they descried Demosthenes a-E pon a pere of the hauen, with his fleete brauely set out and furnished, to terrifie the enemies. For he had three score and thirteene gallies, and in them he brought fiue thowsande footemen well armed and appointed, and of darters, bowmen, and hurlers with slinges about three thowsand, and the gallies trimmed and set foorth with goodly armors, numbers of enfignes, and with a world of trompets, howboyes, and such marine muficke, and all set out in this triumphant shew, to feare the enemies the more. Now thought the SYRACVSANS themselues againe in a pecke of troubles, perceiuing they strooue against the streame, and consumed themselues to no purpose, whe by that they saw there was no likelyhoode to be deliuered frō their troubles. And Nicias also reioyced, that so great aide was come, but his ioy held not longe.
For so soone as he began to talke with Demosthenes of the state of thinges, he found him bent F forthwith to set apon the SYRACVSANS, and to hasard all with spede, that they might quickely take SYRACVSA, and so dispatche away home againe. Nicias thought this more hast than good speede, and feared much this foolehardines. Wherupon he prayed him to attempt nothing rashely, nor desperately: and perswaded him that it was their best way to prolong the warre against the enemies, who were without money, and therefore would soone be forsaken of their confederates. And besides, if they came once to be pinched for lacke of vitells: that they would then quickely seeke to him for peace, as they had done afore time. For there were A many within Syracvsa that were Nicias frendes, who wished him to abide time: for they were weary of warre, and waxed angry also with Gylippus. So that if they were but straighted a litle more with want of vittels, they would yeelde straight. Nicias deliuering these perswasions somwhat darkely, and keping somwhat also from vtteraunce, bicause he would not speake them openly: made his colleagues thinke he spake it for cowardlines, and that he returned againe to his former delayes to keepe all in security, by which manner of proceedinge he had from the beginning killed the hartes of his armie, for that he had not at his first comming set apon the enemies, but had protracted time so long, till the corage of his souldiers was colde and done, and him selfe also brought into contempt with his enemies. Whereupon the other Captaines (his colleagues and companions with him in the charge) Euthydemus and Menan- B der, stucke to Demosthenes opinion: wherunto Nicias was also forced against his will to yeelde.

Demosthenes rashnes. So Demosthenes the selfe same night taking the footemen, went to assault the fort of Epipolis where, before his enemies heard any thing of his comming, he slue many of them, and made the rest flee that offered resistaunce. But not content with this victory, he went furder, till he fell apon the Boeotians. They gathering them selues together were the first that resisted the Athenians, basing their pikes with such furie and lowde cries, that they caused the former to retyre, and made all the rest of thassailantes afrayed and amased. For the formost flying backe, came full vpon their companions: who taking them for their enemies, and their flight for a charge, resisted them with all their force, & so mistaking one an other, both were woundded and slaine, and the hurt they ment vnto their enemies, did vnfortunately light vpon their C owne fellowes. For this multitude meetinge thus confusedly together, what through their great feare, & what for that they could not discerne one an other in the night, the which was neither so darke that they could not see at all, nor yet so cleere, as they might certainly iudge by sight what they were that met them: (for then the moone declined a pace, and the small light it gaue was diffused with the number of men that ran to & fro) the feare they had of the enemy, made them mistrust their frendes. All these troubles and disaduantages had the Athenians; and beside, the moone on their backes, which causing the shadow to fall forward, did hide their number, and glistering of armor: and contrarily, the enemies targets, glaring in their eyes by the reflection of the moone that shone vpon them, encreased their feare, and making them seeme a greater number and better appointed than they were in deede. At last, D
The slaughter of the Athenians at Syracusa. the enemies getting a lusty charge vppon them on euery side, after they once beganne to geue backe and turne taile: some were slaine by their enemies, others by their owne company, and others also brake their neckes falling from the rockes. The rest that were dispersed abroade in the fieldes, were the next morning euery man of them put to the sworde by the horsemen.
So, the account made, two thowsand Athenians were slaine, and very few of them escaped by flight, that brought their armors backe againe. Wherefore Nicias that alwayes mistrusted it would thus come to passe, was maruelously offended with Demosthenes, and condemned his rashnes. But he excusing him selfe as well as he could, thought it best to imbarke in the morning betimes, and so to hoyse sayle homewardes. For, sayd he, we must looke for no new aide from Athens, neither are we strong enough with this armie to ouercome our enemies: and B though we were, yet must we of necessity auoide the place we are in, bicause (as it is reported) it is alwayes vnholsome for an army to campe in, and then specially most contagious, by reason of the automne and season of the yeare, as they might plainly see by experience. For many of their people were already sicke, and all of them in maner had no minde to tary. Nicias in no case liked the motion of departing thence, bicause he feared not the Syracvsans, but rather the Athenians, for their accusations & condemnation. And therefore in open counsell he told them, that as yet he saw no such daunger to remaine: and though there were, yet that he had rather dye of his enemies hands, than to be put to death by his owne contrymen.
The corage of Leo Bizantine. Being therin of a contrary minde to Leo Bizantine, who after that sayd to his citizens. I had rather suffer death by you, than to be slaine with you. And furthermore, as for remouing their F campe to some other place, they should haue leasure enough to determine of that matter as they thought good. Now when Nicias had deliuered this opinion in counsell, Demosthenes ha-

A ting hath ill lucke at his first cõming, durst not contrary it. And the residue also supposing that Nicias stuche not so hard against their departure, but that he relied apon the trust and confidence he had of some within the city: they all agreed to Nicias. But when newes came that there was a new supply come vnto the SYRACVSANS, and that they saw the plague encreased more and more in their campe: then Nicias selfe thought it best to departe thence, and gaue notice to the souldiers to prepare them selues to shippe away. Notwithstanding, when they had put all thinges in readines for their departure, without any knowledge of the enemy, or suspicion thereof: the moone beganne to eclipse in the night, and sodainly to lose her light, to the great feare of Nicias and diuers others, who through ignorance and superstition quaked at such sightes. For, touching the eclipse and darkening of the sunne, which is euer at any

B coniunction of the moone, euery common person then knew the cause to be the darkenes of the body of the moone betwixt the sunne and our sight. But the eclipse of the moone it selfe, to know what doth darken it in that sorte, and howe being at the full it doth sodainly lose her light, and chaunge into so many kinde of colours: that was aboue their knowledge, and therefore they thought it very straunge, perswading them selues that it was a signe of some great mischiefes the goddes did threaten vnto men. For Anaxagoras, the first that euer determined and deliuered any thing, for certaine and assured, concerning the light and darkenesse of the moone: his doctrine was not then of any long continuance, neither had it the credit of antiquity, nor was generally knowẽ, but only to a few, who durst not talke of it but with feare euen to thẽ they trusted best. And the reason was, for that the people could not at that time abide

C them that professed the knowledge of natural Philosophy, & inquired of the causes of things: for them they called then Μετεωροσοφιστὰς, as much to say, as curious inquirers, and tatlers of things aboue the reach of reason, done in heauen and in the ayer. Bicause the people thought they ascribed that which was done by the goddes only, vnto certaine naturall and necessarie causes, that worke their effectes not by prouidence nor will, but by force, and necessary consequences. For these causes was Protagoras banished from ATHENS, and Anaxagoras put in prison: frõ whence Pericles had much a do to procure his deliuery. And Socrates also, though he did not medle with that parte of Philosophy, was notwithstanding put to death for the suspicion thereof. In fine, the doctrine of Plato being receiued and liked, as well for his vertuous life, as also for that he submitted the necessity of naturall causes vnto the controlement & dis-

D position of diuine power, as vnto a more excellent and supreame cause: tooke away all the ill opinion which the people had of such disputations, and gaue open passage and free entry vnto the Mathematicall sciences. And therefore Dion, one of Platoes schollers and frendes, an eclipse of the moone chaunsing euen at the very same time that he was weying vp his anckers to sayle from ZACYNTHE, to make warre with the tyran Dionysius: being nothing afrayed nor troubled therewithall, made sayle notwithstanding, and when he came to SYRACVSA, draue out the tyran. But then it fell out vnfortunatly for Nicias, who had no expert nor skilful soothsayer: for the party which he was wont to vse for that purpose, and which tooke away much of his superstition, called Stilbides, was dead not long before. For this signe of the eclipse of the moone (as Philochorus sayth) was not hurtfull for men that would flie, but contrarily very

E good: for sayd he, thinges that men doe in feare, would be hidden, and therefore light is an enemy vnto them. But this notwithstanding, their custome was not to kepe them selues close aboue three dayes in such eclipses of the moone and sunne, as Autoclides selfe prescribeth in a booke he made of such matters: where Nicias bare them then in hande, that they should tary the whole and full reuolution of the course of the moone, as though he had not seene her straight cleere againe, after she had once passed the shadow and darkenes of the earth. But all other thinges layed a side and forgotten, Nicias disposed him selfe to sacrifice vnto the gods: vntil such time as the enemies came againe as well to besiege their fortes, and all their campe by lande, as also to occupy the whole hauen by sea. For they had not onely put men aborde into their gallies able to weare armor, but moreouer young boyes into fisher botes and other

F light barkes, with the which they came to the ATHENIANS, and shamefully reuiled them, to procure them to fight: among the which there was one of a noble house, called Heraclides whose bote being forwarder than his companions, was in daunger of taking by a gallie of the

ATHENIANS, that rowed against him. Pollichus his vncle being afrayed of it, launched forth with tenne gallies of SYRACVSA for his rescue, of the which him selfe was Captaine. The other gallies douting also least Pollichus should take hurt, came on likewise a mayne: so there fell out a great battell by sea, which the SYRACVSANS wanne, and slue Eurymedon the Captaine, and many other. This made the souldiers of the ATHENIANS so afrayed, that they beganne to crie out, it was no lenger tarying there, and that there was none other way but to departe thence by land. For after the SYRACVSANS had wonne that battell, they had straight shut vp the hauen mouth. Nicias could not consent to such a retyre. For, sayd he, it would be too great a shame for them to leaue their gallies and other shippes to the enemy, considering the number not to be much lesse then two hundred: but he thought good rather to arme a hundred and tenne gallies with the best & valliantest of their footemen, and darters, that were in the army, bicause the other gallies had spent their owers. And for the rest of the army, Nicias forsaking their great campe and walles (which reached as farre as the temple of Hercules) did set thē in battell ray apon the peere of the hauen. Insomuch, that the SYRACVSANS which vntill that day could not performe their wonted sacrifices vnto Hercules: did then sende their Priestes and Captaines thither to do them. The souldiers being imbarked into the gallies, the Priestes and Soothsayers came and told the SYRACVSANS, that vndoutedly the signes of the sacrifices did promise thē a noble victory, so that they gaue no charge, but only stoode vppon their defence: for so did Hercules euer ouercome, defending, when he was assailed. With this good hope the SYRACVSANS rowed forward, and there was such a hot and cruell battell by sea, as had not bene in all this warre before: the which was as dreadfull to them that stoode on the shore to behold it, as it was mortall vnto them that fought it, seeing the whole conflict, and what alteration fell out beyond all expectation. For the ATHENIANS did as much hurte them selues by the order they kept in their fight, and by the rankes of their shippes, as they were hurt by their enemies. For they had placed all their great shippes together, fighting with the heauy, against thenemies that were light and swift, which came on on euery side of them, whurling stones at them which were made sharpe to wound how euer they lighted: whereas the ATHENIANS onely casting their dartes, and vsing their bowes and slinges, by meanes of their rowing vp and downe could not lightly ame to hit with the head. That maner of fight, Aristo a CORINTHIAN (an excellent shippe maister) had taught the SYRACVSANS, who was him selfe slaine valliantly fighting, when they were conquerers. The ATHENIANS therupon being driuen to fight, hauing susteined a maruelous slaughter & ouerthrow, (their way to flie by sea being also cleerely taken from them) and perceiuing moreouer that they could hardly saue them selues by lande: were then so discoraged, as they made no lenger resistaunce, when their enemies came hard by them and caried away their shippes, before their faces. Neither did they aske leaue to take vp their dead mens bodies to bury them, taking more pity to forsake their diseased and sore wounded companions, than to bury them that were already slaine. When they considered all these thinges, they thought their owne state more miserable than theirs, which were to end their liues with much more cruelty, than was their misery present. So they being determined to departe thence in the night, Gylippus perceiuing the SYRACVSANS through all the citie disposed them selues to sacrifice to the goddes, and to be merry, as well for the ioy of their victorie, as also for Hercules feast: thought it booteless to perswade them, and much lesse to compell them, to take armes vppon a sodaine, to set apon their enemies that were departing. Howbeit Hermocrates deuising with him selfe how to deceiue Nicias, sent some of his frendes vnto him with instructions, to tell him that they came from such as were wont to send him secret intelligence of all thinges during this warre: and willed him to take heede not to departe that night, least he fell into the ambushes which the SYRACVSANS had layed for him, hauing sent before to take all the straights and passages, by the which he should passe. Nicias being ouerreached by Hermocrates craft and subtilty, stayed there that night, as though he had bene afrayed to fall within the daunger of his enemies ambush. Therupon, the SYRACVSANS the next morning by peepe of day, hoysed sayle, got the straights of Nicias passage, stopped the riuers mouthes, & brake vp the bridges: and then cast their horsemen in a squadron in the next plaine fieldes adioyning, so that the ATHENIANS had no way left

A leure to escape, and passe by them, without fighting. At last notwithstanding, hauing stayed all that day and the next night following, they put them selues in iorney, and departed with great cryes & lamentations, as if they had gone from their natural contry, and not out of their enemies lande: as well for the great distresse and necessity wherein they were, (lacking all things needefull to susteine life) as also for the extreame sorowe they felt to leaue their sore wounded companions and deseased kinsemen and frends behinde them, that could not for their weakenes follow the campe, but specially for that they looked for some woorse matter to fall ed them selues, than that which they saw present before their eyes to be happened to their fellowes. But of all the most pitifull sightes to beholde in that campe, there was none more lamentable nor miserable, than the person of Nicias selfe: who being tormented with his disease, and waxen very leane and pale, was also vnworthely brought to extreame want of natural sustenance, euen when he had most neede of comfort, being very sickely. Yet notwithstanding his weakenes and infirmity, he tooke great paines, and suffered many thinges, which the soundest bodies doe labor much to ouercome and suffer: making it appeare euidently to euery man, that he did not abide all that paines for any respect of him selfe, or desire that he had to saue his owne life, so much as for their sakes in that he yeelded not vnto present dispayre. For where the souldiers for very feare & sorowe burst out into teares & bitter wayling: Nicias selfe shewed, that if by chaunce he were forced at any time to doe the like, it was rather vpon remembraunce of the shame and dishonor that came into his minde, to see the vnfortunate successe of this voyage, in steade of the honor and victory they hoped to haue brought home, than for any other respect. But if to see Nicias in this misery, did moue the lookers on to pitye: yet did this much more encrease their compassion, when they remembred Nicias wordes in his orations continually to the people, to breake this iorney, & to dissuade them from their enterprise of this warre. For then they plainly iudged him not to haue deserued these troubles. Yet furthermore, this caused the souldiers vtterly to dispayre of helpe from the goddes, when they considered with them selues, that so deuout and godly a man as Nicias (who left nothing vndone that might tend to the honor and seruice of the goddes) had no better successe, than the most vile and wicked persons in all the whole army. All this notwithstandinge, Nicias B strained him selfe in all that might be, both by his good countenaunce, his cheerefull words, & his kinde vsing of euery man to let them know that he fainted not vnder his burden, nor yet C did yeeld to this his misfortune and extreame calamity. And thus trauelling eight dayes iorney outright together, notwithstanding that he was by the way continually set vpon, wearied, and hurt: yet he euer mainteined his bandes, and led them whole in company vntill that Demosthenes, with all his bandes of souldiers was taken prisoner, in a certaine village called Polion: whyle remayninge behinde, he was enuironned by his enemies in fight, and seeing him selfe so compassed in, drewe out his sword, and with his owne handes thrust him selfe thorow, but dyed not of it, bicause his enemies came straight about him and tooke hold of him. The Syracvsans thereupon went with speede to Nicias, and told him of Demosthenes case. He geuing no credit to them, sent presently certaine of his horsemen thither to vnderstand the trothe: who brought him worde that Demosthenes and all his men were taken prisoners. Then he besought Gylippus to treate of peace, to suffer the poore remaine of the Athenians to departe out of Sicile with safety, and to take such hostages for the sure payement of all such summes of money the Syracvsans had disbursed by meanes of this warre, as should like him selfe: which he promised he would cause the Athenians to performe & satisfie vnto them. Howbeit the Syracvsans would in no wise hearken to peace, but cruelly threatning & reuiling them that made mocion hereof, in rage gaue a new onset vpon him, more fiercely than euer before they had done. Nicias being then vtterly without any kinde of vittells, did notwithstanding hold out that night, & marched all the next day following (though the enemies darts still flew about their eares) vntill he came to the riuer of Asinarus, into the which the Syracvsans did forcibly driue them. Some others of them also dying for thirst, F entred the riuer of them selues, thinking to drinke. But there of all others was the most cruell slaughter of the poore wretches, euen as they were drinking: vntil such time as Nicias falling downe flat at Gylippus feete, sayd thus vnto him. Since the goddes haue geuen thee (Gylippus)

victory, shewe mercy, not to me that by these miseries haue won immortall honor and fame, but vnto these poore vanquished ATHENIANS: calling to thy remembraunce, that the fortunes of warre are common, and howe that the ATHENIANS haue vsed you LACEDÆMONIANS curteously, as often as fortune fauored them against you. Gylippus beholding Nicias perswaded by his wordes, tooke compassion of him, (for he knew he was a frend vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS: at the last peace concluded betwext them, and furthermore thought it great honor to him, if he could cary away the two Captaines or generalls of his enemies prisoners) shewed him mercy, gaue him wordes of comforte, and moreouer commaunded besides that they should take all the residue prisoners. But his commaundement was not knowen in time to all: insomuch as there were many moe slaine than taken, although some priuate souldiers saued diuers notwithstanding by stealth. Now the SYRACVSANS hauing brought all the prisoners that were openly taken into a troupe together, first vnarmed them, then taking their weapons from them hong them vp apon the goodliest younge trees that stoode apon the riuers side in token of triumphe. And so putting on triumphing garlandes apon their heades, & hauing trimmed their owne horses in triúphant maner, & also shorne all the horses of their enemies: in this triumphing sorte they made their entry into the citie of SYRACVSA, hauing gloriously ended the most notable warre that euer was amongest the GRECIANS one against another, and attained also the noblest victory that could be atchieued, and that only by force of armes and valliancy. So at their returne, a counsell and assembly was holden at SYRACVSA by the citizens and their confederates: in the which, Eurycles one of the orators, (a practiser of publicke causes) first made peticion, that the day on the which they had taken Nicias, might for euer thenceforth be kept holy day, without any maner of worke or labor, but only to doe sacrifice to the goddes: and that the feast should be called, Asinarus feast, after the name of the riuer where the ouerthrow was geuen. This victory was had the six and twenty day of the moneth of Iuly. And as touching the prisoners, that the confederats of the ATHENIANS and their slaues should be openly solde by the dromme: and that the naturall ATHENIANS which were free men, and their confederates of the contry of SICILE, should be clapped in irons & layed in prison, the Captaines only excepted, whom they should put to death. The SYRACVSANS cõfirmed this decree. And when the Captaine Hermocrates went about to perswade them that to be merciful in victory, would be more honor vnto them, than the victory it selfe: they thrust him backe with great tumult. And furthermore, when Gylippus made sute that for the Captaines of the ATHENIANS, he might cary them aliue with him to SPARTA: he was not onely shamefully denyed, but most vilely abused, so lusty were they growen apon this victory, beside also that in the time of the warre they were offended with him, & could not endure his straight seuere LACONIAN gouernment. Timæus sayth moreouer, that they accused him of couetousnes and theft, which vice he inherited from his father. For Cleandrides his father was conuict for extorcion, and banished ATHENS. And Gylippus selfe hauing stolen thirty talentes out of a thowsande which Lysander sent to SPARTA by him, and hauing hid them vnder the eusinges of his house, being bewrayed, was compelled with shame to flie his contry, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lysander. So Timæus wryteth, that Nicias & Demosthenes were not stoned to death by the SYRACVSANS, as Thucydides and Philistus reporte, but that they killed them selues, apon word sent them by Hermocrates (before the assemble of the people was broken vp) by one of his men whom the kepers of the prison let in vnto them: howbeit their bodies were cast out at the iaile dore, for euery man to beholde. I haue heard there is a target at this present to be seene in a temple at SYRACVSA, which is sayd to be Nicias target, couered all ouer with golde and purple silke, passinge finely wrought together. As for the other prisoners of the ATHENIANS, the most of them dyed of sickenes, and of ill handling in the prison: where they had no more allowed them to liue withall but two dishefulls of barley for their breade, and one of water for eche man a day. In deede many of them were conueyed away, and sold for slaues: and many also that scaped vnknowen as slaues, were also solde for bondmen, whom they branded in the forehead with the prince of a horse, who notwithstanding besides their bondage endured also this paine. But such, their humble patience and modesty did greatly profit them. For either shortly after they were made free men,

A or if they ſtill continued in bondage, they were gently intreated, and beloued of their maſters. Some of them were ſaued alſo for Euripides ſake. For the SICILIANS liked the verſes of this Poet better, than they did any other GRÆCIANS verſes of the middeſt of GRÆCE. For if they heard any rimes or ſonges like vnto his, they would haue them by hart, & one would preſent thē to an other with great ioy. And therfore it is reported, that diuers eſcaping this bondage, and returning againe to ATHENS, went very louingly to ſalute Euripides, & to thanke him for their liues: and told him how they were deliuered from ſlauery, only by teaching them thoſe verſes which they remembred of his workes. Others tolde him alſo, how that after the battel, they ſcaping by flight, & wandering vp and downe the fieldes, met with ſome that gaue them meate & drinke to ſing his verſes. And this is not to be maruelled at, weying the reporte made

The newes of this lamentable ouerthrow, was not beleued at the firſt, when they heard of it at ATHENS. For a ſtraunger that landed in the hauen of PIRÆA, went and ſat him downe (as the maner is) in a barbers ſhoppe, & thinking it had bene commonly knowen there, beganne to talke of it. The barber hearing the ſtraunger tell of ſuch matter, before any other had heard of it: ranne into the city as faſt as he could, and going to the gouernors tolde the newes openly before them all. The magiſtrates thereupon did preſently call an aſſembly, and brought the barber before them: who being de-

Whereupon being taken for a forger of newes, that without ground had put the city in feare and trouble: he was preſently bound, and layed on a wheele, wheron they vſe to put offenders to death, and ſo was there tormented a great time, vntill at laſt there arriued certaine men in the city, who brought too certaine newes thereof, and told euery thing how the ouerthrow came. So as in fine they found Nicias wordes true, which now they beleued, when they ſawe all thoſe miſeries light fully apon them, which he long before had prognoſticated vnto them.

The end of Nicias life.

THE LIFE OF Marcus Craſſus.

Marcus Craſſus kinred, & youth.

Marcus Craſſus was the ſonne of a Cenſor, who had alſo receiued the honor of triumphe: but him ſelfe was brought vp in a litle houſe with two other of his brethren, which were both maried in their fathers & mothers life time, and kept houſe together. Whereuppon it came to paſſe, that he was a man of ſuch ſober and temperate dyet, that one of his brethrē being deceaſed, he maried his wife by whom he had children. For women, he liued as continent a life, as any ROMANE of his time: notwithſtanding, afterwardes being of riper yeares, he was accuſed by Plotinus to haue deflowred one of the Veſtall Nunnes called Licinia. But in troth the cauſe of that ſuſpicion grew thus. Licinia had a goodly pleaſaunt garden hard by the ſuburbes of the city, wherewith Craſſus was maruelouſly in loue, and would faine haue had it good cheape: and vpon this only occaſion was often ſeene in ſpeeche with her, which made the people ſuſpect him. But foraſmuch as it ſeemed to the iudges that his couetouſnes was the cauſe that made him follow her, he was clered of thinceſt ſuſpected, but he neuer left followinge of the Nunne, till he had got the garden of her. The ROMANES ſay there was but that only vice of couetouſnes in Craſſus, that drowned many other goodly vertues in him: for mine owne opinion, me thinkes he could not be touched with that vice alone without others, ſince it grew ſo great, as the note of that only did hide and couer all his other vices. Nowe to ſet out his extreame couetous deſire of getting, naturally bred in him, they proue it by two manifeſt reaſons. The firſt, his maner and meanes he vſed to get: and the ſeconde, the greatnes of his wealth. For at the beginning he was not left much more worthe, then three hundred talentes. And during the time that he delt in the affayers of the common wealth, he offered the tenthes of all his goodes wholly vnto Hercules, kept open houſe for all the people of ROME, and gaue alſo to euery citizen of the ſame as much corne as would kepe him three monethes: & yet when he went from ROME to make warre with the PARTHIANS, him ſelfe being deſirous to know what all he had was worth, founde that it amounted to the ſumme of ſeuen thowſande one hundred talentes. But if I may with licenſe vſe euill ſpeeche, wryting a troth: I ſay he got the moſt parte of his wealth by fire and blood, raiſing his greateſt reuenue of publicke calamities. For when Sylla had take the citie of ROME, he made porteſale of the goods of them whom he had put to death, to thoſe that gaue moſt, tearming them his booty, Craſſus couetouſnes.

Craſſus riches.

How Craſſus came by his goodes.

A booty, onely for that he would the nobility, and greateſt men of power in the citie ſhould be partakers with him of this iniquity: and in this open ſale Craſſus neuer left taking of giftes, nor bying of thinges of Sylla for profit. Furthermore, Craſſus perceiuinge that the greateſt decay commonly of the buildinges in ROME came by fire, and falling downe of houſes, through the ouermuch weight by numbers of ſtories built one apon an other: bought bondmen that were maſons, carpinters, and theſe deuiſours and builders, & of thoſe he had to the number of fiue hundred. Afterwardes, when the fire tooke any houſe, he would buy the houſe while it was a burning, and the next houſes adioyning to it, which the owners ſolde for litle, being then in daunger as they were, and a burning: ſo that by proces of time, the moſt parte of the houſes in ROME came to be his. But notwithſtanding that he had ſo many ſlaues to his workemen, he

B neuer built any houſe from the ground, ſauing his owne houſe wherein he dwelt: ſaying, that ſuch as delighted to builde, vndid them ſelues without helpe of any enemy. And though he had many mynes of ſiluer, many ploughes, and a number of hyndes and plowmen to followe the ſame: yet all that commoditie was nothing, in reſpect of the profit his ſlaues and bondemen brought him dayly in. As readers, ſcriueners, goldſmythes, bankers, receiuers, ſtewards of houſeholde, caruers, and other ſuch officers at the table, taking paines him ſelfe to helpe them when they were learners, and to inſtruct them what they ſhould doe: and to be ſhorte, he thought the greateſt care a good houſeholder ought to haue, was to ſee his ſlaues or ſeruauntes well taught, being the moſt liuely cattell and beſt inſtruments of a mans houſe. And ſurely therein his opinion was not ill, at the leaſt if he thought as he ſpake: that all thinges

C muſt be done by ſeruauntes, and his ſeruauntes muſt be ruled by him. For we ſee that the arte and skill to be a good husbande, when it conſiſteth in gouernment of thinges without life or ſence, is but a baſe thing, only tending to gaine: but when it dependeth apon good order and gouernment of men, me thinkes then it is to knowe how to gouerne well a common wealth. But as his iudgement was good in the other, ſo was it very bad in this: that he thought no man riche, and wealthie, that could not maintaine a whole army with his owne proper goods. For the warre (as king Archidamus was wont to ſay) is not made with any certainty of expences and therefore there muſt no ſufficiency of riches be limited for the maintenance of the ſame. But herein Marius and he differed farre in opinion: who hauinge allowed euery ROMANE foureteene akers lande (called with them, Iugera) vnderſtanding that ſome were not pleaſed,

D but would haue more, made them this aunſwer. The gods forbid any ROMANE ſhould thinke that land litle, which in deede is enough to ſuffiſe for his maintenance. This notwithſtanding, Craſſus was curteous to ſtraungers, for his houſe was open to them all, and he lent his frendes money without intereſt: but when they brake day of payment with him, then would he roudly demaunde his money of them. So, his curteſie to lende many times without intereſt, did more trouble them, than if he had taken very great vſery. In deede when he bad any man to come to his table, his fare was but euen ordinary, without all exceſſe: but his fine and cleanly ſeruice, & the good entertainment he gaue euery man that came to him, pleaſed them better, than if he had bene more plentifull of dyet and diſhes. As for his learning and ſtudy, he chiefly ſtudied eloquence, and that ſorte ſpecially that beſt would ſerue his turne to ſpeake in open

E preſence: ſo that he became the beſt ſpoken man in ROME of all his time, and by his great induſtry and diligent indeuor excelled all them that euen by nature were moſt apt vnto it. For ſome ſay, he had neuer ſo ſmall nor litle a cauſe in hande, but he alwayes came prepared, hauing ſtudied his caſe before for pleading: and oftentimes alſo when Pompey, Ceſar, and Cicero refuſed to riſe, and ſpeake to matters, Craſſus would defend euery cauſe if he were requeſted. And therfore was he generally beloued & well thought of, bicauſe he ſhewed him ſelfe painfull, & willing to helpe euery man. Likewiſe was his gentlenes maruelouſly eſteemed, bicauſe he ſaluted euery body curteouſly, and made much of all men: for, whom ſo euer he met in the ſtreetes that ſpake to him as he paſſed and ſaluted him, were he neuer ſo meane, he woulde ſpeake to him againe, and call him by his name. It is ſayd alſo he was very well ſtudied in ſto-

F ries, and indifferently ſeene in Philoſophy, ſpecially in Ariſtotels workes, which one Alexander did read vnto him, a man that became very gentle and pacient of nature, by vſing of Craſſus company: for it were hard to ſay, whether Alexander was pobber when he came to Craſſus

or made poorer while he was with him. Of all his frendes he would euer haue Alexander abroade with him, and while they were abroade, would lend him a hat to couer his head by the way: but so soone as they were returned, he would call for it againe. O wonderfull pacience of a man? to see that he making profession of Philosophie as he did, the poore man being in great pouerty, did not place pouerty in thinges indifferent. But hereof we will speake more hereafter. Cinna and Marius being now of greater power, and comming on directly towardes ROME; euery man suspected straight their cōming was for no good to the common wealth, but as appeared plainly, for the death and destruction of the noblest men of ROME. For it so fell out in deede, that they slue all the chiefe men they found in the city, among whom Crassus father & his brother were of the number, and him selfe being at that time but young, escaped the present daunger only by flight. Furthermore, Crassus hearing that they layed waite to take him, & that the tyrannes sought him in euery place, tooke three of his frends in his company, and tenne seruauntes only, and fled into SPAYNE with all possible speede, where he had bene with his father before, and had got some frendes when he was Prætor, and ruled that contrie. Neuertheless, seeing euery body afrayed, and mistrusting Marius cruelty as if he had bene at their dores, he durst not bewray him selfe to any man, but went into the fieldes, and hid him in a great caue being within the lande of one Vibius Piciacus by the sea side, from whence he sent a man of his to this Piciacus, to feele what good will he bare him, but specially for that his vittells beganne to faile him. Vibius hearing that Crassus was safe, and had scaped, became very glad of it: and vnderstanding how many persones he had with him, and into what place he was gotten, went not him selfe to see him, but called one of his slaues (who was his receiuer and occupied that ground for him) & bringing him neere the place where Crassus was, commaunded him euery night to prouide meate for supper, to bring it ready dressed to this rocke whereunder was the caue, & make no wordes of it, neither be inquisitiue for whom it was, for if he did, he should dye for it: & otherwise, for keping the thing secret as he commaunded, he promised to make him a free man. This caue is not farre from the sea side, & is closed in round about with two rockes that mete together, which receiue a soft coole winde into them. Whē ye are entred into the caue, it is of a great height within, and in the hollownes thereof are many other caues of great receite one within an other, and besides that, it neither lacketh light nor water: for there is a well of passing good water running hard by the rocke, and the naturall riftes of the rockes also receiuing the light without, where they mete together, do send it inward into the caue. So that in the day time it is maruelous light, and hath no dampe ayer, but very pure and drye, by reason of the thickenes of the rocke, which sendeth all the moisnesse and vapour into that springinge well. Crassus keeping close in this caue, Vibius receiuer brought vittells thither dayly to relieue him, and his company, but saw not them he brought it to, nor could vnderstand what they were: and yet they saw him plainly, obseruing the houre & time of his comming when he brought the same. He prouided them no more then would euen necessarily serue their turne, and yet plenty sufficient to make good cheare withall: for Vibius was bent to entertaine Crassus as honorably as he could possible, insomuch as he considered he was a younge man, and therefore reason woulde he shoulde offer him some occasion to take such pleasure and delight as his youth required. For to relieue his necessity only, he thought that rather a parte of feare, than any shew of loue towards him. One day he tooke two fayer young damsells, and brought them with him to the sea side: and when he came to the caue, shewed them where they should get vp, and bad them not be afrayed. Crassus at the first, when he saw the young wenches, was afrayed he had bene betrayed: yet he asked them what they were, and whome they sought. They being instructed by Vibius what they should say, aunswered, that they sought their master that was hidden there. Then Crassus knew this was Vibius mirth to shew him curtesie: so he receiued them into his caue, and kept them as long as he lay there, letting Vibius vnderstand by them what he lacked. Fenestella wryteth, that he saw one of them when she was an old woman, and that he had heard her tell him this tale many a time with great delight. In fine, Crassus (after he had lyen hidden in this caue eight monethes) vnderstanding that Cinna was dead, came out: and so soone as he made him selfe to be knowen, there repayred a great number of souldiers vnto him, of whom he only chose

A two thowſand fiue hundred, and with them paſſed by many cities, and ſacked one called MALACA, as diuers doe wryte, but he flatly denied it, and ſtowtly contraried them that affirmed it. And afterwardes hauing gotten ſhippes together, went into AFRICKE, to Metellus Pius, a man of great fame, and that had already gotten a great army together. Howbeit he taried not long with Metellus, but iarring with him, went vnto Sylla, who welcomed and honored him as much, as any that he had about him. Sylla afterwardes arriuing in ITALIE, intending to imploy all the young nobility he had in his cõpany, gaue euery one of them charge vnder him, and ſent Craſſus into the contry of the MARSIANS, to leauy men of warre there. Craſſus deſiring certaine bandes of Sylla to aide him, being driuen to paſſe by his enemies: Sylla aunſwered him angrely againe. I geue thee thy father, thy brother, thy frendes and kinſemen to aide B thee, whom they moſt wickedly haue ſlaine and murdered, and whoſe deathes I purſue with hot reuenge of maine army, apon thoſe bloody murtherers that haue ſlaine them. Craſſus being netled with theſe wordes, departed thence preſently, and ſtowtly paſſing through his enemies, leauied a good number of ſouldiers: & was euer after ready at Syllaes commaundement in all his warres. Here began firſt (as they ſay) the ſtrife and contention betwext him and Pompey. For Pompey being younger than Craſſus, and borne of a wicked father in ROME, whom the people more hated thã euer they did man: came yet to great honor by his valliancy, & by the notable acts he did in the warres at that time. So that Sylla did Pompey that honor many times, which he ſeldom did vnto them that were his elders, nor yet vnto thoſe that were his equalls: as to riſe vp when he came towardes him, to put of his cappe, to call him Imperator, as much C as Lieutenant generall. And this galled Craſſus to the hart, although he had no wrong in that Pompey was taken before him, bicauſe he had no experience in matters of warre at that time, and alſo bicauſe theſe two vices that were bred in him, miſery and couetouſnes, drowned all his vertue and well doing. For at the ſacke of the city of TVDER, which he tooke, he priuely got the moſt parte of the ſpoyle to him ſelfe, wherof he was accuſed before Sylla. Yet in the laſt battell of all this ciuill warre (which was the greateſt and moſt daungerous of all other) euen before ROME it ſelfe, the wing that Sylla led, was repulſed and ouerthrowen: but Craſſus that led the right wing, ouercame his enemies, followed them in chaſe till midnight, ſent Sylla word of his victory, and demaunded vittells for his men. But then againe he ranne into as great defame, for buying, or begging the confiſcate goodes of the outlawes appointed to be D ſlaine, for litle or nothing. And it is ſayd alſo, that he made one an outlaw in the contry of the BRVTIANS, without Syllaes priuitie or commaundement, only to haue his goodes. But Sylla being told of it, would neuer after vſe him in any open ſeruice. Surely this is a ſtraunge thing, that Craſſus ſelfe being a great flatterer of other, & could creepe into any mans fauor: was yet himſelfe eaſie to be won through flattery, of any man that would ſeeke him that way. Furthermore, it is ſayd of him that he had this property: that though himſelfe was as extremely couetous as might be, yet he bitterly reproued and vtterly miſliked them that had his owne humor of auarice. Pompeyes honor that he attained vnto dayly, by bearing great charge and rule in the warres, did greatly trouble Craſſus: both bicauſe he obtained the honor of triumphe before he came to be Senatour, and alſo for that the ROMANS commonly called him, Pompeius E Magnus, to ſay, Pompey the great. Craſſus beinge in place on a time when one ſayd that ſawe Pompey comming, ſee, Pompey the great is come. And how great I pray ye, ſayd he ſcornefully? howbeit diſpayring that he could not attaine to match him in the warres, he gaue him ſelfe vnto the affayers of the city: and by his paines and induſtry of pleading, and defending mens cauſes; by lending of money to them that needed, and by helping of them that ſued for any office, or demaunded any thing els of the people, he attained in the end to the like eſtimacion and authoritie that Pompey was come vnto, by his many noble victories. And there was one notable thing in either of them. For Pompeyes fame & power was greater in ROME, when him ſelfe was abſent: and contrary wiſe when he was there preſent, Craſſus oftentimes was better eſteemed than he. Pompey caried a great maieſty and grauity in his maner of life, would not be ſeene often of the people, but kept from repayring to open places, and would ſpeake but in fewe mens cauſes, and that vnwillingly: all to keepe his fauor and credit whole for him ſelfe, F when he ſtoode in neede to employ the ſame. ny, bicauſe he kept continually in the market place, and was eaſie to be repayred vnto by any man that required his helpe, dayly following thoſe exerciſes, indeuoring him ſelfe to pleaſure euery man: ſo that by this eaſie acceſſe and familiaritie, for fauor and good will, he grew to exceede the grauety and maieſty of Pompey. But as for the worthines of their perſons, their eloquence of ſpeeche, & their good grace & countenaunce: in all thoſe (it is ſayd) Pompey and Craſſus were both alike. And this enuy and emulation neuer caried Craſſus away with any open malice and ill will. For though he was ſory to ſee Pompey and Cæſar honored aboue him: yet the worme of ambition neuer bred malice in him. No, though Cæſar when he was taken by pyrates in Asia (as he was once) and being kept priſoner cryed out alowde: O Craſſus, what ioy will this be to thee, when thou ſhalt heare I am in priſon. This notwithſtanding, they were afterwardes good frendes, as it appeareth. For Cæſar being ready on a time to depart out of Rome for Prætor into Spayne, and not being able to ſatisfie his creditors that came flocking all at once about him, to ſtay & arreſt his cariage: Craſſus in that time of neede forſooke him not, but became his ſurety for the ſumme of eight hundred and thirty talentes.

In fine, all Rome being deuided into three factions, to wit, of Pompey, Cæſar, and Craſſus (for as for Cato, the eſtimacion they had of his fidelity was greater, than his authority: and his vertue more wondered at then practiſed) inſomuch as the graueſt and wiſeſt men tooke parte with Pompey. The liuelieſt youthes, and likelieſt to runne into deſperate attemptes, they followed Cæſars hope. Craſſus keeping the middeſt of the ſtreame, was indifferent to them both, and oftentimes chaunged his minde and purpoſe. For in matters of gouernment in the common weale, he neither ſhewed him ſelfe a conſtant frend, nor a daungerous enemy: but for gaine was eaſily made frend or foe. So that in a moment they ſaw him praiſe and reproue, defende and condemne, the ſame lawes, and the ſame men. His eſtimacion grewe more, through the peoples feare of him: than for any good will they bare him. As appeareth by the aunſwere that one Sicinius (a very buſie headed man, and one that troubled euery gouernor of the common weale in his time) made to one that asked him, why he was not buſie with Craſſus amongeſt the reſt: and howe it happened that he ſo ſcaped his handes? O, ſayd he, he caries haye on his horne. The maner was then at Rome, if any man had a curſt bullocke that would ſtrike with his horne, to winde haye about his heade, that the people might beware of him when they met him. The commocion of fenſers, which ſome call Spartacus warre, their waſting and deſtroying of Italie came apon this occaſion. In the citie of Capva, there was one Lentulus Batiatus, that kept a great number of fenſers at vnrebated foyles, whom the Romanes call Gladiatores, whereof the moſt parte were Gavles and Thracians. Theſe men were kept locked vp, not for any fault they had cõmitted, but only for the wickednes of their maſter that had bought them, and compelled them by force, one to fight with an other at the ſharpe. On a time two hundred of them were minded to ſteale away: but their conſpiracy being bewrayed, three ſcore and eighteene of them entred into a cookes houſe, and with the ſpittes and kitching kniues, which there they got, went quite out of the city. By the way they fortuned to meete with cartes loden with fenſers weapons, that were brought from Capva going to ſome other city: thoſe they alſo tooke by force, and arming them ſelues therewith, got them then to a ſtrong place of ſcituacion. Where amongeſt them ſelues they choſe three Captaines, and one Spartacus a Thracian borne (and of thoſe contrymen that go wandring vp and downe with their heards of beaſtes neuer ſtaying long in a place) they made their Generall. This Spartacus was not onely valliant, but ſtrong made withall, and endued with more wiſedom and honeſty, than is commonly found in men of his ſtate and condicion: and for ciuility and good vnderſtanding, a man more like to the Græcians, than any of his countrie men cõmonly be. It is reported, that when Spartacus came firſt to Rome to be ſold for a ſlaue, there was founde as he ſlept, a ſnake wound about his face. His wife ſeeing it, being his owne contry woman, & a wiſe woman beſides, poſſeſt with Bacchus ſpirite of diuination: ſaid plainly that it did ſignifie, that one day he ſhoulde be of great power, much dread, and haue very good ſucceſſe. This ſame woman propheteſſe was then with him, and followed him likewiſe when he fled. Now firſt they ouerthrewe certaine ſouldiers that came out of Capva againſt them, thinking to take them: and ſtripping them of their armor & weapons, made them glad

A to take the fensers weapons, which they threw away as vile & vnseemely. After that, the Romanes sent Clodius Prætor against them, with three thowsand men. Who besieged them in their forte, scituate apon a hill that had a verie steepe and narowe aseent vnto it, and kept the passage vp to them: all the rest of the grounde rounde about it, was nothing but high rockes hanging ouer, & apon the great store of wilde vines. Of them the bondmen cut the strongest stirppes, and made thereof ladders, like to these shippe ladders of ropes, of such a length and so strong, that they reached from the toppe of the hill euen to the very bottome: apon those they all came safely downe, sauing one that taried aboue to throwe downe their armor after them, who afterwards by the same ladder saued him selfe last of all. The Romanes mistrusting no such matter, these bondmen compassed the hill round, assailed them behinde, & put them B in such a feare with the sodaine onset, as they fled apon it euery man, and so was their campe taken. Thereupon diuers heardmen and sheapherds that kept cattell hard by the hill, ioyned with the Romanes that fled, being strong and hardy men: of which some they armed, and others they vsed as scowtes and spialls to discouer. Apon this ouerthrowe was sent an other Captaine from Rome, called Publius Varinus, against these bondmen: who first ouercame Furius, the Lieutenant of Varinus in battell, & two thowsand of his men: & after that againe they slue one Cossinius, and ouerthrew a great army of his, being ioyned with P. Varinus, as his fellow & counseller. Spartacus hauing intelligence that Cossinius was bathing him selfe at a place called the salte pittes, had almost taken him tardy, hasting much a do by flight to saue him selfe: notwithstanding, Spartacus wanne all his cariage at that time, and hauing him hard in chase, C tooke his whole cãpe with great slaughter of his men, among whom Cossinius selfe was slaine. Spartacus hauing thus now in sundry battells and encounters ouercome the Prætor him selfe, P. Varinus, and at the length taken his sergeauntes from him that caried the axes before him, and his owne horse whereon he rode him selfe: was growen then to such a power, as he was dreaded of euery man. Yet all this notwithstandinge, Spartacus wisely considering his owne force, thinking it not good to tary till he might ouercome the power of the Romanes: marched with his armie towardes the Alpes, taking it their best way after they had passed them ouer, euerie man to repayre home to his owne contrie, some into Gavle, the rest into Thracia. But his souldiers trustinge to their multitude, and perswading them selues to doe great thinges: would not obey him therein, but went againe to spoile and ouerrunne all Ita- D lie. The Senate of Rome being in a great perplexity, not onely for the shame and dishonor that their men should be ouercome in that sorte by slaues and rebells, but also for the feare & daunger all Italie stoode in besides: sent both the Consulls together, Gellius and Lentulus, as vnto as difficult and daungerous a warre, as any that could haue happened vnto them. This Gellius one of the Consuls, setting sodainly apon a band of the Germaines, which in a brauery and contempt as it were, dispersed them selues from their campe, put them to the sworde euery man. Lentulus, his colleague and fellow Consull on thother side, compassed in Spartacus round with a great army: but Spartacus charged his Lieutenaunts that led tharmy, gaue them battell, ouerthrew them, and tooke all their cariage. Hereupon, marching on still with his army towardes the Alpes, Cassius the Prætor, and Gouernor of Gavle about the Po, came a- E gainst him with an army of tenne thowsand men. Spartacus ioyned battell with him, and ouercame him. Cassius hauing lost a great number of his men, with great difficulty saued him selfe by flying. The Senate hearing of Cassius ouerthrow, were marueloully offended with the Consulls, and sent commaundement vnto them, to leaue of the warre: and thereuppon gaue the whole charge thereof vnto Marcius Crassius, who was accompanied in this iorney with many noble young gentlemen of honorable houses, both for that he was marueloully esteemed, & also for the good will they bare him. Now went Crassius from Rome, and camped in Roma- nia, tarying Spartacus comming, who was marching thitherwarde. He sent Mummius one of his Lieutenauntes with two legyons, to fetche a compasse about to intrappe the enemie be- hinde, straightly commaunding him to follow Spartacus rereward, but in no ease to offer him F skirmishe nor battell. But Mummius notwithstanding this straight commaundement, seeing some hope geuen him to doe good, set apon Spartacus, who gaue him the ouerthrowe, slue numbers of his men, and moe had slaine, sauing that certaine of them saued them selues by flight, hauing only loſt their armor and weapons. Hereupon Craſſus was grieuouſly offended with Mummius, and receiuing his ſouldiers that fled, gaue them other armor and weapons but yet vpon ſureties, that they ſhould keepe them better thencefoorth, than they had before done. Now Craſſus of the fiue hundred that were in the firſt ranckes, and that firſt fled, them he deuided into fifty times ten, and out of euery one of thoſe he put one of them to death as the lot fell out: renuing againe the auncient diſcipline of the ROMANES to puniſh cowardly ſouldiers, which of long time before had not bene put in vſe. For it is a kinde of death that bringeth open ſhame withall, and bicauſe it is done in the face of the campe, it maketh all the reſidue afrayed to ſee the terror of this puniſhment. Craſſus hauing done execution in this ſorte apon his men, led his armie againſt Spartacus: who ſtill drue backe, vntill he came to the ſea ſide through the contry of the LVCANIANS, where he found in the ſtraight of the Far of MESSINA, certaine pyrates ſhippes of CILICIA, and there determined to goe into SICILIA. And hauing put two thowſande men into SICILE, he then reuiued the warre there of the ſlaues, which was but in maner newly ended, and lacked ſmall prouocation to beginne it againe. But theſe pyrates hauing promiſed Spartacus to paſſe him ouer thither, & alſo taken giftes of him, deceiued him, & brake their promiſe. Whereupon Spartacus returning backe againe from the ſea ſide, went & camped within a litle Ile of the RHEGIANS. Craſſus comming thither to ſeeke him, and perceiuing that the nature of the place taught him what he ſhould doe: determined with a walle to choke vp the barre or channell entring into this litle Ilande, both to keepe his men occupied from idlenes, & his enemies alſo from vittell. This was a maruelous hard and long peece of worke, notwithſtanding, Craſſus finiſhed it beyonde all mens expectation in a very ſhorte time, and brought a trenche from one ſide of the ſea to the other ouerthwart this barre, which was three hundred furlonges in length, fifteene foote broade, and ſo many in height: and apon the toppe of this trenche built a high wall, of a maruelous ſtrength, wherof Spartacus at the firſt made light accompt, and laughed at it. But when pillage beganne to faile him, & traueling all about the Ile for vittells, perceiuing him ſelfe to be ſhut in with this wall, and that there was no kinde of vittells to be had within all the compaſſe of the Ile: he then tooke the vantage of a rough boyſterous night, the winde being very great, when it ſnewed exceedingly, ſet his men a worke, and filled vp a peece of the trenche (being of a ſmall bredth) with earth, ſtones, and boughes of trees, whereupon he paſſed ouer the third parte of his army. Craſſus at the firſt then became afrayed, leaſt Spartacus would haue taken his way directly toward ROME: but he was ſoone put out of that feare, when he heard they were fallen out together, and that a great number of them rebelling againſt Spartacus, went & camped by themſelues by the lake of LVCANIA, which water by reporte hath this variable property, that at certaine times it chaungeth and becommeth very ſweete, and at ſome other times againe ſo ſalte and brackiſh, as no man can drinke it. Craſſus going to ſet apon them, draue them beyond the lake, but could kill no great nũber of them, nor follow them very farre: bicauſe Spartacus came preſently to the reſcue with his army, who ſtayed the chaſe. Craſſus had wrytten letters before to the Senate, to call Lucullus home out of THRACIA, & Pompey out of SPAYNE, wherof he then repented him, & made all the poſſible ſpeede he could to end this warre, before either of them came thither: knowing, that which of them ſo euer came to his helpe, to him would the people geue the honor of ending this warre, and not to him ſelfe. Wherefore he firſt determined to aſſaile them that had reuolted from Spartacus, and camped by them ſelues who were led by Caius Canicius, and an other called Caſtus. So Craſſus ſent ſix thowſand footemen before to take a hil, commaunding them to lye as cloſe as they could, that their enemies might not diſcouer them: and ſo they did, and couered their morians & headpeeces as well as might be, from being ſeene. Neuertheleſſe they were diſcouered by two women doing ſacrifice for the ſafety of their army: and therupon were all in great hazard of caſting away, had not Craſſus bene, who came in time to their aide, and gaue the enemies the cruelleſt battell that euer they fought in all that warre. For there were ſlaine of the ſlaues at that battel, twelue thowſand and three hundred, of which, two only were found hurt in the backes, and all the reſt ſlaine in the place of their ranckes, valliantly fighting where they were ſet in battell ray. Spartacus after this ouerthrowe, drew towardes the mountaines of Petelie, whither Quintus

A one of Craſſus Lieutenauntes, and Seroſa his treaſorer followed him, ſtill skirmiſhing with his rereward all the way: yet in fine, Spartacus turned ſodainly apon them, made the ROMANES flie that ſtill harried his men in that ſorte, and hurt Seroſa Craſſus treaſorer, ſo ſore that he hardly eſcaped with life. But the vantage they had of the ROMANES by this ouerthrow, fell out in the ende to the vtter deſtruction of Spartacus. For his men thereby, being the moſt of them fugitiue bondmen, grew to ſuch a ſtowtenes and pride of them ſelues, that they would no more flie from fight, neither yet would they any lenger obey their leaders and Captaines: but by the way as they went, they compaſſed them in with their weapons, and tolde them, that they ſhould go backe againe with them whether they would or not, and be brought through LVCANIA againſt the ROMANES. All this made for Craſſus as he wiſhed, for he had receiued

B newes that Pompey was comming, and that diuers were ſuters for him at ROME to be ſent in this iorney, ſaying, that the laſt victory of this warre was due to him, and that he would diſpatche it at a battell, as ſoone as he came thither. Craſſus therefore ſeeking occaſion to fight, lodged as neere the enemie as he could, and made his men one day caſt a trenche, which the bondmen ſeeking to preuent, came with great fury, and ſet apon them that wrought. Wherupon fell out a hotte skirmiſhe, and ſtill ſupplies came on of either ſide: ſo that Spartacus in the ende perceiuing he was forced vnto it, put his whole power in battell ray. And when he had ſet them in order, & that they brought him his horſe he was wont to fight on: he drew out his ſword, and before them all ſlue the horſe dead in the place, ſaying: if it be my fortune to winne the field, I know I ſhall haue horſe enow to ſerue my turne: and if I chaunſe to be ouer-

After that, he flew in among the ROMANES, thinking to attaine to fight with Craſſus, but he could not come neere him: yet he ſlue with his owne handes two ROMANE Centurions that reſiſted him. In the end, all his men he had about him, forſooke him and fled, ſo as Spartacus was left alone among his enemies: who valliantly fighting for his life, was cut in peeces. Now though Craſſus fortune was very good in this warre, and that he had ſhewed him ſelfe a noble and valliant Captaine, venturing his perſone in any daunger, yet he could not keepe Pompey from the honor of ending this warre: for the ſlaues that ſcaped from this laſt battell where Spartacus was ſlaine, fell into Pompeyes handes; who made an end of all thoſe rebellious raſcalls. Pompey hereupon wrote to the Senate, that Craſſus had ouercomen the ſlaues in battell, but that he him ſelfe had pulled vp that warre euen by

D the very rootes. After this Pompey made his entrie into ROME, and triumphed for his victorie of Sertorius, and the conqueſt of SPAYNE. Craſſus alſo ſued not for the great triumphe, neither thought he the ſmall Ouation triumphe a foote, which they graunted him, any honor vnto him, for ouercomming a few fugitiue bondmen. But for this ſmall triumphe, whereby it was called Ouatio, how much it differeth from the great triumphe: ſee Marcellus life, where we haue at large diſcourſed thereof. Now Pompey being called to be Conſull: Craſſus, though he ſtoode in good hope to be choſen Conſull with him, did yet notwithſtanding pray his frendſhippe and furtherance. Pompey was very willing to helpe him, and was euer deſirous to make Craſſus beholding to him: whereupon he delt frendly for him, and ſpake openly in thaſſembly of the city, that he would no leſſe thanke the people to appoint Craſſus his companion & fel-

But notwithſtandinge they were both Conſulls together in office, their frendſhip held not, but were euer at iarre, & the one againſt the other. So by meanes of their diſagreement, they paſſed all the time of their Conſulſhippe, without any memorable act done: ſauing that Craſſus made a great ſacrifice to Hercules, and kept an open feaſt for the people of ROME of a thowſande tables, and gaue to euery citizen corne to finde him three monethes. But in the ende of their Conſulſhip, at a common counſell holden, there was a knight of ROME called Onatius Aurelius: (a man not greatly knowen, for that he had no dealinges in the ſtate, and kept moſt in the contry) who getinge vp to the pulpit for orations, told the people what a viſion he had ſeene in his dreame. Iupiter, ſaid he, appearing to me this night, willed me to tell you openly, that ye ſhould not put Craſſus & them alowde: my Lordes of Rome, I do nothing vnworthy of my selfe, to seeke Pompeis frendship and fauor first, since you your selues haue called him the great, before he had any heare vpon his face, & that ye gaue him the honor of triumphe, before he was Senatour. And this is all that Crassus did of any accompt in his Consulship. When he was Censor also, he passed it ouer without any acte done. For he reformed not the Senate, mustered not the men of warre, nor tooke any view or estimate of the peoples goodes: although Lucratius Catulus was his colleague and fellowe Censor, as gentle a persone as any of that time that liued in Rome. Now Crassus at the first entry into his office of Censor, going about a cruell and violent act, to bring Egypt to pay tribute to the Romanes, Catulus did stowtly withstand him: wherby dissention falling out betwene them, they both did willingly resigne their office. In that great conspiracie of Catiline, which in manner ouerthrewe the whole state and common wealth of Rome, Crassus was had in some iealousie and mistrust: bicause there was one of the confederats that named him for one of them, howbeit they gaue no credit vnto him. Yet Cicero in an oration of his, doth plainly accuse Crassus & Cæsar, as confederats with Catiline: howbeit this oration came not forth till they were both dead. And in the oration he made also, when his office and authority of Consul ceased, he sayd: that Crassus came one night to him, & shewed him a letter touching Catiline, certainly confirming the conspiracy then in examination. For which cause Crassus euer after hated him: and that he did not openly reuenge it, the let was by meane of his sonne. For Publius Crassus much fauoring eloquence, and beinge geuen to his booke, bare great good will vnto Cicero: in such sorte, that apon his banishment he put on chaunged garmentes as Cicero did, and procured many other youthes to do the like also, and in fine, perswaded his father to become his frend. Cæsar now returning to Rome from the prouince he had in gouernment, intended to sue for the Consulshippe: and perceiuing that Pompey & Crassus were againe at a iarre, thought thus with him selfe, that to make the one of them his frend to further his sute, he should but procure thother his enemy: and minding therfore to attaine his desire with the fauor of them both, sought first the meanes to make the frendes, & perswaded with them, that by their controuersie thone seeking thothers vndoing, they did thereby but make Cicero, Catulus, and Cato, of the greater authority, who of them selues were of no power, if they two ioyned in frendshippe together: for making both their frendes and factions one, they might rule the state and common wealth euen as they would. Cæsar hauing by his perswasion reconciled Crassus and Pompey, ioyning their three powers in one, made them selues vnuincible, which afterwardes turned to the destruction of the people and Senate of Rome. For he made them not only greater than they were before, the one by the others meanes: but him selfe also of great power through them. For when they beganne to fauor Cæsar, he was straight chosen Consull without any deniall: and so behaued him selfe in the Consulship, that at the length they gaue him charge of great armies, and then sent him to gouerne the Gavles: which was, as a man may say, euen them selues to put him into the castell that should kepe all the citie in subiection: imagining that they two should make spoyle and good booty of the rest, sithence they had procured him such a gouernment. Now for Pompey, the cause that made him commit this error was nothing els, but his extreame ambition. But as for Crassus, besides his old vice of couetousnes rooted in him, he added to that a newe aurice and desire of triumphes and victories, which Cæsars fame for prowes and noble actes in warres did throughly kindell in him, that he being otherwise his better in all thinges, might not yet in that be his inferior: which furie tooke such holde as it neuer left him, till it brought him vnto an infamous end, and the common wealth to great misery. Thus Cæsar being come out of his prouince of Gavle vnto Lvca, diuers Romanes went thither to see him, and among other, Pompey and Crassus. They hauing talked with him in secret, agreed among them to deuise to haue the whole power of Rome in their handes: so that Cæsar should kepe his armie together, and Crassus and Pompey should take other prouinces and armies to them. Now to attaine to this, they had no way but one: that Pompey and Crassus should againe sue the second time to be Consulls, and that Cæsars frendes at Rome should stand with them for it, sending also a sufficient number of his souldiers to be there at the day of choosing the Consulls. Thereupon Pompey and Crassus returned to Rome to that ende, but not without suspicion of their

A their practise: for there ranne a rumor in the citie, that their meeting of Cæsar in Lvca, was for no good intent. Whereupon, Marcellinus and Domitius asked Pompey in open Senate, if he ment to make sute to be Consull. Pompey aunswered them: peraduenture he did, peraduenture he did not. They asking him againe the same question: he aunswered, he would sue for the good men, not for the euill. Pompeyes answers were thought very prowde & hawty. Howbeit Crassus aunswered more modestly, that if he saw it necessary for the common wealth, he would sue to be Consull: if not, that he would not stand for it. Vpon these words, some were so bold to make sute for the Consulshippe, as Domitius among other. But afterwardes Pompey and Crassus standing openly for it, all the rest left of their sute for feare of them, Domitius only excepted: whom Cato so prayed and intreated, as his kinseman and frend, that he made

B him to seeke it. For he perswaded him, that it was to fight for the defense of their libertie, and how that it was not the Consulshippe Crassus and Pompey looked after, but that they went about to bring in a tyranny: & that they sued not for the office, but to get such prouinces and armies into their handes as they desired, vnder colour and countenaunce of the Consulship. Cato ringing these words into their eares, & beleuing it certainly to be true as he sayd, brought Domitius as it were by force into the market place, where many honest men ioyned with them bicause they wondred what the matter ment that these two noble men should sue the second time to be Consulls, and why they made sute to be ioyned together, and not to haue any other with them, considering there were so many other worthy men, meete to be companion with either of them both in that office. Pompey fearing he should be preuented of his purpose, Pompey made him selfe and Crassus Consulls by force.

C fell to commit great outrage and violence. As amongest other, when the day came to choose the Consulls, Domitius going earely in the morning before day, accõpanied with his frends to the place where the electiõ should be: his man that caried the torch before him was slaine, by some whom Pompey had layed in waite, & many of his companie hurt, and among others, Cato. And hauing thus dispersed them, he beset a house rounde about whether they fled for succour, and inclosed them there, vntill they were both chosen Consulls together. Shortly after they came with force to the pulpit for orations, and draue Cato out of the market place, & slue some of them that resisted & would not flye. They also then prolonged Cæsars gouernment of the Gavles for fiue yeres more, and procured for them selues by decree of the people, the contries of Syria and Spayne. Againe, when they drew lottes together, Syria fell

Pompey and Crassus Consulls the second time.

D to Crassus, and Spayne to Pompey. Euery man was glad of their fortune. For the people on the one side were loth Pompey should goe farre from Rome: & him selfe also louing his wife well, was glad he had occasion to be so neere her, that he might remaine the most of his time at Rome. But Crassus of all other reioyced most at his happe, that he should goe into Syria: and it appeared plainely that he thought it was the happiest turne that euer came to him, for he would euer be talking of the iorney, were he in neuer so great or straunge company. Furthermore, being among his frendes and familiars, he would geue out such fonde boastes of it, as no young man could haue made greater vauntes: which was cleane contrary to his yeres and nature, hauing liued all his life time as modestly, and with as small ostentacion as any man liuing. But then forgetting him selfe too much had such fond conceites in his heade, as he not Crassus had the gouernmens of Syria.

E only hoped after the conquest of Syria, and of the Parthians, but flattered him selfe that the world should see all that Lucullus had done against king Tigranes, and Pompey against king Mithridates, were but trifles (as a man would say) to that he intended. For he looked to conquier the Bactrians, the Indians, and the great Occean sea toward the East, though in the decree passed by the people there was no mention made of any warres against the Parthians. Nowe euery man sawe Crassus ambition and greedy desire of honor: insomuch as Cæsar selfe wrote vnto Crassus out of Gavle, commending his noble intent and forwardnes, and wished him to goe thorow therewith. But Atteius one of the Tribunes being bent against Crassus to withstand his departure: (hauing diuers other confederats with him to further his pur-

F pose, who much misliked that any man of a brauery and lustines should make warre with any nation or people that had no way offended the Romanes; but were their frends and confederates) Crassus fearing this conspiracy, prayed Pompey to assist and accompany him out of the city, bicause he was of great authority and much reuerenced of the people, as it appeared then.

For, though multitudes of people were gathered together of purpose to let Crassus of his de- A parture, and to crie out apon him: yet when they saw Pompey goe before him, with a pleasant smyling countenaunce, they quieted them selues, and made a lane for them, suffering them to passe on, and sayd nothing. This notwithstanding, Atteius the Tribune stepped before them, and commaunded Crassus he should not departe the city, with great protestations if he did the contrary. But perceiuing Crassus still held on his way notwithstanding, he commaunded then one of the officers to lay hold of him, & to arrest him: howbeit the other Tribunes would not suffer the officer to doe it. So the sergeaunt dismissed Crassus. Then Atteius running towards the gate of the city, got a chasingdish with coles, & set it in the middest of the streete. When Crassus came against it, he cast in certaine perfumes, and made sprinckelinges ouer it, pronouncing horrible curses, and calling apon terrible and straunge names of goddes. The Ro- B MANES say that those manner of curses are very auncient, but yet very secret, and of so great force: as he that is once cursed with that curse can neuer escape it, nor he that vseth it doth neuer prosper after it. And therefore fewe men doe vse it, and neuer but apon vrgent occasion.
But then they much reproued Atteius, for vsing of these dreadfull ceremonies and extreame curses, which were much hurtefull to the common wealth, although he for his contries sake had thus cursed Crassus. Crassus setting forward notwithstandinge, sayled on, and arriued at BRVNDVSIVM, when winter stormes had not left the seas, and he had lost many of his shippes: howbeit he landed his army, and marched through the contry of GALATIA. There he found king Deiotarus, a very old man and yet building a new city: and to taunte him pretily, sayd vnto him. What, O king, beginne you to builde now in the afternone? To whom the king of C the GALATIANS againe smiling made aunswere. And truely Syr Captaine, you goe not very earely (me thinkes) to make warre with the PARTHIANS. For in deede Crassus was three score and vpward, and yet his face made him seeme elder then he was. But to our story againe. Cras- sus being comen into the contry, had as good lucke as he looked for: for he easily built a bridge apon the riuer of Euphrates, and passed his armie ouer it without any let or trouble. So en-tring into MESOPOTAMIA, receiued many cities, that of good will yeelded them selues vnto him. Howbeit there was one city called ZENODOTIA, whereof Appolonius was tyran, where Crassus lost a hundred of his men: thereupon he brought his whole armie thither, tooke it by force, sacked their goodes, and sold the prisoners by the drumme. The GREEKES called this citie ZENODOTIA, and for winning of the same Crassus suffered his men to call him Impera- D tor, to say, soueraigne Captaine: which turned to his shame and reproach, and made him to be thought of a base minde, as one that had small hope to attaine to great thinges, making such reconing of so small a trifle. Thus when he had bestowed seuen thowsand of his footemen in garrison, in those cities that had yeelded vnto him, and about a thowsand horsmen he returned backe to winter in SYRIA. Thither came his sonne Publius Crassus to him out of GAVLE from Iulius Cæsar, who had geuen him such honors, as Generalles of ROME did vse to geue to valliant souldiers for reward of their good seruice: and brought vnto his father a thowsand men of armes, all choise men. This me thinkes was the greatest fault Crassus committed in all his enterprise of that warre. For when he should presently haue gone on still, and entred into BABYLON and SELEVCIA, (cities that were euer enemies vnto the PARTHIANS) E he tracted time, & gaue them leasure to prepare to encounter his force when he should come against them. Againe they found great fault with him for spending of his time when he lay in SYRIA, seeming rather to leade a marchauntes life, than a chieftaines. For he neuer saw his army, nor trained them out to any marshall exercise, but fell to counting the reuenue of the cities, and was many dayes busily occupied weying of the gold and siluer in the temple of the goddesse Hierapolis. And worse then that: he sent to the people, princes, and cities about him, to furnishe him with a certaine number of men of warre, and then he would discharge them for a summe of money. All these things made him to be both ill spoken of, & despised of euery body. The first token of his ill lucke that happened to him, came from this goddesse Hierapolis, whom some suppose to be Venus, other say Iuno, and others, that she is the mother and chiefe F cause that giueth beginning of moisture to euery thing that commeth forth and hath a being, and taught men the original cause also of euery good thing. For as Crassus the father, & sonne both,

A both, were comming out of the temple: Craſſus the younger fell firſt on his face, and the father afterwardes apon his ſonne. Likewiſe as he was gatheringe his garriſons together, callinge them out of the cities into the fielde, there came Ambaſſadors vnto him from Arſaces, kinge of the PARTHIANS: who deliuered him their meſſage in fewe wordes, and tolde him, that if this army he brought came from the ROMANES to make warre with their maſter, then that he would haue no peace nor frendſhip with them, but would make mortall warres againſt them. Further, if it were (as he had heard ſay) that Craſſus againſt the peoples mindes of ROME, for his owne couetous deſire, and peculiar profit was come in a iolity to make warre with the PARTHIANS, and to inuade their contry: then in that reſpect Arſaces would deale more fauorably, in conſideration of Craſſus yeares, and was contented alſo to ſuffer his men to B departe with life and goods, whom he tooke rather to be in priſon, than in garriſon within his cities. Thereto Craſſus coragiouſly aunſwered, that he would make them aunſwere in the city of SELEVCIA. Therewith Vagiſes, one of the eldeſt Ambaſſadors fell a laughing, and ſhewing Craſſus the palme of his hand, told him thus: heare will ſooner grow in the palme of my hand, Craſſus, than you will come to SELEVCIA. In this ſorte the Ambaſſadors tooke their leaue of Craſſus, and returned to their kinge Hyrodes, tellinge him he was to prepare for warre. In the meane ſpace, certaine of Craſſus ſouldiers whom he had left in garriſon in the cities of MESOPOTAMIA, hauing ſcaped maruelous daungerouſly and with great difficulty: brought him newes of importance, hauing them ſelues ſeene the wonderfull great campe of the enemy & their maner of fight in the aſſaultes they made to the cities where they lay in garriſon. And, as C it falleth out commonly among men eſcaped from any daunger making thinges more fearefull and daungerous than they be in deede: they reported that it was vnpoſſible by flyinge to ſaue them ſelues, if they did followe in chaſe: neither to ouertake them alſo, if they fled. And further, that they had ſuch kinde of arrowes as would flie ſwifter, than a mans eye could diſcerne them, and would perce through any thing they hit, before a man could tell who ſhot them. Beſides, for the horſemens weapons they vſed, that they were ſuch, as no armor could poſſibly hold out: and their armors on thother ſide made of ſuch a temper and metall, as no force of any thing could pearce them thorow. The ROMANES hearing theſe newes, fell from their former ſtowtnes and corage, being borne in hande before, that the PARTHIANS differed nothing at all from the ARMENIANS and CAPPADOCIANS, whom Lucullus had ouercome D and ſpoyled ſo oft, that he was weary withall: and they had already made accompt, that their greateſt paynes in this warre, was but the tediouſnes of the iorney they had to make, and the trouble they ſhould haue to follow thoſe men that would not abide them. But then contrarie to expectation, they looked to come to ſtrokes, and to be luſtely fought withall. Hereupon, diuers Captaines and head officers that had charge in the army (among whom Caſſius the treſorer was one) aduiſed Craſſus to ſtay, and to deliberate in counſell to knowe whether he were beſt to goe on, or to remaine where he was. The ſoothſayers them ſelues did partely let Craſſus vnderſtand, that the goddes ſhewed no good tokens in all their ſacrifices, and were hardly to be pacified. But Craſſus gaue no eare to them, neither would heare any other that told him as much, but only liſtned to them that counſelled him to make haſt. Yet Craſſus chiefeſt com-E forte and incoragement, was of Artabazes, king of ARMENIA, who came to his campe with ſixe thowſand horſe, which were but only the kinges cornet and garde. Againe he promiſed him other tenne thowſand horſemen all armed and barbed, and thirty thowſande footemen which he kept continually in pay, and counſelled Craſſus to enter the PARTHIANS contrie vpon ARMENIAES ſide: bicauſe his campe ſhoulde not onely haue plenty of vittells, which he would ſend him out of his contry, but for that he ſhould alſo march in more ſafety, hauing a contrie full of mountaines and woddes before him very ill for horſemen, which was the only ſtrength and force of the PARTHIANS. Craſſus coldly thanked Artabazes for his good will, & all his noble offer of aide: yet told him he would take his iorney through MESOPOTAMIA, where he had left many good ſouldiers of the ROMANES. And thus departed the king of AR-F MENIA from him. But now as Craſſus was paſſing his army apon the bridge he had made ouer the riuer of Euphrates, there fel out ſodaine ſtraunge & terrible crackes of thūder, with fearefull flaſhes of lightning full in the ſouldiers faces: moreouer, out of a great blacke clowde came a wonderfull ſtorme and tempeſt of winde apon the bridge, that the maruelous force thereof ouerthrewe a great parte of the bridge, and caried it quite away. Beſides all this, the place where he appointed to lodge, was twiſe ſtriken with two great thunder clappes. One of his great horſe in like caſe, being brauely furniſhed and ſet out, tooke the bit in his teeth, and lept into the riuer with his ryder on his backe, who were both drowned; and neuer ſeene after. They ſay alſo, that the firſt Eagle & enſigne that was to be taken vp when they marched, turned backe of it ſelfe, without any handes layed vppon it. Further it fortuned that as they were diſtributing the vittells vnto the ſouldiers, after they had all paſſed ouer the bridge, the firſt thing that was geuen them, was ſalte, and water lintels, which the ROMANES take for a token of death and mourning, bicauſe they vſe it at the funeralles of the deade. After all this, when Craſſus was exhorting his ſouldiers, a worde ſcaped his mouth that troubled the armie maruelouſly. For he told them that he had broken the bridge which he had made ouer the riuer of Euphrates, of purpoſe, bicauſe there ſhould not a man of them returne backe againe. Where in deede when he had ſeene that they tooke this word in ill parte, he ſhould haue called it in againe, or haue declared his meaning, ſeeing his men ſo amazed thereat: but he made light of it, he was ſo wilfull. In the ende he made ordinarie ſacrifice for the purging of his army: and when the Soothſayer gaue him the intrells of the beaſt that was ſacrificed, they fell out of his handes. Craſſus perceiuing that the ſtanders by were troubled withall, fell a laughing, and told them, you ſee what age is: yet ſhall you not ſee my ſword fall out of my hande. So hauing ended his ſacrifice, he beganne to marche forwarde into the contrie by the riuers ſide, with ſeuen legions of footemen, and litle lacke of foure thowſand horſe, and in maner as many ſhot and ſlinges lightly armed. There returned to him certaine of his ſkoutes that had viewed the contry, and told him there was not an enemy to be ſeene in the field: howbeit that they had founde the tracke of a maruelous number of horſe, which ſeemed as they were returned backe. Then Craſſus firſt of all beganne to hope well: and his ſouldiers alſo, they fell to deſpiſe the PARTHIANS, thinking certainly that they would not come to battell with them. Yet Caſſius his treaſorer euer perſwaded him the contrary, and thought it better for him to refreſh his army a litle in one of the cities where he had his garriſon, vntil ſuch time as he heard more certaine newes of the enemies: or elſe that he would march directly towards SELEVCIA by the riuers ſide, which lay fit for him to vittell him ſelfe eaſily by botes that would alwayes follow his campe, & ſhould be ſure beſides that the enemies could not enuiron him behinde, ſo that hauing no way to ſet apon thē but before, they ſhould haue none aduantage of them. Craſſus going about then to conſult of the matter, there came one Ariamnes vnto him, a Captaine of the ARABIANS, a fine ſubtill fellow, which was the greateſt miſchiefe and euill, that fortune could ſend to Craſſus at that preſent time, to bring him to vtter ruine and deſtruction. For there were ſome of Craſſus ſouldiers that had ſerued Pompey before in that contrie, who knew him very well, and remembred that Pompey had done him great pleaſures: whereupon they thought that he bare great good will to the ROMANES. But Ariamnes had bene labored at that time by the king of PARTHIANS Captaines, & was wonne by them te deceiue Craſſus, and to intiſe him all he could, to drawe him from the riuer and the woddy contry, & to bring him into the plaine fielde, where they might compaſſe him in with their horſemen: for they ment nothing leſſe than to fight with the ROMANES at the ſwordes poynte. This barbarous Captaine Ariamnes comming to Craſſus, did highly praiſe and commend Pompey, as his good Lord and benefactor (for he was an excellent ſpoken man) and extolled Craſſus army, reprouing him that he came ſo ſlowly forward, tracting time in that ſorte as he did, preparing him ſelfe as though he had neede of armor and weapon, and not of feete and handes ſwift & readie againſt thenemies: who (for the chiefeſt of them) had of long time occupied them ſelues to flie with their beſt moueables, towardes the deſertes of SCYTHIA & HYRCANIA. Therfore if you determine (ſayd he) to fight, it were good you made haſt to meete them, before the king haue gathered all his power together. For nowe you haue but Surena and Sillaces, two of his Lieutenauntes againſt you, whom he hath ſent before to ſtay you that you followe him not: and for the king him ſelfe, be bold, he meaneth not to trouble you. But he lyed in all. For king Hyrodes had deuided his army in two partes at the firſt, whereof him ſelfe tooke the one, and went

went to spoyle the realme of ARMENIA, to be reuenged of king Artabazes: and with the other he sent Surena against the ROMANES, not for any contempt he had of Crassus (for it was not likely he would disdaine to come to battel with him, being one of the chiefest noble men of ROME, and to thinke it more honorable to make warre with king Artabazes in ARMENIA) but I thinke rather he did it of purpose to auoyde the greater daunger, and to keepe farre of, that he might with safetie see what would happen, and therefore sent Surena before to hasard battell, and to turne the ROMANES backe againe. For Surena was no meane man, but the second person of PARTHIA next vnto the king: in riches, reputacion, valure, and experience in warres, the chiefest of his time among all the PARTHIANS, and for execution, no man like him. Surena, when he did but remoue into the contry only with his household, had a thowsand camels to cary his sumpters, and two hundred coches of Curtisans, a thowsand men of armes armed at all peeces, and as many moe besides lightly armed: so that his whole traine & court made aboue ten thowsand horse. Further, by the tenure of that land he had by succession from his ancesters, his office was at the first proclaiming of any king, to put the roial crowne or diademe apon the kinges head. Moreouer, he had restored king Hyrodes that then reigned, to his crowne, who had bene before driuen out of his realme: and had wonne him also the great city of SELEVCIA, him selfe being the first man that scaled the walls, and ouerthrew them with his owne handes that resisted him. And though he was vnder thirtie yeares of age, yet they counted him a wise man, as well for his counsell, as his experience, which were the meanes whereby he ouercame Crassus. Who through his rashnes and folly at the first, and afterwards for very feare and timerousnes, which his misfortune had brought him vnto, was easie to be taken and intrapped, by any policy or deceit. Now this barbarous Captaine Ariamnes hauing then brought Crassus to beleue all that he sayd, and drawen him by perswasion from the riuer of Euphrates, vnto a goodly plaine contrie, meeting at the first with very good way, but after with very ill, bicause they entred into sandes where their feete soncke deepe, and into desert fields where was neither tree nor water, nor any end of them that they could deeme by eye, so that not only extreame thirst, and miserable way maruelously amazed the ROMANES, but the discomforte of the eye also, when they could see nothing to stay their sight vpon: that, aboue all the rest, wrought their extreame trouble. For, neither farre nor nere any sight of tree, riuer, brooke, mountaine, grasse, or greene herbe appeared within their view, but in troth an endlesse sea of desert sandes on euerie side, rounde about their campe. Then beganne they to suspect that they were betraied. Againe, when newes came that Artabazes king of ARMENIA, was kept in his contrie with a great warre king Hyrodes made apon him, which kept him that he could not according to his promise come to aide him, yet that he wished him to draw towardes ARMENIA, that both their armies being ioyned together they might the better fight with king Hyrodes, if not, that he would alwayes keepe the woddy contrie, marching in those vallies and places where his horsemen might be safe, and about the mountaines: Crassus was so wilfull, as he would wryte no aunswere to it, but angrily told the messenger, that he had no leasure then to harken to the ARMENIANS, but that afterwardes he would be reuenged well enough of Artabazes treason. Cassius his treasorer was much offended with Crassus for this answere: howbeit perceiuing he could doe no good with him, and that he tooke euery thing in euill parte, he sayd vnto him, he would tell him no more. Notwithstanding, taking Ariamnes this Captaine of the ARABIANS a side, he rebuked him roundly, and sayd: O thou wretche, what cursed deuill hath brought thee to vs, and how cunningly hast thou bewitched & charmed Crassus: that thou hast made him bring his army into this endlesse desert, and to trace this way fitter for an ARABIAN Captaine of theeues, than for a Generall and Consull of the ROMANES? Ariamnes being crafty & subtill, speaking gently vnto Cassius, did comforte him, and prayed him to haue pacience, and going and comming by the bandes, seeming to helpe the souldiers, he tolde them merily: O my fellowes, I beleue you thinke to marche through the contry of Naples, and looke to meete with your pleasaunt springes, goodly groues of wodde, your naturall bathes, and the good innes round about to refreshe you, and doe not remember that you passe through the desertes of ARABIA and ASSYRIA. And thus did this barbarous Captaine entertaine the ROMANES a while: but afterwardes he dislodged betimes, before he was openly knowen for a traitor, and yet not without Crassus priuity, whom he bare in hande A that he would goe set some broyle and tumult in the enemies campe. It is reported that Crassus the very same day came out of his tent not in his coate armor, of scarlet, (as the maner was of the ROMANE Generalls) but in a blacke coate: howbeit, remembring him selfe, he straight chaunged it againe. It is sayd moreouer, that the ensigne bearers when they should march away, had much a doe to plucke their ensignes out of the ground, they stucke so fast. But Crassus scoffing at the matter, hastened them the more to marche forward, compelling the footemen to goe as fast as the horsemen, till a fewe of their skowtes came in, whom they had sent to discouer: who brought newes howe the enemies had slaine their fellowes, and what a doe they had them selues to scape with life, and that they were a maruelous great army, & well appointed to geue them battell. This newes made all the campe afrayed, but Crassus selfe more B than the rest, so as he beganne to set his men in battell ray, being for hast in maner besides him selfe. At the first following Cassius minde, he set his ranckes wide, casting his souldiers into a square battell, a good way a sonder one from an other, bicause he would take in as much of the plaine as he coulde, to keepe the enemies from compassinge them in, and so deuided the horsemen into the winges. Yet afterwardes he chaunged his minde againe, and straited the battell of his footemen, facioning it like a bricke, more long than broade, making a front, and shewing their faces euery way. For there were twelue cohorts or ensignes imbattelled on either side, & by euery cohorte a company of horse, bicause there should be no place left without aide of horsemen, and that all his battell should be a like defended. Then he gaue Cassius the leading of one wing, his sonne Publius Crassus the other, and him selfe led the battel in the C middest. In this order they marched forward, till they came to a litle brooke called Balissus, where there was no great store of water, but yet happely lighted on for the souldiers, for the great thirst and extreame heate they had abidden all that painefull way, where they had met with no water before. There the most parte of Crassus Captaines thought best to campe all night, that they might in the meane time finde meanes to knowe their enemies what number they were, and how they were armed, that they might fight with them in the morning. But Crassus yeelding to his sonnes and his horsemens perswasion, who intreated him to march on with his army, and to set apon the enemy presently: commaunded, that such as would eate, should eate standing, keeping their ranckes. Yet on the sodaine, before this commaundement could runne through the whole army, he commaunded them againe to march, not fayer and D softly as when they go to geue battell, but with speede, till they spied the enemies, who seemed not to the ROMANES at the first to be so great a number, neither so brauelie armed as they thought they had bene. For, concerning their great number, Surena had of purpose hid them, with certaine troupes he sent before: and to hyde their bright armors, he had cast clokes and beastes skinnes apon them. But when both the armies approached neere thone to thother, & that the signe to geue charge was lift vp in the ayer: first they filled the fielde with a dreadfull noyse to heare. For the PARTHIANS doe not encorage their men to fight with the sounde of a horne, neither with trompets nor howboyes, but with great kettle drommes hollow within, & about them they hang litle bells & copper rings, and with them they all make a noise euery where together, and it is like a dead sounde, mingled as it were with the braying or bellowing E of a wild beast, & a fearefull noyse as if it thundered, knowing that hearing is one of the senses that sooneste moueth the harte & spirite of any man, & maketh him sooneste besides him selfe. The ROMANES being put in feare with this dead sounde, the PARTHIANS straight threw the clothes & couerings from them that hid their armor, & then shewed their bright helmets and curaces of Margian tempered steele, that glared like fire, & their horses barbed with steele and copper. And Surena also, General of the PARTHIANS, who was as goodly a personage, and as valliant, as any other in all his host, though his beawtie somewhat effeminate, in iudgement shewed small likelyhoode of any such corage: for he painted his face, and ware his heare after the facion of the MEDES, contrary to the maner of the PARTHIANS, who let their heare grow after the facion of the TARTARES, without combing or tricking of them, to appeare more ter- F rible to their enemies. The PARTHIANS at the first thought to haue set apon the ROMANES with their pykes, to see if they could breake their first ranckes. But when they drew neere, and

The person of Surena, Generall of the Parthians described.

A saw the depth of the ROMANES battell standing close together, surely keping their ranckes: then they gaue backe, making as though they fled, & dispersed them selues. But the ROMANES marueled when they found it contrary, & that it was but a deuise to enuiron one them on euery side. Whereupon Crassus commaunded his shot and light armed men to assaile them, which they did: but they went not farre, they were so beaten in with arrowes, and driuen backe vnto their force of the armed men. And this was the first beginning that both feared and troubled the ROMANES, when they saw the vehemency and great force of the enemies shotte, which brake their armors, and ranne thorowe any thing they hit, were it neuer so hard or stiff. The PARTHIANES thus still drawing backe, shotte all together on euery side, not a fote before, but a fote behinde: for the battell of the ROMANES stoode so neere together, as if they would, they could not misse the killing of some. These bowmen drew a great strength, & had bigge strong bowes, which sent the arrowes from them with a wonderful force. The ROMANES by meanes of these bowes were in hard state. For if they kept their ranckes, they were grieuously wounded: againe if they left them, and fought to run apon the PARTHIANES to fight at hande with them, they saw they could do them but litle hurt, and yet were very likely to take the greater harme them selues. For as fast as the ROMANES came apon them, so fast did the PARTHIANES flie from them, and yet in flying continued still their shooting: which no nation but the SCYTHIANS could better doe than they, being a matter in deede most greatly to their aduantage. For by their flight they best doe saue them selues, and fighting still, they thereby shunne the shame of that their flying. The ROMANES still defended them selues, and held it out, so long as they B had any hope that the PARTHIANES would leaue fighting, when they had spent their arrowes, or would ioyne battell with them. But after they vnderstoode that there were a great number of camels loden with quiuers full of arrowes, where the first that had bestowed their arrowes fetched about to take new quiuers: then Crassus seeing no end of their shotte, began to faint, and sent to Publius his sonne, willing him in any case to charge apon the enemies, and to geue an onset, before they were compassed in on euery side. For it was on Publius side, that one of the winges of the enemies battell was neerest vnto them, and where they rode vp and downe so compasse them behinde. Whereupon Crassus sonne taking thirteene hundred horsemen with him (of the which, a thowsand were of the men of armes whom Iulius Cæsar sent) and fiue hundred shot, with eight ensignes of footemen hauing targets, most neere to the place where C him selfe then was: he put them out in bredth, that wheling about they might geue a charge apon them that rode vp & downe. But they seeing him comming, turned straight their horse and fled, either bicause they meant a marrisse, or else of purpose to beguile this young Crassus, intising him thereby as farre from his father as they could. Publius Crassus seeing them flye, cried out, these men will not abide vs, and so spurred on for life after them: so did Censorinus and Megabacchus with him (the one a Senatour of ROME a very eloquent man, the other a stowte coragious valliant man of warre) both of them Crassus well approued frendes, and in maner of his owne yeares. Now the horsemen of the ROMANES being trained out thus to the chase, their footemen also would not abide behinde, nor shew them selues to haue lesse hope, ioy, and corage, then their horsemen had. For they thought all had bene won, and that there D was no more to do, but to follow the chase till they were gone farre from the army, and then they found the deceit. For the horsemen that fled before them, sodainly turned againe, and a number of others besides came and set vpon them. Whereupon they stayed, thinking that the enemies perceiuing they were so few, would come and fight with them hande to hande. Howbeit they set out against them their men at armes with their barbed horse, & made their light horsemen wheele rounde about them, keeping non order at all: who galloping vp and downe the plaine, whurled vp the sand hilles from the bottome with their horse feete, which raised such a wonderfull dust, that the ROMANES could scarce see or speake one to another. For they being shut vp into a litle roome, and standing close one to an other, were sore wounded with the PARTHIANES arrowes, and died of a cruell lingring death, crying out for anguish E and paine they felt: and turning and tormenting them selues apon the sande, they brake the arrowes sticking in them. Againe, striuing by force to plucke out the forked arrowheades, that had pearced farre into their bodies through their vaines & sinewes: thereby they opened their woundes wider, and so cast them selues away. Many of them dyed thus miserably tyred: and such as dyed not, were not able to defend them selues. Then when Publius Crassus prayed and besought them to charge the men at armes with their barbed horse, they shewed him their handes fast nailed to their targets with arrowes, & their feete likewise shot through and nailed to the ground: so as they could neither flie, nor yet defende them selues. Then upon him selfe incouraging his horsemen, went and gaue a charge, and did valiantly set vppon the enemies, but it was with too great disaduantage, both for offence, and also for defence. For him selfe and his men with weake & light staues, brake apon them that were armed with corrades of steele, or stiffe leather iackes. And the PARTHIANS in contrary manner with mighty strong pykes gaue charge apon these GAVLES, which were either vnarmed, or else but lightly armed. Yet those were they in whom Crassus most trusted, hauing done wonderfull feates of warre with them. For they receiued the PARTHIANS pykes in their handes, & tooke them about the middells, and threw them of their horse, where they lay on the ground, and could not sturre for the weight of their harnesse: and there were diuers of them also that lighting from their horse, lay vnder their enemies horse bellies, & thrust their swordes into them. Their horse flinging & bounding in the ayer for very paine threw their maisters vnder feete, & their enemies one apon an other, & in the end fell dead among them. Moreouer, extreame heate and thirst did marueilously comber the GAVLES, who were vsed to abide neither of both: and the most parte of their horse were slaine, charging with all their power apon the men at armes of the PARTHIANS, and so ranne them selues in apon the pointes of their pikes. At the length they were driuen to retyre towardes their footemen, & Publius Crassus among them, who was very ill by reason of the woundes he had receiued. And seeing a sand hill by chaunce not farre from them, they went thither, & setting their horse in the middest of it, compassed it in round with their targets, thinking by this meanes to couer and defende them selues the better from the barbarous people: howbeit they founde it contrary. For the contry being plaine, they in the formest rankes did somewhat couer them behinde, but they that were behinde, standing hier than they that stoode formest (by reason of the nature of the hill that was hiest in the middest) could by no meanes saue them selues, but were all hurt alike, as well the one as the other, bewailing their owne miserie and misfortune, that must needes dye without reuenge, or declaration of their valliancy. At that present time there were two GRÆCIANS about Publius Crassus, Hieronymus, and Nicomachus, who dwelt in those quarters, in the city of CARRES they both counselled P. Crassus to steale away with them, and to flie to a city called ISCHNE, that was not farre from thence, and tooke the ROMANES parte. But P. answered them, that there was no death so cruell as could make him forsake them, that dyed for his sake. When he had so sayd, wishing them to saue them selues, he embraced them, & tooke his leaue of them and being very sore hurt with the shot of an arrow through one of his handes, commaunded one of his gentlemen to thrust him through with a sword, & so turned his side to him for the purpose. It is reported Censorinus did the like. But Megabacchus slue him selfe with his owne handes, and so did the most parte of the gentlemen that were of that company. And for those that were left aliue, the PARTHIANS got vp the sand hill, and fighting with them, thrust them through with their speares and pykes, and tooke but fiue hundred prisoners. After that, they strake of Publius Crassus head, & therupon returned straight to set apon his father Crassus, who was then in this state. Crassus the father, after he had willed his sonne to charge the enemies, and that one brought him word he had broken them, & pursued the chase: & perceiuing also that they that remained in their great battell, did not preasse apon him so neere as they did before, bicause that a great number of them were gone after the other for rescue: he then began to be liuely againe, and keeping his men close, retyred with them the best he could by a hills side, looking euer that his sonne would not be long before that he returned from the chase. But Publius seeing him selfe in daunger, had sent diuers messengers to his father, to aduertise him of his distresse, whom the PARTHIANS intercepted and slue by the way: and the last messengers he sent, scaping very hardly, brought Crassus newes, that his sonne was but cast away, if he did not presently aide him, and that with a great power. These newes were grieuous to Crassus in two respectes: first for the feare he had, seeing him selfe in daunger to lose all: and

A secondly for the vehement desire he had to goe to his sonnes helpe. Thus he saw in reason all would come to nought, and in fine determined to goe with all his power, to the reskue of his sonne. But in the meane time the enemies were returned from his sonnes ouerthrow, with a more dredfull noyse and crie of victorie, than euer before: and thereupon their deadly sounding drommes filled the ayer with their wonderful noise. The ROMANES then looked straight for a hot allarme. But the PARTHIANS that brought Publius Crassus head apon the point of a launce, comming neere to the ROMANES, shewed them his head, and asked them in derision, if they knew what house he was of, and who were his parentes: for it is not likely (sayd they) that so noble and valliant a young man, should be the sonne of so cowardly a father, as Crassus. The sight of Publius Crassus head killed the ROMANES hartes more, than any other daunger B they had bene in at any time in all the battell. For it did not set their hartes a fire as it should haue done, with anger, and desire of reuenge: but farre otherwise, made them quake for feare, & strooke them starcke dead to behold it. Yet Crassus selfe shewed greater corage in this misfortune, than he before had done in all the warre beside. For riding by euery band he cried out alowde. The griefe and sorrow of this losse (my fellowes) is no mans but mine, mine only: but the noble succesſe and honor of ROME remaineth stil vnuincible, so long as you are yet liuing. Nowe, if you pitie my losse of so noble and valliant a sonne, my good souldiers, let me intreate you to turne your sorrow into fury: make them deerely buy the ioy, they haue gotten: be reuenged of their cruelty, and let not my misfortune feare you. For why, aspiring mindes sometime must needes susteine losse. Lucullus ouercame not Tigranes, nor Scipio Antiochus, C but their blood did pay for it. Our aunceſters in olde time lost a thowsande shippes, yea in ITALIE diuers armies and chieftaines for the conquest of SICILIA: yet for all the losse of them, at the length they were victorious ouer them, by whom they were before vanquished. For the Empire of ROME came not to that greatnes it now is at, by good fortune onely, but by patience and constant suffering of trouble and aduersitie, neuer yeeldinge or geuing place to any daunger. Crassus vsing these perswasions to encorage his souldiers for resolution, founde that all his wordes wrought none effect: but contrarily, after he had commaunded them to geue the showte of battell, he plainely sawe their hartes were done, for that their showte rose but faint, and not all alike. The PARTHIANS on the other side, their showte was great, and lustily they range it out. Now when they came to ioyne, the PARTHIANS archers a horseback D compassing in the ROMANES apon the winges, shot an infinite nũber of arrowes at their sides. But their men at armes geuing charge apon the front of the ROMANES battel with their great launces, compelled them to draw into a narrow rome, a few excepted, that valliantly, and in desperate maner ranne in among them, as men rather desiring so to dye, than to be slaine with their arrowes, where they could do the PARTHIANS almost no hurt at all. So were they sone dispatcht, with the great launces that ranne them through, head, wodde and all, with such a force, as oftentimes they ranne through two at once. Thus when they had fought the whole day, night drew on, and made them retyre, saying they would geue Crassus that nightes respit, to lament and bewaile his sonnes death: onlesse that otherwise he wisely looking about him, thought it better for his safety to come and offer him selfe to king Arsaces mercy, then to tary E to be brought vnto him by force. So the PARTHIANS camping hard by the ROMANES, were in very good hope to ouerthrow him the next morning. The ROMANES on the other side had a maruelous ill night, making no reckoning to bury their dead, nor to dresse their wounded men, that dyed in miserable [illegible]: but euery man bewayled his hard fortune, when they saw not one of them could escape, if they taried till the morning. On the other side, to departe in the night through that desert, their wounded men did grieue them much. Bicause, to carie them so away, they knew it would let their flight: and yet to leaue them so behinde, their pitiefull cries would geue the enemies knowledge of their departure. Nowe, though they all thought Crassus the only author of their misery, yet were they desirous to see his face, and to heare him speake. But Crassus went a side without light, and layed him downe with his head F couered, bicause he would see no man, shewing thereby the common sorte an example of vnstable fortune: and the wise men, a good learning to know the frutes of ill counsell, and vaine ambition, that had so much blinded him, as he could not be content to commaunde so many thowſandes of men, but thought (as a man would ſay) him ſelfe the meaneſt of all other, and one that poſſeſt nothing, becauſe he was accompted inferior vnto two perſones only, Pompey and Ceſar. Notwithſtanding, Octauius, one of his chieftaines, and Caſſius the treaſorer, made him riſe, and ſought to comforte him the beſt they could. But in the end, ſeeing him ſo ouercome with ſorrow, and out of hart, that he had no life nor ſpirit in him: they them ſelues called the Captaines and Centurions together, and ſate in counſell for their departure, and

But immediately after, they that were left hurt and ſicke, and could not follow, ſeeing the campe remoue, fell a crying out and tormenting them ſelues in ſuch ſorte, that they filled the whole campe with ſorrow, and put them out of all order, with the great mone and lowde lamentation: ſo as the formeſt ranke that firſt diſlodged, fell into a maruelous feare, thinking they had bene the enemies that had come and ſet apon them. Then turning oft, and ſetting them ſelues in battell raye, one while loding their beaſtes with the wounded men, an other while vnloding them againe, they were left behinde, ſauing three hundred horſemen that ſcaped, who came about midnight to the city of CARRES. Ignatius their Captaine called to the watche on the walles,

Who anſwering, he willed them to tell Coponius, Gouernor of the towne, that Craſſus had fought a great battell with the PARTHIANS, and ſayd no more, neither told what he was: but rode on ſtill, till he came to the bridge which Craſſus had made ouer Euphrates. Yet this word Ignatius gaue to the watch to tell Coponius, ſerued Craſſus turne very well. For Coponius thought by this great haſt of his, and the ſhorte confuſed ſpeeche he made, paſſing on his way, that he had no good newes to tell them: wherefore he ſtraight armed his ſouldiers, and vnderſtanding that Craſſus was returning backe, went to mete him, and brought him & his army into the city of CARRES. The PARTHIANS knew well enough of the remouing of the ROMANES campe, but yet would not follow them in the night, but the next morning entring into their campe where they lay, ſlue all that were left behinde, which were about foure thowſande men: and riding after them that were gone, tooke many ſtraglers in the plaine. Among them there was Bargunteius, one of Craſſus Lieutenauntes, who ſtrayed in the night out of the army with foure whole enſignes, and hauing loſt his way, gotte to a hill, where the PARTHIANS beſieged him, ſlue him & all his company, though he valiantly there

They wondering at their deſperation, opened of them ſelues, & ſuffered the to march on towards the city of CARRES. In the meane time falſe newes was brought to Surena, how Craſſus with all the chiefeſt men of his hoſt was ſlod, & that the great number that were receiued into the city of CARRES were men of all ſortes gathered together, and not a man of any quality or eſtimacion. Surena thereupon thinking he had loſt the honor of his victorie, yet ſtanding in

A ſtratageame of Surena. ſome doubt of it, bicauſe he would knowe the troth, that he might either beſiege the citie of CARRES, or purſue after Craſſus: ſent one of his interpreters to the walles of the city, charging him to call for Craſſus, or Caſſius, & to tell them that Surena would parle with them. The interpreter did as he was commaunded. Word was brought to Craſſus, and he accepted parlance. Shortly after alſo, thither came certaine ſouldiers of the ARABIANS from the campe of the PARTHIANS, who knew Craſſus and Caſſius very well by ſight, hauing diuers times ſeene them in their campe before the battell. Theſe ARABIANS ſeeing Caſſius apon the walles, told him, that Surena was contented to make peace with them, and to let them goe ſafely, as his maſters good frendes, ſo that they would ſurrender MESOPOTAMIA into the king of PARTHIANS handes, and how they thought that was the beſt way for both parties, rather than to be enforced vnto it by extremitie. Caſſius thought this a good offer, and told them, that they muſt appoint the day & place, where Craſſus and Surena ſhould mete to talke together of the matter. The ARABIANS made anſwere they would doe it: and ſo departed. Surena hearing this, was glad he had them at ſuch aduauntage, where he might beſiege them. The next day he brought all his armie before the city of CARRES. There the PARTHIANS maruelouſly terrified the ROMANES, and told them, they muſt deliuer them Craſſus and Caſſius bound handes and feete,

A sent, if they would haue any grace or peace with them. The ROMANES were maruelously offended that they were thus deceiued, and told Crassus, that it was no boote any longer to counsel him ought of the ARMENIANS, but presently to flie: howbeit to keepe it secret in any wise from any of the CARRENIANS, till the very houre of their departure. Yet Crassus selfe had told it to Andromachus, the veriest traitor and villen in all the city, whom he had chosen to be his guide. This traitor Andromachus aduertised the enemies in euery poinct, of their purpose and departure. But bicause the PARTHIANS do neuer vse to fight in the night, & that it was a hard matter to bring them to it, and againe that Crassus departed in the night time: Andromachus was afrayed least the ROMANES would winne such ground before the PARTHIANS, as they could not possibly ouertake him the next day. Therefore of purpose he sometime brought them one B way, other while an other way, and at the last, brought them into a great bogge or marish, full of deepe holes and ditches, and where they must needes make many turnes and returnes before they could get out againe, and yet very hardly. Whereupon, some in the armie began to mistrust, that Andromachus ment no good to turne and tosse them vp and downe in that sorte, and therefore would follow him no more: insomuch as Cassius among others, returned towardes the citie of CARRES againe, from whence they came. And when his guides (who were ARABIANS) counselled him to tary there, till the moone were out of the signe of Scorpio, he answered them: I feare the signe of Sagittarie more. So as soone as he could, he tooke his C way towardes ASSYRIA with fiue hundred horsemen. And other of the armie also hauing sundrie guides, recouered a contry of the mountaines, called Sinnaca, and retyred into a safe place before the breake of day: and they were about fiue hundred men, whom Octauius a noble man had in charge. But the day stale apon Crassus, hunting vp & downe yet in the marish, in those ill fauored places, into the which Andromachus that traitor had of purpose brought him, hauing with him some ensignes of footemen all with targets, & very few horsemen, and fiue lictors or sergeantes that caried the axes and roddes before him: with whome, with much a do & great labor, he got into the right way, when the enemies were almost apon him, and that he was within twelue furlong of ioyning with Octauius. There in hast he had gotten a hill, which was not so steepe for horsemen, neither of such strength as the other hilles were, called Sinnaces, yet vnder them, and ioyning vnto them by a long hill that runneth along fast by the plaine, so as Octauius plainly saw the danger Crassus was in. Therupon he first ran downe the hilles with a few of his men that followed him: but after also came all the rest, saying they were ouerrunne if they should tary behinde. At their comming they gaue such a hot onset apon the PARTHIANS, that they made them geue backe from that hill: and compassing Crassus in the middest of them, couering him rounde with their targets, they spake nobly, that neuer arrow of the PARTHIANS should touche the bodie of their Generall, before they were slaine one after an other, and that they had fought it out to the last man in his defence. Hereupon Surena perceiuing the PARTHIANS were not so corragious as they were wont to be, and that if night came apon them, and that the ROMANES did once recouer the hie mountaines, they could neuer possibly be met withall againe: he thought cunningly to beguile Crassus once more by this deuise. He let certaine prisoners goe out purpose, before whome he made his men geue out this speeche. That the king of PARTHIA would haue no warre with the ROMANES: but rather desired their friendshippe, by shewing them some notable benefite, as to vse Crassus very courteously. And to geue colour to this deuise, he called his men of warre to fight, and geing him selfe in person towardes Crassus, with the chiefe of the nobility of his kingdome, in goodly manner, his bow vnbent: he held out his right hand, and called Crassus vnto him with speeche of peace, and said vnto him. Though the ROMANES had first broken the leagues & peace of late betwixt vs, yet it was against his will, for he could do no lesse but defend him selfe, hauing iust cause so to do: but he was very willing and desirous to make them taste of his mercie & clemencie, and to graunt them leaue to make peace with them, and so let them goe safely where they would. All this Crassus and the rest of Crassus were glad of Surenaes wordes. But Crassus that had both old trouble & fresh cause of suspitions and iealousies, considering also no cause apparant to make them so fauourable vnto him, would not harken to it, but left confused with his friends. Howbeit the souldiers they tried out on him to geue, and fell at wordes with him, saying: that howsoeuer they were all slaine, and that him selfe had not the hart onely to come downe and talke with the enemies that were vnarmed. Crassus proued first to pacifie them by fayer meanes, perswading them to beare a litle pacience but till night, which was at hande, and then they might safely departe at their pleasure, and recouer the mountaines and straight passages, where their enemies could not follow them: and pointing them the way with his finger, he prayed them not to be faint harted, nor to dispaire of their safety, seeing they were so neere it. But in the end Crassus perceiuing they fell to mutiny, and beating of their harnes did threaten him if he went not, fearing then they would doe him some villany: went towardes the enemy, and comming backe a litle, sayd onely these wordes: O Octauius, and you Petronius, with all you ROMANE gentlemen that haue charge in this armie: you all see now how against my will I am enforced to go to the place I would not, & can witnes with me, how I am driuen with shame and force. Yet I pray you if your fortunes be to escape this daunger, that ye will report whersoeuer you come, that Crassus was slaine, not deliuered vp by his one souldiers into the handes of the barous people, as I am: but deceiued by the frawde & suttiltie of his enemies. Octauius would not tary behind on the hill, but went downe with Crassus: but Crassus sent away his officers that followed him. The first that came from the PARTHIANS vnto Crassus were two mongrel GRECIANS who dismounting from their horse saluted him, and prayed him to sende some of his men before, and Surena would shewe them, that both him selfe and his trayne came vnarmed towardes him. Crassus thereto made them aunswer, that if he had made any accompt of his life, he would not haue put him selfe into their handes. Notwithstanding he sent two brethren before, called the ROSCIANS, to knowe what number of men, and to what ende they met so many together. These two brethren came no sooner to Surena, but they were stayed: and him selfe in the meane time kept on his way a horse backe, with the noblest men of his army. Now when Surena came neere to Crassus: why, how now (quod he) what meaneth this? a Consull and Lieutenaunte generall of ROME a foote, and we a horse backe? Therewithall he straight commaunded one of his men to bring him a horse. Crassus aunswered Surena againe: In that, they neither of both offended, following the vse and maner of their contry, when any meeting is made for treatie of peace. Surena replied: As for the treatie of peace, that was already agreed apon betwene the king Hyrodes, and the ROMANES: howbeit that they were to goe to the riuer, and there to set downe the articles in wryting. For you ROMANES, sayd he, doe not greatly remember the capitulacions you haue agreed apon. With those wordes he gaue him his right hand. As Crassus was sending for a horse: you shall not neede, sayd Surena, for looke, the kinge doth present you this. And straight one was brought him with a steele saddle richly gilt, apon the which his gentlemen mounted Crassus immediatly, and following him behinde, lashed his horse to make him runne the swifter. Octauius seeing that, first layed hand on the bridle, then Petronius Colonell of a thowsand footemen: and after them, all the rest of the ROMANES also gathered about Crassus to stay the horse, and to take him from them by force, that pressed him on of either side. So they thrust one at an other at the first very angrily, and at the last fell to blowes. Then Octauius drew out his sword, and slue one of the barous noble mens horsekeepers: and an other came behinde him, and slue Octauius. Petronius had no target, and receiuing a blow on his curaces, lighted from his horse, and had no hurt: and on the other side came Pomaxathres, one of the PARTHIANS, and slue Crassus. Some say notwithstanding, that Pomaxathres slue him not, but an other, yet that he cut of his heade & his hand after he fell dead to the ground. But all these reportes are rather coniectures, then any certainty. For as for them that were there, some of them were slaine in the field fighting for Crassus, and other saued them selues by flying to the hill. The PARTHIANS followed them, and tolde them that Crassus had payed the paine he had deserued: and for the rest, that Surena bad them come downe with safetie. Then some of them yeelded to their enemies: and other dispersed them selues when night came, and of them very few scaped with life. Other being followed and pursued by the ARABIANS, were all put to the sword. So as it is thought there were slaine in this ouerthrow, about twentie thowsand men, and tenne thowsande taken prisoners. Surena had now sent Crassus head and his hand vnto Hyrodes, the king his master, into ARMENIA: and gaue out a brute as farre as the citie of SELEVCIA, that he brought Crassus aliue,

The number of the Romanes that were slaine and taken.

A line, & that he had prepared a sight to laugh at, which he called his triumph. Among the Romane prisoners there was one called Caius Pacianus, who was very like Crassus: him they clothed in womans apparell of the Parthians, and had taught him to answer when any called him Crassus, or Lord captaine. Him they put a horse backe, and had many trompets before him, and sergeauntes upon camells backes, that caried axes before them, and bundells of rodes, and many purses tyed to the bundell of rodes, and Romane heades newly cut off tyed to the axes: and after him followed all the strumpets & women minstrells of Surena, who went singing of songes of mockery and derision, of Crassus womanish cowardlines. Now for these open shewes, euery one might see them: but besides that sight, Surena hauing called the Senate of Selevcia together, layed before them Aristides bookes of ribaldrie, intituled B the Milesians, which was no fable, for they were found in a Romanes fardell or trusse, called Rustius. This gaue Surena great cause to scorne and despise the behauiour of the Romanes, which was so faire out of order, that euen in the warres they could not refrayne from doing euill, and from the reading of such vile bookes. Then the Senatours of Selevcia found that Æsope was a wise man, who sayd, that euery man caried a sacke on his necke, and that they put other mens faultes at the sackes mouth, and their owne towardes the bottome of the sacke. When they considered that Surena had put the booke of the lasciuousnes of the Milesians at the sackes mouth, and a long taile of the Parthians vaine pleasures and delightes in the bottome of the sacke, carying such a number of cartes loden with naughtie packes in his army as he did, which seemed an army of ermites and fielde mise. For in the vpward and fore- C meest ranckes, all appeared terrible and cruell, being onely launces, pykes, bowes, and horse: but all they ended afterwards in the rereward with a traine of harlots, instruments of musicke, daunsing, singing, bancketing, and ryoting all night with Curtisans. I will not deny but Rustius deserued blame: but yet withall, I say, that the Parthians were shameleese to reproue these bookes of the vanities of the Milesians, considering that many of their kinges, and of the royal blood of the Arsacides, were borne of the Corian and Milesian curtisans. Things passing thus in this sorte, king Hyrodes had made peace & league with Artabazes king of Ar- A menia, who gaue his sister in mariage vnto Pacorus, king Hyrodes sonne, & made great feastes one to an other: in the which were many Greeke verses song, Hyrodes selfe vnderstanding well the Greeke tongue, and Artabazes was so perfit in it, that he him selfe made certaine tragedies, orations, and stories, whereof some are yet extant at this day. The same night Crassus D head was brought, the tables being all taken vp, Iason a common player of enterludes (borne in the city of Tralles) came before the kinges, & recited a place of the tragedy of the Bacchantes of Euripides, telling of the misfortune of Agaue, who strake of his sonnes heade. And as euery man tooke great pleasure to heare him, Sillaces comming into the hall, after his humble duty first done to the king, deliuered him Crassus head before them all. The Parthi- & ans seeing that, fell a clapping of their handes, and made an outcrie of ioy. The gentlemen vshers by the kinges commaundement, did set Sillaces at the table. Iason casting of his apparell representing Pentheus person, gaue it to an other player to put on him, & counterfeating the Bacchantes possest with furie, beganne to rehearse these verses, with a iesture, tune, E and voyce, of a man madde, and beside him selfe.

Behold, we from the forest bring a stag now newly slaine,

None else but I thereof may brag.

Pomaxathres hearing them dispute about the matter, being set at the table with others, rose straight, and went and tooke the head him selfe, to whome of right it belonged to say those wordes, and not vnto the player that spake them. King Hyrodes liked this sport & manueilously, F and rewarded Pomaxathres according to the maner of the contrie in such a case: and so Iason he also gaue a talent. Such was the succesfe of Crassus enterprise and voyage, much like vnto the end of a tragedy. But afterwardes, Hyrodes cruelty, and Surenes fowle periury and craft, were in the end iustly reuenged apon them both, according to their desertes. For king Hyrodes enuying Surenaes glorie, put Surena to death. And Hyrodes fell into a disease that be-came dropsy, after he had lost his sonne Pacorus, who was slaine in a battel by the ROMANES. His second sonne, thinking to set his father forwardes, gaue him drinke of the iuice of Aconitum. The dropsie receiued the poison, and one draue the other out of Hyrodes bodie, and did him a foote againe. Phrahates perceiuing his father to amende apon it, to make shorte worke, with his owne handes strangled him.

THE COMPARISON OF Crassus with Nicias.

NOw to proceede to the comparison: first, Nicias goodes were more lustely gotten, and with lesse reproach, than Crassus wealth: for otherwise a man can not geue any great praise to mineral workes: the which are wrought by lewde and ill disposed barbarous fellowes kept in irons, and toyled to death in vnholsome and pestilent places. But being compared vnto Crassus buying of confiscate goodes at Sylles handes, and vngentle manly bargaines of houses a fire, or in daunger thereof: surely Nicias trade will appeare the better way of getting. For as openly did Crassus auow vsery, as tillage. And againe for other faultes, wherewith Crassus many times was burdened, and which he stowtly denied: as, that he tooke money of men hauing matters before the Senate at ROME, to winne fauor for their side: and that he preferred matters to the preiudice of the confederates of the ROMANES, only for his priuate profit: and therefore curried fauor with Ladies, & generally sought to cloke all fowle offenders: of all these faultes, was Nicias neuer so much as once suspected. For he to the contrarie, was mocked of euery bodie, bicause for feare he maintained wicked doers by giftes: which perhappes would not haue becommed Pericles, nor Aristides, and yet was mete for Nicias, who was borne a timerous natured man, and neuer had corage in him. Whereof Lycurgus the Orator did vaunte afterwardes to the people, being accused that he redeemed detractours with money: I am glad, sayd he, that hauing delt thus long in affayers of the state, it is found I haue rather geuen than taken. And now touching expences: Nicias was thought the better and more ciuill citizen. For his charge and cost was, in dedicating some goodly image to the goddes, or in making of publicke playes or pastimes to recreate the people. But all the money he spent that way, and all that he was worth besides, was nothing comparable, and but a small parte of that Crassus bestowed in an open feast he made at ROME: feasting so many thowsandes at one time, and did finde and maintaine them also for a certaine time after. Now I can not but wonder at those men, that deny vice to be an inequality and disagreement of maners, repugnant in it selfe, seeing men may honestly spend that which is naughtily gotten.

Nicias and Crassus richesse.

Lycurgus saying.

A ten. Thus much for their goodes. For Nicias doinges in the common weale, he did nothing malicioufly, cruelly, nor vniuftly, neither any thing of felfe will or ftomake, but rather delt plainly and fimply. For he was deceiued by truſting of Alcibiades, and neuer came to fpeake before the people, but with great feare. Craſſus, on thother fide was reproued for his vnconſtancie and lightnes, for that he would eaſily chaunge frendes or enemies: and he him ſelfe denied not, that he came to be Conſull the ſeconde time by plaine force and cruelty, hauing hiered two murderers to kill Cato and Domitius. And in the aſſembly the people held for deuiding of the prouinces, many men were hurte, and foure were ſlaine in the market place: and more then that, Craſſus him ſelfe (which we haue forgotten to wryte in his life) gaue one Lucius Annalius ſo ſore a blow on the face with his fiſt, for ſpeaking againſt him, that he ſent him

B going with blood about his eares. But as Craſſus in thoſe thinges was very fierce and cruell: ſo Nicias womaniſh behauior on thother ſide, and faint hart in matters of the common wealth, humbling him ſelfe to the meaneſt and moſt vile perſones, deſerueth great reproache. Where Craſſus in this reſpect ſhewed himſelfe aſſuredly of a noble minde, not cõtending with men of ſmall accompt, as with Cleon, or Hyperbolus, but would geue no place to Cæſars fame and glory, nor yet to Pompeyes three triumphes, but ſought to goe euen with them in power and authority: and had immediatly before exceeded Pompeyes power, in the dignity of Cenſor. For Magiſtrates, and Gouernors of the common weale, ſhould make them ſelues to be honored, but not enuied, killing enuy by the greatnes of their power. But if it were ſo that Nicias preferred quietnes, and the ſafety of his perſone aboue all things elſe, and that he feared Alcibia-

C des in the pulpit for orations, the LACEDÆMONIANS in the forte of Pyle, and Perdiccas in THRACIA: he had liberty & ſcope enough to repoſe him ſelfe in the city of ATHENS, & might haue forborne the dealing in matters, & (as Rhethoricians ſay) haue put a hoode of quietnes apon his heade very well. For doutleſſe, concerninge his deſire to make peace, it was a godly minde in him, and an act worthy of a noble perſon, to bring that to paſſe he did, appeaſing all warre: wherein Craſſus certainely was not to be compared to him, though he had ioyned all the prouinces to the Empire of ROME, that reach vnto the Caſpian ſea, and to the great Ocean of the INDIANS. But on the other ſide alſo, when one hath to deale with people that can diſcerne when a man ruleth according to equity and iuſtice, and that he ſeeth he is in the

D prime of his credit and authoritie: he muſt not then for lacke of corage ſuffer wicked men to ſteppe in his roome, nor geue occaſion to preferre ſuch to authoritie in the common weale, as are vnworthie for that place and countenaunce: neither ſhould allowe ſuch any credit, as are altogether of no credit nor truſt, as Nicias did: who was the only occaſion that Cleon, being before but a pratling Orator, was choſen Generall. Neither doe I alſo commend Craſſus, for that in the warre againſt Spartacus, he made haſt to geue him battell, more raſhely then ſafely or conſiderately. For his ambition ſpurred him forwarde, bicauſe he was afrayed leaſt Pompeyes comming ſhould take from him the glorie of all that he had done in that warre: as

E Mummius tooke from Metellus thonor of the winning of CORINTH. But beſides all this, Nicias fact therein was without the compaſſe of reaſon, and can no way be excuſed. For he did not reſigne his honor & office of Generall to Cleon his enemy, when there was hope of good ſucceſſe, or litle perill: but fearing the daunger of the iorney, he was contented to ſaue one, and tooke no care beſides for the common wealth. Which Themiſtocles ſhewed not, in the time of the warre againſt the PERSIANS. For he, to keepe Epicydes an Orator (a man of no reckoning beſide his eloquence, and extreamely couetous) from being choſen Generall of A-

F THENS, leaſt he ſhould haue ouerthrowen the common weale: ſecretly bribed him with money to leaue of his ſute. And Cato alſo, when he ſaw the ſtate of ROME in greateſt daunger, ſued to be Tribune of the people for the common wealthes ſake. And Nicias in contrary maner, reſeruing him ſelfe to make warre with the city of MINOA, or with the Ile of CYTHERA, or with the poore vnfortunate MELIANS: if there fell out afterwards occaſion to fight againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, then away went his Captaines cloke, and he left the ſhippes, the armie, and munition to the charge and gouernment of Cleons raſhnes and ſmall experience of warre, when the neceſſitie of the ſeruice required the wiſeſt and moſt expert Captaine. The which he did not, deſpiſing the meanes to make him honored: but it was a plaine drawing backe, at time of neede, to defend his contrie. Wherefore, afterwardes he was compelled against his will to be Generall, to make warres in SICILIA with the SYRACVSANS: bicause the people thought he was not so earnest to dissuade the iorney, for that he thought it not meete for the common wealth, but bicause through his sloth and cowardlinesse he would make his contrie lose so good an oportunity to conquer SICILE. Yet was this a great testimony of his honesty and trust they had in him: who though he euer hated warre, & did flie from the offices of honor and charge in the common wealth, his contriemen notwithstanding did alwayes choose him, as the most experienced persone, and meetest man of the citie. Now Crassus in contrarie maner desiring nothing else but to be Generall, could neuer attaine to it, but in the warre of the bondmen, and yet was it for lacke of an other: (for Pompey, Metellus, and both the Lucullus were then abroade in the warres) although he was otherwise of great estimation and authoritie. Howbeit it seemeth to me, that his frendes that loued him best, thought him (as the comicall Poet sayth)

A good man any vvay else, but in vvarres.

His ambition notwithstanding & couetous desire of rule, did nothing benefit the ROMANES. For the ATHENIANS sent Nicias to the warre against his will: but Crassus led the ROMANES thither against their willes. So that the common wealth fell into miserie by the one, and the other through the common wealth was brought into miserie: and yet therein there is rather cause to praise Nicias, than to blame Crassus. For Nicias like a wise man, & a Captaine of great experience, could neuer so much as be brought to thinke they should conquer SICILE: and therfore dissuaded his contrymen from the iorney, & would geue no place to the vaine hope of the people of ATHENS. But Crassus taking apon him to make warres with the PARTHIANS, as though it had bene an easie matter to ouercome them, found him selfe deceiued, yet did he aspire to great thinges. For as Iulius Cæsar had conquered & subdued to the Imperiall crowne of ROME, all the contries of the West partes, to say, the GAVLES, the GERMAINES, and ENGLANDE: euen so did Crassus desire to goe towardes the East partes, to conquer all to the great west sea of the INDIANS, and to subdue all the regions of ASIA, whereunto Pompey and Lucullus aspired, being both very noble personages, and such as euer curteously behaued them selues to all men: notwithstanding, prouoked thereunto with the like desire that Crassus had. For whē the charge of the warres in the East partes was assigned to Pompey, by decree & order of the people: the Senate vtterly misliked it, and were against it all they could. When newes were brought to ROME that Iulius Cæsar in battell had ouerthrowen and slaine three hundred thowsand GERMAINES: Cato perswading with the Senate, was yet stil of this minde, that Cæsar should be deliuered into the handes of his enemies whom he had ouercomen, for to be punished: thereby to turne the sharpe reuenge and wrathe of the goddes from ROME, apon him only, that was the vniust breaker of the peace. This notwithstāding, the people making none account of Catoes perswasions, made common feastes & processions fifteene dayes together, and open sacrifices to the goddes with great ioy through the citie, to thanke them for this famous victory. How glad may we thinke would they haue bene, and howe many dayes would they haue feasted and sacrificed, if Crassus had wrytten from BABYLON of his victory, and that he had conquered all the realmes of the MEDES, of the PERSIANS, of the HYRCANIANS, of SVSE, and of the BACTRIANS, and that he had made new gouernments and prouinces to the Empire of ROME?

The diuersitie betwext Nicias and Crassus.

If a man vvill needes doe vvrong and iniustice,

As Euripides sayth to them, that can not liue in peace, and be contented with their owne he must not then sticke at trifles, (as rasing of a castell of Scandia, or of a citie of MENDA, or chasing of the ÆGINETES being out of their owne naturall contrie, and hiding them selues like birdes without neastes, in an other birdes hole) but must dearely sell the wrong he doth, and not lightly contemne iustice, as a thing of small account. For they that will commend the intent of Alexander the great in his voyage, for the conquestes he made in the East, and doe dispraise Crassus voyage: doe not well to iudge of the beginning, by the euentes and successe of the end. For executing of their offices, Nicias did many noble exploytes. For he ouerthrew his enemies in diuers battells, and had almost taken the citie of SYRACVSA: and sure they can

A not iuſtely blame him for all the misfortunes that chaunced in the warre of SICILIA, but partely the plague was a cauſe of it, and partely alſo the enuie of thoſe towardes him that remained at ATHENS. Where as Craſſus ranne into ſo many errors, and committed ſuch foule parces in all his voyage, that he gaue fortune no leaſure to do him good: ſo that I wonder not ſo much that his folly was ouercome by the power of the PARTHIANS, as that it could ouerborne the good fortune of the ROMANES. Sithens it ſo falleth out the, that they both came to like vnfortunate end, Nicias prognoſticating before what thinges ſhould happen by arte and rule of diuination, and Craſſus contrarily diſdaining to obſerue any thing? ſure it falleth out hard in iudgement, which of them two proceeded with moſt ſafety. Yet according to the beſt approued opinions, a fault committed of feare is more excuſable, then of raſhnes and folly to B breake any auncient law or cuſtome. For their deathes, Craſſus end deſerued leſs reproache. For he againſt his will did yeelde him ſelfe, and was neither bound nor mocked, but only perſwaded by his frendes, and through his enemies frawde and treaſon moſt traiterouſly deceiued: where Nicias, cowardly, and diſhonorably hoping to ſaue his life, truſting to the mercy of his enemies, made his death more infamous.

D Eraduenture it is not to be marueiled at, if in long proces of time (fortune altering her effectes dayly) theſe worldly euentes fall often out one like an other. For whether it be that the variety of thinges are infinite, fortune hath ſtore of matter apt enough to worke to likenes: or be it that worldly matters be compreheded within determinate number: of neceſſitie one thing muſt fall out like an other, ſince they proceede from one cauſe, tyed to the ſame meanes it before did vſe. But E bicauſe men doe delight to compare ſuch chaunces together, as they haue ſeene or heard to haue happened ſo like, as if they had bene done of purpoſe, thone by the example of the other: (as that of two men being both named Alexander, both of them commen of noble houſes, thone in SYRIA, and the other in ARCADIA, both the one and the other were ſlaine with a wild bore. That of two called Arizon, the one F was torne a peeces by his dogges, the other by his louers. That of the two famous Scipiones the CARTHAGINIANS were first ouercomen by the one, and afterwards vtterly destroyed by the other. That the citie of TROYE was first taken by Hercules, for the horses that Laomedon had promised him: the seconde time by Agamemnon, by meanes of the great wodden horse: and the third time by Charidemus, by meanes of a horse that fell within the gate, & kept the TROYANS that they could not shutte it in time. And that of two sweete smelling plantes, Ios, and SMYRNA, two cities were named, the one signifying the Violet, and the other Myrre: it is supposed that the Poet Homer was borne in the one, and that he dyed in the other.) we may also adde to this example, that amongest the auncient Captaines, the greatest warriers, and that haue done the noblest exployes by wit and warlike stratageames, had but one eye: as Philip, Antigonus, Hannibal, and Sertorius also, whom we wryte of at this presene. Whom we may truely reporte to haue bene more chast, than Philip: more faithfull to his frend than Antigonus; more curteous to his enemies than Hannibal: and for wisdom and iudgement to geue place to none of them, but in good fortune to them all. The which, though she shewed her spight more to him, than to his enemies that were all great men: yet in experience he was to quall with Metellus, in prowes and valliancie with Pompey, and in fortune with Sylla. So that being banished his contrie, a straunger in an other realme, & hauing to gouerne a barbarous nation, he notwithstanding maintained warres for a time, against the power of the ROMANES. Me thinkes therefore, that of all the GRÆCIAN Captaines I can liken none so well vnto him, as Eumenes the CARDIAN. For both of them knew how to commaund, both were very valliant & politicke in warres, both were banished men out of their contry, both were Captaines ouer straungers, and both of them were traiterously and villanously slaine by them, through whom they had before ouercomen their enemies. Now for Sertorius, he came of worshipfull parentes, and was borne in the citie of NVRSIA in the contrie of the SABINES. His father left him a very childe with his mother, who carefully brought him vp, and whom he singularly loued and reuerenced. Her name as they say was Rhea. His first rising and beginning grew by pleading matters in law, which he could handle very well: insomuch as being a young man he came to ROME, and wanne some name by his eloquence. Howbeit, the honor and estimation he achieued afterwardes by his valliant actes, made him imploy all his studie and ambitious care, to armes and warres. The first time of his souldierfare was, when the CIMBRES & TEVTONS inuaded GAVLE with a mighty army: where, when the ROMANES had bene ouercome vnder the leading of Capio, his horse being slaine vnder him, and him selfe hurt, he notwithstanding swame ouer the riuer of Rone, with his corselet, & target apon him, breaking the fury and rage of the riuer with meere strength, so able and lustie a bodie he had to breake all paines and hardnes. The second time that these barbarous CIMBRES returned with an infinite number of fighting men, and with prowde and dreadfull threates, the ROMANES were thē so afrayed, that they thought him a stowte man that had but the corage to kepe his rancke, and obey his Captaine. At that time was Marius Generall of the ROMANES armie, and then did Sertorius vndertake to goe and discouer the enemies campe. And for the purpose, apparelled him selfe like a GAVLE, and learned the common wordes and phrases of their language, to salute one an other when they met, and in this sorte went among them: and hauing partly by sight and reporte learned that he sought for, he returned to Marius, who then gaue him such honorable reward, as was due to his deserte. All the time of the warres after, he did such valliant actes and deedes of armes, that his Captaine had him in great estimation, and committed the chiefest matters to his charge. Whereupon, the warres being ended with the TEVTONS and CIMBRES, Sertorius was sent into SPAYNE, vnder Didius the Prætor, with charge of a thowsand footemen, with whom he wintered in the citie of CASTVLO, in the marches of the CELTIBERIANS: where the souldiers finding plentie of vittells, fell to gluttonie and dronckennes, and committed great insolencie, being ouercome with wine. Insomuch as the barbarous people of the citie grew to such a misliking and disdaine of them, that they sent one night to their nexte neighbours the GYRISÆNIANS for aide, and as they came by the ROMANES lodgings, slue a great number of them. Sertorius hearing the noyse, went immediely out of the citie with a few of his men, & gathering them together also that fled one after an other Nowe when he had executed this re-uenge, he commaunded all his souldiers to leaue of their owne apparell and weapons, and to take these of the barbarous people whom they had slaine, and to follow him to the city of the GYRISENIANS, from whence they came that had on such a sodaine assailed the in the night. The GYRISENIANS seeing the garmentes and weapons of their supposed nere farre of, thinking certainly they had bene they: opened their gates, and a number of people went out, as to meete their frendes and citizens, whome they thought had happely sped of their purpose. Sertorius stratagame.

B Thus were a maruelous number of them slaine by the ROMANES, euen hard at the gates of their citie: and the rest putting them selues to Sertorius mercy, he sold for slaues. After this exployt, Sertorius wanne great fame through all SPAYNE, and returning to ROME, was made Questor or Treasorer generall of GAVLE, on this side of the mountaines, by the riuer of Po. A happy chaunce for ROME: for euen at that very present time fell out the warres of the confederates and allies of ITALIE, called the MARSIANS warre, in the which he had commission to presse souldiers, and to make armor. And therin he shewed such diligence and expedition for quicke dispatche of that seruice, in respect of the longe delay and carelesse regard other young men had of the same before: that he wan the name to be a carefull man of his charge, and one that afterwardes would atchieue great enterprises. Furthermore, when he came to be a Captaine him selfe, he would not let to venter his persone as valliantly, as any other priuate souldier whatsoeuer, but did maruelous actes with his owne handes, in the greatest perills and conflictes: insomuch as at the length he lost one of his eyes in fight. Whereof he was nothing ashamed, but continually gloried in it: for others, sayd he, doe not alwayes carry the markes about them of their valliant seruice, but leaue them otherwhiles at home, as their chaines, carconets, iauelinges, and crownes, geuen them by their Captaines for testimony of their valliancy: howbeit that he alwayes caried the markes about him (whereseuer he went) of his seruice, so that such as saw the blemish of his eye, did therwithall witnes his valliantnes and corage. The people also did honor him as became them. For when he came into the Theatre, they welcomed him with clapping of their handes, and great praises, which the ROMANES did scantly vse vnto their oldest Captaines, and which were most honored for their great and noble seruice. Neuertheless, when he sued to be Tribune, he was reiected by Sylles practise who hindered him: whereupon grew as it seemeth, that grudge & malice which he euer after bare vnto Sylla. For after that Marius was fled being ouercome by Sylla, & that Sylla was gone out of ITALIE to make warre with Mithridates, and that of the two Consulls, Octauius tooke parte with Sylla, and Cinna thother Consull (which sought chaunge and alteration) was gathering men together to set vp Marius faction, that was in manner vnder foote: Sertorius tooke his parte, bicause he saw that Octauius was but a slow and lither man, and did not besides trust any of Marius frendes. So was there a cruell conflict betweene them, euen in the market place within the city selfe, where Octauius had the vpper hand. And Cinna & Sertorius scaped by flying, hauing lost few lesse then ten thowsand men in this only battell throwen. Neuertheless, afterwardes through practise and policy, they got those souldiers together againe that were dispersed here and there through ITALIE, so as in shorte time they made their power equall with Octauius force. Marius also being aduertised of the same, tooke the sea incontinently, and returned into ITALIE out of AFRICKE, and came to Cinna to serue as a priuate souldier, vnder his Captaine and Consull. Now they all liked well that Marius should be receiued, saue Sertorius, who was against him all he could: fearing that either his credit and estimation should diminish, Cinna hauing a worthier Captaine then him selfe to serue him, or else that Marius cruelty and seuerity (who pardoned none offence) would marre all together, hauing no stay in his anger, but bent vtterly to all kinde of cruelty to his enemies, if Cinna fortuned to haue the victorie. And thereunto he added this further: that nowe they had the victory in maner in their hands, if they once receiued Marius vnto them, he would robbe them of all the honor of ending this warre, and being also in authority, he was richer to be trusted, Sertorius, treasorer Generall of Gaule, about the Po Padus flu.

nor commaunded. Whereunto Cinna aunſwered thus: that he thought the words he had alleaged to be true, howbeit that he was aſhamed, and beſides, could not ſee with honeſty how he might refuſe Marius, or ſend him backe, ſithens he had purpoſely ſent for him, to commit parte of the charge of theſe warres vnto him. Sertorius againe replied. Sure I thought Marius had come of his owne good will vnſent for, & therfore (as for the beſt in mine owne opinion) I gaue aduiſe not to receiue him: but ſithence it is ſo that you ſent for him before, and that he is now comen vpon your cõmaundement, you were much to blame to aske counſell whether you ſhould now receiue him or not. And therefore you muſt needes accept his ſeruice, that is comen apon your worde: for, the bonde of your promes paſt you, doth now cut of all counſell or other reſolution. Thereupon Marius was called for: and when he came, they deuided their whole army into three partes, and then beganne to charge apon their enemies of all handes, ſo as they obteined victorie. Howebeit Cinna and Marius committed as horrible cruelty in this victory, as could poſſibly be ſhewed: inſomuch as the Romanes thought all the miſeries they had endured in time of this warre nothing, and but a play as it were, in reſpect of the great calamities they fell into afterwardes. Nowe Sertorius on thother ſide neuer cauſed man to be ſlaine for any priuate malice or quarrell he had with any perſon, neither did he hurte any man when he had ouercomen, but was much offended with Marius inſolency & crudll murders: and when he had good oportunity to ſpeake with Cinna a parte, he did qualifie him the beſt he could, and made him more milde and tractable through his perſwaſion. In fine, Sertorius ſeeing Marius garded with a great number of bondmen for lacke of other ſouldiers in this warre, whom he vſed as executioners of his ſlaughter and butchery, alwayes attending about his perſon as a garde, and ſuffering them alſo to make them ſelues riche, partly with that he gaue them, or commaunded them to ſpoyle, and partely alſo with that they violently tooke without his commaundement of their owne maſters, killing them when they had done, rauiſhing their miſtreſſes, & defiling their children: he could no lenger abide ſuch wickednes and villany, but made them all to be ſlaine in their campe where they lay together, being no leſſe then foure thowſand perſones. Afterwardes, when he ſaw that the elder Marius was deade, and that ſoone after Cinna was ſlaine, the younger Marius his ſonne (againſt his counſell, and contrary to the lawes of Rome) had by force made him ſelfe Conſull: and that Carbo, Scipio, and Norbanus (which had bene ouercomen by Sylla) were comen out of Greece to Rome wards, partely through the cowardlines of their Captaines, and partely alſo bicauſe they were betrayed and ſolde of their owne men: and further, conſidering therewithall, that his perſon could doe no good in thoſe affayers, which waxed worſe and worſe, by meanes of thauthoritie of ſuch as had leaſt wit and vnderſtanding, and ſpecially alſo ſeeing Sylla campe hard by Scipio, making much of him, and feeding him with hope of a good peace, whileſt vnderhand he wanne his ſouldiers from him, notwithſtanding that he was certainly warned and told of it before: Sertorius then vtterly diſpairing of Romes proſperity and wellfare, departed from Rome, to go towardes Spayne, thinking that if he could get the firſt poſſeſſion and gouernment of that realme, it would at the leaſt be a refuge and receit for all thoſe of their tribe, that ſhould chaunce to be baniſhed out of their contrie. Howbeit in his voyage thitherward, he met with foule and rough weather: and paſſing through a contry of mountaines, the barbarous people inhabiting the ſame, demaunded tribute of him, for licence to paſſe through their territories. Thereat the ſouldiers of his company were maruelouſly offended, ſaying that it were too much ſhame and diſhonor for a Proconſull of Rome, to pay tribute to vile barbarous people. Notwithſtãding, Sertorius paſſed not for the ſhame they ſayd it would to be him, but aunſwered them thus: that he bought time, which thing he ſhould moſt recken of, that aſpireth to haughtie enterpriſes, and ſo pleaſed the barbarous people with money. And thus he made ſuch ſpeede, as he quickely recouered Spayne, which he found greatly repleniſhed with people, and ſpecially of young men able to weare armor. But now Sertorius perceiuing that they had bene hardly delt withall before, through the inſolency, pride, and couetouſnes of the Romane Gouernors, whom they ordinarily ſent from Rome, and that therefore they hated all manner of gouernment: firſt of all ſought to winne the good willes of all the whole contrymen one and other. A and of the common people, by easing them of their taxe and subsidies. But that which bred him most loue of all men generally was this: that he dispensed with them for lodging of souldiers, and receiuing of any garrison within their cities, compelling his souldiers to set vp their tentes, and to make their cabines without the suburbes of great cities to winter there, & causing also his owne pauillion to be first set vp, and lay in it him selfe in persone. This notwithstanding, he pleased not these barbarous people in all things to win their fauor: for he armed all the ROMANE citizens of age to cary weapon, that dwelt in SPAYNE, and made them make all sortes of engines for battery, and a number of gallies besides, so that he had all the cities at commaundement, being very curteous to them in matters of peace, but in warlike munition, very dreadfull to his enemies. After Sertorius vnderstoode that Sylla kept ROME, and that the B most parte of the tribe of Marius & Carbo was vtterly ouerthrowen, mistrusting that it would not be long before they sent some Captaine with a great armie against him: he sent Iulius Salinator betimes to keepe the mountaines Pirenei, with sixe thowsande men well armed. Immediatly after Caius Annius also came thether, sent by Sylla: who seeing no possibilitie to distresse Salinator in a place of such aduantage, was driuē to stay at the foote of the mountaine, not knowing what to determine. But by misfortune, one Calphurnius surnamed Lanarius, traiterously slue Salinator: whereupon his souldiers foorthwith forsooke the toppe of the mountaines, and by this meanes Annius had easie passage with his army which was very great, and ouerthrewe them that resisted his further comming on into the contry. Sertorius finding him selfe not strong enough to fight with him, marched away with three thowsand men vnto the C citie of new CARTHAGE, and there tooke sea: from thence he coasted ouer into AFRICKE, and fell with the coast of the MAVRVSIANS, where his souldiers landed immediatly for freshe water, dispersing them selues without keeping any order. Thereupon the barbarous people gaue a charge apon them, & slue numbers of them: insomuch as Sertorius was driuen to imbarke againe, and to take his course towardes SPAYNE, where he was kept from landing. Then was he driuen to take certaine pirates botes of the CILICIANS, and to sayle towardes the Ile of PITYVSA, where he landed in despite of Annius garrison, and put them to distresse. But shortly after came Annius thither him selfe with a good number of shippes, and fiue thowsand fighting men in them. Him Sertorius determined to abide, and to fight withall by sea, though he had but small barkes, purposely made for swift sayling, & of no strength for fight. But now
D the West winde rising very bigge, did swell the sea in such sorte, that it cast the most parte of Sertorius shippes (being weake and very light) apon rockes in the sea, and him selfe with a few being kept from land by his enemies, and from the sea by storme was driuen to ride ten dayes together at anker, working still for life against the daunger of the surging waues & boisterous windes, which continued rough all that time: yet in the ende when it calmed againe he waied anker, and ranne into certaine desolate Iles, where was no water to be had. Then hoising saile from thence, he passed the straighte of Gilbratar, and turning on his right hande, landed apon the coast of SPAYNE, lying towardes the great Westerne sea, a litle aboue the mouth of the riuer of Bætis, the which falling into the sea Atlanticum, gaue name in olde time to that parte of SPAYNE, which was called HISPANIA BÆTICA. There certaine saylers met with him
E that were newly arriued from the Iles of the Ocean Atlanticum, which the auncients called the fortunate Ilands. These two Ilandes are not farre one from an other, being but a litle arme of the sea betweene them, and are from the coast of AFRICKE only tenne thowsand furlongs. They haue raine there very seldom, howbeit a gentle winde commonly that bloweth in a litle siluer dew, which moisteth the earth so finely, that it maketh it fertile and lustie, not onely to bring forth all that is set or sowen apon it, but of it selfe without mans hand it beareth so good frute, as sufficiently maintaineth the inhabitants dwelling apon it, liuing idlely, and taking no paines. The weather is fayre and pleasaunt continually, & neuer hurteth the body, the climate and seasons of the yeare are so temperate, and the ayer neuer extreame; bicause the windes that blow apon that land frō the other side of the coast opposite to it, as the North & Easter-

Westerly) they sometime bring litle showers with them which commonly doe but moist the ground a litle, and make the earth bring forth all thinges very trimmely: insomuch as the very barbarous people them selues doe faithfully beleue, that there are the Elysian fieldes, the bode of blessed creatures, which Homer hath so much spoken of. Sertorius hearing reporte of these Ilandes (vpon a certaine desire now to liue quietly out of tyranny & warres) had straight a maruelous minde to go dwel there. But when the pyrates of CILICIA (who were no men of peace, but geuen altogether to spoyle & pillage) heard that: they by & by forsooke Sertorius, & went into APRICKE, to restore Ascalius the sonne of Iphtha to his realme of MAVRITANIA again. Sertorius quailed not for all their departure from him, but determined to aide them that made warre against Ascalius, and all to thend that his souldiers seeing matter of new hope and meanes to be imployed, should not so leaue him, being faced afterwardes to be discharged of very necessity. The MAVRVSIANS being very glad of his arriuall, he presently went on with his enterprise, ouercame Ascalius in battell, and besieged the citie whereinto apon the ouerthrowe of his armie he was fled for refuge. Sylla being aduertised thereof, sent Paccianus thither with an army to aide Ascalius. Sertorius gaue him battell, slue him in the field, and wan the rest of his army, which yeelded vnto him: then tooke he the city of TINGIS, whereinto Ascalius was fled with his brethren. The LIBYANS wryte that Antæus is buried there. But Sertorius geuing no credit to the tales of the barbarous people of that contrie, by reason of the greatnes of the tombe they shewed: made it to be broken open round, and finding there the body of a man (as they say) of three score cubits long, he marueled at it, and so finishing his sacrifice to honor the memory thereof, caused the tombe to be well closed vp againe. By this act hee did greatly increase the honor of Anteus memory, which the city did vnto him, and thereby confirmed the contry mens reporte of Antæus. For the TINGIANS doe reporte, that after Antæus death, his wife Tinga lay with Hercules, and had a goodly sonne by him called Sophax, who was king of that contrie, and there built this city, geuing it his mothers name. Furthermore, it is sayd also that this Sophax had a sonne called Diodorus, who conquered the most parte of APRICKE with an army of the GRÆCIAN OLBIANIANS and MYCENIANS, which Hercules brought thether, to inhabite those partes. We were willing to imbrace the occasion offered vs to speake of this matter as we went, for the honor of Iuba, the noblest historiographer that euer came of royall blood: for it is thought his aunceſters were lineally discended from Sophax and this Diodorus. Sertorius as conquerour now, hauing the whole contry in subiection, did in no wise hurt them that yeelded vnto him, & put trust in him, but restored them their goodes, cities, and gouernment againe, contenting him selfe with that they offered him of their good willes. But then standing doubtfull what way to determine: the LVSITANIANS sent Ambassadors vnto him, to intreate him to be their chiefetaine. For they stoode in great neede of a worthy personage, and a man expert in warres to defende them against the furie of the ROMANES: and therefore they only trusted him, hearing of his honorable behauiour by them that were conuersaunt with him. Whose qualities as we finde wrytten, were these. He was neuer greatly moued, with feare nor ioy: but as he was a resolute man without feare in most daunger, so was he most temperate in greatest prosperitie. In valliantnes inferior to no Captaine of his time, and very quicke of execution in euery imminent daunger. For where any present exployt was to be done, any strong place of aduantage to lodge or fight in to be taken, or that he was to passe ouer any riuer, or scape any instant daunger, where it stoode apon speedy execution, and to shew some stratageame or policie in time and place to supplant the enemie: in those matters he passingly excelled. Furthermore, he was both bountifull in rewarding good seruice, and mercifull in punishing of offenders: but this notwithstanding, the fowle murder he did in his latter dayes apon certaine younge children that were pledges with him (which doutlesse was an act of great cruelty and anger that could not forgeue) doth manifestlie proue, that he was neither mercifull nor curteous of nature: but that he manie times did finely counterfeat it, when both the time and the warres did so require it. But for mine opinion, sure I am perswaded that no misfortune can haue power to make perfite vertue, grounded vpon good reason, to worke in any sorte contrarie to it selfe: neither doe I thinke it impossible also, but that mens good willes and gentle natures being iniured without cause,

A cause, may peraduenture chaunge their naturall dispositions. Which then proued true in Sertorius, who finding fortune contrary vnto him, & his good happe chaunged into ill, grewe so crabbed and fierce of nature, that he would take cruell reuenge of them which had villanously betraied him. But now to our matter where we left. Sertorius departed out of Africke apon the Lvsitanians offer, who chose him for their General, geuing him absolute power and authoritie: and so soone as he arriued, he straight leauied men of warre, and with them subdued the people of Spayne fronting apon their marches, of which the more parte did willingly submit them selues, apon the brute that ranne of him to be mercifull and curteous, and a valliant man besides in present daunger. Furthermore, he lacked no fine deuises & sutteties to winne their good willes: as amonge others, the policie and deuise he had of the Sertorius fained lyt of the hynde.

B hynde, which was this. There was a poore man of the contrie called Spanus, who meeting by chaunce one day with a hynde in his way that had newly calued, flying from the hunters: he let the damme goe not being able to take her, and running after her calfe tooke it, which was a young hynde, and of a straunge heare, for she was all milke white. It chaunced so, that Sertorius was at that time in those partes, who was alwayes very glad when any man offered him such maner of presentes: as frutes, fowle, or venison, & would make very much of them that brought them to him, and also reward them well for the same. So, this poore man presented Sertorius with his younge hynde, which he gladly receiued, and which with time he made so tame, that she would come to him when he called her, and followe him where euer he went, being nothing the wilder, for the dayly sight of such a number of armed souldiers to-

C gether as they were, nor yet afrayed of the noyse and tumult of the campe. Insomuch as Sertorius by litle & litle made it a miracle, making the simple barbarous people beleue that it was a gift that Diana had sent him, by the which she made him vnderstande of many and sundrie things to come: knowing wel enough of him selfe, that the barbarous people were men easily deceiued, and quickely caught by any subtill superstition, besides that by arte also he brought them to beleue it as a thinge very true. For when he had any secret intelligence geuen him, that the enemies would inuade some parte of the contries and prouinces subiect vnto him, or that they had taken any of his fortes from him by any intelligence or sodaine attempt: he straight told them that his hynde spake to him as he slept, and had warned him both to arme his men, and put him selfe in strength. In like maner if he had heard any newes that one of his

D Lieutenauntes had wonne a battell, or that he had any aduantage of his enemies, he would hide the messenger, and bring his hynde abroade with a garland and coller of nosegayes: and then say it was a token of some good newes comming towardes him, perswading them withall to be of good cheare, and so did sacrifice to the goddes, to geue them thankes for the good tidings he should heare before it were long. Thus by putting this superstition into their heades, he made them the more tractable and obedient to his will, insomuch as they thought they were not now gouerned any more by a straunger wiser than them selues, but were stedfastly perswaded that they were rather led by some certaine god: and so much the more, bicause that his deedes confirmed their opinions, seeing his power so dayly to increase beyonde the hope and expectation of man. For with two thowsand fiue hundred souldiers, which he cal-

E led Romanes (although the most of them in deede were Africans, which came ouer with him out of Africke into Spayne) & foure thowsand Lvsitanians, with seuen hundred horsemen also, he made warre against foure great Captaines of Rome, which had the leading of fiue score thowsand footemen, two thowsand archers and slingmen, with a world of cities and contries besides. Where Sertorius at the first had not aboue twenty at the most: and yet with this small power to maintaine this warre withall, he did not only conquer great contries and many goodly cities, but tooke some of the Captaines prisoners also, whome the Romanes sent against him. Of which company Cotta was one, whome he ouerthrewe in battell by sea, not farre from the citie of Melaria. He also ouercame Fidius in battell, being gouernor of Spayne Betica, by the riuer of Bætis, where he slue two thowsand Romanes.

The ouerthrowes that Sertorius had by sea and land against the Romanes.

F By his treasorer likewise he ouercame Lucius Domitius, Proconsull of the other prouince of Spayne. And an other time he discomfited Toranius an other Captaine, one of Pompeius Lieutenaunts, whom he slue in fight with all his army. And Metellus selfe, being taken at that time for one of the moſt expert men of warre, and chiefeſt Captaines among the ROMANES: him he put alſo ſo oft to diſtreſſe, that Lucius Lollius was faine to come out of GAVLE NARBONESIS (now Languedocke) to aide. And they were furthermore driuen to ſende Pompey the great with all ſpeede from ROME, with a new army. Bicauſe Metellus knew not what courſe to take, hauing to fight with a moſt valliant man, & one whom he could neuer either bring to any ſet battell, nor yet entrappe in the plaine fielde, (ſo eaſily could he caſt him ſelfe into all kinde of formes) by reaſon of the dexterity and ſwiftnes of his ſpaniſhe ſouldiers being lightly armed. Where he cleane contrary, was wont to fight a pitched field, without remouing a foote, and to lead an army heauy armed, which could kepe their ranckes, and fighting ſteadely could ouerthrow their enemies with handſtrokes, and marche apon their bellies. But to clime vp the mountaines, and to be continually (as they were) charged in the rereward with theſe men armed as light as the winde, and to purſue them in chaſe that fled ſtill, and neuer kept place: it was vnpoſſible for them to doe it, and much leſſe to abide hunger and thirſt, to liue without a kitchin and fire, and likewiſe to lye on the bare ground without tentes or pauillions, as Sertorius ſouldiers did. Furthermore Metellus being growen an old man, (hauing ſpent all his youth in ſeruice of the warres, and taken & ſuffred great paynes and troubles, geuing him ſelfe now to quiet and pleaſure) was matched with Sertorius, being then euen at his beſt age, and luſtieſt of body, beſides that nature had made him both ſtrong, actiue, and temperate withall. For he was neuer geuen to his belly, nor to be a great bibber, when he was at moſt quiet, and out of warres, he was likewiſe acquainted with paines and hardnes from his youth, could away with long iorneys, watch many dayes and nightes without ſleepe, eate litle, and content him ſelfe with any meate that came to hand. And had he neuer ſo litle leaſure, he would continually be on horſebacke, riding a hunting vp and downe the fieldes, which made him very ready and expert to know how to winde him ſelfe out of daunger when he was diſtreſſed, and contrarily alſo to compaſſe in his enemy apon any aduantage: and beſides, to ſee where he might enter, and where not. For this cauſe was Metellus driuen (who was ſtill deſirous to fight) to abide the loſſes and diſcommodities which they ſuffer that be vanquiſhed: and Sertorius on thother ſide refuſing battell, and flying before him, had all the vantage of him that they haue, which chaſe their enemies whome they haue ouercomen. For he cutte of his vittells on euery ſide, tooke away his water, and kept him in from foraging. When he thought to marche further forwarde, Sertorius ſtayed him. And when he lay ſtill in his campe, Sertorius came and gaue him alaroms, & draue him to diſlodge. Yf Metellus layed ſiege to any place, Sertorius ſtraight beſieged him for want of vittells. So that his ſouldiers were euen weary of altogether. Wheruppon, when Sertorius challenged the combat of Metellus: oh, well ſayd, cryed all the ſouldiers, let Captaine fight againſt Captaine, and ROMANE againſt a ROMANE. Howbeit Metellus refuſed him, and the ſouldiers laughed him to ſcorne. Neuertheleſſe he did but ſmyle at them, and therin ſhewed him ſelfe a wiſe man: for as Theophraſtus ſayth, a Captaine muſt dye as a Captaine, not like a priuate ſouldier. Furthermore, Metellus conſidering that the LANGOBRITES (who gaue great aide vnto Sertorius in all ſeruices) were eaſie to be taken for lacke of water (hauing but one onely well in all their city) and that whoſoeuer did beſiege the ſame, ſhould ſtraight be maſter of all the ſpring heades of the ſuburbes about it, hoping thereby to make the citie yeelde vnto him within two dayes at thutmoſt: he commaunded his ſouldiers to vittell them ſelues for fiue dayes only. But Sertorius hauing intelligence thereof, gaue good direction and ſpeedy order to preuent him. For he cauſed two thowſand goates skinnes to be filled with water, and promiſed rounde ſummes of money for euery skinne brought thether. Many SPANYARDS and MAVRYSIANS ſtraight tooke apon them thenterpriſe. Thereuppon Sertorius chooſinge the luſtieſt men amonge them, ſent them away through the mountaines, commaunding them withall, that when they deliuered their goates skinnes with water vnto the citizens, they ſhould cauſe them forthwith to put out all their idle people, that the water might laſt them the lenger which defended the city. Metellus receiuing aduertiſement hereof, was much agrieued withall, bicauſe his ſouldiers vittells were wel nere ſpent, which they had brought according to his commaundement: and therefore he ſent Aquinus one of his Leiuetenauntes, with ſix thowſand men to get vittells. Sertorius hauing intelligence of his purpoſe, preſently

This place may well be taken two wayes, and either of both allowable: & according to the other it might be ſaid, to leade Romane citizens to the warres, fighting like valliant men.

Sertorius warlike vertues.

Metellus practiſeth to beſiege the Langobrites, and to take their city, for lacke of water.

Sertorius finely deceiued Metellus, at the ſiege of the Langobrites.

A peesently layed an ambush for his returne in a valley full of wodde, and bestowed there three thowsande men to set vppon the reteward, whilest he him selfe gaue charge on the vowward. Thus made he Aquinus flie, slue the most parte of his men, and tooke the rest prisoners. How- beit Aquinus selfe the Captaine hauing lost his weapons and horse, by flying recouered Metellus campe: who thereuppon was driuen with shame to raise his siege, being mocked of all the SPANYARDS. For these valliant deedes, was Sertorius wonderfully beloued and honored of all the barbarous people, and specially bicause he had made them good souldiers, brought them from their former rude & beastly fight, and had taught them to be armed after the RO- MANE facion, to kepe their ranckes when they fought, to follow their ensigne, and to take the signall and word of the battell: insomuch as he made them then appeare a goodly army, well B taught and trained, being before a confused multitude of theeues and robbers. Furthermore, he deuided great store of gold and siluer among them, shewing them how they should gilde their headpeeces, sette out their shieldes and targettes with fine workemanshippe, and also brauely apparell them selues with riche clokes and sleueleese cassockes apon their armor, teaching them to be fine, and furnishing them with money, whereby he maruelously wanne the heartes of the barbarous people. Yet did he further binde them vnto him, by that he did vnto their children. For he sent generally for all the noble mens young sonnes, through all the contries and prouinces subiect vnto him: and brought them to the goodly citie of OSCA: where he prouided them of schoolemasters to teache them the Greeke and Latine tongue, bearing their parentes in hande, that it was to no other ende, but to make them (when they C came to be men) meete to be imployed in the seruice of the common weale, albeit in deede it was but a fine deuise of him, to haue them as Ostages for their faith and loyaltie towardes him. Then were the fathers of these children glad men to see their sonnes apparelled like RO- MANES, in fayer long gownes garded with purple, to goe ciuilly to the schooles: that Sertorius payed for their learninge: and that oftentimes he went thither to appose them, to see how they profited: and how he gaue rewardes vnto them that were the best schollers, hang- ing iuells about their neckes, which the ROMANES call Bulla. Insomuch, that they hauing a custome at that time in SPAINE, that such as were about the Prince or their chieftaine should dye with him when he dyed, that custome of voluntarie vowe to dye with their Lorde, being called by the barbarous people, deuotion: there were very fewe of their followers and fami- D liars that would vowe to dye with other Captaines, but on thother side, thowsandes com- monly followed Sertorius, hauing vowed to loose their liues with him. And for proofe hereof it is reported, that when his army on a time was ouerthrowen by a certaine citie of SPAINE, the enemies egerly pursuing him: the SPANYARDS not regarding their owne liues to saue his, tooke him vp on their shoulders, and so passed him from man to man apon them, till they put him into the city, who being safe & out of daunger, they then looked by running to saue them selues the best they could. Thus was Sertorius not only beloued of the SPANYARDS, but of o- ther souldiers also that came out of ITALIE. For when Perpenna Vento, being of the same fa- ction, arriued in SPAYNE full of money, & with a good number of souldiers, intending to make warre in his behalfe against Metellus: his souldiers fell out with him, and had none other talke E in his campe but of Sertorius. The which spited Perpenna to the hart, being prowde & stately by meanes of his wealth and estate, comming of a noble house. Newes being come that Pom- pey was past ouer the mountaines Pyrenei, the souldiers armed them selues, and plucked vp their ensignes that were fast in the ground, and cried out apon Perpenna to lead them to Serto- rius, threatning him that if he would not, they would leaue him alone, and seeke them a Cap- taine, that could both saue him selfe and them. So was Perpenna forced against his will to fol- lowe their mindes, and to leade the three and fiftie ensignes he had with him, to ioyne with Sertorius force. Thus became Sertorius army very great, and specially after all the cities on this side the riuer of Ebrus had yeelded vnto him. For then came souldiers to him out of all partes, F howebeit they were a rashe confused multitude of Omnigatherum togethet, hauing no rea- son nor pacience to abide time, but cried out in furie, to set apon their enemies. This trou- bled Sertorius much, seeking first to quiet them by reason and perswasion. But when he sawe they fell to mutinie, and would needes haue their wills, and both without reason and all good order would so goe set apon their enemies: he gaue them the head, and let them goe as they would, knowing well enough they would pay for their folly, but yet tooke such order and direction, as they should not vtterly be cast away, hoping after that to haue them the more obedient vnto him. And in deede they had their payment as he coniectured: notwithstanding he went to rescue them, & so brought the safe into his campe. Now to take away the feare & perplexitie from them, which this ouerthrow perhappes had striken into them: immediately after he caused his whole armie to assemble, as purposing to vse some speeche vnto them. In which time he caused two horses to be brought and set in the middes among them, the one an olde and feeble iade, and thother a goodly lustie horse, which besides other things, had a maruelous fayer thicke taile. Behinde the old leane iade, he set a lusty tall fellow: and behinde the goodly horse also, he placed a litle weariſh man, & seeming to sight to haue but small strength. Now apon a signe geuen them which he had made them priuy to, the strong man tooke the leane horse by the taile with all his might, as if he would haue pluckt it of by the stumpe: and the other weariſh man fell to plucking of heare by heare from the great horse taile. So when the strong man had tugged and swet a great while in vaine at the leane horse taile, thinking to haue pulled it of, and in thende did nothing else but make the lookers on laugh: and that the weariſh wretch on thother side in a shorte space, (& at ease) had left the great horse taile with neuer a heare on it: Sertorius then rising vp, spake in this sorte to his souldiers. Doe ye not see (my frendes and companions) sayd he, how time and perseuerance exceedeth force? and that thinges vnlikely at the first to be ouercome by force, are yet in time, by litle and litle obtained? For continuance ouercommeth all thinges, and there is no force nor power, but processe of time consumeth and bringeth to nought, being a most certaine helpe to them, that can take oportunity, and abide time: as in contrariwise haste and rashnes is as daungerous an enemy as may be, to them that doe thinges of a head without regard. By these common deuises wherewith Sertorius daily acquainted the barbarous people, he taught them to abide the oportunitie of time. But of all the stratageames he vsed in warre, that only exceeded al other, which he shewed vnto a people called the CHARACITANIANS. The people doe dwell on the other side of the riuer of Tagus, and haue neither cities nor villages for their common abode, but only a great high hill, full of hollow caues and deepe holes among the rockes, looking towardes the North. At the foote of this mountaine the valley is a great slimie ground and so rotten, that it is not able to beare a man, but being troden on, crummeth like white lyme, & turneth to dust vnder his feete. And therefore, by meanes of the same, when those people were afrayed of any enemies, or that they had conueyed the goodes they had robbed & stollen from their neighbors into those caues, they thought them selues safe, if they were once gotten into them: for it was vnpossible to compell them to come out. Nowe it chaunced that Sertorius flying from Metellus, came and encamped hard by this hill which these barbarous people inhabited, who made no reckoning of him, imagining Metellus had ouerthrowen him. But Sertorius being in a rage with them, and bicause he would shew that he fled not: tooke his horse backe the next morning, and rode as neere to the hill as he coulde, to viewe the nature and scituacion of the place: and when he saw there was no way to bring a man into it, he fretted, and walked vp and downe, vainely threatning them to no purpose. Yet going and comming to and fro, he perceiued the winde raised a great dust, of that britle earth we haue spoken of, and caried it full into the CHARACITANIANS holes, the mouthes whereof as we sayd before, lay full apon the North. This Northen winde, which some call Cæcias, is the only winde of all other that most keepeth in that quarter, and riseth from the moores and mountaines thereaboutes, which be continually couered with snow, and then in the hart of sommer is nourished and inforced by the melting of the ice and snow, and so bloweth a ioly coole winde, which refresheth the barbarous people and beastes all the day long. Sertorius marking this with him selfe, and vnderstanding by the inhabitants therabouts, that this winde blew commonly among them: commaunded his souldiers to gather a great quantitie of this light britle earth together, & to raise a mount of it, right against the other hill. The barbarous people made a mockery of it at the first, thinking Sertorius would haue made a mount to haue fought with them apon it: howbeit he went on with his worke till night came, and then brought his souldiers backe againe into his

Sertorius wonderfull deuise against the barbarous people, called the Characitanians.

A his campe. The next morning by breake of day there was a merie little winde ſturring, that only blew of the toppe of his forced mount, & the higheſt parte of that maſſe of earth, as chaffe when they winnowe corne: and as the ſunne beganne to haue any power, the North winde alſo roſe, which foorthwith filled all the hill with duſt. And withall, came Sertorius ſouldiers who threw downe the hill to the bottome, which they had gathered the day before, and brake all thoſe drie clots of clay in peeces. The horſemen on ouerthother ſide, they ſtill manadged their horſes vp and downe in it, to raiſe vp the greater duſt, which the winde caried as ſoone as it roſe, and blew into the eares of theſe barbarous people, full in their faces, through their holes B and rifts of the rockes. So they hauing no other ventes nor ayer any way, but there where the winde blew in apon them: it did ſo blindefolde their eyes, and filled their eares with ſuch a hotte ſtuffing ayer, that they were almoſt choked with all, not able to take breath. For when they ſhould drawe their breathes, this ſtuffing ayer and duſt came in at their mouthes ſo faſt, that they had much a doe to hold out two dayes, and on the thirde yeelded them ſelues vnto Sertorius mercy: the which thing did not ſo much increaſe his power, as it wanne him honor, by policie to haue wonne ſuch an vnlikely conqueſt, which by force could neuer haue bene gotten, and where to fight was matter impoſſible. So longe therefore as he made warre with C Metellus alone, he commonly had the aduantage of him, bicauſe Metellus was an olde man and heauy, & could not reſiſt Sertorius luſty youth, that led a light army, like rather to a company of theeues and robbers, than to an army of men of warre. But afterwardes when Pompey was come ouer the mountaines Pyrenei, and that both of them being encamped eche before other, and that Pompey had ſhewed him all the ſtratageames and policies of warre poſſible for a good Captaine to deuiſe, & he the like vnto Pompey: and found that Sertorius had the better of him, both in laying his ambuſhes, & alſo in foreſeeing to intrappe him: then grew the fame of Sertorius to be ſo great, that euen in Roume it ſelfe he was thought to be the nobleſt Captaine, & of beſt conduction of any man in his time. Yet was Pompey at that time of great fame and reputacion, which afterwardes alſo waxed greater, by the noble actes he did vnder Sylla, who gaue him the ſurname of Pompey the great, for that he had deſerued honor of triumphe, before his beard was growen. So, when he was comen thus into SPAYNE, diuers townes and cities ſubiect vnto Sertorius, were halfe in minde to yeelde vnto Pompey: but afterwardes they altered againe, apon the chaunce that happened vnto the citie of LAVRON, beyond all expe-D ctation. For Sertorius being gone to lay ſiege to it, Pompey in haſt went thither with his armie to raiſe the ſiege. Neere vnto the city there was a litle hill very commodious to lodge a campe in, and alſo to diſtreſſe them of the citie: whereupon thone made haſt to get it, and thother to keepe him from it. Notwithſtanding, Sertorius was the firſt man, and got the hill: and Pompey came euen as he had taken it, who was very glad it had ſo fallen out, thinking to haue made Sertorius ſure at that time, being kept in on the one ſide with the citie of LAVRON, and with his army on the other. Thereupon he ſent vnto the citizens, and bad them care for nothing, more then to ſtand apon their walles at their pleaſure, to ſee Sertorius ſtraightly beſieged, who thought to haue beſieged them. This meſſage being brought to Sertorius, he ſmyled at it, and ſayd, that he would teache Syllaes younge ſcholler (for ſo in mockerie he called Pompey) that E a wiſe Captaine ſhould rather ſee behinde then before him: and therewithall he ſhewed the LAVRONITANS ſixe thouſande footemen well armed, which he had left in his campe when he came to take the hill where he was, to thend that if Pompey came by chaunce to aſſaile him, they ſhould geue a charge apon his rereward. Pompey hauinge founde this too late, durſt not offer Sertorius battell, fearing to be compaſſed in behinde: and on thother ſide he was aſhamed to forſake the LAVRONITANS, whome he was driuen in thende to ſee vnerly ſpoyled and deſtroyed before his eyes, and durſt not once ſturre to helpe them. The barbarous people of the contrarie parte ſeeinge no hope of aide by him, yeelded ſtraight vnto Sertorius, who did not onely pardon them, but alſo ſuffered them to goe whether they would. Howbeit he burnte the citie, for no anger or crueltie (being a Captaine that neuer ſhewed crueltie in anger) but to F ſhame Pompey withall, and to ſtoppe their mouthes that made ſuch accompt of him: and that this brute might runne among the barbarous people, that Pompey him ſelfe being preſent, and might in manner haue warmed him by the fire that burnt a goodly city of his confederates, neither durſt nor could helpe them. In deede Sertorius in continuance of this warre ſ[illegible] much loſſe and great hurt, howbeit it was alwayes through the faulte of his Lieutenantes, as touching him ſelfe, he was neuer ouerthrowen, nor thoſe he led. And yet he euer wonne more honor in recouering of thoſe battels which his Captaines loſt, than his enemies did that had put them to the worſe. As in the battell he wanne againſt Pompey, by the citye of Sucron, and in an other he wanne againſt Pompey and Metellus both, by the citie of Tvrdra. And as for the ouerthrow of Sucron, it is thought it came through Pompeyes ambition, making him more haſt for feare Metellus ſhould be partaker of the honor of his victorie: and that was the thing Sertorius looked for, to fight before Metellus came to ioyne with him, and therefore he fought the battell with Pompey towardes night, ſuppoſing the darkeneſſe of the night would trouble his enemies much, be a helpe to ſaue them ſelues if they were ouercome, and alſo to chaſe the enemies if ſo it happened they had the vpper hande, bicauſe they were ſtraungers, and knew not the contrie. When both battells came to geue charge, Sertorius at the firſt was not directly againſt Pompey, but againſt Afranius, who led the left wing of Pompeyes battell, and him ſelfe was in the right wing of his owne battell. Howebeit Sertorius being aduertiſed that the left wing of his owne army againſt the which Pompey fought, was in ſuch diſtreſſe as they gaue backe, and could abide no lenger, if they were not preſently aided: ſtraight left the leading of the right wing, which he aſſigned ouer to other of his Captaines, and ranne with all ſpeede poſſible vnto the left wing, which were then euen as good as flying. And firſt he gathered them together againe which had turned their backes, and after put thoſe alſo in good order that were yet a fighting: and ſo hauing encoraged them both with his wordes, and the preſence of his perſon, he gaue a new charge againe apon Pompey, more coragiouſly than before, (who thinking he had already wonne the field, was then a chaſing ſuch as fled) and came ſo fiercely apon him, that he put all the whole army of the Romanes to flight: inſomuche as Pompey him ſelfe eſcaped killing in the field very hardly being ſore hurt, & ſaued by a ſtraunge meane. For the Afrikans of Sertorius hauing taken Pompeis horſe (which was richly trapped with harneſſe of gold and other precious furniture) falling out among them ſelues, and fighting for deuiſion of the ſame: in the meane time let Pompey goe, and neuer followed after him. Afranius againe on thother ſide, whileſt Sertorius was gone to helpe the other wing of his battel, made them flie all that ſtoode before him, & followed killing of thē euen into the trenches of their campe, entring in amongeſt them that fled, and ſpoiled the campe being darke night, knowing nothing of Pompeis ouerthrow, neither could he withdraw his men from ſpoyle. Sertorius alſo comming thither apon the inſtant, finding Pompeis men in diſorder, ſlue a number of them: and the next morning betimes armed his men againe, and brought them out into the field, to fight once more with Pompey. But receiuing intelligence that Metellus was at hand, he ſounded the retreate, and diſlodged from the place he encamped, ſaying: had not that old woman comen, I would haue whipped that young boy to Rome with roddes. Now was Sertorius very heauy, that no man could tell him what was become of his white hynde: for thereby all his ſutteltie and fineſſe to kepe the barbarous people in obedience was taken away, and then ſpecially, when they ſtoode in neede of moſt comforte. But by good happe, certaine of his ſouldiers that had loſt them ſelues in the night, met with the hynde in their way, and knowing her by her colour, tooke her, and brought her backe againe. Sertorius hearing of her, promiſed thē a good reward, ſo that they would tell no liuing creature that they brought her againe, and thereupon made her to be ſecretly kept. Then within a few dayes after, he came abroade among them, and with a pleaſaunt countenaunce tolde the noble men and chiefe Captaines of theſe barbarous people, how the goddes had reuealed it to him in his dreame, that he ſhould ſhortly haue a maruelous good thing happen to him: and with theſe wordes ſate downe in his chayer to geue audience. Whereuppon they that kept the hynde not fare from thence, did ſecretly let her goe. The hynde being loſe, when ſhe had ſpied Sertorius, ran ſtraight to his chayer with great ioy, and put her head betwext his legges, & layed her mouth in his right hande, as ſhe before was wont to doe. Sertorius alſo made very much of her, and of purpoſe appeared maruelous glad, ſhewinge ſuch tender affection to the hynde, as it ſeemed the water ſtoode in his eyes for ioy. A the same, at the first were much amazed therewith: but afterwardes when they had better bethought them selues, for ioy they clapped their handes together, and waited vpon Sertorius to his lodging with great and ioyfull showtes, saying, and stedfastly beleuing, that he was a heauenly creature, and beloued of the goddes: whereupon they were maruelously pleased in their mindes, and certainely hoped that their affayres should prosper dayly better and better. An other time hauing straighted his enemies with scarcety of vittells, in the territorie of the SAVNYTINES, he was by force compelled to fight against his will, for that they sent great troupes of men to forrage the contrie, to get vittells. Apon the encounter it was valliantly fought of either side, where Memmius was slaine, (the valliantest Captaine Pompey had) coragiously fighting in the middest of the battell. Sertorius finding him selfe the stronger, followed B his first wing, making great slaughter of those that withstoode him, vntill he came vnto Metellus selfe, who taried his comming, defending him selfe more valliantly than was either hoped, or looked for, in a man of his yeares: insomuch as he was at the last hurt with a partisan. Which was such a dishonor to the ROMANES, not vnto them only that saw it, but vnto such also as heard of it, that being all ashamed to forsake their Captaine, and turning their shame into anger against their enemies: they couered Metellus rounde about with their shieldes and targets, & getting him out of the presse and furie of the fight, gaue such a fierce onset, as they draue the SPANYARDS to flie. Thus fortune chaunging the victory, Sertorius to geue his scattered men time to saue them selues, and leasure also for a new supply (which he caused to be presently leauied) to come at their pleasure: fled of purpose into a citie of the mountaines of C strong scituation, and there setting a good face of the matter repayred the rampers, and fortified the gates, thinking nothing lesse then to abide there to be besieged, but only to lay a baite for his enemies, comming to besiege the citie, hoping they should easily winne it, and in the meane time left pursuing of the barbarous people which had therby good leasure giuen them to saue them selues. Furthermore, they tooke no order to suppresse the new supplie that was comming to Sertorius, who had sent out his Captaines to the next cities & shieres adioyning, to leauie men, with expresse commaundement, that when they had mustered a conuenient number together, they should sende them vnto him, as they did. So when he vnderstoode of their comming, he easily passed through his enemies to meete them, and with them sodainly came backe againe, and harried his enemies worse then before: somtime cutting their vit-D tells from them by land, through his ambushes and continuall suttle policies, being quickely in euerie place whether they thought to go, with his light army: and on the sea also with certaine pirats pinneses, with the which he scoored all the coast apon the sea side. By this meanes, both the Captaines his enemies were compelled to seuer the selues farre one from the other, insomuch as Metellus went to winter in GAVLE, Pompey remained in SPAYNE, (in great scarcetie of all thinges for lacke of money) to winter in the territories of the VACCEIANS, and wrote to the Senate at ROME, that he would returne with his armie into ITALIE, if they sent him not money out of hande, for that he had spent all his owne dayly fighting for the defense of ITALIE. Thus it was certainly thought at ROME, that Sertorius would be in ITALIE before Pompey: bicause he had through his valliancy and great skill brought two of the most famous E Captaines of their time, to great extreamitie and distresse. Then did Metellus showe howe much he feared Sertorius, and how he thought him a great and dreadfull enemie. For he proclaimed by sounde of trompet, that if any ROMANE could kill him, he would geue him an hundred siluer talentes, and twentie thowsand Iugera of land: and if he were a banished man, he promised he should be restored to his contry and goodes againe, buying his death by treason, whome he could not ouercome by force. And furthermore, being his chaunce once to winne a battell of Sertorius, he was so ioconde and prowde for this victorie, that he would needes therefore be called Imperator, to say, Prince, or soueraine Captaine: and was contented the people should sette vp aulters and doe sacrifices vnto him in euerie citie where he F came. And it is furthermore reported of him, that he wore garlandes of flowers on his head, and would be bidden to dissolute bankets, sitting at the table in a triumphing robe: and they made images of victory goe vp and downe the hall, moued by certaine secret engines carying triumphes of golde, and crownes and garlandes of triumphe, and daunsers of goodly young boyes and fayer girles following of them, with ſonges of triumphe in his praiſe. Whereto doubtleſſe he deſerued to be laughed at, ſhewing himſelfe ſo much caried away with ioy and vaine glory, for one ouerthrowe geuen vnto him, whom himſelfe was wont to call Sylles fugitiue, and the remnant of the baniſhed men of Carbo. On thother ſide, Sertorius noble corage was eaſily diſcerned, firſt, for that he called the baniſhed men which were eſcaped frō Rome, and comen to him, Senators: and hauing them about him, called them the Senate, making ſome of them Treaſorers, others Pretors, directing and ordering all thinges according to the manner of his contrie. And in this alſo, that making warres with the ſouldiers of the cities of Spayne, and defraying the ſame at their owne charges, yet he neuer gaue them any authoritie, ſo much as in word, but ruled them alwayes with Romane officers and Captaines: ſaying ſtill, that he fought for the liberty of the people of Rome, and not to increaſe the glorie and power of the Spanyards, to the hurt and diſhonor of the Romanes. For to ſay truly of him, he euer loued his contrie well, and longed much to be ſent for home againe: and yet in his greateſt troubles, when thinges thwarted him moſt, then was his minde greateſt, yeelding no maner of ſhewe or appearance to his enemies, of any faint hart or diſcoragement in him. Againe, when he was in beſt proſperitie, and had moſt aduantage of his enemies, he ſent vnto Metellus and Pompey both, letting them vnderſtand that for his parte he was contented to lay armes aſide, and to liue at home like a priuate man, ſo that he might be lawfully reſtored and called home by edict: and that he had rather be counted the meaneſt citizen in Rome, then being a baniſhed man out of his contry, to be called Emperor of the world. And it is ſaid, that one of the chiefeſt cauſes which made him deſire ſo much to be called home againe, was the tender loue he bare vnto his mother (that had brought him vp from the time of his fathers death) vpon whom he caſt all his loue and delite: inſomuch as after that his frends in Spayne had ſent for him to come to be their Captaine, and that he had bene a while among them, receiuing newes that his mother was departed out of the world, it ſo ſtrake him to the hart, that he had almoſt dyed for ſorrowe. For he lay ſeuen dayes together continually on the grounde weeping, & neuer gaue his ſouldiers the watch word, nor would be ſeene of any of his frends vntil that the other noble men and Captaines of his owne eſtate, came to him to his tent, and were ſo importunate of him by intreaty and perſwaſion, that they gotte him out of his tent to ſhew himſelfe to his ſouldiers, to ſpeake to them, & to take order for his affayres which proſpered very well. By theſe ſignes many haue iudged, that he was of a curteous and pityfull nature, and that naturally he was geuen to be quiet and peaceable: howbeit, that he was forced of neceſſity to take charge of men of warre, bicauſe he coulde not otherwiſe liue quietly nor ſafely, being purſued by his enemies, which would neuer let him reſt, and thereuppon entred into warre, for his owne gard and ſafety. The treaty ſelfe he made with king Mithridates, argued his noble minde. For when Mithridates whome Sylla had ouercomen, was recouerd againe (like a wreſtler that being ouerthrowen getteth vp on his feete to trye an other fall with his enemy) and tooke apon him to inuade Asia: Sertorius fame was then ſo great, that he was ſpoken of through the world, by marchauntes comming from the Weſt, who blew abroade the reporte therof al the Eaſt partes ouer, euen into the realme of Pont, like to marchandiſes which they went to ſeeke for in ſtraunge contries. Whereupon Mithridates being perſwaded by the vaine vauntes of his fauored courtiers, who compared Sertorius to Hanniball, and him ſelfe vnto king Pyrrus, ſaying that the Romanes being ſet apon by them both, could not withſtand two ſuch excellent natures, & great powers together, when the nobleſt Captaine of the world ſhould be ioyned with the greateſt and moſt puiſant Prince that euer was: ſent thereupon his Ambaſſadors into Spayne vnto Sertorius, with full power and commiſſion to promiſe him money and ſhippes towards the maintenaunce and charge of this warre, in recompence whereof he deſired that Sertorius would redeliuer him the poſſeſſion of Asia againe, the which he had ſurrendred vp vnto the Romanes apon the peace made betwext him and Sylla. Sertorius hereupon called his counſell together (which he termed the Senate) to conſult apon this matter. And when they were all of opinion that he ſhould accept Mithridates offers, and were exceedingly glad of the ſame, conſidering that they asked them nothing but a title in the ayer, and a name of things which were not in their power, offring them therfore things

preſent,

A preſent, whereof they had greater neede, yet would Sertorius neuer agree thereunto. Notwithſtanding, thus much he graunted Mithridates, that he ſhould enioy CAPPADOCIA & BITHYNIA, which had euer bene contries ſubiect vnto kings, & whereunto the ROMANES had neuer any right, excepting this ſpecially: that he would neuer ſuffer him to vſurpe any cōtry vnto the which the ROMANES had any iuſt title, and the which he had loſt in warres by force of armes vnto Fimbria, & had afterwardes alſo willingly ſurrendred by agreement made betwene him and Sylla. For he ſayd he would enlarge the Empire of ROME through his victories, but not impayre or hurte it by his conqueſtes. For, a valliant man (ſayed he) ſhould coueit to conquer with honor, but in no wiſe deſire life with diſhonor. His anſwere being reported vnto kinge Mithridates, did much amaze him: and ſome haue wrytten, that he then ſayd vnto his familiars. What would Sertorius commaund vs then, if he ſate among the in the Senate at ROME, B who being an exile now, and remaining in the furtheſt parte of the world by the ſea Atlanticum, doth take apon him to bounde the certaine confines of our kingdome, threatning vs alſo with warres, if we attempt any thing againſt ASIA? All this notwithſtanding, they were agreed apon othes taken betwene them, that Mithridates ſhould enioy the contries of CAPPADOCIA and BITHYNIA, and that Sertorius ſhould ſend him one of his Captaines with aide of men of warre, and that apon performance thereof, the kinge ſhould geue him the ſumme of three thowſande talentes, and fortie ſhippes of warre. So Sertorius ſent thither one of his Captaines called Marcus Marius, a Senator of ROME, who fled to him for ſuccour: with whom Mithridates diſtreſſed certaine cities of ASIA. And when Marius entred into them, C with his ſergeauntes carying the bundells of roddes and axes before him, as before a Proconſull of the ROMANES: Mithridates gaue him the vpper hande, as his better and followed after him. Furthermore, Marius did ſet certaine cities at libertie, and wrote vnto others, declaring vnto them, that Sertorius of his grace and goodneſſe did releaſe them of their taxe and cuſtomes they payed: ſo that poore ASIA which had bene oppreſſed by the couetouſnes of the Treaſorers and farmers of the ROMANES, and alſo by the pride and inſolencie of the ſouldiers which lay in garriſon among them, beganne to haue ſome hope of chaunge, & to deſire that alteration of gouernment, which Sertorius offered. But on thother ſide, the Senators of ROME that were in SPAYNE as baniſhed men in Sertorius armie, and of the like dignitie and eſtate that him ſelfe was of, they hearing ſay that all was well againe at ROME, and perſwading them D ſelues that they ſhould be ſtronge enough for their enemies, hauinge no cauſe to feare any more daunger: beganne then to enuie Sertorius greatneſſe and authoritie, but Perpenna ſpecially amonge other, who by reaſon of his nobilitie being puft vp with a vaine preſumption and ambitious ſelfe will, practiſed to make him ſelfe chiefe of all the armie, and to that ende threwe foorth amongeſt his frendes and familiars ſuch kinde of ſeditious wordes. What curſed fortune (quod he) my frendes doth dayly haunt vs worſe then other, making vs that were vnwilling to obey Sylla (commaunding at this day both lande and ſea at his will) to chooſe rather to forſake our landes and contrie? And nowe being come hither in hope to liue at libertie, we willingly make our ſelues ſlaues, becommīnge Sertorius garde for defence of his perſone in his exile: who to requite vs withall, payeth vs with fayer wordes, calling vs the E Senate, whereat euerie man laugheth to heare vs ſo called, and in fine we muſt abide this diſhonor to be at his commaundement, and drudge and take as much paines, as the SPANYARDS and LVSITANIANS doe them ſelues. Hereuppon the more parte of them being caried away with theſe mutinous wordes, durſt not yet ſhew them ſelues in actuall rebellion againſt Sertorius, being afeard of his authoritie: howebeit ſecretly vnderhande they ouerthrewe his doinges, by ſhewing extreame crueltie vnto the barbarous people, by pretext of iuſtice, impoſing great paymentes apon them, geuing it out it was Sertorius cōmaundement. By which their lewde practiſes, many cities reuolted againſt him, and put them ſelues into his enemies handes: and they daily alſo raiſed new mutinies and rebellions apon him. Furthermore, thoſe whome he ſent to pacifie the tumultes did handle them ſelues in ſuch ſorte, that where they F ſhoulde haue quieted the grudges and rebellions of the people, they ſet them farder out, and procured newe tumultes. Hereupon was Sertorius gentle nature and former goodnes ſo altered, that he committed a moſt cruell act apon all the noble mens children of that land, which

This Manlius loued a young boy exceedingly, & bicauſe he would let him know he loued him well, he told him on a time the whole plat of this conſpiracy, willing him not to reckon any more of others loue but of his, and to loue him only: for he ſhould ſee him a great man before it were longe. The younge boy louinge an other better than him, called Auſidius, went & reuealed vnto him all that Manlius had told him. Auſidius marueled to heare the boy made priuie to it, ſeeing him ſelfe alſo was of the confederacie, and knew not yet that Manlius was one of them. And when the boy alſo named Perpenna, Graecinus, & ſome other whom Auſidius knew well to be of coũſell, he was worſe afrayed then before, but yet ſeemed to make B

This notwithſtanding, departing thence, he went foorthwith vnto Perpenna, and tolde him how their practiſe was diſcouered, declaring further what daunger they were in, if it were not ſpeedily put in execution. All the confederates agreed it was true

They had ſuborned a meſſenger to bring counterfeate letters to Sertorius, feyning in the ſame that one of his Lieutenauntes had won a great battell, in the which he had ſlaine a maruelous number of his enemies. Sertorius being very glad of the good newes, made ſacrifice vnto the goddes to geue them thankes. Now Sertorius did euer vſe great modeſtie at the bourde, and would ſuffer no diſſolute talke nor light partes at his meate, and had acquainted them alſo that vſed his table, to talke of graue and wiſe matters, and yet one to be honeſtly mery with an other, without any playing or vncomely talke. In the middeſt of ſupper, they that ſought occaſion of quarrell, beganne to ſpeake lewde wordes, counterfeating to be dronke, and to play many vile partes of purpoſe to anger Sertorius. Whereuppon Sertorius, D

But all fell out to his vtter deſtruction and ruine, making the world know that he E was a wicked man, who could neither commaund, nor knew how to obey. For he went to aſ-

And yet in that inſtant of his calamitie, he did not vſe him ſelfe like a valliant minded man, and one worthy to rule: for, thinking to ſaue his life, hauing Sertorius letters and wrytinges, he offered Pompey to deliuer him all Sertorius letters ſent him from the chiefeſt Senators of ROME, wrytnew occasion of trouble & sedition. And as for the other conspirators, some of thē afterwards were brought to Pompey, who put them all to death: and the rest of them fled into AFRICKE where they were all ouerthrowen by them of the contrie, and not a man of them scaped, but fell vnfortunately apon thedge of the sworde, Ausidius only except, Manlius companion in loue. Who, either bicause he was not reckened of, or else vnknowen, dyed an olde man in a pelting village of the barbarous people, poore, miserable, and hated of all the world.

DVris the Historiographer wryteth, that Eumenes was borne in the citie of CARDIA in THRACIA, being a cariers sonne of the same contrie, (who for pouertie earned his liuing by carying marchaundises to and fro) and that he was notwithstanding honestly brought vp, as well at schoole, as at other comely exercises. And furthermore, how that he being but a boy, Philip king of MACEDON chaunsing to come through the city of CARDIA, where hauing nothing to do he tooke great pleasure to see the young men of the citie handle their weapons, & boyes to wrestle: and among them, Eumenes shewed such actiuitie, and performed it with so good a grace withall, that Philippe liked the boye well, and tooke him away with him. But sure their reporte seemeth truest, which wryte that Philippe did aduaunce him for the loue he bare to his father, in whose house he had lodged. After the death of Philippe, Eumenes continued his seruice with king Alexander his sonne, where he was thought as wise a man, & as faithfull to his master, as any: and though he was called the Chaunceller or chiefe secretary, yet the king did honor him as much as he did any other of his chiefest frendes & familiars. For he was sent his Lieutenaunt generall of his whole army, against the INDIANS, and was Perdiccas succeffor in the gouernment of his prouince, Perdiccas being preferred vnto Hephæstions charge after his death. Nowe bicause Neoptolemus (that was one of the chiefe Squiers for the body vnto the king) after the death of Alexander told the Lordes of the counsell of MACEDON, that he had serued the king with his shield and speare, and howe Eumenes had followed with his penne and paper: the Lordes laughed him to scorne, knowing that besides many great honors Eumenes had receiued, the king esteemed so well of him, that he did him the honor by mariage to make him his kinseman. For the first Lady that Alexander knew in ASIA, was Barsine Artabazus daughter, by whom he had a sonne, & called his name Hercules: & of two of her sisters he maried the one of them called Apama vnto Ptolomye, & her other sister also called Barsine, he bestowed vpon Eumenes, when he distributed the PERSIAN Ladies among his Lordes and familiars to marrie them. Yet all this notwithstanding, he often fell in disgrace with king Alexander, & stoode in some daunger by meanes of Hephæstion. For Hephæstion following Alexanders courte on a time, hauing appointed Euius a phiphe player a lodging, which Eumenes seruauntes had taken vp for their maister: Eumenes being in a rage, went with one Mentor vnto Alexander, crying out that a mā were better be a phiphe & a common plaier of Tragedies, then a souldier, sithence such kinde of people were preferred before men of seruice that ventured their liues in the warres. Alexander at that present time was as angrie as Eumenes, & roundly tooke vp Hephæstion for it: howbeit immediatly after hauing chaunged his minde, he was much offended with Eumenes, bicause he thought him not to haue vsed that franke speech so much against Hephæstion, as of a certaine presumptuous boldenes towardes him selfe. And at an other time also, when Alexander was sending Nearchus with his army by sea to cleere the coastes of the Occean, it chaunsed the king was without money: whereupon he sent to all his frendes to take vp money in prest, and among others, vnto Eumenes, of whom he requested three hundred talentes. Eumenes lent him but a hundred, and sayd he had much a doe to get him so much of all his tenantes. Alexander sayd nothing to him, neither would he suffer them to take his hundred talentes: but commaunded his officers to set Eumenes tent a fire, bicause he would take him tardy with a lye, before he could geue order to cary away his gold and siluer. Thus was his tent burnt downe to the ground, before they could make shift to saue any thing: the which Alexander repented afterwardes, and was sorie it was burnt, bicause all his letters and wrytinges were burnt withall. Howbeit, after the fire was quenched, they found in niggots of gold and siluer mingled together, aboue a thowsand talentes, and yet Alexander tooke none of it away: but more then that, he sent vnto all his Lieutenauntes, Captaines, and Gouernors of contries, whersoeuer they were, that they should send him copies of all the letters which they before had sent vnto him, bicause all those which he had were burnt, and commaunded Eumenes to take them againe. After that, Eumenes and Hephæstion fell at variance againe, by reason of a gifte that was geuen him, insomuch as very fowle wordes passed betwext Hephæstion and him: yet did not the king geue Eumenes any ill countenaunce at that time. Notwithstanding, shortly after Hephæstion was dead, the king taking his death grieuously whom he loued so derely, gaue no good countenaunce (and was very briefe besides) vnto those whom he knew bare any grudge vnto Hephæstion whiles he liued, & that he thought were glad of his death, but specially vnto Eumenes of all other, whose malice towards Hephæstion was knowen to him well enough: insomuch as he would ofte twyt him withall, remembring him of the iniuries he had offred Hephæstion. But Eumenes being very wise, and one that could take his time, procured his helpe by the selfe same meane that did him hurte: and deuised (to further Alexanders desire, seeking to honor Hephæstions funerall with all pompe possible) newe inuentions to set forth the same, of more magnificence then had before bene seene, sparing for no cost, laying on money bountifully, to make him a rich and stately tombe. Againe, when Alexander was dead, there fell out great variance betwext the MACEDONIAN footemen, and the noble men that had bene neereste about him: and in that quarrell, Eumenes in good will stucke to the Lordes, but in wordes he seemed a newter and frend to both partes: saying, it was not for him being a straunger to thrust him selfe into the quarrells of the MACEDONIANS. And when the other Lordes were departed from BABYLON, Eumenes tarying behinde pacified the greateste parte of the souldiers, and made them more tractable and ready to agree with the Lordes. Whereupon, after the Lordes and Captaines had consulted together, and taken order for those contentions, they deuided the gouernment of the prouinces amonge them which they called Satrapaes: in which partition Eumenes had CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, and all that coast vpon Mare Ponticum, vnto the citie of TRAPEZVNTE, the which at that time was not subiect to Thempire of MACEDON, for Ariarathes kept it then as king. Howbeit it was sayd, that Leonatus and Antigonus would put him in possession of it, with a great and puisant armie, and make him Gouernor there. Yet afterwardes Antigonus made

How Eumenes came to preferrement by the kinges of Macedon.

A none accompt of Perdiccas letters vnto him, putting him in the heade of great imaginations to conquer all, despising all other. And Leonatus also came downe into PHRYGIA, and vndertooke the iorney of this conquest for Eumenes sake. But when he was in iorney thitherwardes, Hecataus, tyran of the CARDIANS, went to him to his army, & prayed him rather to goe helpe Antipater and the other MACEDONIANS, which were besieged in the citie of LAMIA. So Leonatus being willing to take sea, and go thither, went about to perswade Eumenes also to like of it, and to reconcile him with Hecataeus: for they were not frendes one with an other, by reason of a quarrell that Eumenes father had with this Hecataeus, about the gouernment of their citie. Besides that, Eumenes had many times complained of him openly vnto king Alexander, saying, that he was a tyranne, and besought the kinge that it woulde please him to sette the CAR-B DIANS at libertie. And therefore Eumenes refusing that iorney against the GRÆCIANS, alleaging that he was afrayed of Antipater, who had bene his enemy of long time, doubting that for the olde grudge he bare him, & also to gratifie Hecataeus, he would put him to death: Leonatus then reuealed him selfe and his purpose to him, and how he made as though he would passe ouer the sea to ayde Antipater, where in deede his meaning was to take the kingdom of MACEDON. Thereupon he shewed him letters sent him from Cleopatra, willing him to come to the citie of PELLA, and there she would marry him. When Eumenes was made priuy to his purpose: either bicause he feared Antipater, or els for that he had no great good opinion of Leonatus, knowing him to be a fonde man, and very rashe and vnconstant in his doinges, he C stale away from him by night, with those fewe men he had (being about three hundred horsemen, and two hundred footemen well armed) taking all his gold with him, which amounted to the summe of fiue thowsand talentes, and fled with them vnto Perdiccas, vnto whom he bewrayed all Leonatus intent and minde: whereuppon he was immediatly of great credit about him, and called to counsell. Shortly after, Perdiccas brought him into CAPPADOCIA, with a great armie which he him selfe did leade. Where Ariarathes was taken prisoner, and Eumenes established Gouernor of the contrie, who deliuered the charge of the great cities vnto his frendes, and left them there Captaines of garrisons which he appointed, placing euery where, Iudges, Receiuers, Gouernors, and all such other officers necessarie as he thought meete, Perdiccas medling with nothing at all. Notwithstanding, Eumenes went away with Perdiccas a-D gaine, as well to wayte apon him, as also bicause he would euer be about the kinges. But Perdiccas thinking with him selfe that he alone could wel enough performe thenterprise he went about, and considering also that the realme he left behinde him stoode needefull of a wise and skilfull Gouernor, whom he might trust with the safety of his state: when they were in CILICIA, returned Eumenes backe againe, vnder colour to send him to his gouernment, but in dede to keepe the realme of ARMENIA in obedience, the which confined apon the fronters of his contrie whereof he was Gouernor, bicause Neoptolemus did vnder hand practise some alteration. Now though Neoptolemus was a prowde and insolent person, yet Eumenes still deuised to hold him in, and kept him from attemptes, by gentle and fayer wordes. Furthermore, perceiuing also that the regiment of the MACEDONIAN footemen were growen exceding stowt & insolent: he for a strength & defense against them, set vp a cõpany of horsemen, & to bring E it to passe, released all the contriemen from paying of tribute or taxe, being meete to serue a horsebacke, and bought a great number of horse of seruice, which he gaue amongs them that were about him, in which he put his most trust and affiance, making them coragious, by honors and giftes he gaue to them that serued well, and so by continuall exercise and often remouing them from place to place, made them very ready and seruiceable. Thus were the noble men of MACEDON, some much amazed, some others very glad when they sawe howe by this diligence Eumenes had in so shorte a time gotten about him such a number, as sixe thowsand three hundred horsemen. About that time, Craterus and Antigonus hauing subdued the GRÆCIANS, came on with their army into ASIA to ouerthrow Perdiccas greatnes and power: and newes also, that shortly they would inuade CAPPADOCIA. Whereupon Perdiccas being F otherwise occupied in warres, fighting against Ptolomye, made Eumenes his Lieutenaunt generall, and gaue him commission and full authoritie ouer all his souldiers that were for him, either in CAPPADOCIA, or in ARMENIA: and wrote letters vnto Neoptolemus and Alcetas, commaunding them by the same that they should be obedient vnto Eumenes, and suffer him to order all matters according to his discretion. Now for Alcetas, he flatly aunswered, that he would not be at this warre: for the MACEDONIANS vnder his charge were ashamed to take armes against Antipater, and moreouer they would not fight against Craterus, but contrarily were bent to receiue him for their Captaine, so much good will they bare him. Neoptolemus on thother side, was as ready to play the traitor, and to doe Eumenes a shrewde turne, as Alcetas was. For being sent for by Eumenes to come to him, where he should haue obeyed him, he set his men in battell ray to fight with him. There did Eumenes reape the first frute of his wise foresight of the horsemen, which he had set vp to make head against the footemen of the MACEDONIANS. For when his owne footemen were broken and ouerthrowen, he ouercame Neoptolemus, and put him to flight with his horsemen, and tooke all his cariage. Then he made them march in order of battell against the MACEDONIANS, who were dispersed euery where, following the chase of his footemen, whom they had ouerthrowen. Thus cõming apon them in this disorder, he draue them to throwe away their weapons, and to yeelde vnto him: and moreouer, euerie man to take his othe to serue him faithfully in this warre, whersoeuer he would lead them. Now Neoptolemus gathering a few together that fled, went with them vnto Craterus and Antipater: who sent vnto Eumenes to pray him to take their parte, with condition that he should not onely enioy the contries and prouinces still which he had in gouernment, but furthermore that they would geue him others vnto them, and make him stronger then euer he was: besides that by thacceptation of thoffer, he should be taken for Antipaters good frend, where before he was euer reckoned his enemy. Whereunto Eumenes made aunswere: that hauing alwayes bene Antipaters enemy, he could not of a sodaine become his frend, specially seeing him vse his frendes as enemies: howebeit otherwise that he was very willing to make Craterus peace with Perdiccas, and to restore him againe to his fauor, apon reasonable & indifferent condicions. And furthermore, that if he ment to assaile him, that then he would aide him so longe as he had any breath in his bodie, and would lose his life before he woulde breake his promise. This aunswere being brought vnto Antipater, they fel to consult at leasure what was to be done. In the meane space, Neoptolemus that fled apon his ouerthrowe, was come vnto them: who told them how the battell was fought, and besought them both verie instantly, (but Craterus chiefly) to geue him aide if it were possible. For the MACEDONIANS were so farre in loue with him, that if they did but see his hatte, and heare him speake, they would all arme them selues and follow him. For, to speake a troth, Craterus was had in great estimation amõg the MACEDONIANS: insomuch as after Alexanders death, he was more desired of the common souldiers, than any other Captaine, remembring how often he had for their sakes incurred Alexanders disgrace and displeasure, bicause he went about to perswade him to leaue the king of PERSIAES maner, whereunto Alexander by litle and litle gaue him selfe: and also for that he maintained and defended the customes of the contry of MACEDON, the which euery man through pride and excesse beganne to forsake and contemne. At that time therefore Craterus sent Antipater into CILICIA, and he him selfe with Neoptolemus, went against Eumenes with the best parte of his army, hoping to take him tardy and altogether vnprouided, supposing he would geue him selfe to pleasure and pastime, after so late a victorie. But Eumenes like a wise and vigilant Captaine had taken such order, that he heard newes time enough of his enemies comming, and had thereupon prepared his men in readines to resist him. Yet was not this the chiefest point of his skill in warre. For he looked so precisely to his doings, that he did not only kepe his enemies frõ knowledge of any thing that he did, but making his men also to kill Craterus in battell, before they knew against whom they should fight, and to keepe also so dreadfull an enemie from their knowledge: that of all others shewed the passing skill of an expert Captaine. And to worke this feate the better, this was his policie. First, he made a rumor to be spred in his host, how Neoptolemus & Pigres were againe comen against him, with certaine horsemen of all sortes gathered together, CAPPADOCIANS and PAPHLAGONIANS. And when he thought to haue remoued in the night, a great desire of sleepe came apon him, in the which he had a maruelous straunge dreame. For it seemed vnto him that he saw two Alexanders preparing to fight one with an other, either of them leading a battel

Eumenes skill in warre.

A battell of footemen, ranged after the MACEDONIAN facion: who comming to geue charge thone apon the other, came the goddesse Minerua to aide the one, and Ceres likewise to ayde the other. Then him thought that after they had fought a long time together, he whom Minerua aided was ouerthrowen, and that Ceres had gathered eares of corne and made a crowne of them, to geue him that had wonne the field. Hereupon Eumenes perswaded him selfe that this dreame made for him, and promised him victorie, for that he fought for a fertile contrie of corne, where was great plenty of it. For all the fields were sowen with corne in euery place, that it was a pleasure to behold it, shewing the benefit of long peace, to see all the corne fields how greene they looked. But whē he vnderstoode that the enemies had giuen their souldiers for the signall of battell, Minerua and Alexander: then was his first imagination confirmed
B more then before. Whereuppon, he gaue Ceres and Alexander for signall of the battell to his souldiers, and commaunded euery man to make them a garlande of wheate eares to weare on their heades, and that they should wreath flowers and nosegayes about their pikes. He was in a minde many times to make his trustiest Captaines priuie against whome they should fight, and not alone to trust him selfe withall, to keepe so necessary a thing as that secret: yet in fine, he kept his first resolution, thinking it the safest way, not to commit this daunger, but to him selfe. Now when he came to geue battell, he would place neuer a MACEDONIAN directly against Craterus, but set two companies of men of armes that were straungers against him, the which Pharnabazus (Artabazus sonne) and Phœnix Tenedian did lead. Then he specially commaunded, that soosoone as they saw the enemies before thē, they should straight geue charge, C geuing them no leasure to speake nor retire, neither to hearken to any Heraulde or tromper that they should send vnto them: for he feared much that the MACEDONIANS would turne against him, if they once came to know Craterus. Now for him selfe, he led the right wing of his battell, with a troupe of three hundred men at armes, the chiefest men of all his armie, where he should meete full with Neoptolemus fronte. When they had passed a litle hill that stoode betwene both battells, Eumenes horsemen following his commaundement, ranne with full cariere to set apon their enemies. Craterus seeing that, was amazed withall, and banned and cursed Neoptolemus that had deceiued him in that sorte, informing him that the MACEDONIANS would turne of his side, if they might but once see him: notwithstanding, he prayed them that were about him, to shewe them selues like valliant men that day, and therewithall D fiercely set spurres to his horse to meete with his enemies. The encounter was very cruell on either side, and their staues being broken, they fell straight to their swordes: but that day did not Craterus dishonor the memory of Alexander, for he slue many of his enemies round about him, valliantly repulsed them that did assaile him, and many times ouerthrewe them. Yet in fine, one of the men of armes of THRACIA gaue him such a blow on the side, that he turned him of his horse, and when he was downe, many passed ouer him. But Gorgias, one of Eumenes Captaines knowing him, lighted from his horse, and appointed men about him to garde him: howebeit it was too late, for he was drawing on, and euen in the very panges of death, Eumenes and Neoptolemus on thother side, which had bene mortall enemies of long time, being a fire with an old malice, they sought vp and downe thone for the other. So at the two first E courses they could not one light apon thother, but at the third meeting, when they knew one an other, then they set spurres to their horses, their swordes drawen, and with great cries gaue charge apon eche other. And their horses met so fiercely together, as if two armed gallies had met with their prowes: and both the Captaines laying the bridells in their horse neckes, closed together, and with both handes striued to plucke of eche others headpeece, and to rent their polrons from their shoulders. Whilest they were thus tearing eche other, their horses ran from them, and they fell to the ground, one holding the other fast as if they had wrestled together. Neoptolemus got vp first: but as he rose, Eumenes cut the hamme of his legge, & raised him selfe vp withall. Neoptolemus staying him selfe apon one knee, his other legge being very sore hurt, defended him selfe on the ground the best he could, from Eumenes that was on F his feete, but he could geue him no deadly wound: neuertheless him selfe had a blow on the necke, that layed him flat on the grounde. Then Eumenes inflamed with choller against him, went about to strippe him, and fell a reuiling of him, and being in that furious moode, remem-

bred not that Neoptolemus had his ſword yet, who hurt him vnder his curaces, euen about his groyne, not farre from his priuie partes: howebeit the wounde made Eumenes worſe afrayd, then there was cauſe of hurt, for that Neoptolemus ſtrength was gone before the ſtroke came, dying preſently apon it. Eumenes hauing ſtripped him found him ſelf very ill, (by reaſon of his woundes) on his armes and legges, which had many a fore gaſhe: notwithſtanding, he got vp on his horſe againe, and rode towards the other wing of his battell, thinking his enemies had bene fighting ſtill. But there being told that Craterus had his deathes wound, he went ſtraight to the place where he lay, and found him yet aliue, not paſt knowledge. Then Eumenes lighted from his horſe, and wept, and taking him by the right hande, accurſed Neoptolemus that had brought him to that pitiefull ſtate, and had alſo forced him to be in battell againſt one of his deereſt frendes, to make him the inſtrument of his vtter vndoing. This ſecond battell Eumenes wanne tenne dayes after the firſt battell obtained, which got him great honor, for that he had diſcomfited one of his enemies through wiſedome, and the other by valliantnes. But yet this bred him much ill will, not onely of his enemies, but of his frendes alſo that tooke his parte, when they bethought them, that he being a ſtraunger, had with the weapons and power of the MACEDONIANS them ſelues, ſlaine the greateſt and moſt famous Captaine among them. Now if Perdiccas had bene ſo happie, as to haue liued and receiued thaduertiſement of Craterus death: no dout he had bene the greateſt perſon of all the MACEDONIANS. But as ill luck would haue it, within two dayes after that Perdiccas was ſlaine in a mutinie of his men in EGYPT, newes came to his army of Eumenes victorie, and alſo of the death of Craterus. Whereupon the MACEDONIANS were ſo offended with Eumenes, that incontinently they condemned him to dye, & gaue Antigonus and Antipater commiſſion to execute the reuenge. When Eumenes paſſing by mount Ida (where the king kept a race and brede of horſes) had taken away with him as many horſes as he would, and had ſent letters of aduertiſement thereof to the kinges ryders: Antipater, as it is reported, ſmyled, and in mockerie ſayd, that he marueled to ſee Eumenes great care, to thinke that he ſhould either geue or receiue any account of the kinges goodes. So Eumenes thought good to fight in the great plaines of LYDIA, eſpecially neere vnto the chiefe citie of SARDIS, bicauſe he was the ſtronger in horſemen, and for that he would make Cleopatra ſee the power of his armie. Howebeit, being intreated by her (who feared blame of Antipater) he went further into hie PHRYGIA, and wintered in the citie of CELÆNES. But there Polemon, Alcetas, and Docimus, fell in contention with him for leading of the army, ſaying, that they had as much right to leade the army as he. Eumenes aunſwered them, truely here is euen the cõmon ſaying vp and downe: deſperate men regard no daunger. Now Eumenes hauing promiſed his ſouldiers pay within three dayes, to keepe his promeſſe, ſolde them all the farmes & caſtells of that contrie, together with the men and beaſtes of the ſame, whereof the prouince was fully repleniſhed. Thereupon his Lieutenauntes of the bandes hauing bought certaine of them, went and tooke them perforce, through Eumenes engines of battery which he ſuffred them to carie with him: and hauing taken them, they went and deuided the ſpoyle, paying euery ſouldier ratably his wages due. This deuiſe brought him againe in fauor among his ſouldiers. For certaine papers being founde in his campe caſt abroade by his enemies, promiſing great offices, and a hundred talents beſides to any man that killed Eumenes: the MACEDONIANS that ſerued vnder him were ſo offended withall, that they preſently ſet downe an order, that from that time forward a thowſande of the beſt ſouldiers amonge them (which alſo had charge vnder them) ſhould alwayes garde his perſon, keeping watche euery night about him, as fell out by turnes one after an other. Whereunto they all agreed: & Eumenes gaue them thoſe honors and rewardes, which the kinges of MACEDON were wont to geue vnto their frendes, and which they gladly receiued. For through their graunt he had authoritie to geue purple clokes and hattes to whom he thought good, which was the honorableſt gift the kinge of MACEDON could geue. It is true that proſperitie maketh ſimple men high minded, whereby they ſeeme (though they be not) very honorable, but ſpecially when fortune hath raiſed them to honor & wealth. But in deede he that is of a noble minde & ſtowt corage is beſt diſcerned in aduerſitie: for he neuer yeeldeth to any troubles, as appeareth by Eumenes. For when he had loſt a battell among the ORCYNIANS, in the realme of CAPPADOCIA,

The conſtancy of Eumenes in aduerſity.

A era, through the treason of one of his souldiers: he being pursued, yet neuer gaue the traitor any leasure to flie to his enemies for safety, but tooke him, & trussed him vp. And after he had fled for a time, he turned his horse head vpon a sodaine, and leauing his enemies side hand of him that had him in chace, he closely stale by them without their knowledge, & held on ornying so long, vntill he came to the selfe same plaine, where the battell was fought. There he camped, and gathering vp the dead bodies, (the Captaines by them selues, and the souldiers aparte) he burnt them with the dores, gates, and windowes of all the villages & townes thereabouts that he could get together: and in steede of tombes for them, he raised vp great heapes of earth. Insomuch as Antigonus comming thither immediatly after, he wondred much at his valliantnes & inuincible corage. Remouing thence, he met with Antigonus cariage, & might Eumenes stra-
B easily without daunger haue taken a number of prisoners, as well free as bond, & haue gotten tageme.
all the riches & treasure which they had spoyled in so many sundrie warres, townes, and countries: howbeit he was afrayed that if his souldiers were loden with that spoyle, it would make them more heauy to march, and vnable to flie, but specially more tender to abide & run from place to place a long time together, being the only meane wherein he trusted to come to end this warre. For he made account that Antigonus in the end would be weary of following him so long a time, & therefore that he would turne some other way. Moreouer he perceiued that it was vnpossible for him by his authority to keepe the MACEDONIANS from taking for the spray, as offred it selfe vnto them: whereupon he commaunded them to stay a while, & baite their horse first, and then that they should go straight to spoile the enemies cariage. But in the C meane time he secretly sent a messenger to Menander (who had the charge and conduct of all the cariage) to will him to flie with all speede out of the plaine, and to get him to the hanging of a hill not farre from thence, and safe from horsemen, where they could not be enuironned, and there to fortifie him selfe: sending him word also, that he sent him this aduertisement, for the old frendship & acquaintance that had bene betwene them afore. Menander hearing what daunger he was in, made his men trusse vp their cariage straight. Thereupon Eumenes openly sent certaine light armed men to discouer, & to bring him newes: and therwithall commaunded them to arme, and bridle their horses, as if he had ment to haue led them against the enemies. His skowtes were nowe returned, and told him that it was vnpossible either to distresse or take Menander, for that he was fled into a place of such strength, & therefore he was not to D be come by. Eumenes seemed to be very sory for it, howbeit he led his army from thence notwithstanding. Menander afterwards reported this matter to Antigonus, & the MACEDONIANS that were in his army, who did greatly commend Eumenes, & after that loued him better then euer they did before: bicause that hauing their childre in his hands whom he might haue made slaues, & their wiues also whom he might haue defiled, he spared them al. Howbeit Antigonus to put them out of this humor, told them, ye are deceiued, my frendes: for it was not for your sakes, nor yet to pleasure you, that Eumenes tooke not your wiues, your children, & your goods, but only for the feare he had to haue shackles on his heeles, to let him from speedy flying. So Eumenes departing from thence, fled still before Antigonus, & wandring vp & downe, did him selfe with his souldiers to get them somewhere else, either in deede for that he was carefull of E them, or for that he was vnwilling to haue such a number about him, being too fewe to fight a battell, and too many to hide his flying. In fine, he went to a strong place of scituacion called Nora, in the confines of LYCAONIA & CAPPADOCIA, with fiue hundred horsemen, and two hundred footemen well armed. And when he was comen thither also, he gaue euery one leaue to depart that asked him licence, bicause they could not haue abidden the discommodity of the place, which was very straight, & the lacke of necessary victells which they must needes haue wanted, if the siege did continue long: & thus departed from them with very good words and louing countenaunce. Shortly after came Antigonus before the forte, but would not besiege it, before he sent for Eumenes to come to him apon his word. Eumenes answered him, that Antigonus had many of his frendes about him, that after him might come to be the heades of his F tribe, & that him selfe on the other side had not a noble man for whom he fought. And therfore if Antigonus would haue him come and speake with him, that he should sende him one of his chiefest frendes in hostage. Againe Antigonus being earnest with him, and telling him it was

reaſon he ſhould come to him, for that he was the better man, and of greater power: Eumenes aunſwered him, I will acknowledge none better then my ſelfe, ſo long as I can hold my ſword in my hand. In the end, Antigonus (according to Eumenes requeſt) ſent his owne neuew Ptolemy into the forte, and then came Eumenes out. At their meeting they both embraced and ſaluted eche other, as frendes of old acquaintance and familiaritie: and ſo fell in talke of diuers matters: but all this while Eumenes neuer once made requeſt to departe in ſafety, neither yet demaunded pardon, but only deſired the confirmation of his charge & gouernment, and that he might be reſtored to that which was geuen him. They that were preſent at their meeting marueled much at Eumenes, & greatly commended his ſtowtnes. Now whileſt they were thus in talke together, the MACEDONIANS came out of all partes of the campe, to ſee what maner of man Eumenes was: bicauſe that after the death of Craterus there was no talke among the MACEDONIAN ſouldiers, of any Captaine, but of Eumenes. Neuertheleſſe, Antigonus fearing they would do Eumenes ſome miſchiefe, commaunded them alowde to geue backe, and made ſtones to be throwen amonge them to keepe them of him. All this notwithſtandinge he was fayne in the end to put them of with his gard, and to take Eumenes in his armes, and had much a doe to deliuer him ſafely into his forte againe. After this imparlance, Antigonus compaſſed this forte of Nora round about with a wall, and left a ſufficient number of men to continue the ſiege, and ſo went his way with the reſt of his army. In the meane time Eumenes remained beſieged within this forte, where there was plenty of wheate, water, and ſalt, but of no other thing that was good to eate, nor ſwete of taſt, to ſuſteine them with their bread. Yet with ſuch as he had, he kept them in good liking that were in houſe with him. For he made them euery one after an other ſit at his bourde with him, and withall did facion out that manner of dyet, with a certaine life and familiarity of pleaſaunt deuiſes to entertaine them at their meate. For beſides that he ſought to ſhewe them as pleaſaunt a countenaunce as he coulde, yet naturally he had a ſweete fayer face, not looking like a man of warre, that all the dayes of his life had bene trained vp in it: but like a freſh youth, being of ſuch a conſtitution of bodie, that the excelleneteſt workeman that euer was could not better ſet out all the partes and proportion of a man, then were naturally to be ſeene in him. His ſpeeche was not harſh nor churliſhe, but very mylde, and pleaſaunt, as appeareth by the letters he wrote. Now for the ſiege, there was nothing that more annoyed the beſieged, then the narrownes of the forte wherein they were, which was not aboue two furlonges compaſſe about, and their houſes ſo litle and narrowe, that they could ſcant turne them in them: and did eate and drinke without any manner of exerciſe for them ſelues, or their horſe. Now Eumenes to take away the ſluggiſhneſſe that groweth by idleneſſe, (a thing moſt hurtefull to them that are acquainted with trauell and paines) to keepe them in breth, and to make them the lighter to flie, if occaſion were offered: put his men into the longeſt & wideſt hall he had in his houſe, (being fourteene cubits long to walke vp and downe in) and taught them firſt of all to march fayer and ſoftly, and then by litle & litle to haſten their pace. For the horſes he had, them he made to be girt before, one after an other, & then did ſoftly triſe them vp with long pulleyes faſtned to the beames: their hindmoſt feete ſtanding on the ground, & their formoſt being aloft. The horſes being triſed vp in this maner, their riders came with lowde cries behinde them, & ſome with whippes in their hands to laſh them, that the horſe being mad withall, yerked out behind, & ſprang forward with his formeſt legges to touch the ground, that they did but euen raſe it a litle, ſo as euery vaine and ſinew of them were ſtrained by this meanes, that they blue, and were all of a ſome withall, ſo good an exerciſe to thē it was, as well to put them in breth, as to kepe their legges ſupple to run. After that, they had their otes very cleane pickt & dreſſed, that they might diſgeſt them the ſooner. Antigonus hauing long continued this ſiege, newes came vnto him that Antipater was dead in MACEDON, & that the realme was in a great broyle, through the factions of Caſſander & Polyperchon. Antigonus, whoſe head was ſtraight full of great imaginations, greedily coueting with him ſelfe the whole kingdom of MACEDON: thought good to make Eumenes his frende, that through his helpe he might attaine his deſired purpoſe. Thereupon he ſent Hyeronymus vnto him to treate of peace, and gaue him the forme of the othe which he would haue him ſweare vnto him. When Eumenes had ſeene it, he would not be ſworne in that maner, but corrected it,

A & sayd: that he did referre him selfe to the iudgement of the MACEDONIANS which kept him besieged, to iudge which of those two formes were most meetest: that which Antigonus had sent him, or the same which he had corrected. For in Antigonus forme of othe, there was a litle mencion only made at the beginning of the blood royall, but in all the rest following, he bound Eumenes particularly to him selfe. But Eumenes in his forme of othe, did first of all put Olympias the mother of kinge Alexander, and the kinges his sonnes afterwardes: and for the rest, he sware he would be frende of the frendes, and enemie of the enemies, not of Antigonus onely, but of the kinges, and of Olympias. The MACEDONIANS being at the siege before Nora, did better like the forme of Eumenes othe, than they did that of Antigonus. So hauing geuen Eumenes his othe, & made him sweare according to that forme: they raised their siege, B and sent also vnto Antigonus to take his othe. All this accomplished, Eumenes redeliuered the CAPPADOCIANS their hostages, (which he had kept in Nora with him) and they that came for them, gaue him in their steade, horse of warre, beastes of cariage, tentes and pauillions. Thus he beganne to gather his men againe together, which were dispersed abroade after his ouerthrowe, so that in fewe dayes he was aboue a thowsande horsemen, with whom he fled, fearing yet Antigonus, and he did wisely. For Antigonus had not onely commaunded them to shutte him vp againe straighter then he was before: but besides that wrote sharpe letters and verie angrily vnto the MACEDONIANS, which had accepted the correction of the othe. Whileste Eumenes wandered vp & downe flying still, he receiued letters from certaine in MACEDONIA (fearing Antigonus greatnesse) and specially from Olympias: which sent vnto him C to come into MACEDON, to take the charge and gouernment of her young sonne Alexander, whome they sought to put to death. Furthermore, he likewise receiued letters from Polyperchon and from king Philippe, who commaunded him to make warre with Antigonus with his armie he had in CAPPADOCIA, and to put in his purse of the kinges, fiue hundred siluer talentes (which had bene taken from him before) which were in the citie of CYNDES, and besides, to defraye the charges of the warres, as much as he thought meete. And therewithall also they wrote vnto Antigenes and Teutamus, the two Captaines of the Argyraspides: to wit, the souldiers with the siluer shieldes, or shieldes siluered, which were of the olde bandes of Alexanders armie. These two Captaines hauinge receiued these letters, did vse Eumenes with very good wordes, & shewed him great countenaunce: yet a man by their lookes might D easily coniecture that they enuied him, for either of them both thought them selues men sufficient, and worthie to commaunde Eumenes, not to aide him. Howebeit Eumenes behaued him selfe very wisely. For as touching their enuie, he pacified that, bicause he tooke not the money which he was cõmaunded to take for his owne vse, for that he had no neede of it. And as for their ambition and presumption, disdaining to be commaunded by him, though they could neither tell howe to commaunde nor obey: he did reclaime them, by a superstition he layed before them, which was this. He made them beleue that Alexander did appeare to him in his sleepe, and that he shewed him a pauillion sumptuously sette out in the state and magnificence of a king, in the which was a royall throne: and tolde him, that if they would kepe their councell place in that pauilion, he would be present among them, and ayde them E in all their councells and conduct of their warres, so that they would alwayes beginne by him. He easily perswaded Antigenes and Teutamus to beleue that which he spake, who would not goe to him to consult of any matters: neither did he thinke it honorable for him selfe to be seene to go to other mens gates. Wherefore with all their consents they incontinently set vp a goodly rich pauilion, which was called Alexanders pauillion: and there they kept their councells and assemblies for dispatch of all their weightiest causes. After this, they went towardes the hie contries and met with Peucestas on the way, (Eumenes very great frende) who ioyned with them, and other great peeres of the realme, with all their power besides. This did greatly strengthen the armie of the noble men of MACEDONIA, as touching the number of men, and their braue armors and furniture: but for their owne persones, bicause they had no man F to commaunde them since the death of Alexander, they were growen selfe willed by dissolute libertie, and effeminate in their maner of life: and moreouer they had gotten a tyrannicall fiercenesse, nourished & increased by the vanities of the barbarous people. So that many of them being then together, could not be quiet one with an other, but ſhamefully flattered the old bandes of the MACEDONIAN ſouldiers, geuing them money, and making them bankets and feaſtes of ſacrifices. And thus in ſhorte time, of a campe they brought it to be a diſſolute tauerne, where the noble men got the ſouldiers fauor that they might be choſen chieftaines of all the armie: like as the common peoples voyces are bought in free cities (where the people doe rule) to be preferred to honorable ſtates and offices of the common wealth. Now Eumenes found ſtraight that theſe pieres of the realme diſdained one an other, howbeit that they all feared and miſtruſted him, and ſought but for oportunity to kill him. Wherefore to preuent this, he made as though he had occaſion to occupie money, and ſo borrowed a great ſumme of thē eſpecially, whom he knew moſt hated him: to the end that from thenceforth they ſhould no more diſtruſt, but truſt him, ſtanding in feare to loſe the money they had lent him. And thereof followed a ſtraunge thing: for other mens money and goodes, was the ſafetie of his life. For where others geue money to ſaue their liues, he by taking of money ſaued his owne life. Now for the ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS, whileſt they ſawe they were without daunger of enemies to make them afraied, they ſtil hong apon them that gaue them, being deſirous to be made Generalles: and came euery morning to their vpriſing to waite apon them, and follow them whereſoeuer they went. But when Antigonus was come to campe hard by them with a great and puiſant army, and that their caſe required then a valliant Captaine and skilfull leader: not the ſouldiers alone, but all the pieres and ſtates beſides, (which in peace did braue it out) did then willingly (without motion made) ſubmit them ſelues vnto Eumenes, to be at his commaundement. For when Antigonus aſſaied all the wayes he could to paſſe ouer the riuer of Paſitigris, the pieres which were layed in diuers places to let him from paſſing ouer, heard nothing of it, ſo that there was none but Eumenes onely that reſiſted him, and fought with him: where he ſlewe ſuch a number of his men, that he filled the riuer with them, and tooke foure thowſande of them priſoners. Againe, when Eumenes was ſicke, theſe olde bandes did more plainly ſhew, what opinion they had of him, and of others: to wit, that they could banket them, and make them good cheere at their houſes, yet that Eumenes onely of all other was worthieſt to be their Captaine, and to commaunde them. For Peuceſtas hauing feaſted them in the kingdom of PERSIA, and geuen euery ſouldier a mutton to ſacrifice, thought he had wonne great fauor & credit among them. But ſhortly after, as the army marched againſt their enemies, Eumenes by misfortune fell daungerouſly ſicke, & therfore would needes be caried in a litter farre from the campe, to be out of the noyſe, bicauſe he could take no reſt. But they had not gone farre, before they ſaw their enemies, which hauing paſſed ouer certaine litle hills betwene them, were comming downe into the valley. When the ſouldiers ſawe the gliſtering of the gilt armors of their enemies, that glared in the ſunne, and the good order they marched withall in battell ray, the Elephantes with the towers apon their backes, and the men at armes with their purple coates apon their armors: (which was the apparell they wore when they went to fight with their enemies) then the formeſt ſtayed apon it, and cried out, willing them to ſend for Eumenes to lead them, for they would els goe no further if they had not him for their Generall. And therewithall they raiſed their pykes, & layed downe their ſhieldes at their feete, calling from one to an other to ſtay, & to their priuate Captaines alſo: and told them plainly, that they would not ſturre a foote from thence, nor fight at all, vnleſſe Eumenes were among them to lead them. Eumenes hearing of it, came to them with great ſpeede, haſtening his ſlaues and littermen to bring him thither: and then opening his litter on euery ſide, he held out his right hand to the ſouldiers, and tolde them he was very glad of the good opinion they had of him. The ſouldiers alſo ſo ſoone as they ſawe him, ſaluted him in the MACEDONIAN tongue, and tooke vp their ſhieldes, clapping them againſt their pykes with a great ſhowte, bidding their enemies come when they would, they ſhoulde be fought withall, now that their Captaine was among them. Antigonus on thother ſide, being informed by certaine priſoners which his ſouldiers had taken in skermiſh, that Eumenes was fallen very ſore ſicke, and by reaſon thereof was caried in a litter: thought nowe he ſhould haue no great a doe to diſcomfit the reſt of the army, and therefore made all poſſible ſpeede he could to fight. But when he came ſo neere, that he might eaſily ſee the order and countenaunce of his

A his enemies, who were ſet in ſuch good order of battell, that it could not any wayes be amended: he was much amaſed withall, and pawſed a great while, and in the meane time ſpied Eumenes litter a farre of, caried from one end of the battell to the other, whereat he laughed out alowed, as his maner was, and turning him ſelfe to his frendes, ſayd. See, ſayd he, I beleue it is that litter that maketh warre with vs, and doth offer vs battell. But with thoſe wordes, he ſounded the retreate, & brought his men backe againe into his campe. When this feare was a litle paſſed ouer, the MACEDONIANS fell to their olde trade againe, the pieres to flatter the ſouldiers, and the ſouldiers to waxe braue and ſtowte againſt their Captaines: ſo that when they came to take their garriſons for the winter time, they deuided in maner among them the whole contrie of the GABENIANS, the firſt from the laſt being lodged almoſt a thowſand furB longe of. Which Antigonus vnderſtanding, determined to ſet apon them, they miſtruſting nothing. And ſo went ſodainly towards them, by a ſhorter way then that he had already commen, but the worſer way a great deale, and where no water was to be had: in hope that if he met them thus diſperſed aſunder, their Captaines could not readily aſſemble them all together. But while he was in this his iorney, in the deſert crooked way, he was ſo ouertaken, and with ſuch boyſterous windes and extreame bitter cold, that his ſouldiers could go no further, but were forced to tary ſtil, to prouide them preſent remedy againſt the fury of the time. Now the onely remedy they had, was to make numbers of fires: and by them their enemies knewe of their comming. For the barbarous people inhabiting the mountaines towardes the deſert, being amaſed to ſee ſuch a number of fires in the valley, ſent preſently with ſpeede apon two C camells light loden, to aduertiſe Peuceſtas, who being neereſt vnto the mountaine was ſo ſcared with theſe newes, that he was at his wittes end, not knowing what to doe. For, ſeeing his other companions as much afrayed as him ſelfe, he fled apon it, and caried all them with him which he met in his way. But Eumenes quieted this great feare, aſſuring them that he would ſtay the ſodaine attempt of their enemies, and that they ſhould come three dayes later than they looked for: which they beleued. Then did Eumenes ſende meſſengers into euery quarter to all the Captaines, commaunding them ſpeedily to put their men in readineſſe, and to meete him at a certaine place which he appointed. Him ſelfe in the meane time went with other Captaines to chooſe a fit grounde to lodge a campe, the which might eaſily be ſeene from the toppe of the mountaines, which they muſt paſſe that come from the deſert: & there D fortified the ſame with trenches, and deuided it out into quarters, making fire in euery place, ſuch a diſtance of one from an other, as they vſe commonly to make in a campe. It was no ſooner done, but Antigonus came to the toppe of the mountaines, and ſawe theſe fires a farre of, which grieued him much: for he thought that his enemies had longe before knowen of his comming, and that they came againſt him. Being afrayed therfore leaſt his enemies would compell him to fight, comming freſhe apon him, his owne men being weary and done with the paines they had abidden, comminge through that deſert contrie: he tooke his way to lead backe his armie, not the neereſt way by the which he came, but through the contry richly inhabited and repleniſhed with great cities and good townes, to refreſhe his ouerwearied people. Yet ſeeing he had none alaroms geuen, nor any skermiſhes offered him, (as they vſe E commonly when both armies are neere together) and that the valley men told him that they had ſeene none other armie but his, ſauing that round about there was ſtore of fires: then he ſtraight miſtruſted that it was one of Eumenes ſtratageames of warre, wherewith he had deceiued him. And therewithall he was in ſuch a rage, that he went ſtraight to the place where he thought to finde him, determining no more to ſteale apon him, but to put all to the haſard of a battell. But in the meane time, the moſt parte of the hoaſt was gathered about Eumenes, for the great eſtimacion euery man had of his wiſdom and ſufficiency: inſomuch that they agreed and ordained, that he only as their Lieutenaunt generall ſhould commaund the whole army. This ſpited the two Captaines of the Argyraſpides, Antigenes & Teutamus, who bare him ſuch an inward grudge, that from that time forth, they practiſed his death: & aſſembling together F with many of the ſtates & particular Captaines, they ſat in councell to know when, & in what ſorte they ſhould kill him. Howbeit the moſt voices aſſembled in this councell, were whole of opiniō, that they ſhould take the benefit of his ſeruice in leading the battel, & that immediatly after they ſhould put him to death. This being thus reſolued apon, Eudamus Captaine of the Elephants, and an other called Phædimus, went ſecretly and told Eumenes what they had concluded apon in the aſſembly againſt him, not for any good will that they bare him, or for that they ſought to pleaſure him, but only bicauſe they were afrayed to looſe the money they had lent him. Eumenes gaue them great thankes, and commended their fidelity, and then reported it vnto his beſt frendes, and tolde them: you ſee howe I am enuironned with a troupe of wilde and brutiſhe beaſtes. That done, he made his will, and tare all the letters and wrytinges that had bene ſent him, bicauſe he would not haue them ſuffer for him after his death, that had ſent him ſecret aduertiſementes. Afterwardes when he had diſpoſed of all his priuate matters in this ſorte, he ſtoode in a doute whether he ſhoulde loſe the battell geuing his enemies the victorie, or whether it were better for him to flie into CAPPADOCIA, through MEDIA and ARMENIA. Howebeit he reſolued of nothing before his frendes. But when the miſchiefe he was in had put diuers thoughtes into his head, in fine he determined to fight, and did ſet his army in battell ray, perſwading the GRÆCIANS as well as the barbarous people to ſtand to it like men. And as for the olde ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS, they ſo litle needed exhortation, that they them ſelues did exhorte Eumenes to be of good corage, ſaying: that their enemies would neuer abide them, bicauſe they were all the oldeſt ſouldiers, and of greateſt experience, that had bene in all the conqueſtes of kinge Philippe, and of his ſonne Alexander, and that it was neuer heard that they had bene ouerthrowen in any ſette battell, the moſt of them being three ſcore and tenne yeares olde, and the youngeſt no leſſe then three ſcore. Whereupon, when they ranne with great furie to geue charge apon their enemies, they cried out alowde ſpeaking to the ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS that were vnder Antigonus: Ah wretches, come ye to fight with your fathers? And ſo aſſailing them with a luſtie corage, and in a rage withall, in a ſhorte ſpace ouerthrew the ſquadron of their enemies, & ſlue the moſt parte of them in the fielde. Thus was Antigonus armie cleane ouerthrowen on that ſide: but on the other ſide where his men of armes were, through Peuceſtas cowardlineſſe (that handeled him ſelfe very ill at that battell) he had the vpper hande, and wanne all their cariage, through his foreſight in the greateſt furie of the battell, and the ſtrength of the place where the battell was fought. For it was a maruelous great plaine of length, neither too depe, nor yet to hard vnderfoote, but couered ouer with a ſmall fine ſand, much like to the drie ſand the ſea caſteth vp, & leaueth apon the ſhore. This ſand being ſcattered abroade by riding and going to & fro of ſo many thowſandes of men and horſes during the time of the battell foughten, had raiſed ſuch a mightie duſt and white ſmoke in the element, as if they had ſturred or tempered white lime together, which troubled their ſight ſo ſore, as they could ſee nothing before them: in reſpect whereof Antigonus might eaſily ſeaſe all their cariage, them ſelues being neuer a whit the wiſer. The battell being come to this paſſe you haue heard, Teutamus ſent preſently vnto Antigonus, to pray him to redeliuer them their cariage againe, which he had taken & caried into his campe. Antigonus made him aunſwere, that he would not only redeliuer the goodes vnto the ARGYRASPIDES, but would moreouer vſe them with all the fauor he could, ſo farre foorth as they deliuered Eumenes into his handes. Whereupon the ARGYRASPIDES tooke preſently a wicked reſolution, to deliuer him aliue into the handes of his enemies. And with that determination they came neere vnto him, not makinge any countenaunce as though they would lay handes on him, but rather ſeeming to garde and defend his perſone as their manner was: ſome of them lamenting that their goods were gone: others telling him that he cared not now that he had wonne the battell: and others accuſing the noble men of cowardlines, ſaying, that the fault was in them that they had not the whole victorie. But in fine, one of thē hauing ſpied his time, flew to him, and tooke his ſword out of his hande: the others ſtraight layed hold of him, and bound both his handes behinde him with his owne girdle. Antigonus vnderſtanding it, ſent Nicanor thither to take him out of their handes, and to bring him to him. Then Eumenes hauing made requeſt vnto them to ſuffer him to ſpeake, as they brought him through the bandes of theſe olde MACEDONIAN ſouldiers: it was graunted him with condicion, that he ſhould make no motion vnto them to turne from that they were determinated to doe, but to tell them of thinges, which (as he ſayd) tended greatly to their benefite. Whereuppon ſilence being Eumenes conflict with Antigonus.

Eumenes betrayed by the Argyraſpides.

A being made, he goo vp apon a litle hillocke, and there spake vnto them, putting forth his hands being bound. O wretched and faithlesse men, the wickedest that euer Macedon bred. What so great triumphe, or victorie, hath euer Antigonus wonne of you, hauing sought it by such infinite wayes: and you your selues doe now put into his handes, deliuering him your Captaine bound and manacled? Will not this be to your great shame, that being masters of the fielde, you will graunt the honor of the victory vnto your enemy, only for a litle couetousnesse of money and paltry stuffe which you haue lost? And yet is not this all, but the worst behinde: to send your Captaine as you do to paythe ransome of your baggage. For my selfe, though now they lead me bound, yet doe I remaine free vnouercome, vanquisher of mine enemies, & sold by them that should be my frendes. Well, yet this request I onely make vnto you, in the name B of Iupiter, protector of armes, and for the honor of the goddes, (vnto whom all vowed othes ought faithfully to be kept) I pray and coniure you, to kill me your selues in this place. For all commeth to one end, To be slaine in Antigonus campe by the hands of mine owne enemies, will euer be counted your deede: and you may be assured he will not be angrie withall, for he only desireth Eumenes death, and not his life. If you will needes hold your hands from this attempt, vnlose yet one of mine only: that shall suffice to doe the feate. And if for feare ye will not put a sworde in my hande, throw me bound yet hands and feete vnto wilde beastes: which if ye performe, then doe I discharge you of your othe taken betwene both my handes, which ye haue sworne vnto your Captaine, as holily and perfectly performed. Apon this speeche of Eumenes, all the rest of the army had compassion of him, that they wept for tender affection. But C the Argyraspides cried out to cary him away, and not to geue eare to his preaching: and that it was a good deede to punishe this wicked Cherronesian, according to his desertes, considering that he had turmoyled the Macedonians with endlesse warre and battell. And moreouer, that it were too much shame that the worthiest souldiers that euer serued kinge Philippe & Alexander, so painfully in all their warres, should for recompence of their seruice in their olde age be turned a begging, their wiues hauing now lyen three nightes with their enemies. With those wordes, they violently draue him on towardes Antigonus campe, who fearing least the multitude of people that ranne to see him, would smother him in the preasse, because euery man ranne out of the campe: he sent thither tenne of the strongest Elephantes he had, and a good number of men of armes of the Medes and Parthians, to make way for D him in the preasse. When Eumenes was now come into Antigonus campe, his hurt would not serue him to see him in that miserable state, for that they had once beene familiarly acquainted together. Whereupon, such as had him in their custodie, came to Antigonus to aske him, how he would haue him kept. Who aunswered them: like a Lyon, or an Elephant. Yet within a while after he tooke pitie of him, and discharged him of his weightiest irons, and sent one of his household seruaunts to him to see him well vsed, and suffered his frendes to come & bring him any thing he lacked. Thus did Antigonus deferre many dayes, before he would determine ought of Eumenes, hearing euery man speake, and pondering their purposes and seuerall opinions. Nearchus Cretan, and his owne sonne Demetrius spake for Eumenes, and made suite to saue his life, contrarie to all the other Lordes and Captaines that were about Antigonus, who E would in any case haue him dye. Eumenes standing in these termes, asked his keeper Onomarchus one day, what Antigonus ment, that hauing his enemy in his hands, he did not quickly rid him out of his paine, or nobly deliuer him? Onomarchus churlishly aunswered him againe, that the time was past nowe to shewe his corage, as though he feared not death: and that he should haue shewed it in the field at the battell. So helpe me Iupiter (quod he) so haue I done, and if thou beleuest not me, aske them that set apon me: for I neuer met with man yet more strong then my selfe. Onomarchus replied againe: sith now therefore thou hast found a stronger than thy selfe, why then canst thou not abide his pleasure? In fine, when Antigonus had resolued of his death, he commaunded them to geue him no more meate: and thus taking his sustenaunce from him, Eumenes was three dayes a dying. In the meane time came such newes, F that sodainely the campe remoued: and therefore before their departure, a man was sent to Eumenes to dispatche him out of his paine. Antigonus licensed his frends to take his body and burne it, and then to gather his ashes and bones to send them to his wife & children. Eumenes being slaine in this manner, the gods appointed none other iudges to reuenge the disloyall and treason of the ARGYRASPIDES and their Captaines, for betraying of Eumenes, but Antigonius selfe: who detestinge them as cruell murderers, and periured persones to the goddes, appointed Sibyrtius Gouernor of the prouince of ARACHOSIA, to kill them euerie mother sonne what way he coulde, that none of them might euer see MACEDON againe, nor the Greekishe sea.

THE COMPARISON OF Eumenes with Sertorius.

HEre haue we set downe the thinges worthie memorie of Eumenes and Sertorius: Nowe to compare them together, in this they were both alike: that they being straungers in a straunge contrie, and banished out of their owne, had alwayes bene Captaines of diuers nations, and chiefetaines of great and warlicke armies. But this was proper to Sertorius, that all those of his faction gaue him the chiefest place of authoritie, as the most sufficientest man among them, and worthiest to commaund: where Eumenes hauing many that contended against him for the chiefe rule and conduction of the armie, through his noble deedes, obtained the chiefe place and authoritie in the same. So that they obeyed the one, desiring to be gouerned by a good Captaine: & for their owne safety gaue place to the other, seeing themselues vnable to commaund. For Sertorius being a ROMANE, gouerned the SPANYARDS and LVSITANIANS: and Eumenes a CHERSONESIAN, the MACEDONIANS. Of the which, the SPANYARDS of long time had bene subiect to the Empire of ROME: and the MACEDONIANS at that time had subdued all the worlde. Furthermore, Sertorius beinge then of great estimation for that he was a Senatour of ROME, and had had charge of men of warre before, came to the dignity & estate to be chiefetaine of a great army. Where Eumenes came with small reputacion, disdained for that he was but a secretarie: and when he began to come forwardes, had not only lesse meanes to preferre him then Sertorius had, but greater lets & impedimentes also, to hinder his rising and estimation. For many openly stoode against him, and secretly conspired his death: and not as Sertorius, whom no man contraried from the beginning, vntill his latter ende, when certaine of his companions secretly conspired against him. Therefore Sertorius ende of all his daungers, was to ouercome his enemies: where Eumenes greatest daungers came through his victories, which he wanne of his owne men, through the malice of them that enuied his honor. Nowe for their deedes of armes, they are both in maner alike: but on thother side for their conditions, Eumenes naturally loued warre and contention: and Sertorius imbraced peace & quietnes. For, Eumenes that might haue liued in safety with honor, if he would but haue geuen place to his betters, and forsaken the warres: liked better with the daunger of his life to followe martiall feates, with the greateſt perſonages of MACEDON, and in the end ſo came to his death. Sertorius contrarily being vnwilling to come in trouble, was forced for the ſafetie of his perſon to take armes againſt them, that would not let him liue in peace. For had not Eumenes bene ſo ambitious and ſtowte to ſtriue againſt Antigonus for the chiefeſt place of authoritie, but could haue bene contented with the ſeconde, Antigonus would haue bene right glad thereof: where Pompey would neuer ſo much as ſuffer Sertorius to liue in reſt. So, the one made voluntary warre onely to rule, and the other againſt his wil was compelled to rule, becauſe they made warres with him. Wherby it appeareth that Eumenes naturally loued warre, preferringe the couetous deſire of a better eſtate, aboue the ſafety of his life: and the other as a right ſouldier, vſed the warres only for a meane to ſaue his life by valiãt defence of armes. Furthermore, the one was ſlaine, miſtruſting no treaſon againſt him: and the other, looking euery hower for preſent death threatned him. Whereof the one argued a noble minde, not to miſtruſt them whom he thought his frendes: and the other ſhewed a faint hart, being taken when he ment to flie. So Sertorius death diſhonored not his life, ſuffering that of his owne companions, which his deadly foes could neuer make him ſuffer. The other hauing no power to auoide his deſtinie before he was taken, and hauing ſought meanes to liue being in priſon and captiuitie: could neither paciently nor manfully abide his death. For, begging life at his enemies handes, he gaue him his hart with his body, who before had but his body in his power.

Sertorius death more honeſt, then the death of Eumenes.

THE LIFE OF Ageſilaus.

Archidamus the ſonne of Zeuxidamus, hauing honorably raigned in LACEDÆMON, left two ſonnes behind him: Agis which he begate of that noble Lady Lampridо, & Ageſilaus a great deale younger, which he had by Eupolia, Meliſſippidas daughter. So the kingdom falling by ſucceſſion vnto Agis the elder, the younger ſonne Ageſilaus remaining a priuate perſon, was brought vp after the LACONIAN manner, which was a ſtraight kind of life: but withal it taught children how to obey. Wherof it is thought the Poet Simonides calleth SPARTA, Damaſimbrotos: to wit, making men ciuill: for that by continuance of cuſtome, it frameth the citizens to be obedient to the lawes, as much, or more, than any other city that euer was in the world, taming them from their childhoode, as they doe young colres. The law dispenseth with the heires apparant to the crowne, from that straight subiection & hard life: but Agesilaus had that excellencie in him aboue all others of his estate, that he came to the dignity and honor to commaund, hauing from his youth learned to obey. The which vndoutedly was the cause, that he knewe better than any other king, howe to please and beare with his subiectes, helping his royall estate & princely behauior, grafted in him by nature, with that curteste and familiarity which he had attained by education. At that time when he went in company with the boyes which were brought vp together, Lysander fell in loue with him, wondering at the modesty of his wit. For hauing better spirite, and being more constant in his opinion, than any of the other children, striuing euer to excell in all things, with such a vehemency he tooke all trauells in hande, that it was vnpossible to ouercome him, much lesse to compell him. He was on thother side so milde & gentle, that euery curteous word wrought in him better obedience, than any feare could doe: bicause it grieued him more to be reproued, then to take vpon him any paine or labor. And for the deformitie of his legge, the one being shorter than the other, in the flower of his youth, through his pleasaunt wit, he vsed the matter so pleasauntly and paciently, that he would merily mocke him selfe: which maner of mery behauior did greatly hide the blame of the bleamish. Yea further, his life & corage was the more commendable in him, for that men sawe that notwithstanding his lamenes, he refused no paines nor labor. Of his person we haue drawen no counterfeate, bicause he woulde not in any wise haue it drawen, and did expressely commaund by his will, that they should neither draw his picture, nor make any mowld or image of his body. How beit we finde that he was of small stature, wherby his presence promised no great matters to them that beheld him. Yet for that he was euer mery and pleasaunt, and neuer pensiue nor troublesome in word nor looke, euen to the last ende of his life he was better loued, then the most fayer creature that liued. Notwithstanding, the Ephori (as Theophrastus writeth) did condemne king Archidamus in a summe of money bicause he maried a litle woman: saying that he would beget them demy kings, no kinges in deede. In the time that his eldest sonne Agis raigned king, Alcibiades being banished Athens, fled out of Sicile into Lacedæmon, and had not long remained in Sparta before they suspected him, that he kept king Agis wife, called Timæa: for which cause Agis would not acknowledge the childe she brought to be his sonne, saying that Alcibiades had begotten him. But Timæa cared not much for it, as Duris writeth: for otherwhile as she sate amongest her women, softly she called him Alcibiades, not Leotychides. On thother side they reporte, that Alcibiades him selfe sayd, it was for no hurt he ment to any man, that he lay with Queene Timæa, but only for the desire he had that some of the kinges of Lacedæmon should be begotten of his seede. Neuertheles at the length he was driuen to forsake Lacedæmon, mistrusting king Agis, who euer after douted of the childe, & thought him a bastard: vntill such time as being on his death bed, Leotychides falling on his knees, wept, and so behaued him selfe, that Agis before many witnesses, said he did acknowledge him for his sonne. This notwithstanding, when king Agis was dead, Lysander that had then ouercomen the Athenians by sea, & was more in credit & authority in the city of Sparta, than any other: practised to put the crowne apon Agesilaus head, saying, that Leotychides had no interest vnto it, bicause he was a bastard. The like did diuers other citizens say of him, which loued Agesilaus vertue, and liked him passingly, for that he had bene brought vp from his childhood among them. But on the contrary parte also, there was a Soothsayer or wisard in Sparta, called Diopithes, that had a number of old prophecies without booke, & was accounted a very skilfull man touching prophecies and diuinations. He maintained that it was not lawfull for any lame man to be king of Sparta: and for proose thereof he told this auncient oracle before the counsell.

Agesilaus learned to obey, before he came to commaund.

As stately as thy stomake is ô Sparta take good heede,
And stand vpon thy gard, and looke about thee I thee reede.
For halting one day downe vvill cast thine Empire to the ground, By meane of vvarres and troubles great that shall inclose thee round.

Lysander replied against it, saying, that if the Spartans were afrayed of this oracle, they should rather beware of Leotychides. For the goddes cared not, if any man lame of a foote aspired

A spired to be king: but rather if he were a bastard, and not lineally descended of the race of Hercules. For that, sayd he, were to make the kingdom halte. Agesilaus furthermore alleaged, that the god Neptune him selfe had witnessed, that Leotychides was a bastard: for he draue Agis by an earthquake, to runne out of his wiues chamber, and that tenne monethes after that, and more, Leotychides was borne. So was Agesilaus apon these allegacions not onely proclaimed king of SPARTA; but he had geuen him moreouer, as lawful heire, all his brother Agis goods, and Leotychides reiected as a bastard. Notwithstanding, considering that his parentes by his mothers side were very poore, (yet honest men) he left them the moyty of all the goodes: by which act, Agesilaus wanne all their good willes, where else they had enuied him for his succession in the kingdom. And (as Xenophon sayth) by obeying his contrie, he grew to such po-B wer that he might doe whatsoeuer he would. The Ephori and Senatours at that time bare all the sway and gouernment of the common wealth, the Ephores office chaunging yearely, the other being for life: the which Ephori were only ordained to bridle the insolency of the kings, for that they should not (as we haue more amply wrytten in Lycurgus life) haue absolute power in their handes. Vppon this occasion, the kinges that succeeded in the gouernment, had (as it were) by inheritaunce, a present grudge and malice against them. This notwithstanding, Agesilaus tooke a contrary course to all his predecessors. For where others presently quarelled with the Ephori and Senatours, Agesilaus did honor and reuerence them, and would neuer dispatche any matter without their priuity, but was alwayes ready to goe when they did send him. When he was set in his chaier of state to geue audience, if any of the Ephori chaunsed to C come in, he would rise vp vnto them: and at the election of any new Senatour, he would for honors sake present him a gowne, and an oxe. And thus cunningly seeming to honor and increase the dignity of the Senatours, winning their good wills, he made his power great, & the realme much greater. Furthermore, his behauior towards the rest of his contrymen was such, as his enmity was lesse faulty thē his frendship. For he did neuer hurt his enemies without iust cause, but he aided his frends euen in vniust causes. And wheras he thought it a shame not to honor enemies, when they had done well: he could not finde in his hart to rebuke his frendes when they did amisse, but rather gloried in succoring & helping of them in their euill doings. For he thought it no shame to serue his frendes turne, howsoeuer it were. Againe, when any of his aduersaries offended, he was as sory for it as any man, and as readie to beare with it if he D were intreated: whereby he allured and wanne the hartes of all men. The Ephori seeing that, and fearing his power, punished him in mony for that he made the common loue of his contrie priuate to him selfe. For, as naturall Philosophers holde opinion, that if contention and strife were taken out of nature, it would come to passe that the heauenly bodies should stand still, and also that the generation of all thinges should be at a stay, by reason of the mutuall agreement betwene the worlde and them: euen so, the lawemaker of LACEDÆMON seemeth to haue allowed ambition & strife in the common wealth, as a spurre to vertue, by procuring alwayes some contencion and emulacion amonge great persones. And his reason was that this base and effeminate fauor, in winking one at an other, when men are to be rebuked, ought not of right to be called by the name of concorde. And sure some thinke that Homer also saw E the same, for he would neuer else haue made Agamemnon to haue reioyced to see Vlysses and Achilles at great wordes together, if he had not bene of opinion, that enuy and contencion among great men, were very auailable for the common wealth. Yet is not this thus simply to be allowed: for contentions are hurtfull to cities, where they are violent: and doe bring great daungers with them. Nowe when Agesilaus was entred into his kingdome of LACEDÆMON, newes were brought him out of ASIA, that the king of PERSIA prepared a great nauy to conquer the LACEDÆMONIANS signory by sea. Lysander being glad of this occasion, longing to be sent againe into ASIA to succour his frends whom he had left there as Gouernors & Lieutenants of cities & prouinces (of the which, some of them were driuen away by their citizens, others also put to death for abusing of their authority & ruling ouercruelly:) perswaded Age-
F silaus to goe into ASIA, to make warre apon this barbarous king, farre from GRÆCE, before his army were gathered together. And to cōpasse this the easilier, he wrote vnto his frends in ASIA that they should send vnto SPARTA, to require Agesilaus for their Captaine, and so they did. Thereupon Ageſilaus going to the aſſembly of the people, accepted the charge, with condition that they would geue him thirtie Captaines of the SPARTANS to be counſellers & aſſiſtants to him in theſe warres, two thowſand free ILOTES, & ſix thowſand of the confederates of LACEDÆMON. All this was immediatly graunted through Lyſanders frendſhippe towards him, and he was ſent away ſtraight with the thirty Captaines which he had requeſted: of the which Lyſander was the chiefeſt, not only for his riches and authoritie, but alſo for the good will he bare vnto Ageſilaus: who thought him ſelfe more beholding to him for procuring him this charge, than for his frendſhip he ſhewed him in bringing him to be king. Now Ageſilaus army being aſſembled at the hauen of Geræſte, him ſelfe with certaine of his frends went vnto the citie of AVLIDE, where in his ſleepe he drempt that one ſayd vnto him: O king of the LACEDÆMONIANS, thou knoweſt that neuer none but Agamemnon, & now thy ſelfe, was choſen Generall of all GREECE, conſidering therefore that thou commaundeſt the ſame people he did, that thou makeſt warres with the ſelfe ſame enemies, departing from the ſelfe ſame place to goe thither, it is reaſon that thou make the ſelfe ſame ſacrifice vnto the goddeſſe, the which he made at his like departure. Ageſilaus ſtraight apon this viſion, remembred that Agamemnon through the perſwaſion of the Soothſayers did ſacrifice his owne daughter in the ſame place. Yet this made him not afrayed, but the next day he told it to his frendes, and ſaid he would ſacrifice that vnto the goddeſſe, which he thought woulde pleaſe her well enough, and that he would not followe that cruell deuotion of this auncient Captaine Agamemnon. And with that, he brought a hynde crowned with a garland of flowers, and commaunded his Soothſayer to ſacrifice her: and would not ſuffer him to haue the honor to doe the ſacrifice that was appointed for the ſame purpoſe by the Gouernors of BOEOTIA, according to the cuſtome of that place. The Gouernors of BOEOTIA vnderſtanding it, were much offended, and ſent their officers to will Ageſilaus not to doe any ſacrifice there, contrarie to the law and cuſtome of their contrie. The officers that were ſent, performed their commiſſion: and finding that the beaſt was ſlaine, & the quarters of it apon the aulter, they tooke and flong them of the aulter euery way. This vexed Ageſilaus being readie to imbarke, and departed thence in choller againſt the THEBANS, and miſtruſted much his good ſucceſſe by this vnluckie prediction, which ſeemed to prognoſticate vnto him, that he ſhould not preuaile according to his deſire. Furthermore, when he was arriued at EPHESVS, he preſently miſliked the honor he ſaw done vnto Lyſander, and the great traine that waited on him. For all the contriemen there repaired continually to his houſe, that when he came abroade, they all followed him wherſoeuer he went: as though Lyſander had in deede bene in authority to doe what he would, and that Ageſilaus only had but the name to be general, ſo appointed by the law of LACEDÆMON. For in troth there was neuer GRÆCIAN Captaine in thoſe partes that had won him ſuch eſtimation, nor that was more feared than he: nor there was neuer man that was more beneficial to his frends, neither alſo that was more hurtfull to his enemies. All theſe thinges being freſh in memorie, the contriemen of that contrie perceiuing the ſimplicity of Ageſilaus, and howe he was geuen to pleaſe the people, and caried no great maieſtie nor countenaunce with him, and obſeruing in Lyſander that wonted roughnes and ſharpe ſpeech wherewith they had bene acquainted before: euery man obeied him, and nothing was done but what he commaunded. This firſt of all made the other SPARTANS angrie, for that it appeared they were come as it were to ſerue Lyſander, and not as to counſell the king: but after that, Ageſilaus him ſelfe alſo grew miſcontented, although of his owne nature he was not enuious nor ſorie to ſee others honored beſides him ſelfe. Yet being a man ambitiouſly geuen, and of a noble corage, fearing if he ſhould doe any noble exployt in this warre, that they would impute it vnto Lyſander, for the great eſtimation he was of: he firſt beganne to deale in this ſorte with him. Firſt he contraried all his counſells: and what matters ſoeuer he preferred, which he was deſirous ſhould haue taken effect, Ageſilaus would none of that, but tooke ſome other in hand. Furthermore, if any of Lyſanders followers came to make ſute to him for his fauor, perceiuing that they did leane vnto Lyſander: he ſent them away without any thing done for them. In like caſe alſo in matters of iudgements, if Lyſander were againſt any, they were ſure to haue the matter paſſe on their ſide. On the contrarie parte alſo, if Lyſander bare good will to the partie, and fauored the

A the cause to gratifie him: they hardly escaped from setting a fine of their heades. Agesilaus continuing these shewes ordinarily of purpose, not by chaunce to one or two, but indifferently to all: Lysander looking into the cause, dissembled not with his frendes, but told them plainly that it was for his sake they had those repulses and wronges, and therefore did counsell them to waite apon the king, and those that had more credit then him selfe. Now Agesilaus supposed he gaue that aduise to make euery man to malice him: wherfore, to despite him the more, he made him distributer of his vittells, (& hauing done so) some say that he spake these words in open presence of many: nowe let them goe and honor my flesh distributer. Lysander being grieued withall, sayd vnto the king: my Lord, you know how to oppresse your frendes. And to doe I, sayd Agesilaus, how to keepe them vnder, that would be greater than my selfe. It may B be yet, replied Lysander, I haue not done as your grace doth say: yet if you so conceiue of me, put me I beseeche you in some place of charge or office, where I may doe you good seruice without offence. After this talke betwene thē, Agesilaus sent him into HELLESPONT, where by practise he tooke prisoner a noble man a PERSIAN, called Spithridates, out of Pharnabazus prouince whereof he was Gouernor, and brought him to Agesilaus with a great summe of golde and siluer, and neere about two hundred horsemen with him. All this notwithstanding, he forgate not his grudge to Agesilaus, but being offended stil, fought oportunitie and meanes to defeate the two houses of the priuilege of the kingdome, and to bring it in common to all the other houses of SPARTA: and surely he had made great broyle (in my opinion) in the city of SPARTA, had he not bene preuēted by death, in a iorney he made into BOEOTIA. Thus we C see, that ambitious mindes obseruing no meane, are in a common weale oftimes more hurtfull, than beneficiall. For though Lysander was in deede intollerable, to shew him selfe so ambitious, and out of time: yet was not Agesilaus ignoraunt neither, that there were diuers other meanes lesse reprochful to punish such a noble man, that offended only by gredines of honor. But to tell you my opinion, they were both blinded with one selfe passion: the one not to know his Princes power, & the other not to beare with his frendes imperfection. Now Tisaphernes at the first being afrayed of Agesilaus, made league with him, colourably letting him vnderstand that the king would be content to set the cities of GRÆCE in ASIA at liberty. Notwithstanding, when he thought he had gathered force sufficient to fight with him, he proclaimed warre. Agesilaus was very well content withall: for the expectation was great of him through D all GRÆCE, that he would doe some noble exployt in this iorney. Moreouer he thought him selfe dishonored for euer, that the tenne thowsande GRÆCIANS which were returned backe from the furthest parte of ASIA, euen vnto the sea Maior (vnder the conduct and leading of Xenophon their Captaine) had ouercome the king of PERSIAES army as oft as they listed thē selues: and that he which was the Lieutenaunt generall of the LACEDÆMONIANS (who at that time commaunded both sea and lande) should not doe some deede worthie memorie among the GRÆCIANS. Presently therefore to reuenge Tisaphernes periurie by iust deceit, he made a countenaunce as though he would first inuade the contrie of CARIA. Whereuppon, this barbarous person Tisaphernes, gathered all his power together. But Agesilaus on a sodaine returned backe againe, and entred into PHRYGIA, tooke there many cities, and wonne great E spoyle, making his men see by experience, that to infringe & breake a league made & allowed by othe, was a sacriledge, and contemning of the goddes. On thother side also, that to beguile his enemies, it was not only iust and honorable: but also profitable and pleasant. Now Agesilaus being weaker in horsemen than his enemy, and finding the liuers of the beastes which he had sacrificed, without heades, returned into the citie of EPHESVS, and there gathered horsemen together, letting the richmen vnderstand (which would not them selues serue in person) that he did dispense with their persons, so that they did set out a horse and man furnished for seruice in their place. Many of them tooke that course, & by this meanes Agesilaus within few dayes had leauied a great number of men of armes, in steade of footemen that could doe small seruice. For they that were vnwilling to goe to the warres, did hier them that were willing to F serue in their place: and such also as would not serue a horseback, did geue them pay that were desirous to serue in their steades. In this he wisely followed king Agamemnons example, who did dispense with the person of a riche coward for going to the warres, by taking a good mare of him. Then Ageſilaus had commaunded them that ſold the priſoners by the dromme taken in the warres, that they ſhould ſtrippe them naked, & ſo ſell them: which they did. And ſundry perſons willingly bought their ſpoyles and rayment, but they ſcorned their bodies, becauſe they ſawe them white skinned, ſoft, and delicate: ſo that fewe men would out bid the price for them, for that they thought thoſe men vnprofitable and good for nothing. Ageſilaus alſo being preſent at this ſale of purpoſe, ſayd thus vnto his men. See, my frendes, quod he: theſe be the men againſt whom ye are to fight, and here be the ſpoyles for the which ye ſhall fight. Time being come now to put him ſelfe into the field, and to inuade his enemies contry againe, he gaue it out that he would enter LYDIA, not meaning to deceiue Tiſaphernes againe, but Tiſaphernes deceiued him ſelfe. For he being deceiued before by Ageſilaus, gaue no credit to this ſecond rumor, but perſwaded him ſelfe that doutleſſe Ageſilaus ment then to enter into CARIA, & the rather for that it was a woddie contrie, very ill for horſemen, in the which he was the weaker. This notwithſtanding, Ageſilaus inuading (as he had geuen it out) the champion contry, in the which ſtoode SARDIS, the capitall city of LYDIA: Tiſaphernes was compelled to come to reskue it in haſt, and being come thither with great ſpeede with his horſemen, he ſtale apon many of his enemies whom he found ſtraggling out of order, ſpoyling the contrie, & put the moſt of them to the ſword. Ageſilaus hauing intelligence of this, imagined with him ſelfe that the footemen of his enemy could not yet be arriued, & conſidering alſo that he had his army whole about him: thought it beſt forthwith to bid him battel, rather thē to delay time any lenger. Thereupon he thruſt in among the horſemen his light armed footemen, and commaunded them ſtraight to charge the enemy, whileſt he cauſed the heauier armed mē to follow at their heeles, as they did. But the barbarous people fled apon it immediatly: and the GRÆCIANS luſtely following the chaſe, tooke their campe, & made great ſlaughter of them that fled. After this field foughten, they had leaſure enough not only to ſpoyle & ouetrun the kinges contry at their pleaſure, but alſo to ſee the reuenge taken of Tiſaphernes, that was a vile man, and a cruell enemie to the GRÆCIANS. For the king of PERSIA made an other his Lieutenaunt immediatly in his roome, called Tithrauſtes: who ſtrake of Tiſaphernes head, and ſent vnto Ageſilaus to pray him to take peace with them, and to offer him ſtore of golde and ſiluer to departe out of his contrie. Thereto Ageſilaus aunſwered, that for peace, it was not in him to make it, but in the LACEDÆMONIANS: and that for his owne parte, it was an eaſier matter to enriche his ſouldiers, than him ſelfe. And furthermore, that the GRÆCIANS thought it diſhonor to them, to take any gift of their enemies, other then ſpoyles. This notwithſtanding, to gratifie Tithrauſtes ſomewhat, for that he had taken reuenge of a common enemy of all the GRÆCIANS: for the ſumme of thirtie talentes geuen him to defray his charges, he withdrue his army out of LYDIA, and went into PHRYGIA. In his iorney he receiued from the counſell of LACEDÆMON, the Scytala, or ſcrolle of parchement wreathed about, aduertiſing him that the citizens had made him alſo their Generall by ſea, as he was by lande. Ageſilaus onely of all men obtained this honor, who without cōpariſon was of all other the worthieſt man of fame in his time, as Theopompus witneſſeth: and yet gloried rather to be commended for his vertue, than for the greatnes of his authority. In this notwithſtanding he was to be blamed, when he made choyſe of one Piſander his wiues brother, to be Lieutenaunt of the nauy, & forſooke other Captaines of better experience and elder yeares: ſeeking rather to pleaſe his wife, and to aduaunce one of his kinne, than to regarde the weale and ſafety of his contrie. Afterwardes he led his army into Pharnabazus contrie which he had in charge, where he founde not onely plenty of all ſortes of vittells, but gathered together alſo a wonderfull maſſe of money. From thence he went into the realme of PAPHLAGONIA, and made league there with kinge Cotys who for his vertue and conſtant fidelity, was very deſirous of his frendſhip. The like did Spithridates, forſaking Pharnabazus, and came vnto Ageſilaus: and after he was come to him, he neuer went from him, but alwayes followed him whereſoeuer he went. Spithridates had a young ſonne that was paſſing faier, called Megabetes, (of whom Ageſilaus had great liking) and likewiſe a fayer young woman to his daughter, of age to be maried, whom Ageſilaus cauſed king Cotys to marry. So, taking of king Cotys a thowſand horſemen and two thowſand footemen light armed, he returned backe into PHRYGIA, and there deſtroyed Pharnabazus contrie

A which he had in gouernment, who durſt not meete him in the fielde, nor truſt to his holdes, but ſtill fled from him, carying all his chiefeſt thinges with him, flitting from place to place: vntill that Spithridates, accompanied with Erippidas the SPARTAN, followed him ſo neere, that he tooke his campe, and all his treaſure in it. But there did Erippidas ſhewe him ſelfe ſo hard and cruell, ouerſtraightly ſearching out parte of the ſpoyle that had bene imbeaceled, compelling the barbarous people to deliuer it againe, ranſacking euery corner for it: that Spithridates was ſo offended withall, that on a ſodaine he tooke the PAPHLAGONIANS with him, and went backe vnto the citie of SARDIS. This more grieued Ageſilaus, than any thing that happened to him in all his iorney: for that he had loſt ſo valliant a man as Spithridates, and ſuch a number of good ſouldiers as he caried away with him. Moreouer, he was afrayed leaſt B they would detect him of miſerable couetouſnes, a thing which he euer was carefull to auoid, not onely in his owne perſone, but alſo to keepe all his contriemen from it. But beſides theſe knowen cauſes, the loue he bare to Spithridates ſonne pinched him neerely: though when the boy was with him, he ſtriued with his owne nature to ſubdue that naughty affection and deſire he had of him. For when Megabates on a time came to make much of him, & to kiſſe him: Ageſilaus turned his face from the boy. The boy being aſhamed of the repulſe, durſt no more come ſo familiarly, but ſaluted him aloofe of. Ageſilaus then repenting him that he had not ſuffered Megabates to kiſſe him, made as though he marueled why he did not kiſſe him as he was wont to doe. Then aunſwered ſome of his familliars about him: your ſelfe, O king, is in faulte, bicauſe you durſt not tarie, but were afrayed to kiſſe ſo fayer a boy. For if he knewe C your minde, he would come againe, ſo that you turned your face no more away. When Ageſilaus had heard them, he pawſed a while, and ſaid neuer a word, but in fine aunſwered them: It ſhall not neede you ſay any thing to him, for it would doe me more good I could refuſe ſuch an other kiſſe againe, then if all that I ſee before me were golde. Thus was Ageſilaus diſpoſed whē Megabates was with him: but in his abſence he did ſo loue him, that I dare ſcantly ſay, that if the boy had come againe into his preſence, he would haue refuſed a kiſſe at his hands. After that, Pharnabazus ſought to ſpeake with him, and one Apollophanes a CYZICENIAN brought them together, that was a frende vnto them both. Ageſilaus was the firſt that met at the place appointed with his frends, and tarying for Pharnabazus comming, he layed him downe vpon the depe graſſe in the ſhadow, vnder a fayer great tree. Pharnabazus alſo came thither, & they D ſpred ſoft skinnes long heared, and tapeſtry excellently wrought of diuers colours, for him to ſit on apon the grounde. But being aſhamed to ſee Ageſilaus laied on the bare grounde in that ſorte, he alſo lay downe by him, though he had vppon him a maruelous riche gowne, of excellent tiſſue & paſſing colour. Now when they had embraced one an other, Pharnabazus began firſt to ſpeake, and lacked no good perſwaſions & iuſt complaints, for that he hauing bene (as he was) a frende vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS in the warre againſt the ATHENIANS, was then ſpoyled and ſacked by them. Ageſilaus then finding that the SPARTANS that were about him at that meting, hong downe their heades for ſhame, not knowing how to aunſwere him, conſidering that Pharnabazus had iniury offered him: began to ſpeake in this maner. Hereto- fore when we were frendes with the king (my Lord Pharnabazus) we haue vſed his goodes like E frends, but now that we are his enemies, like enemies we vſe them: and ſence we ſee that thou wilt needes be a ſlaue of his, marueil not though we hurt thee for his ſake. But when thou ſhalt like rather to be a frend of the GRÆCIANS, then a ſlaue to the king of PERSIA: then make account, that all theſe ſouldiers, this armor, our ſhippes, and all we are to defend thy goodes and liberty againſt him, without which, nothing that is honeſt can be looked for of mortall men. Thereupon Pharnabazus told him his minde plainly: ſurely, ſayd he, if the king doe ſende hither any other Captaine to be his Lieutenaunt, be ſure I will then take your parte ſtraight. But on thother ſide, if he make me his Lieutenaunt in this warre, truſt to it, I will do him the beſt ſeruice I can againſt you. This aunſwere paſſingly pleaſed Ageſilaus, who taking him by the hand, and riſing vp with him, ſayd vnto him. I would wish (my Lord Pharnabazus) hauing F ſo noble a minde as thou haſt, that thou were rather our frend, then an enemy. So Pharnabazus departing from thence with his men, his ſonne being left behinde, ranne to Ageſilaus, and ſmiling told him. King Ageſilaus, I will make thee my frend: and therewith gaue him a dart he had in his hande. Ageſilaus tooke it of him, and liking well the beawtie of the young youth, and the curteſie he had offred him, looked about him if any man in his company had any proper thing that he might beſtow on him. At the laſt he ſpied his ſecretarie Adeus horſe, which had a rich capariſſon on: he ſtraight tooke it from him, and gaue the horſe & furniture to this liuely youth Pharnabazus ſonne, who neuer after forgate it. For it chaunſed afterwardes that being driuen out of his contrie by his brethren, and flying into PELOPONNESVS, Ageſilaus made very much of him, and did not ſticke to further him in his loue abroade. For he had a great fancie and liking to a boy of ATHENS, whome they brought vp in wreſtling, one day to play for the beſt games. But when he was growen a bigge man and ſtrong, and that he came to offer him ſelfe to be billed with them that ſhould wraſtle at the games Olympicall, being in ſome perill to be vtterly refuſed: this PERSIAN that loued him, went vnto Ageſilaus, and beſought his helpe, that this wraſtler might not receiue the foyle to be reiected. Ageſilaus being deſirous to pleaſure him, performed his requeſt with ſome difficultie. Thus Ageſilaus in all thinges elſe was a ſtraight obſeruer of the law: but in his frendes cauſes to be ſtraight laced in matters of iuſtice, he ſayd that was but an excuſe for them that would do nothing for their frendes. To this effect, they finde a letter of his wrytten vnto Idrian, Prince of CARIA, for the deliuerie of his frende. If Nicias haue not offended, lette him goe: if he haue offended, then pardon him for my ſake. But howeſoeuer it be, let him goe. This was Ageſilaus manner in the moſt parte of his frends cauſes. Notwithſtanding, occaſions fell out oftentimes, that he rather inclined to the benefit of the common wealth. As appeared one day when he was driuen to remoue in haſte on a ſodaine, and to leaue one ſicke behinde him whome he loued deerelie: the ſicke man callinge him by his name as he was going his way, beſought him that he would not forſake him. Ageſilaus (as Hieronymus the Philoſopher reporteth) turned backe againe, and ſayed: O howe hard is it both to loue, and to be wiſe. Nowe had Ageſilaus ſpent two yeares in this warre, and was ſpoken of throughout ASIA, beinge maruelouſly commended to the kinge him ſelfe, for his great honeſtie, his continencie, his curteſie and plaine dealing. For when he rode out into the contrie with his owne trayne onely, he would euer lye in the holyeſt temples of the goddes: bicauſe he woulde the goddes them ſelues ſhoulde be witneſſes of his priuate doinges, whereas commonly we are lothe that men ſhoulde ſee what we doe. Furthermore, amongeſt ſo many thowſande ſouldiers as were in his campe, there coulde hardlie be founde a worſe mattriſſe, then that him ſelfe did lye apon euerie night. And as for heate and colde, he coulde as eaſilie awaie with either of both, as if by conſtitution of bodie he had bene borne to abide anie weather and ſeaſon. But aboue all, it was a pleaſaunt ſight to the GRÆCIANS that dwelt in ASIA, when they ſawe the great Lordes, the kinges Lieutenauntes of PERSIA, (which before were prowde, cruell, riche, and geuen to all luſt and pleaſure) to honor and feare a man that went vp and downe in a poore cape, beinge affrayed of euerie ſhorte worde that he ſpake like a LACONIAN: inſomuch as many of them called to minde Timotheus the Poetes verſes, who ſayd, Ageſilaus to his frendes, was without reſpect a frend.

As Mars hath no mercie, ſo Greece ſkorneth gold.

Now all ASIA being vp and in garboile, they willingly yelding to him in euery place, after he had taken order with the cities, & had ſtabliſhed the liberty of their cõmon weale, without any bloodſhed, or baniſhment of any perſon: he determined to goe further, into the land, and tranſporting the warres from the ſea coaſtes of GRÆCE, to fight with the king of PERSIA in proper perſon, and with the wealth & happines of the ECBATANIANS and the SVSIANIANS, and by that meanes to take his leaſure from him, who ſitting ſtil before, made the GRÆCIANS make warre one with an other, by force of money, corrupting the Gouernours of euery citie. In the meane time came Epycidas LACONIAN vnto him, and brought him newes how SPARTA was grieuouſly troubled with warres, enforced on them by the other GRÆCIANS: & that therefore the Ephori did ſend for him home, and commaunded him to returne to defend his contrie.

Ageſilaus ſent for out of Aſia.

Ah vvretched Greece, howv cruell ſlaughters haſt Thou brought vpon thee, for to lay thee vvaſt?

A For how should a man otherwise call this enuie, treason, and ciuill conspiracie among the Grecians? Who ouerthrew their good fortune that made them happy before, turning their warres against the barbarous people, out of Greece, and now to bring it against themselues. I am not of Demaratus opinion the Corinthian, that sayd the Grecians delight was taken from them, which sawe not Alexander the great sitting in Darius royall throne: but rather I would thinke they should haue wept, to haue left this honor vnto Alexander and the Macedonians, fondly losing so many famous Captaines of Greece, at the battells of Leuctres, of Coronea, of Corinthe, and of Arcadia. Neuertheless, Agesilaus neuer did better acte in his life, nor euer shewed better example of obedience and iustice due to his contrie, than he did in his returne home. For sithe Hannibal that beganne to haue ill successe in his B warres, being in manner driuen out of Italie, thought neuer (but compelled) to returne againe into his contrie, to obey his contriemen, which called him home to defend the warre the Romanes made at their owne dores: and that Alexander the great also being sent for home vppon the like occasion did not onely refuse to returne into Macedon, but made a iest at it, when newes was brought him of the great battell which his Lieutenaunt Antipater had fought with kinge Agis, saying, me thinkes when I heare these newes, whilest we are ouercomming of kinge Darius here, there hath bene a battell of Ladies fought in Arcadia. Sith then (I say) these two famous Captaines haue made so litle account of their contrie, may we not thinke the citie of Sparta blessed to haue had such a kinge, that so much reuerenced his contrie and obeyed the lawe as receiuing onely a litle scrolle of parchement C commaunding him to returne, he forsooke a worlde of goodes and wealth that he quietly enioyed (with assured hope and certaintie of more) and imbarked foorthwith, leauing all the alies and confederates of his contrie verie sorowefull, for that he had geuen ouer so noble an enterprise, which he had so happely begonne? Yes sure. Nay furthermore, he passed not for the saying of Demostratus Phæacian, who sayd, that the Lacedæmonians in publicke matters were the worthiest men, and the Athenians in priuate causes. For as he had shewed him selfe a good king and an excellent Captaine to the common wealth: so was he alwayes curteous priuately to his familiar frendes. And bicause the Persian coyne was stamped on the one side, with the print of an archer: Agesilaus being readie to departe, sayd, that tenne thowsand archers draue him out of Asia. For so much was brought vnto Thebes and D Athens, and distributed among the Orators and Gouernours there, who through their Orations made both those great cities to rise, and make warre against the Spartans. In his returne, Agesilaus hauing passed the straight of Hellespont, tooke his way through the contrie of Thracia, and neuer intreated barbarous kinge nor people to suffer him to passe, but only sent vnto them to know whether they would he should passe through their contries as a frende, or an enemie. All contries and nacions else receiued him very honorably to their power, saue the people called the Trochalians, vnto whom king Xerxes him selfe gaue presentes that he might passe frendly through their contry: who sent vnto Agesilaus to demaund a hundred siluer talentes, and a hundred women to suffer him to passe through their contrie. But Agesilaus laughing them to scorne, aunswered againe: why, how chanceth it that they E came not them selues to receiue them? So therewithall he marched forwarde against these barbarous people who were ranged in battell raye to stoppe his passage: howbeit he ouerthrewe them, and slue a great number of them in the fielde. The like demaund he made vnto the kinge of Macedon, whether he should passe through his contrie as a frende, or an enemie. The king made him aunswere, he would consider of it. Well, let him thinke of it, quod Agesilaus: we will goe on in the meane time. The king then wondering at his great boldenes, and fearing least he would doe him some hurte as he went: sent to pray him that he woulde passe through his contrie as a frend. Now it chaunced so that the Thessalians at that time were in league with the enemies of the Lacedæmonians: therefore as he passed through their contrie, he did spoyle and forage it as his enemies contrie, and sent Xenocles and Scytha F to the citie of Larisse, hopinge to perswade them to take parte with the Lacedæmonians. These two Ambassadours were retained there as prisoners. The Spartans were marueilously offended withall: and thought good that Agesilaus should besiege Larisse with his army. But he answered them, he would not lose one of those men, to winne all Thessalie A and therefore found meanes that he redeemed them againe by composition. Peraduenture this is not to be marueled at in Agesilaus, that newes being brought him on a time, that in a great battell fought by the citie of Corinthe, where were many worthie and valliant Captaines slaine of the enemies, and but few of the Spartans: he seemed not to reioice at it, but rather to fetche a grieuous sigh, saying. O poore Græce, how vnfortunate art thou to haue slaine with thine owne handes so many valliant Captaines of thine owne people, as ioyning together, might at one field haue ouercome all the barbarous people. The Pharsalians harrying and troubling the rereward of Agesilaus armie, he put foorth fiue hundred horsemen which gaue them so lustie a charge, that he ouerthrew them by force. For this victorie, he set vp tokens of triumphe apon the mountaine called Narthacium, and this victory pleased him B aboue all the rest, bicause with the small number of horsemen which he had gotten together of him selfe, he had ouerthrowen the glory & pride of the enemies horsemen in battell, whereof they had vaunted many yeares before. Thither came Diphridas one of the Ephores vnto him, sent of purpose from Sparta, to commaund him immediatly to inuade Boeotia with his armie. Nowe though Agesilaus intended some other time with a greater power to enter Boeotia, yet bicause he would not disobey the counsells commaundement of Sparta: he told his men straight, that the battell for the which they returned out of Asia, was at hande, and therefore he sent for two companies of them which lay in campe by Corinthe. The Lacedæmonians that were at Sparta, to honor Agesilaus for that he had obeyed their commaundement so readily: proclaimed in the citie, that as many young men as were desi- C rous to goe aide the king, should come and enter their names. Notwithstanding, they onely chose but fiftie of the valliantest among them, and sent them vnto him. In the meane time, Agesilaus passed through the contrie of Thermopyles, and coasting ouer the lande of Phocyde, confederates to the Lacedæmonians, he entred into Boeotia, and camped by the citie of Chæronea: where immediatly after his arriuall, he sodainly saw the sunne eclipsed, and darkened in the facion of a new moone. Euen withall, came the newes of the death of Pisander vnto him, who was slaine in a battell which he lost by sea, fighting against Pharnabazus and Conon, hard by the Ile of Gnidos. These newes were very heauie vnto him, both for respect of the person his kinseman whom he lost, as also for the great losse that happened to the common wealth. Neuertheless, fearing his souldiers would be discoraged with the newes, D and become faint harted, being ready to ioyne battell: he commaunded them that came from the sea, to brute abroade a contrarie tale to that they tolde him, and he him selfe to make good their speache, came out among them, with a garland of flowers on his head, and did sacrifice to the goddes, as thanking them for the good newes, sending to euery one of his frends a peece of flesh sacrificed, as he commonly vsed to doe, in any publike cause of ioy. Then marching forward, he straight discouered his enemies farre of, and they likewise him: & therupon put his men in battell ray, and gaue the left wing vnto the Orchomenians, leading him selfe the right wing. The Thebans on thother side, placed them selues in the right wing of their armie, and gaue the left vnto the Argiues. Xenophon being at that battell on Agesilaus side, wryteth that he neuer knewe of the like fielde fought. At the first onset, the conflict was not E great betwene both, neither helde long, bicause the Thebans brake the Orchomenians straight, and Agesilaus the Argiues. But when either side vnderstoode that the left winges of their battells were in great distresse, and that they turned their backes: they returned sodainly againe. And where Agesilaus might easily haue had the victory without any daunger, if he had suffred the squadron of the enemies to passe by him, and afterwards to haue charged them in the rereward: of a noble corage to shew his valliantnes, he gaue charge apon the voward, to haue honor in ouercõming them. The Thebans on the other side no lesse valliantly receiued him, & fought lustely on all hands: but the cruellest fight was about Agesilaus person, with the fifty young men that were sent to gard him, who shewed thẽ selues very valliant. Agesilaus was sore hurt, notwithstanding their valliant resistance, his armor being passed thorow with their F pikes & swords in sundry places: whereupon they enuironned him round amongst thẽ, & kept him from the enemies, killing a great number of thẽ, & many of them selues also being killed.

A In fine, finding the THEBANS too ſtrōg in the voward they were forced to do that which they refuſed at the firſt: and opening them ſelues, gaue them paſſage thorow them. So when they were paſſed them, the SPARTANS perceiuing howe loſely and diſorderly they marched, as thinking them ſelues out of all daunger, followed them, and gaue charge apon their flancke. But all this could not make the THEBANS flie: for they reioycing for their victorie at this battell, retired fayer and ſoftely vnto the mountaine Helicon. But Ageſilaus, notwithſtanding he was very ſore hurt, with many a grieuous wound, would not go into his pauillion to be dreſſed before he had bene firſt at the place where the battell was fought, and had ſeene his men that were ſlaine brought away in their armors. As many of his enemies as were fled into the tēple of Minerua Itonian, which was not farre from thence: (where alſo were ſette vp tokens of tri- Helicon mons. The worthines of Ageſilaus.

B umphe offred vnto her long time before by the THEBANS, when they had ouercomen the armie of the ATHENIANS, vnder the conduct of Sparton their Captaine, and had ſlaine alſo Tolmides their Captaine in the fielde) he commaunded his men they ſhould lette them goe where they would. The next morning by breake of day, Ageſilaus deſirous to ſee if the THEBANS had any corage to come downe to fight againe: commaunded his ſouldiers to put garlandes apon their heades, and his muſitians to ſounde their ſhalmes or pipes, whileſt he did ſette vp a token of triumphe as victorious. Moreouer, his enemies ſendinge to him to aske leaue to take away their dead men, he graunted them truce for the time, and thereby confirmed his victorie. After that, being caried to the citie of DELPHES, where the Pythian games were played, he made a ſolemne proceſſion and common ſacrifice vnto Apollo, and The temple of Minerua Itonian.

C offered him the tenth parte of all his ſpoyles which he had brought out of ASIA, which amounted to the ſumme of an hundred talentes. This thing done, he returned into his contrie, where he was greatly honored and eſteemed of all his citizens and contrie men, for his orderly life and noble behauiour: for he was no chaungeling, but the ſelfe ſame man in ſtate & condicion that he was before he tooke his iorney. He transformed not him ſelfe into ſtrangers manners, as commonly other Captaines doe, that returne out of a farre contrie where they haue made warres: neitheir did he ſcorne his contrie facions, or ſhewed him ſelfe diſobedient to the lawes thereof, but alwayes kept and obſerued them, without any manner of alteration in his meate or drinke, in waſhing or bathing, in his wiues apparell, in his armory, or any way elſe in his houſeholde ſtuffe, as if he had neuer paſſed ouer the riuer of Eurotas. The conſtancy of Ageſilaus.

D Yet further, he left his olde gates ſtanding that were of ſo great continuaunce, that they were thought to be thoſe which Ariſtodemus had ſet vp. Xenophon alſo ſayeth, that his daughters Canathrum was nothing more ſumptuous than any others were. A Canathrum in LACEDÆMON, is a kinde of coche or charret after the likeneſſe of griffins', hartes, or goates: apon the which they caried younge wenches in ſolemne proceſſions in the citie. Xenophon wrote not what was the name of this daughter of Ageſilaus: and Dicearchus alſo was much offended, that they neither knewe Ageſilaus daughters name, nor yet the mother of Epaminondas. Yet we finde in the LACONIAN Chronicles, that Ageſilaus wiues name was Cleora, one of his daughters called Apolia, and the other Prolyta. Moreouer, Ageſilaus ſpeare is ſeene to this day in the citie of SPARTA, euen like vnto others, and no maner of difference. Canathrum, what it is. Cleora, the wife of king Ageſilaus. Apolia, and Prolyta Ageſilaus daughters.

E Now Ageſilaus perceiuing certaine citizens of SPARTA to ſtand vpon their reputacion, and eſteeming them ſelues aboue others, bicauſe they kept horſe in their ſtable: perſwaded his ſiſter Cyniſca to ſend her coche and coche horſes to the Olympian games to runne for the beſt priſe, only to let the GRÆCIANS ſee that it was no act of any vertue, but ſimply of riches and coſt. Furthermore hauing Xenophon the Philoſopher about him, whome he loued and made great account of, he perſwaded him to ſend for his ſonnes to LACEDÆMON, that they might be brought vp there, where they ſhould learne the nobleſt ſcience that men coulde poſſiblie learne, to witte: to obey, and to commaunde. When Lyſander was dead, Ageſilaus at his returne out of ASIA, founde a great faction and conſpiracie raiſed by his meanes againſt him in SPARTA: and bicauſe it might appeare what manner of citizen Lyſander was when he Xenophon, great about Ageſilaus. The practiſe of Lyſander about alteratiō of gouernemēt.

F liued, he was likely to haue openly ſhewed and declared an Oration which he founde among his wrytinges (the which the Orator Cleon Halicarnaſſeus had wrytten for him, and Lyſander ſhould haue cunned without booke, to haue ſpoken in open aſſembly) that was to ſtirre inno-uation, and in maner haue made a chaunge of the whole gouernment of the common wealth of LACEDÆMON. Howebeit there was a graue counseller that hauing red the oration, and douting the apparant reasons and perswasions alleaged, tolde him, that he would wishe him not to plucke vp the dead againe out of his graue, but rather to burie this oration together with his bodie. Agesilaus liked the counsell, and proceeded no further. And for them that either were, or had bene his enemies, he did thē no hurt openly: but found the meanes to make some of them to be sent as Lieutenaunt of army, or otherwise to haue charge in the warres. In fine, he made it openly knowen, what couetous and wicked men they had bene in their charges: so that when they were accused of it before the counsell, he would than helpe & intreate for them. By this meanes he made them againe his frendes, where they had bene his enemies: insomuch as in the ende, he had not one enemie at all. For the other king Agespolis his colleague, whose father had bene banished: he being a very young man, and of gentle nature, medled not greatly with gouernment of the common wealth. Neuertheless, he so behaued him selfe vnto Agesilaus, that he made him his verie good frende: for both the kinges when they were in the citie, did eate together in one halle. Then Agesilaus knowing that Agespolis (as him selfe) was geuen to loue, would euer minister talke to him of the goodly young boyes of the citie, intising him to loue some one of them, which he him selfe did loue: and therein he was both his companion and helper. For in these LACONIAN loues there was no manner of dishonestie offered, but a true affection and honest regarde to frame the boy beloued vnto vertue and honest condicions: as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lycurgus. Agesilaus by this meanes hauinge the whole authoritie (aboue all men in the citie) in his handes: made his halfe brother Teleutias Generall by sea, and him selfe with the armie by land went to besiege the citie of CORINTHE, where with his brothers helpe by sea he tooke the long walls of the same. The ARGIVES which kept CORINTHE at that time, at Agesilaus arriuall there were solemnising the feast of the Isthmian games: who made them flie, euen as they came from sacrificing vnto the god Neptune, driuing them to leaue all their preparation and solemnity. Then diuers banished men of CORINTHE that were in his armie, besought him that he woulde keepe these Isthmian games. But he denyed them, yet was contented they shoulde them selues solemnize them, and so him selfe remained there, during the time of the feast, for their safetie. Afterwardes when Agesilaus was gone thence, the ARGIVES returned, and did celebrate the Isthmian games: and there were some of them which hauing wonne the game at the first, did also winne it at the second time: and others that were victours before, were this second time ouercome. Whereupon Agesilaus sayd, that the ARGIVES shewed them selues rancke cowardes, that esteeming so much (as they did) these playes and sacrifices, they durst not once offer to fight with him for defence of the same. For him selfe, touchinge such like sportes and games, he euer thought it good to keepe a meane, & not to be too curious. For he was contented to honor such solemne assemblies and common feastes with his presence, as were commonly vsed in SPARTA, & tooke great pleasure to see the sportes betwene the yong boyes and girles of SPARTA: howbeit touching the games, he seemed not to be acquainted with some of them, wherein others had great delight. As we read, that Callipides an excellent stage player (wonderfully esteemed of among the GRÆCIANS for a singular man in that arte) meeting Agesilaus on a time, at the first did his duetie to him, and then arrogantly thrust him selfe amonge them that walked with him, thinking the king would haue made much of him: but perceiuing he made no countenaunce to him, in the end he asked him: O king Agesilaus, doe you not know me? Agesilaus looking apon him, aunswered: what, art not thou Callipides the stage player? And so made no further account of him. An other time beinge desired to heare a man that naturally counterfeated the nightingalls voyce: he would not heare him, saying, I haue oftentimes heard the nightingall it selfe. An other time also when Menecrates the Phisitian (hauing by good fortune cured a desperate disease) called him selfe Iupiter, and arrogantly vsurped that name, presuminge in a letter he wrote vnto Agesilaus, to subscribe it in this manner, Menecrates Iupiter, vnto king Agesilaus, greeting: Agesilaus wrote againe vnto him, Agesilaus vnto Menecrates * health. So, whileſt Agesilaus was in the territorie of CORINTHE (where he had taken the temple of Iuno) beholding his souldiers forraging & spoiling the

* Meaning that he was not well in his wittes to be so presumptuous.

A the contrie rounde about: Ambaſſadors came to him from THEBES, to pray him to make peace with the THEBANS. But he that alwayes hated the THEBANS, and beſides that thought it then very requiſite for the good ſucceſſe of his doinges, to make light of it: ſeemed as he neither heard nor ſaw them that ſpake vnto him. But euen at that very inſtant, as by diuine reuenge to crie quittance, there fell a great miſhappe vpon him. For before the Ambaſſadors were gone from him, he had newes that one of their bandes called the mothers, were ſlaine euery man by Iphicrates: which was the greateſt loſſe that they in long time before had ſuſteined. For they loſt a great number of valliant ſouldiers, all naturall LACEDÆMONIANS: who being well armed euery man, were ſlaine by naked or light armed hierlinges. Thereupon Ageſilaus went ſtraight into the field with hope to ſaue them, or at the leaſt to be reuenged. But B receiuing certaine intelligence by the way that they were all ſlaine, he returned againe to the temple of Iuno from whence he came, and then ſent for the Ambaſſadors of the BOEOTIANS, to geue them audience. But they, to requite his former diſdaine vnto them, made no manner of ſpeache of peace, but onely requeſted him to ſuffer them to enter into CORINTHE. Ageſilaus being offended, aunſwered them: if it be to ſee your frendes triumphe of their victorie, ye may ſafely do it to morrow. Thereupon the next morning taking the Ambaſſadors with him, he deſtroyed the CORINTHIANS contrie, euen to the walles of their citie. And when he had made the Ambaſſadors ſee, that the citizens of CORINTHE durſt not come out into the field to defend their contrie: he gaue them leaue to depart. Then taking the remaine of that band that was ouerthrowen, which by flight had eſcaped: he brought them into LACEDÆMONA- C gaine, alwayes remouing his campe before day, and neuer encamped till darke night, bicauſe the ARCADIANS (their mortall enemies) ſhould not reioyce at their loſſe. After this voyage, to gratefie the ACHAIANS, he entred in with them into the contry of ACARNANIA, & brought great ſpoyles from thence, after he had ouercome them in battel. Moreouer, when the ACHAIANS beſought him to remaine with them all the winter, to keepe their enemies from ſowing of their grownd: he made them aunſwere he would not. For, ſayde he, they will be afraide of warre the next yeare, when all their fieldes ſhall be ſowen with corne: and ſo in deede it came to paſſe. For the army returning againe, they made peace incontinently with the ACHAIANS. About that time, Pharnabazus and Conon, with the king of PERSIAES armye, being Lordes of the ſea without let of any, deſtroyed and ſpoyled all the coaſt of LACONIA. Moreouer, the city D of ATHENS did reare vp her walls againe by helpe of Pharnabazus money, wherewith he had furniſhed them. Thereuppon the LACEDÆMONIANS thought good to make peace with the king of PERSIA, and to that ende ſent Antalcidas Ambaſſadour vnto Tiribazus, moſt ſhamely and cruelly betraying to the king, the GRÆCIANS inhabiting in ASIA, for whoſe libertie Ageſilaus had made warres with him before. So, it was Ageſilaus happe not to be foyled with any part of his ſhame: for Antalcidas that was his enemie, ſought all the meanes he could to conclude this peace, for that he ſaw warre did daily increaſe the authoritie, honor, and fame of Ageſilaus. Notwithſtanding, he aunſwered one then, that reproued him for that the LACEDÆMONIANS did fauor the MEDES: no, ſayd he, they do not ſo, but the MEDES doe play the LACEDÆMONIANS. Neuertheles, threatning warre to all the GRÆCIANS, which would not agre E to the conditions of this peace: he compelled them to yeld vnto that the king of PERSIA liked. But ſurely he did this chiefly for reſpect of the THEBANS, to thende that they being enforced by the capitulations of the peace, to ſet the contry of BOEOTIA at libertie againe, ſhould be ſo much the weaker. This plainly appeared ſoone after by that that followed. For Phœbidas hauing committed a fowle acte, in open peace to take the caſtell of the citie of THEBES, called Cadmea, offending thereby all the other GRÆCIANS (and the SPARTANS them ſelues alſo not being very well pleaſed withall, and thoſe ſpecially which were Ageſilaus enemies) Phœbidas being aſked in great anger, at whoſe commaundement he had done that ſodaine enterpriſe: to lay all the ſuſpition of the facte apon him: Ageſilaus for Phœbidas diſcharge, letted not openly to ſay, that the qualitie of the facte was to be conſidered of, whether it were profitable for F the common wealth or not: and that it was well done of him, the thing fallinge out profitable for his contry to do it of his owne head without commaundement. All this notwithſtanding, he was wont to ſay in priuate talke, that iuſtice was the chiefeſt of all vertues, and therefore that valiantnes without iuſtice was of no validity, and that if all men were iuſt, valiantnes were of no eſtimation. And to them that tolde him, the great king will haue it ſo: Why, ſayd he, and wherein is he better then my ſelfe, if he be not iuſter? Iudging very wiſely therein, that they ſhould eſteeme a king (whether he were of great or ſmall power) by his iuſtice, as by the beame of princely ballance. When peace was concluded, the king of PERSIA hauing ſent him a priuate letter deſiring his frendſhippe, Ageſilaus refuſed it, ſaying: that common frendſhippe was enough betwext them, and that they ſhould neede none other, ſo long as that was kept. But this notwithſtanding, when it came to the poynt of performaunce, he went from his firſt good opinion, and gaue place to his will & ambition, ſpecially againſt the THEBANS, at that time when he did not only ſaue Phœbidas, but alſo procured the citie of SPARTA to take the fault apon them which he had committed, and to iuſtifie it, by keeping the caſtle of Cadmea ſtill, and making Archias and Leontidas Gouernours of the citie of THEBES, by whom Phœbidas came by the caſtell of Cadmea, and poſſeſſed it. Thereupon euery man thought ſtraight, that Phœbidas was he that had put the matter in execution, & that Ageſilaus gaue the counſell to do it: as thinges falling out afterwardes, did manifeſtly proue the ſuſpicion true. For, after that the THEBANS had driuen the garriſon of the LACEDÆMONIANS out of the caſtell of Cadmea, and reſtored their citie againe to libertie, burdening them that they had traiterouſly ſlaine Archias and Leontidas (who in deede were tyrannes, though in name Gouernors) he made warre with them: and Cleombrotus, raigning then king with him after Ageſipolis death, was ſent before into BOEOTIA with an armie, Ageſilaus was diſpenſed with by lawe for going any more to the warres, by reaſon of his age, for that he was fortie yeare olde from the firſt growth of heare on his face, & therefore went not that iorney: being aſhamed that the THEBANS ſhould now ſee him fight to reuẽge the tyrans deathes, who had but a litle before taken armes for the baniſhed men, againſt the PHLIASIANS. At that time there was a LACONIAN called Sphodrias, of the contrarie faction vnto Ageſilaus, and was then Gouernour in the citie of THESPIES, a valliant and ſtowt man of his handes, but euer fuller of vaine hope, than of good iudgement. He deſiring fame, and ſuppoſing that Phœbidas came to dignitie and great eſtimation through his valliant enterpriſe at THEBES: perſwaded him ſelfe that he ſhoulde winne much more honor, if of him ſelfe he tooke the hauen of Piræa ſodainly ſtealing apon the ATHENIANS by land, cutting them of by that meanes from al trade by ſea. It was thought commonly that this was a practiſe deuiſed by Pelopidas and Gelon, Gouernours of BOEOTIA, who had allured certaine men to faine them ſelues very deuout and frendly to the LACEDÆMONIANS. Theſe men praiſing and extollinge Sphodrias to his face, put him in the head that they knew none ſo worthie as him ſelfe alone, to take in hand ſo noble an enterpriſe. Thus by their perſwaſions they trained him on to this attempt, which for vilenes was nothing inferior vnto that tretcherous winning of the caſtell Cadmea at THEBES: although it was attempted with leſſe hardines and diligence. For day was broken when he was yet in the plaine of Thriaſium, where he made account to haue bene at the walles of Piræa by night. Furthermore it is reported, that the men he brought with him ſeeing certaine fires from the temples of the city of ELEVSIN, were all afrayed and amazed: yea he him ſelfe alſo fainted perceiuing he was diſcouered, and ſo returned backe with ſhame and diſhonor to the citie of THESPIES, without any exployt done, ſauing only a litle ſpoyle taken. Thereupon accuſers were ſtraight ſent from ATHENS vnto SPARTA, who apon their arriuall found that they needed not to accuſe him, for that the counſell and Gouernours of the citie had already ſent for him to come vnto them, to condemne him of hie treaſon. But he durſt not returne to SPARTA, fearing the furie of his contriemen, thinking in deede that they would ſeeme as though the wronge had bene done to them, bicauſe it ſhould not be thought that they had cauſed it to be done. This Sphodrias had a ſonne called Cleonymus, a very fayer boy, with whome Archidamus (Ageſilaus ſonne) was farre in loue: who then was maruelous ſorie to ſee this boy he loued, in ſo great daunger to loſe his father, & yet durſt not be ſeene to helpe him, bicauſe Sphodrias was one of Ageſilaus aduerſaries. Notwithſtanding, Cleonymus making his mone to him with the teares in his eyes, and praying him to pacifie his father Ageſilaus (whome they feared aboue all men elſe) Archidamus followed his father three or foure dayes together, and durſt not breake the matter

Sphodrias practiſe to take the hauen of Piræa at Athens.

Sphodrias accuſed of treaſon.

A matter to him: in fine, the day of the next session being at hand, when iudgement should be geuen of Sphodrias, he boldly ventered to tell him, howe that Cleanymus had prayed him to be an humbler suter to him touching his fathers fact. Agesilaus vnderstanding that his sonne loued Cleonymus, would not withdrawe him from louing of him, bicause the boy euen from his childehoode gaue alwayes good hope that one day he would sure make as honest a man as any other whatsoeuer: neither made he any countenaunce to his sonne, as though he would doe any thing at his sute, but onely answered him, for that, he would doe as became him in such a case. Whereupon, Archidamus being bashefull, left comming any more to Cleonymus, where before he would see him oftentimes in a day. This made Sphodrias frendes dispaire of his life more then before, vntill Etymocles, one of Agesilaus familiars talking with them, tolde B them that for the facte it selfe, Agesilaus thought it a shamefull deede, and as much misliked it as might be: but for Sphodrias selfe, that he tooke him for a valliant man, & saw that the common wealth had neede of men of such seruice. This was Agesilaus common talke to please his sonne, when any man came to speake to him of Sphodrias accusation. Insomuch that Cleonimus found straight that Archidamus had delt as faithfully and frendly for him as might be, and then Sphodrias frendes also tooke hart againe vnto them, to solicite his cause, and to be earnest suters for him. Agesilaus among other had this speciall propertie, that he loued his children deerely: and a tale goeth on him, that he would play with them in his house when they were C litle ones, and ride apon a litle cocke horse, or a reede, as a horseback. Insomuch as a frende of his taking him one day with the maner, playing among his children: he prayed him to say nothing, till he had litle children him selfe. In fine, Sphodrias was quit by his iudges. The Athenians vnderstanding it, sent to proclaime warre with the Lacedæmonians. Whereupon Agesilaus was much reproued, bicause that to please the fonde affection of his sonne, he had hindered iustice, & brought his citie to be accused among the Græcians for such grieuous crimes. Agesilaus perceiuing that king Cleombrotus his companion went with no verie good will to make warre with the Thebans, he breaking the order set downe for leading of the army, which was kept before, went to the warres him selfe in person, & so inuading Boeotia he both receiued and did great hurt. Wherupon Antalcidas seeing him hurt one day, now truely (sayd he) the Thebans haue paide you your deserued hier, for teaching them against their wills to be souldiers, that neither had will nor skill to fight. For in dede they say the The- D bans became better souldiers and warriours than they were before, being dayly trained and exercised in armes, through the continuall inuasions of the Lacedæmonians. Loe, this was the reason, why the olde father Lycurgus in his lawes called Rhetra, did forbid them to make warre too oft with one selfe people, bicause that by compulsion they should not be made expert souldiers. For this cause did the confederats of Lacedæmon hate Agesilaus, saying, that it was not for any knowen offence to the state, but for very spite & priuate malice of his owne, that he sought to vndoe the Thebans in this maner: and that to follow his humor, they consumed them selues going yearely to the warres one while this way, an other while that way, without any necessitie at all, following a few Lacedæmonians, them selues being alwayes the greater number. Then it was, that Agesilaus desiring to make thē see what number of men E of warre they were, vsed this deuise. On a time he commaunded all the allies to sit downe together one with an other by them selues, & the Lacedæmonians also by them selues. Then he made a herauld proclaime that all pottemakers should stand vp on their feete. When they were vp, he made him crie to the brasiers to rise also. After them in like maner, the carpinters: then the masons, & so consequently all occupations one after an other. So that at the length the confederates obeying the proclamacion, were all in maner on their feete. The Lacedæmonians, not one of them rose: bicause all base mechanicall craftes were forbidden them to occupie. Then Agesilaus laughing at them, loe, my frendes sayd he: doe ye not see now that we bring moe souldiers to the field, than ye doe? At his returne from this iorney of Thebes, passing by the city of Megara, as he went vp into the counsell house within the castell, there F sodainly tooke him a great crampe in his left legge, that swelled extreamely, and put him to great paine, men thinking that it was but blood which had filled the vaine: a Phisitian of Syracvsa in Sicile being there, straight opened a vaine vnder the ankle of his foote, which made the paine to ceaſe: notwithſtanding there came ſuch aboundance of blood, that they could not ſtanche it, ſo that he ſounded oft, & was in great daunger of preſent death. In fine, a way was found to ſtoppe it, and they caried him to LACEDÆMON, where he lay ſicke a long time, ſo that he was paſt going to the warres any more. The SPARTANS in the meane time receiued great ouerthrowes both by ſea and land, and among other, their greateſt ouerthrow was at the battell of LEVCTRES, where the THEBANS ouercame and ſlue them in plaine battell. Then the GRÆCIANS were all of one minde to make a generall peace, and thereuppon came Ambaſſadors and the Deputies from all the cities of GRÆCE, & met at LACEDÆMON to that ende. One of theſe Deputies was Epaminondas, a notable learned man, and a famous Philoſopher, but as yet vnskilfull in warres. He ſeeing how the other Ambaſſadors curried fauor with Ageſilaus, only he of the reſt kept his grauety to ſpeake freely, and made an Oration, not for the THEBANS alone, but for all GRÆCE in generall, declaring to them all, how warres did only increaſe the greatnes & power of the citie of SPARTA, and contrarily did miniſh and decay all other cities and townes of GRÆCE: and for this cauſe, that he did counſell them all to conclude a good and perfit peace indifferently for all, to the ende it might continewe the lenger, when they were all alike. Ageſilaus perceiuing then that all the GRÆCIANS preſent at the aſſemblie gaue him good eare, and were glad to heare him ſpeake thus boldely of peace: asked him openly, if he thought it mete and reaſonable, that all BOEOTIA ſhould be ſet clere at libertie againe? Epaminondas preſently & boldly againe asked him: if he thought it iuſt and requiſite to ſet all LACONIA clere againe at liberty? Ageſilaus being offended therwith, ſtoode vpon his feete, and commaunded him to aunſwere plainly, whether they would ſet all BOEOTIA at libertie or not? Epaminondas replied vnto him with the ſelfe ſpeache againe, and asked him whether they would ſet all LACONIA at liberty or not. That nettled Ageſilaus ſo, that (beſides he was glad of ſuch a cloke, for the old grudge he euer bare vnto the THEBANS) he preſently put the name of the THEBANS out of the bill of thoſe, which ſhould haue bene compriſed within the league, and cried open warres apon them in the market place. For the reſt, he licenſed the other Deputies and Ambaſſadors of the people of GRÆCE to departe, with this concluſion: that they ſhould louingly take order among thẽ ſelues for the controuerſies betwext them, if they could peaceably agree together, and they that could not fall to ſuch agreement, that then they ſhould trie it by warres, for that it was a hard thing to take vp all quarells among them. King Cleombrotus by chaunce was at that time in the contrie of PHOCIDE with his armie, vnto whom the Ephori wrote that he ſhould forthwith ſpoyle the THEBANS contrie: and therewith alſo they ſent to all their confederates to come and aide them, which had no great fanſie to the iorney, and were loth to make warre with them, but yet durſt not refuſe to goe, nor diſobey the LACEDÆMONIANS. And notwithſtanding that there were many ſignes preſaging ill lucke, as we haue wrytten in the life of Epaminondas, and that Prothous LACONIAN was againſt the enterpriſe of this warre all that he could: Ageſilaus would needes forward, hoping he had nowe found oportunity to be reuenged of the THEBANS, ſith all GRÆCE beſides was in peace and at libertie, them ſelues onely exempted from treatie of peace. If there had bene no other thing in it but the very ſhortnes of time, that made it manifeſt enough that this warre was begonne in a geere, without any manner of reaſon. For the generall peace amongeſt the GRÆCIANS was concluded at SPARTA the fourteenth of May, and the LACEDÆMONIANS were ouercome at the battell of LEVCTRES the fifteene of Iune: ſo as there was but twentie dayes betwene them. There were ſlaine a thowſand LACEDÆMONIANS with their king Cleombrotus, and the choiceſt of the valliantest SPARTANS about him. Amongeſt them was alſo ſlaine that goodly young man Cleonymus, Sphodrias ſonne, of whom we ſpake before: who hauing bene beaten downe thriſe at the kings foote, three times got vp againe, but at the length was ſlaine, valliantly fighting againſt the THEBANS. This great ouerthrowe chaunſing to the LACEDÆMONIANS vnlooked for, and withall ſo glorious a victorie vnto the THEBANS, as GRÆCIANS fighting with GRÆCIANS had neuer the like: the vanquiſhed citie of SPARTA notwithſtanding deſerued no leſſe honor and commendacion for her fortitude and worthineſſe, than did the victorious citie of THEBES. For as Xenophon wryteth, that as amongeſt good men euen in table talke, and in their ſportes & mirth there falleth out

A euer ſome thing of wit worth the noting and bearing away: euen ſo in like caſe, no leſſe, but rather more, ought noble mens wordes to be weyed, and their countenances marked as well in aduerſitie as in proſperitie. At that time by chaunſe there was a common feaſt day in the citie of SPARTA, which was full of ſtraungers that came to ſee the daunſes & ſportes of them that ſhewed naked in the Theater, when as the meſſengers arriued that brought the newes of the battell loſt at LEVCTRES. The Ephori knowing then that the rumor ſtraight ranne all about, that they were all vndone, and how they had loſt the ſignorie and commaundement ouer all GRÆCE: would not ſuffer them for all this to breake of their daunſe in the Theater, nor the citie in any thing to chaunge the forme of their feaſt, but ſent vnto the parentes to euerie mans houſe, to let them vnderſtande the names of them that were ſlaine at the battell, they B them ſelues remaining ſtill in the Theater to ſee the daunſes and ſportes continued, to iudge who caried the beſt games away. The next morning when euerie man knewe the number of them that were ſlaine, and of thoſe alſo that were eſcaped: the parentes and frendes of them that were dead, met in the market place, looking cheerefully of the matter, and one of them embraced an other. On thother ſide, the parentes of them that ſcaped, kept their houſes with their wiues, as folke that mourned. If any of them alſo had occaſion to go abroad out of their houſes, for any matter of neceſſitie: ye ſhould ſee him looke ſo heauily and ſad, that he durſt not talke with you, lift vp his head, nor looke ye in the face. Beſides all this, euen amongeſt the women there was greater difference. For the mothers of thē that kept their ſonnes which came from the battell, were ſad and ſorowfull, and ſpake not a word. Contrarily, the mothers C of them that were ſlaine, went frendly to viſite one an other, to reioyce together. Now when the people ſaw that their confederates beganne to forſake them, and did dayly looke that Epaminondas glorying in his victorie, would inuade PELOPONNESVS: then they beganne to be prieked in conſcience about the oracles of the goddes, thinking that this misfortune came to their citie, for that they had thruſt out of the kingdome a man perfect in limmes, to place an impotent perſon, being ſpecially warned by the goddes to beware of that aboue all thinges. This notwithſtanding, they had him in ſuch veneration for his valliantnes, and his authoritie was ſuch thereby, that they did not onely vſe him in warre, as their king and ſoueraine Captaine: but in ciuill cauſes alſo wherein there roſe any queſtion, they euer vſed his counſell and aduiſe. As they did, when they durſt not puniſh them (according to the penall lawes) that fled D from the battell, whom they call at SPARTA Treſantas, (being a great number of them, and men of the nobleſt houſes and of greateſt power within the citie) leaſt they ſhould moue ſome ſturre or commotion among them. (For by lawe, they can beare no office in the common wealth. It is ſhame and reproche to geue them any wiues, and alſo to marrie any of theirs. Whoſoeuer meeteth them may lawefully ſtrike them, and they muſt abide it, and not geue them a word againe. They are compelled to weare poore tattered cloth gownes patched with cloth of diuers colours: and worſt of all, to ſhaue the one ſide of their beardes, and the other not.) Whereupon, finding the daunger great to deale with them, to execute the lawe according to the infamie they deſerued, ſpecially then ſtanding in neede of a great number of men of warre: they referred them ſelues altogether vnto Ageſilaus, to take ſuch order in it as he E thought good. But Ageſilaus then, without chaunging or altering any thing of the lawe, ſayd in open aſſemblie at LACEDÆMON: that for that day they ſhould let the law alone, notwithſtanding, that afterwardes it ſhould ſtand in force. By this policie he kept the lawe inuiolate, and ſaued alſo the honor of thoſe poore men: and withall, to put theſe youthes againe in hart, being amazed with this feare, he led the armie into the contrie of ARCADIA, and would geue no battell, but onely tooke a ſmall citie of the MANTINIANS, and foraged the contrie. This againe did a litle reuiue the citie of SPARTA with ſome hope, to make that it ſhould not vtterly diſpaire. But ſhortly after, Epaminondas inuaded the contrie of LACONIA, with fortie thowſand footemen well armed, beſides an infinite number of others light armed, and naked people, that followed his campe for the ſpoyle: ſo that in all, there were about three ſcore and F tenne thowſande fighting men that came in with him to inuade LACONIA. It was well neere ſixe hundred yeares ſith the DORIANS poſſeſſed LACEDÆMON, and in all that time till then they neuer ſaw enemies in their contrie that durſt inuade them: but then they ſacked & burnt all that came in their way, euen vnto the riuer of Eurotas, and hard adioyning vnto SPARTA, A and no man durſt come out to reſiſt them. For Ageſilaus (as Theopompus wryteth) would not ſuffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to goe out to fight againſt ſuch a tempeſt and furie of warre, but hauing fortified the middeſt of the citie, and garded euery end of the ſtreetes with ſouldiers, he paciently bare all the bragges and threates of the THEBANS, which challenged him out to fight, and bad him come into the fielde to defende his contrie, that onely was the cauſe of all theſe their calamities, hauing him ſelfe procured this warre. If this went to Ageſilaus hart, no leſſe grieuous were theſe troubles to him that roſe within the citie. As the cries and running toe and froe of the old men, which were mad to ſee that they did before their eyes: and of ſely women alſo, which no grounde nor place could hold, but ranne vp and downe, as ſtraught of their wittes, to heare the noiſe the enemies made, and to ſee the fire which they raiſed all the B fieldes ouer. Much more ſorowefull alſo did this make him, when as he bethought him ſelfe, that entring into his kingdom at ſuch time as the citie of SPARTA was in the greateſt proſperitie that euer it was, he now ſaw his honor eclipſed, and the glorie of his kingdom ouerthrowen: and the rather, for that him ſelfe had often auaunted, that LACONIAN women had neuer ſeene the ſmoke of any enemies campe. And as they ſay of Antalcidas one day, that he anſwered an ATHENIAN that contended with him about the valliantneſſe of one an others nation, alleaging for him ſelfe, that the ATHENIANS had often driuen the LACEDÆMONIANS from the riuer of Cepheſus. It is true, ſaid the LACONIAN: but we did neuer driue you from the riuer of Eurotas. The like aunſwere made a meane man of SPARTA, to one of the ARGIVES that caſt him in the teeth, there are diuers of your LACONIANS buried in the contrie C of ARGOLIDE: ſo are there none of yours, ſayd he, buried in LACONIA. It is reported, that Antalcidas being one of the Ephori at that time, did ſecretly ſende his children into the Ile of CITHÆRA, fearing leaſt the citie of SPARTA ſhould be taken. Ageſilaus perceiuing that the enemies forced to paſſe ouer the riuer, to enter the citie: he ſtoode to defend the middle parte of the citie, being the hieſt place of the ſame, and there had his men ſette in order of battell. Now at that time, by chaunce the riuer of Eurotas was ſwelled greater then of ordinarie, by reaſon of the ſnowe waters that fell aboundantly: which troubled more the THEBANS with the coldnes, then roughnes of the ſame, in paſſing it ouer. Some ſhewing Ageſilaus how Epaminondas marched formoſt before his battell, he beheld him a great while, and his eye was neuer of him, ſaying neuer a word but this onely: O, what a noble fellowe is that? Epaminondas D hauing done all that he could poſſible to geue the LACEDÆMONIANS battell, euen within the citie ſelfe of SPARTA, that he might there haue ſet vp ſome tokens of triumphe, he could neuer intiſe Ageſilaus to come out of his forte: wherefore he was driuen in the ende to departe thence, and ſo went to deſtroy all the reſt of the contrie. There fell out a conſpiracie of two hundred men in SPARTA, who of long time had had an ill meaning with them, and tooke that quarter of the citie where the temple of Diana ſtoode, called Iſſorium, a place of ſtrong ſcituacion, and ill to diſtreſſe. Hereuppon the LACEDÆMONIANS in furie would ſtraight haue ſet apon them. But Ageſilaus fearing great mutinie and ſturre apon it: commaunded that no man ſhould ſturre: and him ſelfe vnarmed, in a poore gowne went thither, crying out to them that had taken that ſtrength: Sirs, ye haue not obeyed my commaundement. This is not the E place I appointed you to aſſemble in, neither all of you in one place: for I willed you to diſperſe your ſelues, ſome one way, ſome an other way, ſhewing them the quarters of the citie. The traitors hearing theſe wordes, were glad, as thinking that their intent was not bewraied: and ſo leauing that ſtrength, went into thoſe partes of the citie that he had ſhewed them. Ageſilaus then bringinge others thether, poſſeſſed the forte of Iſſorium, and tooke fifteene of thoſe conſpiratours, and put them to death the next night followinge. Howebeit then there brake out an other conſpiracie farre greater than the firſt, of the SPARTANS them ſelues which were ſecretly gotten together into a houſe, to make ſome ſodaine ſturre and garboyle, and to puniſh them in ſo great a trouble, it was hard: on thother ſide to neglect it, the conſpiracie was ouer daungerous. Ageſilaus hauing conſulted with the Ephori, did put them all to F death, without any iudgement of lawe, neuer SPARTANS before them ſuffering death, without due order of law. (whom

A (whom they had billed in their bandes for ſouldiers) ſtale away, and ranne to their enemies, which did much diſcorage them that remained: he warned his men that they ſhould euerie day goe to their couches where they lay, and that they ſhoulde take away their armour that were fled, and hide it, bicauſe they ſhould not knowe the names of them that were fled in this ſorte. Now for the departure of the THEBANS, ſome ſay that they went out of LACONIA by reaſon of the winter that came on, whereuppon the ARCADIANS diſcharged their bandes, and euerie one departed his way in diſorder. Others alſo holde opinion, that they continued there three monethes together, during which time they deſtroyed the moſt parte of the contrie. Theopompus wryteth notwithſtanding, that the Captaines of the THEBANS hauing determined to departe, there came one Phrixus a SPARTAN vnto them, ſent from Ageſilaus, who B brought them tenne talents that they ſhould departe out of their contrie. Thus had they money geuen them to defraye their charges homewardes, to doe that, which they them ſelues had long before determined to haue done. And yet doe I wonder, howe it is poſſible that all other hiſtoriographers knewe nothing of this, and that Theopompus onely could tell of it. All doe acknowledge truely, that Ageſilaus onely was the cauſe that the citie of SPARTA was ſaued: who leauing his ambition and ſelfe will, being paſſions borne with him, did wiſely foreſee their ſafetie. Neuertheleſſe, after this great ouerthrowe, he could neuer raiſe SPARTA againe to her former greatneſſe. For like as a whole bodie, which hauing acquainted it ſelfe continually with a moderate diet, with the leaſt diſorder doth ſurfet preſently, and ſo putteth all in daunger: euen ſo Lycurgus hauing framed a perfect ſtate of gouernment in the common C wealth of SPARTA, to make her citizens liue in peace and amitie together: when they did enlarge it by great kingdomes and realmes, the which the good lawemaker thought vnmeete to continue happie life: they were ſtraight ouerthrowen and all went to wracke. By this time Ageſilaus was growen olde, and could no more goe to the warres for verie age: but his ſonne Archidamus, with the aide which Dionyſius the tyranne of SYRACVSA ſent vnto them, wanne a battell againſt the ARCADIANS, called the teareleſſe battell: for there dyed not one of his men, and they ſlue a great number of their enemies. This victorie plainely ſhewed the great weakeneſſe and decaie of the citie of SPARTA. For in former times it was ſo common a thing vnto them to ouercome their enemies in battell, that they did ſacrifice nothinge elſe to the goddes in token of thankes, within the citie, but a poore cocke: and they that had fought the D battell made no boaſt of it: neither did they that hard the newes reioice greatly at it. For when they had wonne that great battell at the citie of MANTINEA, which Thucydides deſcribeth: the Ephori only ſent the meſſenger that brought the newes for reward, a peece of powdered meate, and no other thing. But then, when newes was brought of this victorie, and that they vnderſtoode Archidamus came home victorious: neither man nor woman could keepe the citie, but the father him ſelfe went firſt of all to meete him, with the teares in his eyes for ioy, and after him all the other Magiſtrates and officers of the citie, and a ſwarme of old folke both men & women came downe to the riuers ſide, holding vp their hands to heauen, & thanking the goddes, as if their citie had redeemed and recouered her ſhame and loſt honor, and beganne nowe to riſe againe, as before it did. For vntill that time, ſome ſay, that the husbandes E durſt not boldly looke their wiues in the faces, they were ſo aſhamed of their great loſſes and miſerable eſtate. Now the citie of MESSINA being by Epaminondas reedified and repleniſhed with people, he called home againe out of all partes, the naturall inhabitants of the ſame. The SPARTANS durſt not fight with him (not to hinder his purpoſe) though it ſpighted them to the hartes, and were angrie with Ageſilaus, for that in his raigne they had loſt all that territory, which was as great as all LACONIA ſelfe, and that for goodneſſe and fertilitie compared with the beſt partes of all GRÆCE, the which they had quietly poſſeſſed many yeares before. And this was the cauſe why Ageſilaus would not agree to the peace, which the THEBANS ſent to offer him: and all bicauſe he would not relinquiſh that in wordes, which the enemies kept in deedes. Therfore being wilfully bent once more to fight with them, he went not only without F recouering the thing he looked for, but had in maner alſo loſt the citie of SPARTA by a warlike ſtratageame, in the which he was deceiued. For the MANTINIANS being newly reuolted againe from the alliance of the THEBANS, and hauing ſent for the LACEDÆMONIANS: Epa- minondas receiuing intelligence that Ageſilaus was departed from SPARTA with all his power to aide the MANTINIANS, marched away ſecretly by night from TEGEA, without the priuitie of the MANTINIANS, and went ſtraight to SPARTA, the which he had almoſt ſurpriſed on the ſodaine (going an other way then Ageſilaus came,) being in manner without men to defende it. Howebeit a THESPIAN called Euthynus, as Calliſthenes ſayth, (or as Xenophon wryteth, a CRETAN,) brought Ageſilaus newes of it: who diſpatched a horſeman ſtraight to aduertiſe them of the citie of SPARTA, and marching forward him ſelfe to returne, ſtayed not longe after before he arriued. He was no ſooner come, but incontinently alſo came the THEBANS, who paſſing ouer the riuer of Eurotas, gaue aſſault to the city. Then Ageſilaus perceiuing that there was no more place nor time of ſecuritie as before, but rather of deſperation and courage: he valliantlie defended it more then an olde mans yeares coulde beare. Thus, through corage and deſperate minde, whereto he was neuer brought before, neither did euer vſe it, he put by the daunger, and ſaued the citie of SPARTA from Epaminondas handes, ſetting vp markes of triumphe for repulſing of the enemies, and making the women and children of SPARTA to ſee the LACEDÆMONIANS how honorablie they rewarded their nurſe and contrie for their good education: but Archidamus chiefely of all other, fought wonderfully that day, running into euerie parte of the citie, with a fewe about him, to repulſe the enemies whereſoeuer the daunger was greateſt. It is ſayd alſo that at that time there was one Iſadas the ſonne of Phœbidas, that did maruelous ſtraunge thinges to beholde, both in the face of his enemies, as alſo in the ſight of his frendes. He was of goodly perſonage, and at that time in the prime of his youth: and being ſtarke naked, and vnarmed, his bodie noynted with oyle, hauing in one hande a boreſtaffe, and in the other a ſworde, in this maner he went out of his houſe, and ranne amongeſt them that fought, killinge and ouerthrowing his enemies that withſtoode him, and was not once hurt, either for that the goddes preſerued him for his manhoodes ſake, or elſe bicauſe men thought him more then a man. The Ephori immediatly gaue him a crowne, in honor and reward of his valliantneſſe: but withall they ſet a fine on his head to pay a thowſand ſiluer Drachmas for his raſhe attempt, to haſard him ſelfe in battell, vnarmed for defenſe. Shortly after they fought an other great battell before the citie of MANTINEA. There Epaminondas hauing ouerthrowen the firſt ranckes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and coragiouſly diſtreſſing the reſt, valliantly following the chaſe: there was one Anticrates a LACONIAN, who receiuing him (as Dioſcorides writeth) ſlue him with his boreſpeare. The LACEDÆMONIANS to this day notwithſtanding, doe call the offſpring of this Anticrates, Machariones: as much to ſay, as ſwordmen, as though he had ſlaine him with a ſword. The LACEDÆMONIANS did eſteeme this Anticrates ſo much, for that deadly ſtroke he gaue (bicauſe they were afrayed of Epaminondas while he liued) that they gaue him that ſlue him, great honors & dignities, and diſcharged all his offſpring & kinred from payment of ſubſidie and common contribucions, which priuiledge one Callicrates, a kinſeman of this Anticrates, enioyed euen in our time. After this battell and death of Epaminondas, the GRÆCIANS hauing taken peace generally amongeſt them, Ageſilaus would needes exclude the MESSENIANS from being ſworne to this peace, ſaying: that they neede not ſweare, bicauſe they had no city. Now, foraſmuch as all the GRÆCIANS els did receiue them as amongeſt the number, & tooke their othe vnto this peace: the LACEDÆMONIANS brake of from this general peace, and none but they onely made warre, in hope to recouer the MESSENIANS contrie, and all through the allurement of Ageſilaus, who for this cauſe was thought of the GRÆCIANS a cruell and vnſatiable man for warres, to deale ſo craftily, and all to breake this generall league. Againe, he brought him ſelfe in diſcredit with all men, beinge compelled to make his citie bare of money, borowing of them ſtill, and raiſing ſundrie contribucions amongeſt them: whereas in deede it had bene his beſt way to haue ended all thoſe miſeries, hauing ſo happie an occaſion offred at that time, & not to haue loſt ſo great an Empire of ſo many townes and cities, both by ſea and lande, and all to plague his contrie, to winne the lande and riches of the MESSENIANS. But yet was this moſt ſhame vnto him of all other, when he gaue him ſelfe vnto one Tachos, a Captaine of the EGIPTIANS, euerie man thinking it a ſhamefull parte of him, that ſuch a perſonage as he (reputed the chiefeſt man of all the GRÆCIANS, and the which

A which had filled the worlde with reporte of his fame and glorie) ſhould for money let out his perſon to hyre, and the glorie of his name, vnto a barbarous perſon, a traitor and rebell to his kinge and maiſter, to become a mercenarie Captaine and ſouldier to doe him ſeruice. And moreouer, he being now foure ſcore yeares of age and vpwardes, his bodie all mangled with woundes, though he had vndertaken this honorable charge for the recouerie of the libertie of the GRÆCIANS, yet had his ambition deſerued ſome blame: for noble actes haue their time, yea rather the good and ill doe nothing differ from other, but in meane and mediocritie. But Ageſilaus had no regard of all this, and thought no manner of ſhame in ſeruice, ſpecially for benefitte of the common wealth, but perſwaded him ſelfe that it was a diſhonor to him to liue idlely in a citie and doe nothing, till death ſhould come and make his ſummones:
B thereupon therefore he leuied men of warre through all GRÆCE with the money Tachos ſent vnto him, and with them tooke ſea, hauing thirtie SPARTANS counſellers and aſſiſtantes to him, as he had in his firſt iorney. Now Ageſilaus being arriued in EGIPT, all the chiefe Captaines and Gouernours of king Tachos came to the ſea ſhore, and honorablie receiued him: and not they only, but infinite numbers of EGIPTIANS of all ſortes (that were maruelous deſirous of him, for the great fame that went abroade of Ageſilaus) came thither from all partes to ſee what manner of man he was. But when they ſawe no ſtately trayne about him, but an olde graybeard layed on the graſſe by the ſea ſide, a litle man that looked ſimplie of the matter, and but meanely apparrelled in an ill fauored threed bare gowne: they fell a laughing at him, remembring the merie tale, that the mountaines ſhould bring forth, and was deliuered
C of a mouſe. Beſides all this, they wondered when they ſawe men bring him preſentes to welcome him, that he tooke meale, calues, and geeſe, and ſuch groſſe thinges: and refuſed all confections, perfumes and other delicacies, praying them that offered thoſe dainty things to him, to geue them to the HELOTES his ſlaues. Theophraſtus wryteth, that he delighted marueloully in the ruſhe Papyrus, and liked the garlandes they made of them, for their fineneſſe and the handſomneſſe, the which he caried home with him when he departed thence. Hauing ſpoken at that time with Tachos, who was aſſembling his armie to goe on his iorney: he was not made chiefetaine generall, as he looked he ſhould haue bene, but was appointed only Colonell of all the ſtraungers, Chabrias Generall of all the armie by ſea, and the chiefe of all the reſt was Tachos him ſelfe in perſon. This at the firſt grieued Ageſilaus to the hart, be-D ing driuen whether he would or not, to beare with the vanitie and pride of this EGIPTIAN. So he ſayled with him into PHENICE, againſt the PHENICIANS, imbaſing him ſelfe againſt his noble diſpoſition and minde, and gaue him place, vntill he ſaw time of reuenge. It chaunced that one Nectanebos a nephewe of this Tachos, hauing the leading of parte of this armie, rebelled againſt him, and being choſen king by the EGIPTIANS, he ſent vnto Ageſilaus, and prayed him to come and take his parte. The like he did alſo vnto Chabrias, and prayed him to ioyne with him, promiſing great rewardes vnto them both. Tachos vnderſtanding that, beſought them both that they would not forſake him. Chabrias for his parte alſo did likewiſe intreate Ageſilaus, and perſwade him what he coulde, to continewe frendſhippe with Tachos. Ageſilaus aunſwered him, for thee, Chabrias, thou cameſt of thine owne good will, and there-E fore mayeſt doe what thou thinkeſt good: but ſo is it not with me. For I am ſent hither a Captaine by my contrie, to ſerue the EGYPTIANS, and therefore it were no honeſtie for me to make warre with them, whome I am ſent to ſerue and aide: were it not that they them ſelues which ſent me, doe nowe commaunde me the contrarie. This aunſwere being made, he ſent certaine of his men to SPARTA to accuſe Tachos, and to commende Nectanebos. Both they alſo for their partes ſent to intreate the counſell of LACEDÆMON: the one as being alwayes their frende and confederate, and the other promiſing to be their faithfull frende thencefoorth. The LACEDÆMONIANS hauing heard the requeſtes of both, aunſwered them openly, that Ageſilaus ſhoulde conſider of this matter: and wrote ſecretlie to him, that he ſhould doe what he thought beſt for the common wealth of SPARTA. So Ageſilaus taking F with him the mercenarie ſouldiers which he had brought out of GRÆCE, went vnto Nectanebos, cloking his departure, that it was for the benefitte of his contrie, to bewray a wicked thing: but in deede taking away the viſard to benefit his contrie, they might by a better name rightly haue tearmed it treason. Howebeit the LACEDÆMONANS placing the chiefest poynt of honor, to consist in the benefit of their contrie: did acknowledge nothing to be iustice, but that which they thought might serue for the aduauncement of the glorie of SPARTA. Tachos seeinge him selfe forsaken thus by his mercenarie straungers, fled. But nowe on the other side, there rose an other Kinge in the citie of MENDES, against this Nectanebos, who hauinge leauied to the number of a hundred thowsande fightinge men, came to fight with Nectanebos. But he thinking to encorage Agesilaus, tolde him, that in deede they were a great number of men of all sortes together, and speciallie men of handie craft, and therefore that they were not to be feared, bicause they knewe not what warre ment. But Agesilaus aunswered him againe: it is not their number that I feare, but their rudenesse and vnskillfullnesse, which is hardest of all to deceiue. For warlike stratageames doe most preuaile against men that haue greatest feare and experience: and therefore they foresee one thing rather then an other. But men of no iudgement nor experience, neither feare daunger, nor haue forecast, and therefore doe geue him no more aduantage that seeketh to deceiue them, then the wrastler by slight is able to ouerthrowe him, whome he can not sturre nor remoue. Afterwardes the MENDESIAN king him selfe sent vnto Agesilaus, to winne him if he could. Nectanebos then beganne to be affrayed. For when Agesilaus counselled him to trye it by battell as soone as he could, and not to prolonge this warre against ignoraunt men that had no skill to fight, but yet for their ouermultitude, might intrenche him rounde about, and preuent him in diuers thinges: then he beganne to feare and suspect him more, and thereuppon retyred into a great citie well walled about, and of great strength. Agesilaus beinge offended that he mistrusted him thus, tooke it inwardlie: but being ashamed to turne againe vnto the third, and also to departe without any exployte done, he followed him, and enclosed him selfe within those walles. The enemies pursuinge him hard, came vnto the citie, and beganne to entrenche it rounde, to keepe him in. Then the EGYPTIAN Nectanebos fearing a longe siege, determined to geue them battell. Thereto the hyered GRÆCIANS gaue consent, as desiringe no better matche, and the rather also for that there was but small store of corne within the citie. But Agesilaus perswadinge the contrarie, would in no wise consent to it: whereuppon the EGYPTIANS thought worse of him then before, and plainely called him traytor to their kinge. Howebeit he did pacientlie beare all their accusations, expectinge time to performe an exployte he entended, which was this. The enemies had cast a deepe trenche without, to compasse them in. When this trenche drewe neere to ende, and that both endes lacked not much of meetinge, tarryinge till night came on, he commaunded the GRÆCIANS to arme, and to put them selues in readinesse: then he came vnto the EGYPTIAN, and sayed vnto him. Loe here is an excellent occasion presented to saue thee, which I would not acquaint thee withall till I saw it brought to the perfection I looked for, fearing least otherwise we shoulde haue lost it. Nowe sith the enemies them selues haue with their owne handes geuen vs the way to saue our selues by this trenche they haue cast, the which as muche as is finished thereof dothe hinder their great multitude to helpe them selues, and that which is yet left vnfinished dothe geue vs oportunitie to fight with them of euen hande: determine to shewe thy valure, and followinge vs, saue thy selfe and thy people. For the enemies which we shall assayle before vs, shall neuer be able to abide vs: and the other by meanes of the trenche which defendeth vs on our side, can no way hurte vs. Nectanebos hearinge his wordes, wondered at his great wisedome, and so thrustinge in amonge the GRÆCIANS, did assayle the enemies: the which were soone ouerthrowen and put to flight, as many as durst resist, and make heade against them. Agesilaus hauinge wonne Nectanebos againe to trust him, he once againe deceiued his enemies with the like subtiltie wherewith he had first beguiled them, and which they knewe not howe to auoyde. For one while he made as though he fled, and intised them to followe him: sodainely againe he woulde turne this waye and that waye. In fine, he brought all this great multitude into a straight sluce, walled about of either side, with great broade ditches full of runninge water: so that when they were euen in the middest of it, he sodainely stopped their passage with the fronte of his battell, which he cast to the breadthe of the sluce, and

A and thus made his number of fighting men equall with the multitude of his enemies, which could neither compasse him in behinde, nor flanke him on the sides. They hauing in this sorte made some small resistaunce, in the ende turned their backes and fled, and left a great number slaine in the fielde: the residue after that last ouerthrowe forsooke their Captaines, and fled straglingly here and there. Thus the affaires of this EGYPTIAN king after that time had good successe, and was quietly stablished in his kingdom, making much of Agesilaus: and doing him all honor possible, prayed him to tarie with him all that winter. Howbeit he would needes hasten home to his contrie, which was in warre with others, knowing that his citie of SPARTA was without money, bicause they were driuen to geue pay vnto straungers. Thereuppon Nectanebes in thende tooke his leaue of him very honorably, presenting him a gift (besides all o-

B thet honors he did him) of two hundred and thirtie siluer talentes in readie money, to defray the charges of the warre in his contrie. Howbeit the sea being rough in the winter quarter, he died by the way, hauing notwithstanding recouered land with his shippes in a desert place of the coast of LYBIA, which was called the hauen of Menelaus, after he was foure score & foure yeare old: of the which he had raigned one and fortie yeares king of SPARTA, and thirty yeares thereof and more he was alwayes taken and reputed for the greatest person, and in manner Chiefetaine generall of all GRÆCE, vntill the battell of LEVCTRES. Now the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing a custome to burie the dead bodies of their citizens that died out of their contrie, in the same place where they departed: (the bodies of their kinges exeepted) the SPARTANS which were at that time about Agesilaus, annoynted his bodie with waxe for

C lacke of honny, and caried him home to SPARTA in this maner. His sonne Archidamus succeded him in the kingdom, whose issue successiuely raigned continually after him, vnto the time of Agis (who was the fift king in succession after Agesilaus) whom in deede Leonidas put to death, bicause he sought to restore the LACEDÆMONIANS auncient discipline and forme of life.

THE LIFE OF Pompey.

The father of Pompey hated in Rome.

THe ROMANES seeme to haue loued Pompey from his childhoode, with the selfe affection that Prometheus in the tragedie of AEschylus appeareth to haue borne vnto Hercules, after that he was deliuered by him: when he sayd,

So great a hate I bare not to the father, But that I loue the sonne of him much rather.

Strabo, the father of Pompey.

For the ROMANES neuer shewed more bitter hate against any other Captaine, than they did vnto Strabo Pompeys father. Truely so long as he liued, they feared his greatnesse obtained by armes, for in deede he was a noble Captaine: but being striken with a thunderbolt, and dead, they tooke him from the beare whereon his bodie lay as they caried him to buriall, and did thereto great villannie.

The Loue of the Romanes vnto Pompey.

Contrariewise, neuer any other ROMANE (but Pompey) had the peoples earnest goodwilles so soone, nor that in prosperitie and aduersity continued lenger constant, then vnto Pompey. One only cause procured the fathers hate, and that was: an vnsatiable and greedy desire of money. But Pompey his sonne, was for many occasions beloued. As, for temperance of life, aptnesse to armes, eloquence of tongue, faithfulnes of word, and curtesie in conuersation: so that there was neuer man that requested any thing with lesse ill will then he, nor that more willingly did pleasure any man when he was requested. For he gaue without disdaine, and tooke with great honor. Furthermore, being but a childe, he had a certaine grace in his looke that wan mens good willes before he spake: for his countenaunce was sweete, mixed with grauetie, & being come to mans state, there appeared in his iesture and behauiour, a graue & princely maiestie. His heare also stoode a litle vpright, and the cast and soft mouing of his eyes, had a certaine resemblaunce (as they sayd) of the statues and images of king Alexander. And bicause euerie man gaue him that name, he did not refuse it him selfe: insomuch as there were some which sportingwise did openly call him Alexander. Whereupon Lucius Philippus a Consull, was not ashamed to say openly in an oration he made in Pompeys fauor, that it was no maruell if he being Philip, did loue Alexander. It is reported also, that when Flora the curtisan waxed old, she much delighted to talke of the familiaritie which she had with Pompey beinge a younge man:

Flora the curtisan loued Pompey.

telling that after she had layen with him, she could not possible rise from him, but she must needes geue him some sweete quippe or pleasaunt taunte. She would tell also how one of Pompeys familiars and companions called Geminius, fell in loue with her, and was a maruelous earnest suter to obtaine her good will: and that she aunswered him flatly, she would not, for the loue she bare to Pompey. Geminius thereuppon brake the matter to Pompey himselfe. Pompey desirous to pleasure him, graunted the request: howbeit Geminius after that, would not come neere Flora, nor speake vnto her, albeit it appeared that he yet loued her. But Flora tooke this not curtisan like, for she was sicke a long time for very griefe of minde, and she thought she tooke vppon it. All this notwithstanding, it is sayd that this Flora had then such fame for her passing grace and beautie, that Cecilius Metellus seeing foorth and beautifying the temple of Castor and Pollux, with goodly tables and pictures: among the rest, he caused her picture to be liuely drawen for her excellent beawtie. Furthermore Pompey, against his nature, delt very hardly and vncurteously with the wife of Demetrius, his franchised bondeman (who while he liued was in great credit with him, and dying, left her worth foure thowsand talentes) fearing to be taken with her beautie which was verie singularlie fayer, least he should be thought in loue with her. Now, though herein he seemed to be very circumspect, and to east the worst; yet could he not thus scape the detracting tongues of his ill willers: for they did accuse him, that to please and content his wiues, he would let passe and winke at many thinges, that was against the profit of the common wealth? To proue his sober and temperate diet, and howe he was contented with common meates: a word (they say) he spake when he was verie sicke, and could tast no meate, is specially noted. For, to bring his stomake to him againe, his Phisitian willed him to eate a thrushe. So seeking all about to get him one, there was no thrushe to be bought for money, for they were out of season. Notwithstanding, one told him that he should not misse of them at Lucullus house, for he kept them vp all the yeare through. Why, what then, sayd he: if Lucullus ryot were not, should not Pompey liue? Therewithall, letting his Phisitians counsell alone, he made them dresse such meate as was euery where common. But of that we will speake more hereafter. Now Pompey being a young man, and in the fielde with his father, that was in armes against Cinna: there lay with him in his tent a companion of his, called Lucius Terentius, who being bribed with money, had promised Cinna to kill him, and other confederators also had promised to set their Captaines tent a fire. This conspiracy was reuealed vnto Pompey as he sate at supper, which nothing amated him at all, but he dranke freely, and was merrier with Terentius then of custome. So when it was bed time, he stale out of his owne tent, and went vnto his father to prouide for his safetie. Terentius thinkinge the hower come to attempt his enterprise, rose with his sword in his hande, and went to Pompeys bed where he was wont to lye, and gaue many a thrust into the matteresse. After he had done that, all the campe straight was in an vprore for the malice they bare vnto their Captaine, and the souldiers in all hast would needes haue gone and yeelded to their enemie, beginning alreadie to ouerthrowe their tentes, and to trusse away bagge and baggage. The Captaine for feare of this tumult, durst not come out of his tent: notwithstanding Pompey his sonne ranne amongest the mutinous souldiers, and humbly besought them with the teares in his eyes, not to doe their Captaine this villanie, and in fine threwe him selfe flatling to the grounde ouerthwart the gate of the campe, bidding them marche ouer him, if they had such a desire to be gone. The souldiers being ashamed of their follie, returned againe to their lodginge, and chaunging minde, reconciled them selues with their Captaine, eight hundred onely excepted, which departed. But immediatly after that Strabo, Pompeys father, was departed out of the worlde, Pompey beinge his heire, was accused for the father, to robbe the common treasure. Howebeit he confessed, and auowed, that it was Alexander one of his fathers infranchised bondemen that had stollen the most parte of it, and brought him in before the Iudges. Notwithstanding, he was accused him selfe, for taking away the toyles and arming cordes of hunters nettes, and bookes, that were taken at Asculum. He confessed the hauing of them, and that his father gaue him them when the citie was taken: howbeit that he had lost them sence, when Cinna returned vnto ROME with his souldiers, who breaking into his house by force, spoyled him of all that he had. His matter had many dayes of hearing before definitiue sentence, in which time Pompey shewed him selfe of good spirite and vnderstanding, more than was looked for in one of his yeares: insomuch he wanne such fame and fauor by it, that Antistius being Prætor at that time, and iudge of his matter, fell into such a liking with him, that secretly he offered him his daughter in mariage. Then that matter being by frends broken to Pompey, he liked of the match, & the parties were secretly assured. This was not so closely conueyed, but the people perceiued it, by the care and paines Antistius tooke to fauor his matter. Insomuch, when the Iudges gaue iudgement, and cleered him: all the people together, as if they had bene agreed, cried out with one voyce, Talassio, Talassio, being the vsuall and common crie they vsed of olde time at mariages in Rome. This custome by reporte of auncient folke came vp in this manner. At what time the chiefest peeres and Lordes of Rome did ruishe the Sabines daughters, which came to Rome to see common sportes played: there chaunsed a fewe rascalls (as hoggeherdes or neatherdes) to carie away a goodly fayer woman. They fearing she should be taken from them, cried out in the streetes as they went, Talassio, as if they would haue sayd, she is for Talassius. This Talassius was a young gentleman well knowen, and beloued of most men: so that such as heard him but named only, did clappe their hands for ioy, & cried out with them, Talassio, commending the choyce they had made for him. So, hereof they say came this custome, that euer since they haue cried this word Talassio vnto them that are newly maried, bicause the mariage of that fayer young maid proued fortunate, and happy vnto Talassius. And this me thinkes soundeth neerest to the troth of that they reporte of this wedding crie of Talassio. Shortly after this iudgement geuen, Pompey maried Antistia. After that, going vnto Cinnaes campe, they wrongfully accused him for somewhat, whereupon he being afrayed, secretly stale away. Now when they could not finde him in Cinnaes campe, there ran straight a rumor abroade, that Cinna had put him to death. Therupon, they that of long time had maliced Cinna, did set vppon him for this occasion. But he thinking to saue him selfe by flying, was straight ouertaken by a priuate Captaine that followed him with his sworde drawen in his hande. Cinna seeing him, fell downe on his knees before him, and tooke his seale from his finger wherewith he sealed his letters, which was of great price, and offered it him. Tushe, sayd the Captaine, I come not to seale any couenaunt, but to chastice a villaine and cruell tyranne: and therewithall thrust his sword thorowe him, and slue him presently. Cinna being slaine in this sorte, Carbo succeeded him, and tooke the gouernment in hande, being a more cruell tyranne than the first. Shortly after came in Sylla, being wished for, and desired of the most parte of the Romanes, for the grieuous oppressions and miseries they endured, that they thought them selues happy to chaunge Gouernor for their citie was brought into such miserie, as hoping no more to see Rome recouer her lost libertie, they desired yet a more tollerable bondage. Now Pompey at that time was in a place of Italie called Picenvm (nowe the marches of Ancona) where he had certaine inheritaunce, but much more, great loue and good will of the cities for his fathers sake. He seeing that the noblest men of Rome forsooke their houses and goodes, to flie from all partes vnto Syllaes campe, as vnto a place of safetie: would not goe to him as a fugitiue and cast away to saue him selfe, without bringing him some power to increase his armie, but would honorably goe thither with an armie, as he that ment first to doe him selfe pleasure. So he felt the good will of the Picentines, who willingly tooke his parte, and reiected them that were sent by Carbo. Among them there was one Vindius, that stepping forth, said: that Pompey which came from schoole the last day, must now in hast be a Captaine. But they were so offended with his speech, that they straight dispatched him, and killed him out of hande. After that time, Pompey being but three and twentie yeare olde, tarying to receiue no authoritie from any man, tooke it apon him himself, & causing a tribunal to be set vp in the middest of the market place of Avximvm, a great populous city: he commaunded the two brethren called the Ventidiani (being the chiefest men of the citie, and they that for Carboes sake withstoode his doinges) without delay foorthwith to auoide the citie, and so beganne to leauie men, and to appoint Captaines, sergeaunts of bandes, Centeniers, and such other officers as appertaine to marshall discipline. Then he went to all the other cities of the same marches, and did the like. They that tooke parte with Carbo, fled euery man, and all the rest willingly yeelded vnto him: whereby whereby in shorte space he had gotten three whole legions togeather, munition to enterteine them, cartes, and all maner of beastes for cariage. In this sorte he tooke his iourney towarded Sylla, not in hast, as a man affrayed to be met with by the way, but by small iorneyes, staying still where he might hurt his enemy, causing the cities euery where as he came to reuolt from Carbo. Neuertheless, three Captaines of the contrarie parte, Carinna, Gulius, and Brutius, all three did sette apon Pompey together, not all in a fronte, nor of one side, but in three seuerall places they compassed him with their armies, thinking to haue made him sure at the first onset. This nothing amazed Pompey, but putting his force togeather in one place, he first marched against Brutus, hauing placed his horsemen (among the which he was him selfe in person) before the battell of his footemen. Now the men of armes of the enemie which were GAVLES, comming to geue charge apon him, he ranne one of the chiefest among them through with his launce, and slue him. The other GAVLES seeing him slaine, turned their backes, and brake their owne footemen: so that at length they all fled for life. Thereupon the Captaines fell out among them selues, and some fled one way, some an other way, the best they could. Then the townes round about, thinking that they were dispersed for feare: came all in to Pompey, and yeelded them selues. Afterwardes Scipio the Consull comming against Pompey to fight with him, when both battels were in maner ready to ioyne: before they came to throwing of their dartes, Scipioes souldiers saluted Pompeys men, and went on their side. So Scipio was driuen to flie. And in fine, Carbo him selfe hauing sent after him diuers troupes of horsemen by the riuer of Arsis: Pompey made towards them, and did so fiercely assaile them, that he draue them into such places, as was almost impossible for horsemen to come into. Whereupon, they seeing no way to scape, yeelded them selues, horse and armor, all to his mercie. Sylla all this while heard no newes of these ouerthrowes: wherefore, as soone as he vnderstoode of it, fearing least Pompey should miscarie, being enuironned with so many Captaines of his enemies, he made hast to marche towardes him for to aide him. Pompey vnderstanding of his approache, commaunded his Captaines to arme their men, and to put them in battell ray, that their Generall might see them brauely appointed when he should present them vnto him: for he looked that Sylla would doe him great honor, & in deede he did him more honor, then Pompey looked for. For, when Sylla saw him a farre of comming towardes him, and his armie marshalled in so good order of battell, and such goodly men, that so brauely aduaunced them selues, being coragious for the victorie they had obtained of their enemies: he lighted a foote. When Pompey also came to doe his duety to him, and called him Imperator: (as much as Emperour, or soueraine Prince) Sylla resaluted him with the selfe name, beyonde all mens expectacion present, litle thinking that he would haue geuen so honorable a name, vnto so young a man as Pompey, who had not yet bene Senator: considering that he him selfe did contende for that title and dignitie, with the faction of Marius and Scipio. Furthermore, the entertainment that Sylla gaue him euery way, was answerable to his first kindnes offered him. For when Pompey came before him, he would rise and put of his cappe to him, which he did not vnto many other noble men about him. All this notwithstanding, Pompey gloried nothing the more in him selfe. Wherefore when Sylla would straight haue sent him into GAVLE, because Metellus that was there, was thought to haue done no exployte worthie of so great an armie as he had with him: Pompey answered him againe, that he thought it no reason to displace an auncient Captaine that was of greater fame and experience than him selfe. Yet if Metellus of him selfe were contented, and would intreate him: that he would willingly goe and helpe him to ende this warre. Metellus was very glad of it, and wrote for him to come. Then Pompey entring GAVLE, did of him selfe wonderfull exploytes, and did so reuiue Metellus olde corage and valliantnes to fight, which now beganne to faint, like boyling copper that being poored vpon the colde and hard copper, doth melt and dissolue it, as fast or faster, then fire it selfe. For like as of a wrestler, who hath bene counted very strong, and the chiefest in all games, hauing euer borne the price away where he hath wrestled, they neuer recorde among them his childishe victories and wrestlinges, as thinges of no account: euen so I am affrayed to speake of the wonderfull deedes that Pompey did in his childhoode, bicause they are obscured, in respect of the infinite great warres and battells which he had wonne afterwardes. For I am affrayed that whi-leſt I ſhould go about particularly to acquaint you with his firſt beginnings, I ſhould too lightly paſſe ouer his chiefeſt actes and moſt notable enterpriſes, which do beſt declare his naturall diſpoſition and ſingular wit. Now when Sylla had ouercome all ITALIE, and was proclaimed Dictator: he did reward all his Lieutenaunts and Captaines that had taken his parte, and did aduance them to honorable place & dignity in the common wealth, frankely graunting them all that they requeſted of him. But for Pompey, reuerencing him for his valliantnes, & thinking that he would be a great ſtay to him in all his warres: he ſought by ſome meanes to allie him to him. Metella his wife being of his opinion, they both perſwaded Pompey to put away his firſt wife Antiſtia, and to marrie AEmylia the daughter of Metella, and of her firſt husband, the which alſo was an other mans wife, and with childe by her husbande. Theſe mariages were cruell and tyrannicall, fitter for Syllaes time, rather then agreable to Pompeys nature and condicion: to ſee AEmylia, this new maried wife taken from her lawfull husbande, to marrie her great with childe, and ſhamefully to forſake Antiſtia, who not long before had loſt her father, and for reſpect of her husbande that did put her away. For Antiſtius was murdered within the very Senate houſe, being ſuſpected to take parte with Sylla for his ſonne in lawe Pompeys ſake: and her mother voluntarily put her ſelfe to death, ſeeinge her daughter receiued ſuch open wrong. By theſe apparant cauſes, theſe vnfortunate mariages fell out into a miſerable tragedie, by meanes of the death of AEmylia, who ſhortly after miſerably dyed with childe in Pompeys houſe. Then came newes to Sylla, that Perpenna was gotten into SICILE, and that he had made all that Ilande at his deuotion, as a ſafe place to receiue all Syllaes enemies: that Carbo alſo kept the ſea thereabboutes with a certaine number of ſhippes: that Domitius alſo was gone into AFRICKE: and diuers other noble men that were baniſhed, that had ſcaped his proſcriptions and outlawryes, were all in thoſe partes. Againſt them was Pompey ſent with a great armie. Howebeit he no ſooner arriued in SICILE, but Perpenna left him the whole Ilande, and went his way. There he fauorably delt with all the cities, which before had abidden great trouble and miſerie, and ſet them againe at libertie, the MAMERTINES only excepted, which dwelt in the citie of MESSINA. They deſpiſing his tribunall and iuriſdiction, alleaged the auncient order & priuiledge of the ROMANES, ſet downe in times paſt amongeſt them. But Pompey aunſwered them in choller: what doe ye prattle to vs of your law, that haue our ſwords by our ſides? It ſeemeth alſo that Pompey delt too cruellie with Carbo in his miſerie. For ſith he muſt needes dye, as there was no remedie but he ſhould: then it had bene better they had killed him when he was taken. For then they would haue imputed it to his malice, that ſo had commaunded it. But Pompey after he was taken, made him to be brought before him that had bene thriſe Conſull at ROME to be openly examined, and he ſitting in his chaire of ſtate or tribunall condemned him to dye in preſence of them all: to the great offence and miſliking of euery one that was preſent. So Pompey bad them take him away, and carie him to execution. When Carbo came to the ſcaffold where he ſhould be executed, and ſeeing the ſword drawen that ſhould ſtrike of his head: he prayed the executioners to geue him a litle reſpit and place to vntruſſe a poynt, for he had a paine in his bellie. Caius Oppius alſo (one of Iulius Cæſars frends) wryteth, that he delt verie cruelly in like maner with Quintus Valerius. For Pompey, ſayd he, knowing that he was excellently well learned, as any man could be, and fewe like vnto him: when he was brought vnto him, he tooke him a ſide, and walked a fewe turnes about: then when he had queſtioned with him, and learned of him what he could, he commaunded his gard to carie him away, and to diſpatche him. Howbeit we may not geue too light credit to all that Oppius writeth, ſpeaking of Iulius Cæſars frendes or foes. For Pompey in deede was compelled to make away the greateſt perſonages of Syllaes enemies that fell into his handes, being notoriouſly taken: but for the reſt, all thoſe that he could ſecretly ſuffer to ſteale away, he was contented to winke at it, and would not vnderſtand it: and moreouer did helpe ſome beſides to ſaue them ſelues. Nowe Pompey was determined to haue taken ſharpe reuenge of the citie of the HIMERIANS, which had ſtowtly taken the enemies parte. But Sthenis, one of the Gouernours of the citie, craning audience of Pompey, tolde him he ſhould doe them wrong and iniuſtice, if he ſhould pardon him that committed all the fault, and ſhould deſtroy them that had not offended. Pompey then asking him, what he was that durſt take vppon him to father the

A the offence of them all. Sthenis aunſwered ſtraight, that it was him ſelfe that had perſwaded his frendes, and compelled his enemies to doe that which they did. Pompey being pleaſed to heare the franke ſpeech & boldnes of this man, firſt forgaue him the fault he had committed, and conſequently all the other HIMERIANS. Pompey vnderſtanding that his ſouldiers did kill diuers men in the high wayes, he ſealed vp all their ſwordes, & whoſe ſeale ſoeuer was broken, he was well fauoredly puniſhed. Pompey being buſie about theſe matters in SICILE, receiued letters & commiſſion from Sylla and the Senate, to departe thence immediatly into AFRICKE, to make warre vpon Domitius, with all his power, who had leauied already more men of warre, than Marius had, not long before, when he came out of AFRICKE into ITALIE: and had there ouerthrowen all the ROMANES doinges, being become of a fugitiue outlaw, a cruell tyranne.

Pompey ſealed vp his ſouldiers ſwordes.

B Pompey thereupon hauing ſpeedily put him ſelfe in readines to take the ſeaes, left Memmius his ſiſters husband Gouernor of SICILE: and ſo him ſelfe imbarked, & hoyſed ſaile with ſix ſcore gallies, and eight hundred other ſhippes or bottomes, to tranſport their vittells, munition, money, engines of batterie, and all other cariage whatſoeuer. After he was landed with all his fleete, parte at VTICA, and parte at CARTHAGE: there ſtraight came to him ſeuen thowſand ſouldiers from the enemies, & yelded the ſelues, beſides ſeuen whole legions that he brought with him. They ſay moreouer, that at his arriuall, he had a pleaſaunt chaunce happened vnto him to be laughed at: for it is reported, that certaine of his ſouldiers ſtumbled on a treaſure by chaunce, and got thereby a great maſſe of money. The reſidue of the armie hearing that, thought ſure that the field where this treaſure was found, was full of golde and ſiluer, which Pompeis iorney into Africke vnder Sylla, againſt Domitius.

C the CARTHAGINIANS had hidden there long before in time of their calamitie. Pompey hereuppon, for many dayes after, coulde haue no rule of his ſouldiers, neither coulde he chooſe but laugh, to ſee ſo many thowſande men digging the grounde, and turning vp the fielde: vntill in the ende they wearied them ſelues, and came and prayed him then to lead them where he thought good, for they had payed well for their follie. Domitius came to Pompey with his army ſet in battel ray. Howbeit there was a certaine quamyre before him that ran with a ſwift running ſtreame, verie ill to get ouer: beſides that, from the verie breake of day it had poored downe and rained ſo faſt, and was ſo great a winde withall, that Domitius thinking all that day they ſhoud not fight, commaunded his people to truſſe away, and remoue. Pompey on thother ſide, finding this an excellent fit occaſion for him, ſodainly made his men to march, and

Domitius camped by Pompey with his army.

D paſſed ouer the valley. The enemies perceiuing that, being altogether out of order: were marueloſly amazed, and in that hurly burly would haue made reſiſtaunce. But they were neither all together, nor yet euenly ſet in battell ray, and had beſides the winde beating the raine full in their faces. So did the ſtorme much hurt vnto the ROMANES alſo, for they coulde not one ſee an other: inſomuch as Pompey him ſelfe was in great daunger of being killed by one of his owne ſouldiers, who not knowing him, asked him the word of the battell, and he was ſomewhat long before he anſwered him. In fine, when he had ouerthrowen his enemies with great ſlaughter: (for they ſay, that of twenty thowſand of them, there were but three thowſand ſaued) Pompeis ſouldiers ſaluted him by the name of Imperator. But he aunſwered them, that he would not accept the honor of that name, ſo long as he ſaw his enemies campe yet ſtanding:

Pompeis victory of Domitius.

E and therefore, if it were ſo they thought him worthie of that name, that firſt they ſhould ouerthrow the trenche and forte of the enemies, wherein they had intrenched their campe. The ſouldiers when they heard him ſay ſo, went preſently to aſſault it. There Pompey fought bare headed, to auoide the like daunger he was in before. By this meanes they tooke the campe by force, and in it ſlewe Domitius. After that ouerthrowe, the cities in that contrie came and yeelded them ſelues, ſome willingly, and others taken by force: as alſo they tooke king Iarbas, that had fought for Domitius, and his realme was geuen to Hiempſall. But Pompey, being deſirous further to employ his power, and the good fortune of his armie, went many dayes iorney into the maine lande, and ſtill conquered all where he came, making the power of the ROMANES dreadfull vnto all the barbarous people of that contrie, the which made but ſmall vttermoſt, he had ouercome his enemies, ſubdued AFRICKE, and had ſtabliſhed the affaires of the kinges and kingdomes of all that contry, being then but foure and twenty yeare old. So when he returned vnto the citie of VTICA, letters were brought from Sylla, willing him to diſcharge all his army, and to remaine there with one legion only, tarying the comming of another Captaine that ſhould be ſent to ſucceede him in the gouernment of that contrie. This commaundement, grieued him not a litle, though he made no ſhewe of it at all: but his ſouldiers ſhewed plainly that they were offended. For when Pompey prayed them to departe, they began to geue out broade ſpeeches againſt Sylla, and told directly that they were not determined (whatſoeuer became of them) to forſake him, and they would not that he ſhould truſt vnto a tyran. Pompey ſeeing that he could not perſwade them, by any reaſon to be quiet, roſe out of his chayer, and retyred into his tent weeping. But the ſouldiers followed him, and brought him againe to his chayer of ſtate, where he ſpent a great parte of the day, they intreating him to remaine there & commaund them, and he deſiring them to obey Sylla, and leaue their mutinies. But in fine, ſeeing thē importunate to preſſe him to it, he ſware he would kill him ſelfe, rather then they ſhould compell him: yet they ſcant left him thus. Hereupon it was reported vnto Sylla, that Pompey was rebelled againſt him. Sylla when he heard that, ſayd to his frendes: well, then I ſee it is my deſtiny, in mine olde dayes to fight with children. He ment ſo, bicauſe of Marius the younger, who had done him much miſchiefe, and had beſides put him in great daunger. But afterwards vnderſtanding the troth, and hearing that all generally in ROME were determined to goe and meete Pompey, and to receiue him with all the honor they coulde: bicauſe he would goe beyond them all in ſhew of good will, he went out of his houſe to meete him, and embracing him with great affection, welcomed him home, and called him Magnus, to ſay great, and commaunded all them that were preſent to geue him that name alſo. This notwithſtanding, ſome ſay, that it was in AFRICKE this name was firſt geuen him by a common crie of all his whole army, and that afterwards it was confirmed by Sylla. In dede it is true that Pompey him ſelfe being ſent Proconſul into SPAYNE long time after that, was the laſt that ſubſcribed all his letters and commiſſions with the name of Pompey the great: for this name then was ſo commonly knowen and accepted, as no man did enuy it. And therefore rightly is the wiſedom of the auncient ROMANES, to be both commended & had in admiration: which did not only reward ſeruice in the field with ſuch honorable names & titles, but ciuill ſeruice and good gouernment alſo in peace at home. For there were two whom the people at ROME called Maximi, to ſay, very great: of the which Valerius was the one, for that he made peace and agreement betwext the people and Senate. The other was Fabius Rullus, for that he put from the Senate certaine bondmen infranchiſed, who through their riches and fauor had obtained that place. After that, Pompey required the honor of triumphe, but Sylla denied it, alleaging that none could enter in triumphe into ROME, but Conſulls or Prætors. For ſith Scipio the firſt who in SPAYNE had ouercome the CARTHAGINIANS, neuer deſired this honor of triumphe, being neither Conſull nor Prætor: much leſſe ſhould he ſtande apon demaund of triumphe into ROME, when that through his young yeares he was not yet a Senator: and beſides, it would purchaſe him enuy of his honor and greatnes. Theſe reaſons did Sylla alleage againſt Pompey, and told him plainly that if he were bent to ſtand in it, he would reſiſt him. All this blanked not Pompey, who told him frankely againe, how men did honor the riſing, not the ſetting of the ſunne: meaning thereby, how his owne honor encreaſed, and Syllaes diminiſhed. Sylla heard him not very perfectly what he ſayd, but perceiuing by their countenaunces that ſtoode by, that they wondred at it, he asked what it was he ſayd. When it was tolde him, he maruelled at the boldnes of ſo young a man, and then cried out twiſe together, let him then triumphe a Gods name. Many being offended therewith, Pompey (as it is reported) to anger them more, would needes be brought in in triumphant charriot drawen with foure Elephants: for he had taken many of them from thoſe kings and Princes which he had ſubdued. Howbeit the gate of the city being too narrowe, he was driuen to leaue the Elephantes, and was contented to be drawen in with horſes. Now his ſouldiers that had not all things as they looked for, and which was promiſed them, going about to trouble and hinder his triumphe: he ſayd he paſſed not for it, & that he would rather let alone all his preparation of triumphe, then Pompey not being Senator, triumpheth againſt the law.

A then once to yeeld to flatter them. Whereuppon, there was a famous man at that time called Seruilius, who at the firſt was one of the chiefeſt againſt Pompeys triumphe, who ſayd openly: now I know that Pompey in deede is great, & deſerueth triumphe. Being euident enough, that if he would, he might then haue eaſily bene made Senator: he ſued not for that, but as they ſay, ſought honor by a ſtraunger meane leſſe honorable. For if he had bene made Senator ſo young, it had not bene ſo great a matter: but to haue ſuch honor before he was Senator, that was maruelouſly to be noted. But this wanne him the more fauor and good will ſtill amongeſt the common people: for they were glad when after his triumphe they ſaw him in companie amongeſt the ROMANE Knights. On thother ſide it ſpighted Sylla to ſee him come ſo faſt forward, and to riſe to ſo great credit: notwithſtanding, being aſhamed to hinder him, he was B contented to kepe it to him ſelfe, vntill that Pompey by force & againſt Syllaes will, had brought Lepidus to be Conſull, by the helpe and good will of the people that furdered his deſire. Ther- uppon Sylla ſeeing Pompey returning ouerthwart the market place from the election, with a great traine of followers to honor him, he ſayd vnto him: O young man, I ſee thou art glad of this victory, and ſo haſt thou cauſe, for it is a goodly thing out of doubt to haue had ſuch fa- uor of the people, as for thy ſake to haue made Lepidus Conſull (the vileſt perſon of all men) before Catulus the honeſteſt man of the citie. But I will tell thee one thing, ſee that thou ſleepe not, and looke well to thy buſines, for thou haſt aduaunced a daungerous enemy to thy ſelfe. Now the chiefeſt thing wherein Sylla diſcouered moſt his ill will vnto Pompey, was in his laſt will and teſtament: for he gaue legacies vnto euery one of his frendes, and ſome of them he C made tutors & ouerſeers of his ſonne, but he made no mencion of Pompey at all. This notwith- ſtanding, Pompey tooke it well enough. And where Lepidus and ſome other would haue kept Syllaes body from buriall in the field of Mars, and that his funeralls ſhould not be openly ſo- lemniſed: he contrarywiſe brought him very honorably and ſafely to the ground. Shortly af- ter Syllaes death, his wordes of prophecie vnto Pompey concerning Lepidus, proued true. For Lepidus vſurping the authoritie which Sylla had before, not colourablie, but openly entred ſtraight in armes, ſturring vp againe thoſe of Marius faction, whom Sylla could not be reuen- ged of, and which lay lurking a long time, ſpying for occaſion to riſe againe. True it is that his colleague, and fellow Conſull Catulus (whom the beſt and ſoundeſt parte of the people follo- wed) was thought a maruelous honeſt man, both iuſt and modeſt: howbeit, a better Gouer-
D nor in peace, then a good man of warre, inſomuch as time required Pompeys skill and expe- rience. So Pompey ſtoode not doubtfull which way he would diſpoſe him ſelfe, but tooke parte ſtraight with the nobility and honeſteſt men, & was preſently choſen Captaine of their armie againſt Lepidus: who had already wonne the greateſt parte of ITALIE, and with an army vn- der the conduct of Brutus, kept GAVLE on this ſide the mountaines, called GALLIA CISAL- PINA. And for the reſt, Pompey eaſily ouercame it: howbeit he lay a long time before MODO- NA, beſieging of Brutus. In the meane ſeaſon Lepidus came to ROME, & being hard at the walls demaunding the ſecond Conſulſhip, made them affrayed in the city with the great numbers of men he had about him, gathered together of all ſortes. Howebeit this feare was cooled ſtraight, by a letter which Pompey wrote to ROME, aduertiſing how he had ended this warre E without any bloodſhed: for Brutus, either betraying his army, or being betrayed of it, yeelded him ſelfe vnto Pompey, who gaue him a certaine number of horſemen that conducted him to a litle towne apon the riuer of Poe: where the next day after, Geminius being ſent by Pompey, ſlue him. But hereof Pompey was greatly blamed, for that he had wrytten letters to the Senate from the beginning of the chaunge, how Brutus had put him ſelfe into his handes: and after- wardes wrote letters to the contrary, which burdened him for putting of him to death. This Brutus was father of that Brutus, which afterwardes with the helpe of Caſſius ſlue Iulius Ceſar: howbeit he ſhewed not him ſelfe ſo like a coward, neither in warres nor in his death, as his fa- ther did. As we haue declared more at large in his life. Furthermore, Lepidus being driuen to forſake ITALIE, fled into SARDINIA, where he dyed (as it is reported) of a ſickeneſſe that he F had, not for any ſorowe or griefe of his owne affayers, but for a letter that was brought him which went to his hart, knowing thereby that his wife had played the harlot. There remained at that time Sertorius in SPAYNE, who was an other maner of warrier then Lepidus, & that kept the ROMANES in great awe: for that all the fugitiues of the late ciuill warres were fled to him, as from the last disease of the warres. He had already ouerthrowen many inferior Captaines, & was now wrestling with Metellus Pius, that in his youth had bene a noble souldier, but now being old, made warres but slowly, and would not coragiously take present occasions offered him, which Sertorius by his nimblenes and dexterity tooke out of his hands. For he would euer houer about him, when he thought least of him, like a Captaine rather of theeues then of souldiers, and would still lay ambushes in euery corner, and round about him: where the good old man Metellus had learned to fight in battell ray, his men being heauy armed. Hereuppon Pompey keping his army alway together, practised at ROME, that he might be sent into SPAYNE to aide Metellus. But Catulus, notwithstanding that he commaunded him to disperse his army, Pompey still kept them together by colour of new deuises, and was continually about ROME in armes, vntill that by Lucius Philippus meanes he had obtained the gouernment of that contry. They say that one of the Senators marueling to heare Philip propound that matter to the Senate, asked him: how now Philip, dost thou then thinke it meete to send Pompey Proconsull (to say, for a Consull) into SPAYNE? No truely sayd Philip, not Proconsull only, but pro Consulibus: (to say, for both the Consulls) meaning, that both the Consulls for that yeare were men of no value. Now when Pompey was arriued in SPAYNE, men began straight to be caried away, (as the maner is commonly where new Gouernors be) with the hope of a thing that they had not before. Thereuppon Sertorius gaue out prowde and bitter words against Pompey, saying in mockery, he would haue no other weapon but roddes to whippe this young boy, if he were not affrayed of this old woman: meaning Metellus the old man. But notwithstanding these gallant bragges, he stoode better vpon his gard, and went stronger to fight then he did before, being affrayed of Pompey. For Metellus was very dissolute of life (which no man would haue iudged in him) and was geuen ouer too much to riot and pleasure: howbeit they saw in him a maruelous sodaine chaunge both of his pompe & glory which he vsed before, as also the cuttinge of of his superfluous expence. That thinge, besides that he did honor Pompey greatly by it, wan him also much more the good will of the people, when they saw that he drew him selfe downe to a straighter life. And this was no great paine to him, for of his owne disposition he was a graue man, & temperatly geuen for his desires. In this warre fortune chaunged diuerslly, as it is commonly seene in warres: but nothing grieued Pompey more then Sertorius winning of the city of LAVRON. For he thinking to haue shut him in, & had geuen out some glorious wordes of the matter: wondred when he saw him selfe straight compassed in, that he could not sturre out of the campe where he lay, and was driuen besides to see the citie burnt before his face. This notwithstanding, afterwardes at a set battell by the citie of VALENTIA, he slue Herennius and Perpenna, both notable souldiers and Sertorius Lieutenauntes, and with them ten thowsand men. This victory so encoraged Pompey, that he made hast to fight with Sertorius alone, bicause Metellus should haue no parte of the honor of the victory. So they both met by the riuer of Sucron, about sunne set, both fearing Metellus comming: the one that he might fight alone, and the other with one alone. In fine, the victory fell out doutfull in the end of the battell: for either of their winges had the vpper hand. Betwene the two Captaines, Sertorius had the greater honor: for he alone ouercame all them that stoode before him. And as for Pompey, there was a great man of armes that being a foote, came and set vpon him, and hauing both their swordes in their handes, they both lighted apon their handes, but not both in one sorte: for Pompeys hand was but a litle hurt, and the man of armes had his hand cleane cut of. Then Pompeys men fell apon him, all his owne fellowes on that side being fled from him: notwithstanding, beyond all hope, he saued him selfe after a straunge sorte, by casting vp his horse among his enemies, that was richly trapped with gilt harnes, hauing a caparison of great value: and in the meane time, while they were busie deuiding this booty among them, and fighting for it; he scaped their handes. The next morning by breake of day, both of them againe brought their bandes into the fielde, to confirme the victory, which either of them supposed they had gotten. But Metellus came to Pompey at that present time, whereupon Sertorius went his way, and dispersed his army: for his campe was easily broken, & sodainly gathered againe together. For Sertorius would somtime wander the fieldes alone, and at an other time againe he

A he would haue a hundred and fifty thowſande fighting men together in the fielde, like a vehement ſtreame that ſomtime is dried vp, and that ſodainly againe is all of a flood. Pompey after this battell going to welcome Metellus, when they came neere one an other, he commaunded his ſergeauntes and officers to put downe their bundell of roddes and axes which they caried before him, to honor Metellus withall, who was a better man than him ſelfe. But Metellus would not ſuffer them, but ſhewed him ſelfe equall with him in that, and in all thinges elſe, not reſpecting his ſeniority, nor that he had bene Conſull, & Pompey not, ſauing when they camped together, Metellus gaue the watch word to all the campe. Notwithſtanding, commonly they camped a ſunder, for their enemy that was ſo flitting from place to place, and was ſeene in ſo ſundry places in ſo ſhort time, compelled them to be a ſunder to foreſee the worſt, draw-

B ing them ſodainly from one purpoſe to an other: ſo that in fine, cutting them of from vittells euery way, ſpoyling their contry, and keeping the ſea ſide, he draue them both out of the prouinces of their charge which they had in SPAYNE, and did compell them to goe ſome other where, for lacke of vittels. Pompey in the meane time hauing ſpent the moſt parte of his goods in this warre, ſent to ROME for money to pay his ſouldiers, threatning the Senate, that if they ſent him no money, he woulde returne with his armie into ITALIE. Lucullus then beinge Conſull, though Pompeys enemy, procured they ſhould ſend him money: for he practiſed to be ſent Captaine againſt king Mithridates, and therefore was affrayed to geue Pompey any occaſion to returne, who deſired nothing more then to leaue Sertorius, to bend his force againſt Mithridates, whoſe ouerthrow ſhould be more honorable to him, and alſo leſſe daungerous.

C In the meane ſpace, Sertorius dyed, being betrayed by thoſe whom he thought his frendes, among the which Perpenna was the chiefe man, that after Sertorius death would needes counterfeate his doinges, hauing the ſame meanes, the ſame furniture, and the ſame power that he had: howbeit he lacked his wit, and skill to employ them. Pompey therefore marching directly towardes him, and finding how ignorant Perpenna was in his affayers: he layed a bayte for him of ten cohorts which he ſent to praye in the fields, commaunding them to diſperſe them ſelues abroad as farre as they could, one from an other. Perpenna ſtraight tooke the occaſion, and gaue them charge, and had them in chaſe. But Pompey tarying him at the ford, was ready for him with all his army ſet in order: he gaue him battell, obtained the victory, and ended all

Pompey ouertaue Perpenna, and ſlue him.

D this warre, bicauſe the moſt of the Captaines were ſlaine in the field, and Perpenna the chiefe of all taken priſoner, whom he preſently put to death. But herein Pompey was not to be condemned of ingratitude nor obliuion (as ſome do burden him) of Perpennaes frendſhip ſhewed him in SICILE, but rather deſerued praiſe to haue determined ſo wiſely for benefit of the common wealth. For Perpenna hauing in his cuſtody all Sertorius wrytings, he ſhewed letters of the greateſt noble men of ROME, (which were deſirous of chaunge of gouernment) willing him to returne into ITALIE. Pompey vpon ſight of theſe letters, fearing leaſt they would breede greater ſedition & ſturre in ROME, then that which was already pacified: put Perpenna to death as ſoone as he could, and burnt all his papers and wrytinges, not reading any letter of them.

Pompey burnt Sertorius letters: the like alſo did Iulius Ceſar whē he ouercame Pompey.

Then Pompey remaining in SPAYNE a certaine time, till he had pacified all commocions and tumultes, marueloufly out of order: he brought his army backe againe into ITALIE, and arri-

E ued there when the warre of the bondmen and fenſers led by Spartacus, was in greateſt furie. Vpon his comming therefore, Craſſus being ſent Captaine againſt theſe bondmen, made haſt to geue them battell, which he wan, and ſlue twelue thowſand, three hundred of theſe fugitiue ſlaues. Notwithſtāding, fortune meaning to geue Pompey ſome parte of this honor, fiue thowſand of theſe bondmen eſcaping from the battell, fell into his hands. Whereupon, he hauing ouercome them, wrote vnto the Senate that Craſſus had ouercome the fenſers in battell, and that he had pluckt vp this warre by the rootes. The ROMANES receiuing Pompeys letters, were very glad of this newes for the loue they bare him. But as for the winning of SPAYNE againe, and the ouerthrow of Sertorius, there was no man, although it were in ſporte, that euer gaue any man elſe the honor, but vnto Pompey only. For all this great honor and loue they bare vn-

Pompey ouercame the reſt of the bondemen.

F to Pompey, yet they did ſuſpect him, and were affrayed of him, bicauſe he did not diſperſe his army, that he would follow Syllaes ſteppes, to rule alone by plaine force. Hereuppon, as many went to meete him for feare, as there were that went for good will they bare him. But after he had put this ſuſpicion quite out of their heades, telling them that he would diſcharge his armie after he had triumphed: then his illwillers could blame him for nothing elſe, but that he was more enclined to the people then to the nobilitie, and that he had a deſire to reſtore the Tribuneſhippe of the people, which Sylla had put downe, only to gratifie the common people in all he could: the which in deede was true. For the common people at Rome neuer longed for thing more, than they did to ſee the office of the Tribune ſette vp againe. Yea, Pompey him ſelfe thought it the happieſt turne that euer came to him, to light in ſuch a time, to doe ſuch an acte. For, had any other man preuented him of that, he coulde neuer haue founde the like occaſion poſſiblie to haue requited the peoples good willes vnto him, ſo much as in that. Nowe therefore, his ſeconde triumphe and firſt Conſullſhippe being decreed by the Senate: that made him nothinge the greater, or better man. And yet was it a ſhewe and ſignification of his greatneſſe, the which Craſſus (the richeſt man, the eloquenteſt and greateſt perſon of all them that at that time delt in matters of ſtate, and made more eſtimacion of him ſelfe then of Pompey and all the reſt) neuer durſt once demaunde: before he had craued Pompeys goodwill. Pompey was very glad of his requeſt, and had ſought occaſion of long time to pleaſure him: and thereupon made earneſt ſute vnto the people for him, aſſuringe them he would as much thanke them for making Craſſus his colleague and fellowe Conſull, as he would, for making him ſelfe Conſull. All this notwithſtandinge, when they were created Conſulls, they were in all thinges contrarie one to an other, and neuer agreed in any one thing while they were Conſulls together. Craſſus had more authority with the Senate, but Pompey had more credit with the people. For he reſtored them the office of the Tribune, and paſſed by edict, that the Knightes of Rome ſhould haue full power againe to iudge cauſes ciuill and criminall. It was a pleaſaunt ſight alſo to the people, when he came vnto the Cenſors in perſon, to pray that he might be diſpenſt with for goinge to the warres. For it was an auncient cuſtome in Rome, that the Knightes of Rome hauinge ſerued a certaine time in the warres appointed by their order, ſhould bring their horſe in the middeſt of the market place before the two Cenſors, declaring euery Captaine vnder whome they had ſerued, in what iorneys and contries they had bene, and hauinge alſo deliuered accompt of their good behauior and ſeruice, they then prayed to be diſmiſſed from the warres. Noweif it appeared that they had done good ſeruice, there were they honorablie rewarded: otherwiſe openly ſhamed and puniſhed. At that time, Gellius and Lentulus the two Cenſors being honorablie ſette in their tribunall or iudgement ſeate, taking viewe of all the Romane Knightes that muſtered before them, to be ſeene and examined: they marueled when they ſawe Pompey comminge at the further ende of the market place, hauinge all the markes of a Conſull borne before him, and him ſelfe leading his horſe in his hande by the bridle. When Pompey came neerer, and that they ſawe it was he, he commaunded his ſergeauntes that caried the axes before him, to make roome for him to paſſe by the barres with his horſe, where the Cenſors ſate. Then the people flocked about him, wondering and reioycing, being verie ſilent. The Cenſors them ſelues alſo were maruelous glad to ſee him ſo obedient to the lawe, and did him great reuerence. In fine, the elder of the Cenſors, did examine him in this ſorte. Pompey the great, I pray thee tell me if thou haſt ſerued ſo long time in the warres, as the lawe doth appoint? Then aunſwered Pompey alowde: yes verily that I haue, and vnder no other Captaine then my ſelfe. The people hearing that aunſwere, made an open ſhowte for ioy, they were ſo glad to heare it: and the Cenſors them ſelues came from their iudgement ſeate, and went to accompanie Pompey home to his houſe, to pleaſe the great multitude of people that followed him, clapping of their handes, with great ſignes of ioy. At the ende of their Conſulſhippe, when miſlikinge increaſed further betwext Pompey and Craſſus, there was one Gaius Aurelius, of the order of Knighthoode, who till that time neuer ſpake in open aſſembly, but then got vp into the pulpit for orations, and tolde the people openly: how Iupiter had appeared to him in the night, and had commaunded him to tell both the Conſulls from him, that they ſhould not leaue their charge and office, before they were reconciled together. For all theſe wordes Pompey ſturred not. But Craſſus firſt tooke him by the hand, and ſpake openly to him before the people. My Lordes, I thinke not my ſelfe diſhonored to geue

A place to Pompey, sith you your selues haue thought him worthie to be called, the great, before he had any heare of his face, and vnto whom you graunted the honor of two triumphes before he came to be Senator. When he had sayd his minde, they were made frendes together, and so surrendred vp their office. Now for Crassus, he held on his former maner of life which he had begon. Pompey as neere as he could gaue ouer to plead mens causes any more, & began litle and litle to withdraw him selfe from frequenting the market place, and matters of iudgement, comming seldome abroad, & when he did, he had alwaies a great traine following him. It was a rare thing also to see him any more come out of his house, or talke with any man, but he was euer accompanied with a great number, & he reioyced to him selfe, to see that he had alwaies such a traine with him: for that made him to be honored the more, & gaue him greater B countenaunce to see him thus courted, thinking it dishonor to him to be familiar with meane persons. For men that rise by armes, are easily despised, when they come to liue like priuate citizens: bicause they can not facion them selues to be cõpanions with the common people, (who citizen like vse a common familiaritie together) but looke to be their betters in the city, as they are in the field. Yea and cõtrarily, they that do acknowledge themselues to be their inferiors in warres: will thinke fowle scorne if they be not their superiors in peace. And by this meanes when they haue a noble warrier amonge them that followeth publike causes (which hath triumphed for many victories and battells he hath obtained) they obscure his glory, and make him an vnderling vnto them: whereas they doe not otherwise enuy any souldiers, that are contented equally to geue them place and authority, as plainly appeared shortly after by C Pompey him selfe. By such an occasion, the power of pirates on the sea tooke beginning in the contry of Cilicia, which was not reckoned of at the first, bicause it was not perceiued, vntill they grew bold & venturous in king Mithridates warres, being hyered to do him seruice. And afterwards the Romanes being troubled with ciuill warres, one fighting with an other euen at Rome gates, the sea not being looked to all this while: it set them a gogge, and made them go further then euer they did before. For they did not only rob & spoile all marchãt venterers by sea, but rifled also all the Ilandes & townes vpon the sea coast: insomuch as then there ioyned with them, men of great wealth and nobility, & of great wisedom also, & entred into their fellowshippe, as into a commendable faculty. Now they had set vp arsenalls or store houses in D sundry places, they had sundry hauens and beacons on the land, to geue warning by fire all alongest the sea coast, & those well kept & watcht: moreouer, they had great fleetes of shippes, ready furnisht with excellent good galliots of ores, skilfull pilots & mariners, their shippes of swift saile, & pinnases for discouery, but withall so gloriously set out, that men lesse hated their excesse, then feared their force. For the poopes of their galliots were all guilt, the coueringes of the same all of purple silke, delighting only to make a glorious show of their pillage. All the sea coast ouer, there was no sight of any thinge but musicke, singing, banketing, and rioting, prises of Captaines, and men of great quality, & raunsomes of a thowsand prisoners: & all this was to the shame & dishonor of the Romanes. Their ships were about a thowsand in nũber, & they had take aboue foure hũdred townes. They had spoiled & destroyed many holy tẽples that had neuer bene touched before. As the temple of the twynnes in the Ile of Claros, the E temple of Samothracia, the temple of Earth in the city of Hermion, & the tẽple of Æsculapius in Epidaurvm: the temples of Neptune in Isthmos, Tænaria, & Calabria: & the temples of Apollo in Activm, in the Ile of Levcades: the temples of Iuno in Samos, in Argos, & in Lvcania. They had also many straunge sacrifices & certen ceremonies of religion amongest thẽ selues, in the mount Olympus, & among other, the mistery of Mithres, which is the sunne: & remaineth yet in being vntõ this day, being first shewed by them. But besides all these insolent partes and iniuries they did the Romanes vpon the sea, they went a land, and where they found any houses of pleasure vpon the sea coast, they spoiled & destroyed them: & on a time they tooke two Romane Prætors, Sextilius, & Bellinus, being in their purple robes, with their sergeaũts & officers attending on thẽ, & caried them quite away. An other time also they stale F away the daughter of Antonius (a man that had receiued honor of triumphe) as she went a walking abroad in the fields, & she was redemed for a great summe of money. But yet the greatest spight & mockery they vsed to the Romanes, was this. That when they had take any of them and that he cried he was a citizen of ROME, and named his name: then they made as though they had bene amazed, and affrayed of that they had done. For they clapped their handes on their thighes, and fell downe on their knees before him, praying him to forgeue them. The poore prisoner thought they had done it in good earnest, seeing they humbled them selues as though they seemed fearefull. For some of them came vnto him, & put shooes on his feete: others clapt a gowne on the backe of him after the ROMANE facion, for feare, (sayd they) least he should be mistaken an other time. When they had played all this pageant, & mocked him their bellies full: at the last they cast out one of their shippe ladders, and put him on it, & bad him go his way, he should haue no hurt: and if he would not goe of him selfe, then they cast him ouer the bord by force, and sent him packing. These rouers and sea pirates had all the sea Mediterraneum at commaundement: insomuch there durst not a marchant looke out, nor once traffique that sea. And this was the only cause that moued the ROMANES, (fearing scarsity of vittells, and a great dearth) to send Pompey to recouer the signory againe of the sea from these pirates. The first man that moued it might be decreed, that Pompey should not be only Admirall, or Generall by sea, but should haue absolute power to commaunde all manner of persons as he thought good, without any account to be made of his doinges in his charge was Gabinius, Pompeys frend. The summe of this decree gaue him full power and absolute authority of all the sea from Hercules pillers, and of the maine land, the space of foure hundred furlong from the sea. (For the ROMANES dominions at that time in few places went further then that: notwithstanding, within that compasse were many great nations & mighty kings.) Furthermore, it gaue him power to choose of the Senate fifteene Lieutenauntes, to geue vnto euery one of them, seuerall prouinces in charge, according to his discretion: and also to take money out of the treasure, of the Generall receiuers of the state, to defray the charges of a fleete of two hundred saile, with full power besides to leauy what men of warre he thought good, and as many galliots and mariners as he lifted. This law when it had bene read once ouer among them, the people confirmed it with very good will. Yet the noble men and chiefe of the Senate thought that this authority did not only exceede all enuy, but also that it gaue them apparant cause of feare, to geue such absolute power vnto a priuate person. Whereupon, they were all against it but Cæsar, who fauored the decree, not so much to pleasure Pompey, as the people, whose fauor he sought. The noble men fell maruelously out with Pompey: and at the length one of the Consulls was very hotte with him, and told him he looked to follow Romulus steppes, but peraduenture he would come shorte of that end he made. Thereupon the people thought to haue killed him. After that, Catulus stoode vp to speake against this edict. The people at the first heard him quietly, bicause he was a worthy man. Then he began without any shew of enuy, to speake many goodly thinges in the praise of Pompey, and in fine, aduised the people to spare him, and not to venter in such daungerous warres (one after an other) a man of so great accompt, as they ought to make of him. If ye chaunce to loose him, sayd he: whom haue you then to put in his place? The people then cried out: your selfe. Then perceiuing that he lost his labor, seeking to turne the people from their determination: he left it there, and sayd no more. Roscius rose next after him to speake, but he could haue no audience. When he saw that he coulde not be heard, he made a signe with his fingers, that they shoulde not geue Pompey alone this authority, but ioyne an other with him. The people being offended withall made such an outcrie vppon it, that a crow flying ouer the market place at that instant, was striken blinde, & fell downe amongest the people. Whereby it appeareth, that fowle falling out of the ayer to the ground, do not fall for that the ayer is broken or pearced with any force or fury: but bicause the very breath of the voice (when it commeth with such a violence, as it maketh a very tempest in the ayer) doth strike & ouercome them. Thus for that day, the assembly brake vp, and nothing past: and at the day appointed when this decree should passe by voyces of the people, Pompey went abroad into the contry. There being aduertised that the decree was past for the cõfirmation of his charge, he returned againe that night into the citie, bicause he would auoyde the enuie they would haue borne him to haue seene them run out of all partes of the city vnto him, to haue waited on him home. The next morning he came abroad, and sacrificed to the goddes: and audience being geuen him at an

A open assembly, he handled the matter so, that they gaue him many thinges besides to enlarge his power, almost doubling the preparation set downe and appointed at the first decree. For he ordained that the common wealth should arme him fiue hundred shippes, & they leuied for him sixe score thowsand footemen, and fiue thowsand horsemen, and chose besides foure and twenty Senators, which had euery one of them bene Generalls of armies, and two generall Treasorers also. While thinges were thus a preparing, the price of vittels fell by chaunce: which reioyced the people so much, that they stucke not to say, that the name of Pompey only had already ended this warre. This notwithstanding, he deuided all the sea betweene the lands into thirteene regions, and in euery of them he appointed a certaine number of his shippes, and moreouer, one of his Lieutenauntes ouer them. Thus hauing dispersed his power all a- Pompey's preparation against the pirates.

B broade, he brought all the pirates shippes that were in a fleete together, within his daunger: and when he had taken them, he brought them all into a docke. Now for them that had dispersed them selues betimes, or that otherwise could scape his generall chase: they fled all into Cilicia, as bees into the beehiue, against whom he would needes go him selfe in person with three score of his best shippes. Howbeit he cared not though he went not before he had scoored all the Thvscane sea, the coastes of Lybia, Sardinia, Sicile, and of Corsica, of all these theeues which are wont to keepe thereabouts: and this he did within forty dayes space, taking infinite paines, both him selfe and his Lieutenaunts. Now when one of the Consulls called Piso did all the best he could to hinder Pompeys preparation, and had discharged his ower men, for that he enuied Pompeys prosperity: Pompey sent his shippes before to make to-

C wardes Italie to arriue at the city of Brvndvsivm. He in the meane time, went through Thvscane to Rome, where, so soone as his comming was knowen, all the people ran out to meete him, as if he had bene absent a long time: and that which made the people more ioyfull to see him, was the sodaine chaunge of victals vnlooked for, that dayly came to the towne out of all partes. But Piso went neere to be depriued of his Consulshippe: for Gabinius had the decree wrytten, and ready to present to the people. But Pompey would not suffer it. So, hauing gently brought all to passe as he desired, he went vnto the city of Brvndvsivm, and there tooke sea, and hoysed sayle. Now though his hasty voyage, and shortnesse of time made him passe by many good cities without comming into them: notwithstanding, he would not so passe by the city of Athens, but landed there, and after he had sacrificed to the goddes, retur- The curtesie of Pompey vnto Piso.

The humblier that thou doost thy selfe as man behaue,
The more thou doost deserue the name of god to haue.

And the other wryting was without the gate, which sayd:

VVe vvisht for thee, vve vvayt for thee, VVe vvorship thee, vve vvayt on thee.

Nowe bicause Pompey hauing taken certaine of these rouers by sea that kept together, did vse them gently when they required pardon, and hauing their shippes and bodies in his power, did them no hurt at all: their other companions being in good hope of his mercy, fled

E from his other Captaines and Lieutenauntes, and went and yeelded them selues, their wiues and children into his handes. Pompey pardoned all them that came in of them selues, and by that meanes he came to haue knowledge of the rest, and to followe them where they went, whome he tooke in the ende: but knowinge that they deserued no pardon, they hid them selues. Yet the most parte, and the richest of them, had conueyed their wiues, children and goodes, and all other their family vnmeete for warres, into strong castells and litle townes a- Pompey pursued the pirates.

pon mount Taurus: and such men as were able to cary weapon, imbarked, and lay before a city of Coracesivm, where they taried Pompey, and gaue him battell, first by sea, and there were ouercome, and afterwardes they were besieged by lande. Howebeit shortly after, they prayed they might be receiued to mercie, and thereuppon yeelded their bodies, townes, and

F Ilandes which they had fortified, and were hard to haue taken and worse to haue approached. Thus was this warre ended, and all the pirates in lesse then three monthes driuen from the sea wheresoeuer they were. He wanne also a great number of other shippes, besides foure The victory of Pompey vpon the pirats.

ſcore and tenne gallies armed with copper ſpurres. And touching the men whom they had taken, (who were in number aboue twenty thowſand perſones) he did not only conſider whether he ſhould put them to death, but alſo thought it no wiſe parte on thother ſide to let them goe at liberty, to gather force againe, being ſo great a number of them as in deede they were, and all poore men and ſouldiers. Therefore, weying with him ſelfe, that man by nature is not borne a wild or ſauage beaſt, but contrarily becommeth a brute beaſt chaunging nature, whē he falleth to vice: and againe is made tame and ciuill in time, chaunging place and maner of life: (as brute beaſtes that being wilde by nature doe alſo become gentle and tractable, with gentler vſage by continuance) he determined to draw theſe pirats from the ſea into thupland, and to make them feele the true and innocent life, by dwelling in townes, and manuring the ground. Some of them therefore he placed in certaine ſmall townes of the CILICIANS, that were ſcant inhabited, & were very glad of thē, geuing them land to keepe them with. The city of the SOLIANS alſo, that not long before had bene deſtroyed by Tigranes the king of ARMENIA, being deſirous to repleniſh that againe, he placed many of them there. He beſtowed diuers alſo in the city of DYMA in the contry of ACHAIA, which at that time lacked inhabitants, and had great ſtore of very good land. Now therefore his enemies reproued him greatly: and for that he did in CRETA, they that were his beſt and greateſt frendes miſliked him. For Metellus that gentle perſon, (a coſen to that Metellus which was his colleague, and made warres in SPAYNE with him againſt Sertorius) was ſent Prætor into CRETA, before Pompey was choſen Generall againſt the pirates. This CRETA, next vnto CILICIA, was euen a ſeconde denne of pirates. Metellus finding there a great number of theſe theeues, tooke many of them, and put them to death, euen all that came to his handes. Then, ſuch as had ſcaped from him, being ſtraightly beſieged, ſent vnto Pompey to pray him of pardon, and to take them to mercie: declaringe vnto him, that the Ile of CRETA was within the precinct of his charge, bicauſe all partes of that region from the ſea came iuſt within the cōpaſſe limited him on the land. Pompey pardoning them apon their ſubmiſſion, wrote vnto Metellus, & commaunded him to leaue of his warre, and therewithall charged all the cities, that they ſhould not obey Metellus commaundementes. After that he ſent Lucius Oſtauius, one of his Lieutenauntes, who entred into the townes Metellus beſieged, and fought for the pirates. This made Pompey not only hated & enuied, but derided alſo: for that vnder his name he had protected ſuch vile theeues, that had neither God nor law, and geuen them his authority to ſaue their liues, for a litle enuie and emulacion he bare vnto Metellus. And therefore they rightly reproue Achilles, and ſay that he ſhewed not the parte of a wiſe man, but of a young foole beſides him ſelfe, for deſire of glory, making a ſigne to the GRÆCIANS, forbidding them to ſtrike at Hector, to thend that as Homer ſayd:

How men are tamed.

Pompeys lewd fact againſt Metellus.

Achilles diſhoneſt fact.

Leaſt he too late should to the battell runne,
When others had the honor of it wonne.

But Pompeys fact was worſe then this. For he fought for the cōmon enemies of the world, and only to depriue a ROMANE Prætor of triumphe, who had done great good ſeruice to haue deſtroyed them. This notwithſtanding, Metellus left not of his warre for Pompeys letters, but hauing taken the pirates by aſſault, he put them to death: and afterwardes hauing done Oſtauius open ſhame through his campe, he let him goe. When newes came to ROME, that the pirates warre was brought to good end, & that Pompey hauing no other ſeruice in hand, went viſiting the cities vp & downe: one Manilius a Tribune of the people, put forth an other decree vnto them of this effect. That Pompey taking all the army Lucullus had, & the prouinces vnder his gouernment, with al BITHYNIA, which Glabrio kept: ſhould go make warre vpon the kings Tigranes and Mithridates, keping in his handes notwithſtanding all his iuriſdiction and army by ſea, in as royall maner as he had it before. In fine, this was euen to make one man Monarke and abſolute Prince, of all the ROMANE Empire. For by this ſecond decree, he had all theſe contries not named in his former commiſſion, added to amplifie his authority, as PHRYGIA, LYCAONIA, GALATIA, CAPPADOCIA, CILICIA, high COLCHIDA and ARMENIA, with all the armies and forces with the which he had ouercomen thoſe two mighty kinges. Then the Senate ſtucke not ſo much at the iniurie that was offered vnto Lucullus, depriuing him of the honor

Pompey appointed Lucullus ſucceſſor.

A honor of his doinges, to geue it to an other, that ſhould rather ſuccende him in honor of triumphe, then in daunger of warres, knowing that they did him too manifeſt injury, & ſhewed them ſelues too vnthankefull: but that which moſt grieued them, was to ſee Pompeys power eſtabliſhed in a plaine tyranny. Hereuppon therefore, one of them perſwaded and encoraged an other, ſtowtly to withſtand this edict, and not to ſuffer their liberty to be loſt in this ſorte. Notwithſtanding, when the day came that the decree ſhould paſſe, they were ſo afrayed to anger the people, that their hartes failed them, & none durſt ſpeake againſt it but Catulus only: that earneſtly inueyed againſt the paſſing of it a long time together, & greatly blamed the people. At the length, perceiuing he had wonne neuer a man to take his parte, he oftentimes cried out to the Senate, that they ſhould looke to ſeeke out ſome mountaine or high rocke to

B retyre ſafely vnto, to defend their liberty, as their anceſters had done in old time before them. All this preuailed not, for the decree paſſed by the voices of all the tribes, as it is reported. And thus was Pompey in his abſence made Lorde almoſt of all that, which Sylla by force of armes and great effuſion of blood (hauing made him ſelfe Lord of ROME) had before in his power. When Pompey had receiued letters from ROME, aduertiſing him what the people had paſt in his behalfe: ſome ſay that at the receite of them (in the preſence of his familiar frendes that were about him, and reioyced with him for congratulacion) he knit his browes, and clapped on his thigh, as though it grieued him marueloufly to haue ſuch great offices & charge layed vpon him, one in the necke of an other, and burſt forth in theſe wordes. O goddes, ſhall I neuer ſee an ende of ſuch a worlde of troubles as I haue? Had it not bene better for me to haue Pompeys great diſſimulation.

C bene a meane man borne and vnknowen, then thus continually to be in warre with armor on my backe? What, ſhall I neuer ſee the time, that breaking the neckes of ſpight and enuy againſt me, I may yet once in my life liue quietly at home in my contrie, with my wife & children? When Pompey ſpake thoſe wordes, his familiar frendes could not abide to ſee his deepe diſſimulation, knowing that beſides his naturall ambition and couetous deſire to rule, he was glad in his hart that he had this charge, for the contention that was betwixt him and Lucullus: which his deedes forthwith bewrayed. For he preſently ſent out precepts into euery quarter, commaunding all ſortes of ſouldiers to come to him immediatly, & made alſo all the Princes and kinges within precinct of his charge to come vnto him, and going through the contries, altered and chaunged all that Lucullus had eſtabliſhed before. Furthermore, he did releaſe the Quarrell betwixt Pompey and Lucullus.

D penalties enioyned them, and tooke from them alſo the giftes that Lucullus beſtowed of them. In fine, this was all his purpoſe and deſire: to make them that honored Lucullus know, that he had no further power & authority to doe any thing. Lucullus finding him ſelfe hardly handled by Pompey, the frends of either ſide thought good they ſhould meete & talke together: which came ſo to paſſe, for they met in the contry of GALATIA. And bicauſe they both were great Captaines of the ROMANE armies, and had done many famous acts, they had their ſergeaunts & officers that caried the bundells of roddes before thē, wreathed about with laurell boughs. When they met, Lucullus came out of a cloſe & woddy contry, all couered with greene trees, and Pompey on thother ſide had paſſed through a great ſandy plaine, where no tree was growing. Thereupon Lucullus ſergeaunts ſeeing the laurell boughes drie and withered away, which

E Pompeys ſergeaunts caried, they gaue them of their greene and freſh boughes to beawtifie the roddes and axes. This was a plaine token that Pompey came to take Lucullus honor from him. In troth Lucullus had bene Conſull before Pompey, & ſo was he alſo older man then he: yet the dignity of Pompey was greater, bicauſe he had triumphed twiſe. At their firſt meeting, their entertainment & diſcourſe was with great ceremony and curteſie as might be, one highly praiſing the others deedes, reioycing at eche others good ſucceſſe: but at parting, they fell to lute wordes together, Pompey vpbrayding Lucullus auarice, and Lucullus Pompey ambition, ſo that their frendes had much a doe to parte them. Lucullus departing thence, deuided the landes in

F GALATIA, which he had conquered, and beſtowed them & other gifts, on ſuch as he thought good. Pompey on thother ſide camping hard by him, ſpecially commaunded the people in euery parte to obey him in nothing whatſoeuer he did: and beſides, he took all his ſouldiors from him, leauing him only ſixteene hundred, which he ſuppoſed were ſuch, as for diſdaine and ill will they bare him, would do him but ſmall ſeruice. Furthermore, to bleamiſh the glory of his doings, he told euery body Lucullus had fought with the pompe & ſhadow only of theſe two kinges, and that he had left him to fight with all their whole force and power, Mithridates being then prepared for warres, with ſhieldes, ſwordes, and horſes. Lucullus for reuenge on the other ſide ſayd, that Pompey went to fight but with a ſhadow of warre, like a cowardly buſſard that prayeth vpon dead bodies, which others haue ſlaine: & to cut a ſunder the remaine of this warre ended by an other, as he had done before, attributing the honor of the ouerthrow of Sertorius, Lepidus, and Spartacus, to him ſelfe, where in deede Metellus, Craſſus, and Catulus did ouercome them. And therfore it was no maruell, that he ſought the glory and honor to triumphe for the kingdomes of PONTVS and ARMENIA: ſith that through his ſubtill practiſes he had obtained triumphe for a fewe ſlaues and fugitiues. Lucullus being nowe gone his way, Pompey ſent good garriſons vnto all the coaſtes apon the ſea, from the prouince of PHOENICIA, vnto the realme of BOSPHORVS. That done, he tooke his iorney by lande towardes Mithridates, who had in his campe thirtie thowſande footemen, and two thowſande horſemen, and yet durſt not offer battel, but camped firſt apon a mountaine of great ſtrength, and hard to get vp on: notwithſtanding ſhortly after, he forſooke it for lacke of water. He was no ſooner gone thence, but forthwith Pompey tooke it. Who, coniecturing by the nature of the plantes and trees in that place which were very greene, and alſo by diuers holes he found, that for reaſon thereabouts ſhould be ſome ſpringes: he commaunded them to digge welles in euery corner, ſo that in a very ſhort time all his campe had water enough, and he wondred at Mithridates, that he could not finde that out in all the time he lay there. In thend, he went and camped rounde about Mithridates, and intrenched him with a wall within his owne campe: who after he had abidden the ſiege fiue and forty dayes, fled away with all the choice of his army, vnknowing to Pompey, hauing firſt ſlaine all the ſicke and impotent perſons within his campe. After that, Pompey found him an other time by the riuer of Euphrates, & went and lodged hard by him. But fearing that Mithridates would paſſe ouer the riuer before he could preuent him in time, he raiſed his campe againe, & marched away at midnight. About that time, they ſay, that Mithridates ſawe that in a dreame, which did prognoſticate what ſhould happen. He thought, that hauing the winde in the poope of his ſhippe, he was vnder ſaile, in the middeſt of the ſea of Mare Boſphorum, and that he was maruelous glad of it, and reioyced with them that ſailed with him, thinking him ſelfe certainly paſt all daunger: yet ſodainly againe, that all this ioy left him, and that he floted vp and downe the waues of the ſea, apon a litle peece of the ſhippe that was broken, truſting to the mercy of the windes. As he was troubled with this ill fauored dreame, certaine of his familiars came to him and told him, that Pompey was come ſo neere, that there was no ſhift, but they muſt needes fight to defend their campe. Thereuppon, his Captaines ſtraight beganne to put his men in battell ray, ready to fight. Pompey vnderſtanding they prepared to make defence, was in dout to venter his men to fight in the darke, thinking it better to compaſſe them in to keepe them from flying, & then in the morning to ſet vpon them more eaſily, his men being the better ſouldiers. But Pompeys olde Captaines were ſo earneſtly in hand with him to perſwade him they might fight, that in the ende he was contented they ſhould geue charge. Now it was not ſo darke but they could ſomewhat ſee, for the moone that was very low and vppon her ſetting, gaue light enough to diſcerne the body of a man: yet bicauſe the moone was very low, the ſhadow which gaue out further farre then their bodies, came almoſt euen to their very enemies, which did let the that they could not certainly iudge what ſpace of ground was betwene them, but imagining that they were hard by them, they caſt their dartes at the ROMANES, but they hurte neuer a man, for their bodies were a great way from them. The ROMANES perceiuing that, ran apon them with great cries. But the barbarous people durſt not abide their charge they were ſo affrayed, but turned their backes, and ranne away for life, ſo that they were ſlaine downe right. Thus were there tenne thowſand of the barbarous people ſlaine and more, and their campe alſo taken. As for Mithridates him ſelfe, at the beginning of thonſet, he made a lane among the ROMANES with eight hundred horſemen, and paſſed cleane through them. But incontinently his men diſperſed apon it, ſome one way, ſome an other way, ſo that he was left alone but with three perſons only, whereof Hypſicratea was one of the number, which had euer bene valliant and

A and had a mans hart: whereuppon, for that cause Mithridates called her Hypsicratea. She at that time being arrayed like a man of armes of PERSIA, and mounted also on a horse after the PERSIAN maner, was neuer weary with any long iorney the king made, nor neuer left to waite vpon his person, and to looke to his horse: vntill such time as the king came to a strong castell called Inora, where was great store of gold & siluer, and the kinges chiefest treasure. Then Mithridates tooke of his richest apparell he had there, & gaue it amongest them that were about him at that time, and a deadly poyson besides to euery one of his frendes to carie about them, bicause they should not (vnlesse they would them selues) fall into their enemies handes aliue. From thence he thought to take his iorney into ARMENIA, vnto king Tigranes. Howbeit Tigranes sent to let him, and further proclaimed by trompet, that he would geue a hundred ta-

B lentes to him that could kill him. Thereuppon, passing by the head of the riuer of Euphrates, he fled through the contry of CHOLCHIDE. In the meane time, Pompey inuaded the contry of ARMENIA, at the request of Tigranes the younger, who was reuolted against his father, and went to meete with Pompey at the riuer of Araxes, which hath his beginning almost about the head of Euphrates: but it runneth towards the East, and falleth into Mare Caspium. So they both together marched on further into the contrie, receiuinge such townes as yeelded vnto them. But king Tigranes (that not long before had bene consumed and destroyed by Lucullus) vnderstanding that Pompey was of a mylde and gentle nature, he receiued his garrisons into his strongest fortes and royall houses, and went him selfe with his frendes and kinsemen to meete Pompey, & to yeeld him selfe vnto him. Whē he came hard to his campe, being a horse backe,

C there came out two sergeaunts of Pompeys, & commaunded him to light and go in a foote, for there was neuer man seene a horse backe within the ROMANES campe. Tigranes did not only obey them, but further plucked of his sword and gaue it them: and in fine, when he came almost to Pompey, taking of his royall hatte frō his head, he would haue layed it at Pompeys feete, & falling downe most shamefully on the ground, imbased him selfe to imbrase Pompeys knees. But Pompey him selfe preuented him, and taking him by the hande, made him to sit downe by him on the one side of him, and his sonne on the other. Then he sayd vnto them both: as for the other losses you haue susteined heretofore, you must thanke Lucullus for them, who hath taken from you, SYRIA, PHOENICIA, CILICIA, GALATIA, and SOPHENA: but for that you haue left you till my comming, I will let you enioy it, paying to the ROMANES a fine of sixe

D thowsand talentes for the iniurie you had done them, prouided also, that your sonne haue the kingdome of SOPHENA for his parte. Tigranes accepted the condicions of peace. The ROMANES then saluted him king. He was so glad thereof, that he promised to geue euery souldier halfe a Mina, euery Centener tenne Minas, and to euery Colonell of a thowsand men a talent. His sonne was very angry withall: insomuch as Pompey sending for him to come to supper to him, he aunswered againe, that was not the frendshippe he looked for at Pompeys handes, for he should finde many other ROMANES that would offer him that curtesie. Pompey for his aunswere, clapped him vp as a prisoner, and kept him to be led in triumphe at ROME. Shortly after, Phraates king of PARTHIA sent Ambassadors to Pompey to demaunde this young Prince, that was his sonne in law: and to tell him that the riuer of Euphrates must be the vttermost

E confines of his conquestes. Pompey aunswered againe, that Tigranes had more right to his sonne, then the father in law: and as for limiting of his borders, that he would doe it with iustice. So, leauing Afranius in ARMENIA to keepe the contrie, Pompey passed by other nations which inhabite about mount Caucasus, hauing Mithridates in chace: of which nations, two of the chiefest and of greatest power, are the ALBANIANS and IBERIANS. The IBERIANS do stretch out vnto mount Moschiū, & to the realme of PONTVS. The ALBANIANS lye towards the East, and Mare Caspium. These men first suffered Pompey to passe through their contrie, apon his sending to thē. But winter hauing stolen apon the ROMANES while they were there, & they busily occupied about Saturnes feasts: the barbarous people hauing leuied aboue forty thowsand fighting mē in one campe together, came & passed ouer the riuer of Cyrnus. (This

When they were all ouer, he went against them, ouercame them in battell, and slue a great number of them in the field. Afterwardes he pardoned their kinge, submittinge him selfe vnto Pompey by his Ambassadors, and made peace with him. Then from thence he went against the IBERIANS: who were no lesse in number, then the ALBANIANS were at the first, and also better souldiers, and were resolutely bent to doe good seruice vnto Mithridates, and to driue out Pompey. These IBERIANS were neuer subiect to the Empire of the PERSIANS, nor of the MEDES, and scaped also from being subiect to the MACEDONIANS, for that Alexander neuer stayed in the contry of HYRCANIA: whom also Pompey ouercame in a great & bloodie battell, hauing slaine nine thowsand in the field, and taken temne thowsand prisoners. From thence he went into the contry of COLCHIDA. There Seruilius met him by the riuer of Phasis, with the fleete of shippes with the which he kept all Mare Ponticum. Now to followe Mithridates further, who had hidde him selfe amongest a people that were neighbours vnto the straightes of BOSPHORVS, and the marisses Mæotides, he found it a hard peece of worke. Furthermore also, he had newes that the ALBANIANS were rebelled againe, which drew him backe to be reuenged of them. Thereuppon he passed againe ouer the riuer of Cyrnus, with great paine and daunger, bicause the barbarous people had made a strong defence a great way alongest the riuer side, with a maruelous number of great trees, feld and layed a crosse one ouer an other. Furthermore, when he had with great difficulty passed thorow them, he fell into an euill fauored contry, where he should trauell a great way before he could come to any water. Thereuppon he caused ten thowsand goates skinnes to be filled with water, and so went forward to meete with his enemies, whom he found by the riuer of Abas, being sixe score thowsande footemen, and twelue thowsande horsemen, but all (or the most of them) ill armed with wilde beastes skinnes. Their Chiefetaine was Cosis, the kinges owne brother. He, when the battell was begonne, flew apon Pompey, and threwe a dart at him, and hurt him in the flancke. Pompey on thother side, ranne him through with his launce on both sides, & slue him starke dead. Some say also, that there were certaine AMAZONES at this battel, which fought of the barbarous peoples side, cõming from the mountaines that runne alongest the riuer of Thermodon. For, after the ouerthrow geuen, the ROMANES spoyling the dead, found targets, and buskinnes of the AMAZONES, but not a body of a woman among them. They also doe inhabite on the side of the mountaine Caucasus, that looketh towardes Mare Hyrcanium, and doe not border vpon the ALBANIANS: but the GELE, and the LELEGES are betwene them, with whom they company two monethes only euery yeare meeting together, by the riuer of Thermodon, and all the rest of the yeare, they liue a parte by them selues. After this last battell, Pompey going to inuade the contrie of HYRCANIA, as farre as Mare Caspium, he was compelled to go backe againe for the infinite number of deadly venemous serpents which he met with, being come within three dayes iorney of it. So he returned backe againe into ARMENIA the lesse, and there receiued presentes which were sent vnto him from the kings of the ELYMIANS and the MEDES, and wrote very curteously vnto them againe: howbeit he sent Afranius with parte of his armie against the king of the PARTHIANS, who had inuaded the contry of GORDIENA, and harried and spoiled the king of Tigranes subiects. Notwithstanding, he draue him out, and followed him vnto ARBELITIDE. Furthermore, all the lemmans and concubines of king Mithridates being brought vnto Pompey, he would touche none of them, but sent them all home againe, to their parents and frendes, bicause the most of them were either the daughters of Princes, of noble men, or of Captaines. Notwithstanding, Stratonice that of all the rest of his lemmans, had most credit about Mithridates, vnto whom he had left all the charge of his castel, where the greatest parte of his treasure of gold and siluer lay, was a singers daughter, who as they sayd, was not virgin, but an old mah. She hauing song one night before Mithridates, being at supper, he fell in such fancy with her, that he would needes haue her lye with him the same night, and the old man her father went home offended, bicause the king would not so much as geue him one good word. But the next morning when he rose, he marueled to see the tables in his house full of

A plate of gold and siluer, and a great company of seruing men, groomes of chamber & pages; and that they had brought him maruelous riche apparell, & a horse ready at the gates braue-ly furnished, as the kings familiars did vse when they went abroade into the city: he thought it was done in mockery, to haue made sporte with him, and therefore would haue runne his way, had not the seruing men kept him, and told him that they were a great rich mans goods that dyed of late, which the king had bestowed on him, and that all this he saw, was but a litle portion in respect of the other goods and lands he gaue him. So the old man beleeuing them, at the length did put on this purple gowne they brought him, and got vp a horse backe, & ri-ding through the streetes, cried, all this is mine, all this is mine. Certaine laughing him to scorne for it, he told them: masters, ye may not wonder to heare me thus crie out, but rather, B that I throw not stones at them I meete, I am so madde for ioy. Such was Stratonices birth and parentage, as we haue told you. She did then deliuer this castell into Pompeys hands, and offe-red him many goodly riche presents: but he would take none of them, other then such as ser-ued to adorne the temples of the goddes, and to beawtifie his triumphe, and left all the rest with Stratonice her selfe, to dispose as she thought good. In like manner also, the king of the IBERIANS, hauing sent him a bedstead, a table, and a chayer of cleane golde, praying him to take it as a remembraunce from him: he deliuered it ouer vnto the Treasorers custody, to be accountable for it vnto the state. In an other castell called Coenon, he founde certaine secret letters sent from Mithridates, which pleased him maruelously to reade, bicause thereby he plainly vnderstoode the kinges nature and inclination. For in them were mencioned that he C had poysoned (besides many other) Ariarathes his owne sonne, and Alcaus the SARMATIANS, bicause he had wonne the bell, at the horse race before him. There was also interpretinge of dreames, that either him selfe or his wiues had dreamed, and also loue letters betwext Monimi and him. Theophanes wryteth also, that there was found an oration of Rutilius, in the which he inuised and perswaded Mithridates to put all the ROMANES to death that were in ASIA. How beit in reason men thinke, that this was a shamefull lye, maliciously deuised by Theopha-nes, who hated Rutilius, bicause he was but a counterfeate to him: or peraduentute to gratifie D Pompey, whose father Rutilius in his histories describeth to be as wicked a man as euer liued. Thence Pompey departed towardes the city of AMISVS. There his ambition brought him to commit such factes, as he him selfe did condemne before in Lucullus: for that his enemy being yet aliue, he tooke vpon him to establish lawes, to geue giftes, and distribute such honors, as Captaines that had obtained victory were wont to doe, when they had ended all warre and trouble. For he him selfe (Mithridates being yet the stronger in the realme of BOSPHORVS, and hauing a great puissant army about him) did all that which he reproued an other for, ap-pointing prouinces, and geuing out giftes to euery man according as he deserued: to gratifie twelue barbarous kinges, with diuers other Princes, Lordes and Captaines, that came to him thither. Wryting also to the king of PARTHIA, he disdained to geue him that title, which o-thers were wont to doe in the direction of their letters, calling him king of kinges. Further-more, he had a wonderfull great desire to winne SYRIA, and to goe through the contry of A-RABIA, euen vnto the redde sea, bicause he might enlarge his conquestes and victories euery E way, euen vnto the great sea Oceanum, that compasseth all the whole earth. For in LIBYA, he was the first ROMANE that conquered all to the great sea. On thother side, in SPAYNE he enlarged the Empire of Rome, and brought the confines thereof vnto Mare Atlanticum. And thirdly, hauing lately the ALBANIANS in chase, he came almost vnto Mare Hyrcanium. Thus he put him selfe in iorney, intending his circuite vnto the redde sea, specially bicause he sawe Mithridates so ill to follow, & worse to ouercome by force when he fled, then when he fought any battell: and that made him say, that he would leaue a shaper enemy behinde him, then him selfe: and that he ment, famine. For he appointed souldiers with sufficient number of shippes, to lye in waite for the marchauntes that sailed to the contrie of BOSPHORVS, to kary them any vitells or other marchaundises, prohibiting them vpon paine of death that should F attempt it. Then he went forward with the best parte of his army, and in his way, founde the bodies of dead ROMANES which Mithridates had ouerthrowen vnder the leading of Triarius their Captaine, and were yet vnburied. So he caused them all to be taken vp, and honorably buried. Lucullus hauing forgotten, or otherwise neglected to doo it, in my conscience that was the chiefest cause why his men did hate him. Pompey now hauing by Afranius subdued the ARABIANS, dwelling about mount Amanus, went him selfe in person into SYRIA, and made a gouernment and prouince of it, being won to the ROMANE empire, for that it lacked a lawfull king: and conquered all IVRIE also, where he tooke king Aristobulus, and builded certaine cities there, and deliuered others also from bondage, which by tyrannes were forcibly kept, whom he chasticed well enough. Howbeit he spent the most parte of his time there, deciding of controuersies, pacifying of contencions and quarrells by arbitrement, which fell out betwext the free cities, Princes and kinges, and sent of his frends into those places where he could not come him selfe. For on a time when he was chosen arbitrator betwext the PARTHIANS and the ARMENIANS, touching the title of a contrie which both parties claimed: he sent three commissioners thither to iudge definitiuely betwext them both. If Pompeys fame and renowne were great, no lesse was his vertue, iustice, and liberality, which in deede did hide many faultes, his frendes and familiars about him did commit. For truely he was of so gentle a nature, that he could neither keepe them from offending, nor yet punish them when they had offended. Notwithstanding, he did vse them so well that complained vnto him, or that had to deale with him in any matter: that he made them contented, paciently to beare their couetousnes & straight dealing. One of his chiefest familiars about him whom he loued best, was called Demetrius, a bondman infranchised, who otherwise was very discrete in his doings, but being somewhat too bolde of his good fortune: of him they make this mention. Cato the Philosopher being at that time a young man, yet of good iudgement and of a noble minde, in Pompeys absence went to see the city of ANTIOCH. Now for him selfe, his maner was alwayes to goe a foote, & all his frendes besides that did accompany him to honor him, were a horseback. He perceiuing a farre of, a great sorte of people comming towardes him all in white, and of one side of the streete litle children, and on the other boyes, round about them as in a ring: at the first he was angry withall, thinking they had done it for his sake to honor him, that they made this procession, which he in no wise would haue had done. Thereuppon he commaunded his frendes to light from their horses, and to goe a foote with him. But when they came neere to the gate of the city, the maister of the ceremonies that led this procession, hauing a garland on his head, and a rodde in his hand, came vnto them, and asked them where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come? Catoes frendes laughed to heare this question: then sayd Cato, alas poore city, and so passed by it. Notwithstanding, Pompey him selfe was cause that Demetrius had the lesse ill will borne him, then otherwise he should haue had bicause they sawe howe boldly he would vse Pompey, and howe well he would take it without offence. It is reported, that when Pompey oftentimes had bidden some to dinner or supper, while he was entertaining and welcomming of them, and would tary till they were all come: Demetrius would be set at the bord, and presumptuously haue his head couered euen to the very eares. And furthermore, before he returned into ITALIE out of this iorney, he had already purchaced the goodliest houses of pleasure and fayrest walkes that were about ROME, and had sumptuous gardens also, the which the people commonly called Demetrius gardens: though his maister Pompey was but meanly housed till his third Consullshippe. Howbeit afterwardes, he built that famous stately Theater, called Pompeys Theater, and ioyned vnto that also an other house, as a penthouse to his Theater, farre more sumptuous and stately then the first, and yet no more then needed. Insomuch as he that was owner of it dyed him selfe, when he came into it, he marueled, and asked where abouts it was, that Pompey dyned & supped. These thinges are reported thus. Now, the king of the ARABIANS, that dwelt about the castell called Petra, hauing neuer vntill that time made any accompt of the ROMANES army, was then greatly affrayed of them, and wrote vnto Pompey, that he was at his deuotion, to doo what he would commaunde him. Pompey thereuppon to proue him, whether he ment as he spake: brought his army before this castell of Petra. Howbeit this voyage was not liked of many men, bicause they iudged it was an occasion found out to leaue following of Mithridates, against whom they would haue had him rather haue bent his force, being an auncient enemy to ROME, and that beganne to gather strength againe, and prepared (as they heard say) to lead

A a great army through Scythia and Pannonia into Italie. But Pompey thinking he should hinder minish the his power by suffering him to goe on with warres, then that he should otherwise be able to take him flying: would not toyle to follow him in vaine. And for these causes he would needes make warres in other places, and linger time so long, that in the end he was put by his hope. For when he was not farre from the castell of Petra, & had lodged his campe for that day: as he was riding and managing his horse vp and downe the campe, postes came flagging to him from the realme of Pontus, and brought him good newes, as was easily to be discerned a farre of by the heades of their iauelings, which were wreathed about with laurell boughes. The souldiers perceiuing that, flocked straight about him: but Pompey would make an ende of his riding first, before he red these letters. Howbeit they crying to him, and B being importunate with him, he lighted from his horse, and returned into his campe, where there was no stone high enough for him to stand vppon to speake vnto them, and againe, the souldiers would not tary the making of one after the manner of their campe, which men of warre doe make them selues, with great turues of earth, laying one of them vppon an other: but for haste & earnest desire they had to heare what newes there was in the letters, they layed together a heape of saddells one apon an other, and Pompey getting vp vpon them, tolde how Mithridates was dead, and had killed him selfe with his owne handes, bicause his sonne Pharnaces did rebell against him, and had wonne all that which his father possessed: writing vnto him, that he kept it for him selfe and the Romanes. Vpon these newes, all the campe ye may imagine, made wonderfull ioy, and did sacrifice to the goddes, geuing them thankes, & were C as merry, as if in Mithridates person alone, there had ayed an infinite number of their enemies. Pompey by this occasion, hauing brought this warre more easily to passe then he hoped for, departed presently out of Arabia, and hauing speedily in few dayes passed through the countries lying by the way, he came at length to the city of Adiabene. There he founde great presents that were brought vnto him from Pharnaces, and many dead bodies of the kinges bloode, and amongest the rest, Mithridates corse, which could not well be discerned by his face, bicause they that had the carying of his body had forgotten to drie vp the braine: neuertheless, such as desired to see him, knew him by certaine skarres he had in his face. For Pompey would in no wise see him: but to auoide enuy, sent him away vnto the city of Synope. He wondred D much at the maruelous sumptuous riche apparell and weapons that he ware. The scaberd of his sword (which cost foure hundred talents) was stolen by Publius, and sold to Ariarathes. Also a harte of Mithridates of wonderfull workemanshippe, being begged of Caius his fosterbrother, was secretly geuen to Faustus, the sonne of Sylla, without Pompeys priuity. But afterwards when Pharnaces vnderstoode of it, he punished the parties that had imbezelled them. Pompey hauing ordered all things and established that prouince, went on his iorney homewards with E great pompe and glory. So, comming vnto Mitylene, he released the city of all taxes and paymentes for Theophanes sake, & was present at a certaine play they yearely make for games, where the Poets report their workes, contending one with an other, hauing at that time no other matter in hande, but Pompeys actes and feastes. Pompey liked exceeding well the Theater where these playes were made, and drew a modell or platforme of it to make a stately er then that in Rome. As he passed by the city of Rodes, he would nedes heare all the Rethoritians dispute, and gaue euery one of them a talent. Possidonius hath written the disputation he made before Pompey, against Hermagoras the Rethoritian, vpon the theame and proposition Pompey F selfe did geue them, touching the generall question. Pompey did the like at Athens vnto the Philosophers there. For he gaue towards the reedifying of the city againe, fifty talents. So he thought at his returne home into Italie, to haue bene very honorably receiued, and longed to be at home, to see his wife and children, thinking also that they long looked for him: but the god that hath the charge geuen him to mingle fortunes prosperity, with some bitter sop of aduersity, layed a blocke in his way at home in his owne house, to make his returne more sorrowfull. For Mutia his wife had in his absence played false at tables. But Pompey being then F farre of, made no account of the reportes nor tales that were tolde him. Howebeit, when he drewe neere into Italie, and that he was more attentiue to gesse & reede the ill reportes he heard: then he sent vnto her to tell her, that he refused her for his wife, writing nothing to her at that time, neither euer after told the cause why he had forsaken her. Notwithstanding in Ciceroes Epistles the cause appeareth. Furthermore, there were rumors ranne abroade in ROME which troubled them sore, being geuen out that he would bring his armie straight to ROME, and make him selfe absolute Lord of all the ROMANE Empire. Crassus thereuppon, either for that he beleeued it in deede to be true, or (as it was thought) to make the accusation true, and the enuy towardes Pompey the greater: conueyed him selfe, his family, and goodes, sodainely out of ROME. So Pompey when he came into ITALIE, called all his souldiers together, and after he had made an oration vnto them, as time & occasion required: he commanded them to seuer them selues, & euery man to repaire home to apply his busines, remembring to mete at ROME together, at the day of his triuphe. His army being thus dispersed, & straight reported abroad for newes: a maruelous thing happened vnto him. The cities seeing Pompey the great without souldiers, hauing but a small traine about him of his familliar frendes onely: went all of the to meete to him, not as though he were returned home from his great conquests, but from some iorney take for his pleasure. Such was the loue of the people to him, that they accompanied him to ROME, whether he would or not, with a greater power then that he had brought into ITALIE: so that if he had bene disposed to haue made any innouation in the common wealth, he had not needed his army. In those dayes there was a law, that no man should enter into ROME before his triumphe: whereupon Pompey sent to the Senate, to pray them to deferre the chosing of Consuls for a few daies, bicause he might be present to further Piso, who sued for the Consulship that yere. They denied him his request, by Catoes meanes that hindred it. Pompey marueling to heare of his boldnes & plaine speech, which he only vsed of all other to defend his iust causes: had a maruelous desire to win him, & to make him his frend. So Cato hauing two neeces, Pompey desired to marry the one him selfe, & the other for his sonne. But Cato mistrusting this desire of Pompeys, that it was a colour only to win & corrupt him: denied him flatly. His wife & sister on thother side, they were angry with him for refusing to make alliance with Pompey the great. About that time it chaūced, that Pompey being very desirous to preferre Afranius to be Consul, he caused certaine money to be geuen amongest the tribes of the peoples, & the same was deliuered out to some, euen in his owne gardens. This thing being reported abroad in the city, euery man spake ill of Pompey: that he put the Consulship to sale for money, vnto those that could not deserue it by vertue, sith him selfe only had obtained it by purchase, of many a noble & worthy deede. Then sayd Cato to his wife and sister: loe now, we had bene partakers of this fault to, had we matched with Pompey. When they heard it, they confessed he had reason to refuse the match, for equity and his honor. But now to his triumphe. For the statelines & magnificēce therof, although he had two dayes space to shew it, yet he lacked time: for there were many things prepared for the shewe, that were not seene, which would haue serued to haue set out an other triūphe. First there were tables caried, wheron were written the names & titles of all the people and nacions for the which he triumphed, as these that follow. The kingdom of PONTVS, ARMENIA, CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, MEDIA, COLCHIS, IBERIA, ALBANIA, SYRIA, CILICIA, & MESOPOTAMIA: & furthermore, the people that dwell about PHOENICIA & PALESTINE, IVDEA, & ARABIA: & all the pirats which he had ouercomen both by sea & by land, in all parts of the world. In all these contries, he tooke about a thowsand castels, few lesse then nine hundred townes & cities: of pirats ships eight hundred, & nine & thirtie desolate townes left without inhabitants, repleniſhed againe with people by him. Moreouer, these tables declared, that the reuenue of the cōmon wealth of ROME before these conquests he made, amounted yerely but to fiue thowsand Miriades: & that from thence forth with the summes he had added vnto the former reuenue, they should now receiue eight thowsand & fiue hundred Miriades: & that he brought presently in ready gold & siluer, & in plate & iuells, to put into the common treasory, the value of twenty thowsand talents, besides that which had bene distributed alredy amongst the souldiers: of the which, he that had lest for his share, had fifteene hundred Drachmas. The prisoners that were led in the shew of this triumphe, besides the Captaines of the pirats, were these that follow. The sonne of Tigranes king of ARMENIA, with his wife & daughter: the wife of king Tigranes himselfe, called Zosime: Aristobulus king of IVRIE: Mithridates sister with fiue sonnes of hers, & some Ladies of SCYTHIA.

A The ostages also of the Iberians and the Albanians, and also of the kings of the Commagenians: ouer & besides a great number of other markes of triumphes which him selfe or his Lieutenauntes had wonne at sundry battells in diuers places. But the greatest honor that euer he wanne, and which neuer other Consull of the Romanes but him selfe obtained, was this: that he made his third triumphe of the three partes of the world. Diuers other Romanes had triumphed thrise before him, howbeit he first triumphed of Africke: the seconde time of Europe: the third time of Asia. So that it appeared by these three triumphes, that he had triumphed in maner of all the lande that is inhabited, being at that time, (as it is reported by them which compare his doinges vnto Alexander the great) vnder foure and thirty yeares of age, though in troth at that time he was neere forty. O, happy had it bene for him, if he had B dyed when he had Alexanders fortune: for all his life afterwardes, made his prosperitie hatefull, or his aduersity miserable. Imploying the honor and authority he had gotten by his vallinesse, fauoring mens vniust causes: the more he furthered them, the more he lessened his honor, and vnwares brought his greatnes to nothing. For like as when the strongest places of a citie, which receiuinge their enemies into them, doe geue them the benefit of their owne strength: euen so, through Pompeys power, Cæsar growing to be great, ouerthrew him in the end with the selfe same meanes he imployed, to the ouerthrowe of others. And thus it fortuned. Lucullus at his returne out of Asia (where Pompey had vncurteously vsed him) was then very well taken of the Senate, and much more when Pompey was also come to Rome. For the Senate did counsell and incorage him to deale in thaffaires of the state, seeing him wake very O slow, and geuen too much to his ease & pleasure, by reason of his great wealth he had gotten. So when Pompey was come, he beganne to speake against him, and through the frendshippe and assistance of Cato, confirmed all his doinges in Asia, which Pompey had broken and reiected. Pompey finding he had such a repulse of the Senate, was driuen to haue recourse vnto the Tribunes of the people, and to fall in frendship with light young men. Of the Tribunes, the most impudent & vilest person was Clodius: who receiued him, & made him a praye vnto the people. For he had Pompey euer at his elbow, & against his honor caried him vp & downe the market place after him, to speake as occasion serued to confirme any matter or deuise which he preferred vnto him to flatter the common people. And further, for recompence of his goodwill, he craued of Pompey (not as a thing dishonorable, but beneficiall for him) that he D would forsake Cicero, who was his frend, and had done much for him in matters of common wealth. Pompey graunted his request. Thereupon Cicero being brought in danger of law, and requiring Pompeys frendship to helpe him, he shut his dore against them that came to speake in his behalfe, and went out him selfe at an other backe dore. Cicero thereuppon fearing the extreamity of law, willingly forsooke Rome. At that time, Iulius Cæsar returning home from his Prætorshippe out of Spayne, beganne to lay such a platte, that presently brought him into great fauor, and afterwardes much increased his power, but otherwise vtterly vndid Pompey and the common wealth. Now he was to sue for his first Consullshippe, and considering the enmitie betwext Pompey and Crassus, if he ioyned with the one, he made the other his enemie: he deuised to make them frendes, a thing seeming of great honestie at the first sight, but yet a E pestilent deuise, and as subtill a practise as could be. For the power of the city being before deuided into two partes, (as a shippe euenly balleste of eche side) and maintained the common wealth vpright: being now brought into one mās power, there was no possibility to withstand it, so that all fell to wracke in the end. Whereuppon, Cato wisely told them afterwardes, that sayd the ciuill warres betwext Pompey and Cæsar was cause of the destruction of the common wealth: that their enmity and discord was not the chiefe originall cause of this misery, but rather their frendshippe and agreement. For by their frendshippe, Cæsar was chosen Consull, who straight fell to flatter the people and poore men, and made a law for restoring of the colonies belonging to Rome, and for distributing of lands to them that had none, imbasing the maiesty and dignity of the chiefe Magistrate, and making the Consullshippe in maner no bet- F ter then he Tribuneship of the people. Bibulus his colleague and fellowe Consull, did what he could to resist him, and Cato also did aide him to his power: vntill Cæsar openly brought Pompey into the pulpit for orations before the people, and calling him by his name, asked him if he did geue his consent to the decrees which he did set forth. Pompey aunswered him, he did. Why then, sayd Cæsar, if any man will by force let the passing of this law by voyces of the people: wilt thou not then come to helpe them? Yes that I will in deede, sayd Pompey. Against them that threaten with the sword, I will bring both sword and target. Pompey in all his life neuer did nor spake thinge that men more misliked, then that which he sayd at that time. His frendes excused him, and sayd it was a word passed his mouth before he was aware: but his deedes afterwardes shewed, that he was altogether at Cæsars commaundement. For not many dayes after, he maried Iulia the daughter of Cæsar, which was affianced, or made sure before, vnto Seruilius Cæpio when no man thought of it: and to pacifie Cæpioes anger, he gaue him his owne daughter in mariage, whome he had also promised before vnto Faustus the sonne of Sylla: and Cæsar also maried Calphurnia, the daughter of Piso. After this, Pompey filling all Rome with souldiers, did what he would by force. For as the Consull Bibulus came into the market place accompanied with Lucullus and Cato, they sodainly set vpon him, and brake the bundels of rods which his officers caried before him: and some one, whatsoeuer he was, cast a basket of horse dong apon his head. Moreouer, the two Tribunes that were in his company, were also very sore hurt. By this meanes, hauing cleered the market place of all their enemies, they passed the law for diuision of lands, as they would them selues. The people being fleshed with this baite, were contented to be ruled by them as they would, and would neuer sticke at any matter that they would haue passed. So were all Pompeys matters confirmed, which Lucullus was against: and they appointed vnto Cæsar also, the gouernment of the Gavles on this side and beyond the Alpes: and Illyria for fiue yeres space, with foure whole legions. The next yeare following were appointed Consulls, Piso Cæsars father in law, and Gabinius the greatest flatterer Pompey had about him. But now while things stoode in these tearmes, Bibulus though he were Consull, kept him selfe close in his house for eight monethes space, and only sent out billes, and set them vp on euery post in open places, accusing Pompey and Cæsar. Cato on the other side, as if he had bene inspired with the spirite of prophecie, tolde openly in the Senate house, what would become of the common wealth and Pompey. Lucullus growing old, lay still and tooke his pleasure, & would no more meddle in the common wealth. At that time it was that Pompey sayd: it was more vnseasonable for an old man to followe his pleasure, then to attend matters of the cõmon wealth. Yet him selfe shortly after was so doted of his young wife, that he would follow her vp and downe in the contry, and in his gardens, and leaue all affaires of waight aside. Whereupon Clodius being then Tribune of the people, despised Pompey, and beganne to enter into seditious attemptes. For when he had driuen Cicero out of Rome, and had sent away Cato to make warres in Cyprvs, and that Cæsar also was occupied in Gavle, & finding that the people in like case were at his commaundement, bicause to flatter them he did what they would haue him: he attempted incontinently to vndo some things that Pompey had established. Amongest other things, he tooke Tigranes out of prison, and euer caried him vp and downe with him wheresoeuer he went, and continually pict quarrells vnto Pompeys frends, to trye what credit he had. In the end Pompey comming abroad one day into the common assembly, to here how a matter of his was handled: this Clodius hauing a company of vacabondes and desperate men about him, that cared not what they did: he sitting in a place where he might be seene from the rest, beganne to aske these questions out alowde. Who is the licentiousest Captaine in all this city? What man is he that seekes for a man? What is he that scratcheth his head with one finger? They, like a companie of daunsers or singers, when he spake and clapped his handes on his gowne, aunswered him straight alowde to euery question, that it was Pompey. This went to Pompeys harte, that was not wont to heare him selfe so ill spoken of openly, neither was acquainted with any such kinde of sight: but yet it made him byte the lippe more, when he saw the Senate glad to see him thus shamed and reproued, as a iust reuenge & punishment for his vile betraying and forsaking of Cicero. So, great sturre and vprore being made vpon this in the market place, and many men sore hurt, and one of Clodius bondmen being taken also in the prease of the people with a sword in his hand, very neere vnto Pompey: making this his colour (but otherwise fearing Clodius insolency & prowde words) he would neuer after come into the market place, as long as Clodius was Tribune, but kept at home

A home ſtill, conſulting with his frendes what way he ſhould take, to appeaſe the anger of the Senate againſt him. Thereuppon, one of his frendes called Culeo, perſwaded him to put away his wife Iulia, and vtterly to refuſe Cæſars frendſhippe, and to ſticke againe to the Senate: but he would none of that. Notwithſtanding he was contented to hearken vnto them that gaue him counſell to call Cicero home againe, who was Clodius mortall enemie, and in great fauor with the Senate. Thereuppon, he brought Ciceroes brother into the market place, to moue the matter to the people, with a great number of men about him, where they fell to blowes, and diuers were ſlaine of either ſide: notwithſtanding, he ouercame Clodius. Thus Cicero being called home by decree of the people, when he was come, he brought Pompey againe in fauor with the Senate, and ſtanding with the lawe propounded to geue Pompey authoritie to cauſe
B come to be brought to ROME, he once againe made him haue power both by land and ſea ouer all the territories of the ROMANES. For all the haiens, martes & fayres, & all ſtore houſes for corne, yea moreouer all the trade of marchandiſe and tillage, came vnder Pompeys hands. Then Clodius accuſing him, ſayd: that the Senate had not made this law for the dearth of vittells, but that they made a dearth of vittells, bicauſe the lawe ſhould paſſe, to reuiue Pompeys power and authority againe, that was almoſt vnder foote. Other ſay, that this was a deuiſe of Lentulus Spinther the Conſull, who gaue Pompey the greater authoritie, bicauſe he might be ſent to put king Ptolomy againe into his kingdom. This notwithſtanding, Gauidius the Tribune preferred an other law to ſend Pompey without an army, with two ſergeaunts only to cary the axes before him, to bring Ptolomy in fauor againe with the ALEXANDRIANS. This law ſeemed C not to miſlike Pompey: but the Senate with honeſt colour put by this lawe, as being affrayed leaſt Pompeys perſon ſhould miſcary in ſo doing. Neuertheleſſe, litle papers were found throwen about the market place, and the Senate houſe, declaringe that Ptolomy deſired Pompey might come to aide him in Spinthres ſtead. Timagenes wryteth notwithſtanding, that Ptolomy went vnto ROME, & left ÆGYPT without any occaſion geuen him, at the perſwaſion of Theophanes, who perſwaded him to doe ſo, bicauſe he would geue Pompey occaſion to make newe warres. But Theophanes craft and ſuttilty made not this matter ſo credible, as Pompeys wit and good nature made it altogether vntrue: for his ambitiō was nothing ſo vile nor ill, as that was. So, Pompey hauing now full authority to cauſe corne to be brought to ROME, he ſent then his Lieutenauntes and frendes abroade, and him ſelfe in perſon went into SICILE. Nowe being D ready to returne againe, there roſe ſuch a ſtorme of winde in the ſea, that the maryners were in dout to way their anckers. But him ſelfe firſt imbarked, and commaunded them ſtraight to hoyſe ſayle, crying out alowde, it is of neceſſitie I muſt goe, but not to liue. So, through his boldnes and good ſpirite, vſing the good fortune he had, he filled all the places of marte, and markets with corne, and all the ſea beſides with ſhippes: inſomuch, the plenty he brought did not only furniſhe the city of ROME, but all their neighbours alſo about them, and came like a liuely ſpring that diſperſed it ſelfe through all ITALIE. About that time, the great conqueſtes that Cæſar made in GAVLE, did ſet him aloft. For when they thought that he was occupied in warres farre from ROME, with the BELGEANS, SWISSES, and Engliſhmen: he by ſecret practiſe, was in the middeſt among the people at ROME, & moſt againſt Pompey in the waightieſt
E affayres of the common wealth. For he had the power of an armie about his perſon, which he did harden with paines and continuall practiſe, not with intent to fight onely againſt the barbarous people: for the battells he had with them, were in maner but as a hunting ſporte, by the which he made him ſelfe inuincible, and dreadfull to the worlde. But furthermore, by the infinite gold & ſiluer, and the incredible ſpoiles and treaſure which he wan apon the enemies whom he had ouercome: and by ſending great preſentes alſo to ROME, to the Ædiles, Prætors, Conſulls, and their wiues, he purchaſed him many frendes. Therefore, after he had paſſed ouer the Alpes againe, and was come to winter in the city of LVCA: a world of people (both men and women) and of the Senate them ſelues almoſt two hundred perſons (and amongeſt them, Craſſus and Pompey by name) went out of ROME vnto him. Furthermore, there F were ſeene at Cæſars gate, ſixe ſcore ſergeauntes carying axes before Prætors, or Proconſulls. So Cæſar ſent euery one backe againe, either full of money, or good wordes: but with Pompey and Craſſus, he made a matche, that they two together ſhould ſue to be Conſulls, and that he him ſelfe would ſend them good aide to Rome, at the daye of election, to geue their voyces. A

And if they were thoſen, that they ſhould then practiſe by decree of the people, to haue the gouernmentes of ſome newe prouinces and armies aſſigned them: and withall, that they ſhould adiorne the gouernment of thoſe prouinces he had, for fiue yeares more. This packe being bewrayed and ſpred abroad through Rome, the honeſteſt ſorte miſliked much thereof.
Wherupon Marcellinus at an open aſſembly of the people, did aske them both, if they would ſue for the Conſulſhip at the next election. So, they being vrged by the people to make an-ſwere, Pompey ſpake firſt, and ſaid: peraduenture he would, peraduenture not. Craſſus anſwered more gently, that he would doe that which ſhould be beſt for the common wealth.
Then Marcellinus ſharpely inueying againſt Pompey, he angrily againe caſt him in the teeth, & B ſaid, that Marcellinus was the rankeſt churle, and the vnthankefulleſt beaſt in the world: for that of a dumme man he had made him eloquent, and being in maner ſtarued and famiſhed, many a time he had filled his bellie. This notwithſtanding, diuers that before were determined to ſue for the Conſulſhip, went no further in it, ſauing Lucius Domitius, whom Cato counſelled and incoraged not to geue it ouer: for, ſaid he, thou doeſt not contend for the Conſulſhip, but to defend the common libertie of thy contry againſt two tyrannes. Pompey therefore fearing Catoes faction, leaſt that hauing all the Senates good willes, he ſhould drawe alſo the beſt parte of the people after him: thought it not good to ſuffer Domitius to come into the market place. To this ende therefore, he ſent men armed againſt him, who at the firſt onſet, ſlue the torche bearer that caryed the torche before him, and made all the reſt flie: amongeſt whom alſo Cato was the laſt man that retired, who was hurt in his elbow defending of Domi- C tius. Pompey and Craſſus being become Conſuls after this ſorte, they ordered them ſelues nothing the more temperately, nor honeſtly. For firſt of all, the people being about to chooſe Cato Prætor, Pompey being at thaſſembly of the election, perceyuing that they would chooſe him, brake vp the aſſembly, falſely alleaging that he had noted certaine ill ſignes, and afterwardes, the tribes of the people being bribed and corrupted with money, they choſe Annius and Vatinius Prætors. After that, by Trebonius tribune of the people, they publiſhed edicts, authoriſing Cæſars charge for fiue yeares lenger, according to the appointment they had made with Cæſar. Vnto Craſſus alſo they had appointed Syria, and the warre againſt the Parthians. Vnto Pompey in like caſe, all Affricke, and both Spaynes, with foure Legions be- D ſides: of the which, at Cæſars deſire, he lent him two legions to help him in his warre in Gaule.
Theſe thinges done, Craſſus departed to his Prouince, at the going out of his Conſulſhip: and Pompey remayned at Rome about the dedicating of his Theater, where he cauſed many goodly playes to be made, both for exerciſe of perſon, as alſo for learning and muſicke, and cauſed wilde beaſtes alſo to be baited and hunted, and killed a fiue hundred lions. But of all thinges, there was no ſuch feareſull ſight and terrible fight, as was betwene the elephantes. This great charge and bountifull expence, defrayed by Pompey, to ſhew the people paſtime and pleaſure: made him againe to be very much eſteemed of, and beloued amongeſt the people. But on thother ſide, he wanne him ſelfe as much ill will and enuy, in committing the gouernment of his Prouinces and Legions into the handes of his Lieutenants, whileſt he him ſelfe romed vp and downe the pleaſaunt places of Italy, with his wife at his pleaſure: either by cauſe he was E farre in loue with her, or els for that ſhe loued him ſo dearely, that he could not finde in his harte to leaue her companie. It was reported of her, (being knowen of many) that this young lady Iulia loued her houſband more dearely, not for Pompeys floriſhing age, but for his aſſured continencie, knowing no other woman but her: beſides alſo, he was no ſolemne man, but pleaſaunt of conuerſation, which made women loue him maruelouſly, vnles we will reproue the curtiſan Floraes falſe teſtimonie. It is certaine, that at an election of the Ædiles, men riſing ſodainely in hurly burly, drew their ſwordes, and many were ſlaine about Pompey: inſomuch as his clothes being bloudyed, he ſent his men home in haſte to fetche him other to chaunge him. His young wife that was great with child, ſeeing his clothes bloudie, tooke ſuch a ſlight vpon it, that ſhe fell downe in a ſownde before them, and they had much a doe to recouer F her, and yet ſhe fell ſtraight in labor apon it, and was deliuered. So that they themſelues, which blamed him moſt for his good will he bare vnto Cæſar: could not reproue the loue he bare

A vnto his wife. An other time after that, she was great with child againe, whereof she died, and the childe liued not thany dayes after the mother. As Pompey was about to carie her into the contrie to be buried, to a house he had there neere vnto the citie of Alba, the people by force tooke her corse, & caried it into the field of Mars, more for the pitie they tooke of the young Ladie, then to pleasure either Cæsar or Pompey: and yet what the people did for them, it appeared rather they did it more for Cæsars sake being absent, then for Pompey that was present. But straight when this alliãce was broken, which rather couered, then bridled their ambitious desire to rule: there rose a new sturre in Rome immediatly, and euery mans mouth was full of prittle prattle and seditious wordes. Not longe after that also came newes, that Crassus was ouerthrowen, and slaine in Parthia: who was a manifest staye and let to kepe them two from B ciuill warres, for that they both feared him, & therefore kept them selues in a reasonable sorte together. But when fortune had taken awaie this third champion, who could haue withstood the better of them both that had ouercome the other? then might haue bene said of these two which remained, as the comycall Poet said:

The death of Iulia the daughter of Cæsar.

The beginning of the dissention betwixt Pompey & Cæsar.

See howe these Champions purposing eche others force to trie, With painted skin and dusty hands stand vaunting valiantly.

So litle can fortune preuaile against nature, hauing no power to stoppe couetousnes: sith so large and great an Empire, and such a wide contrie besides, could not containe the couetous desire of these two men. But though they had often both heard and read,

Among the gods them selues all things by lot diuided are,
C And none of them intrudes him selfe within his neighbours share.

Yet they thought not that the Empire of Rome was enough for them, which were but two. But Pompey spake openly in an oration he made vnto the people, that he euer came to office before he looked for it, and also left it sooner then they thought he would haue done: & that he witnessed by discharging his armie so soone. Then thinking that Cæsar would not discharge his armie, he sought to make him selfe strong against him, by procuring offices of the citie, without any other alteracion. Neither would he seeme to mistrust him, but he plainely shewed that he did despise and contemne him. But when he sawe that he could not obtaine the offices of the citie as he would, bicause the citizens that made the elections were bribed with money: he then left it without a magistrate, so that there was none either to commaund, D or that the people should obey. Hereupon there ranne a brute straight, that there must nedes be a Dictator made, and the first man that propounded it, was Lucilius tribune of the people, who perswaded them to choose Pompey. But Cato stucke so stowtely against it, that the Tribune had like to haue lost his office, euen in the market place. But then many of Pompeys frendes stepped vp, and excused him, saying that he neither sought, nor would haue the Dictatorship. Then Cato commended him much, and praying him to see good order kept in the common wealth: Pompey being ashamed to denie so reasonable a requeste, was carefull of it. Thereupon two Consuls were chosen, Domitius and Messala: but afterwardes when the state beganne to chaunge againe, by the death of one of the Consuls, and that diuers were more earnestly bent to haue a Dictator than before, Cato fearing it would breake out with furie, determined E to geue Pompey some office of reasonable authoritie, to kepe him from the other more tyrannicall. Insomuch, Bibulus him selfe being chiefe of the Senate, and Pompeys enemie, was the first that moued, Pompey might be chosen Consul alone: for, said he, by this meanes, either the common wealth shalbe ridde of the present trouble, or els it shalbe in bondage to an honest man. This opinion was maruelled at, in respect of him that spake it. Whereupon, Cato standing vp, it was thought straight he would haue spoken against him. But silence being made him, he plainely tolde them, that for his owne part he would not haue bene the first man to haue propounded that was spoken: but sithence it was spoken by another, that he thought it reasonable and meete to be followed. And therefore, said he, it is better to haue an office to commaund, whatsoeuer he be, rather then none: & that he saw no man fitter to commaund, F then Pompey, in so troublesome a time. All the Senate liked his opinion, and ordained that Pompey should be chosen sole Consul: and that if he sawe in his discretion he should neede the assistance of an other companion, he might name any whome he thought good, but not till two monethes were past. Thus was Pompey made Consul alone by Sulpitius, regent for the daie. Then Pompey made very frendly countenance vnto Cato, and thanked him for the honor he had done him, praying him priuately to assist him with his counsell in the Consulshippe. Cato aunswered him, that there was no cause why he should thanke him, for he had spoken nothing for his sake, but for respect of the common wealth only: and for his counsell, if he would aske it, he should priuately haue it, if not, yet that he would openly saie that which he thought. Such a man was Cato in all his doinges. Now Pompey returning into the citie, married Cornelia, the daughter of Metellus Scipio, not a maiden, but late the widow of Publius Crassus the sonne, that was slaine in Parthia, to whom she was maried a maiden. This Ladie had excellent giftes to be beloued besides her beautie. For she was properly learned, could play on the harpe, was skilfull in musicke and geometrie, and tooke great pleasure also in philosophie, and not vainely without some profit. For she was very modest and sober of behauiour, without brawling & foolish curiositie, which commonly young women haue, that are indued with such singular giftes. Her father also, was a noble man, both in bloud, and life. Notwithstanding, these vnlike mariages did nothing please some: for Cornelia was young enough to haue bene his sonnes wife. Now the best citizens thought, that therein he regarded not the care of the common wealth, being in such a troublesome time, which had chosen him onely, as her remedie to redresse the same: and that he in the meane time gaue himselfe ouer to marying and feasting, where rather he should haue bene carefull of his Consulshippe, which was disposed apon him against the lawe, for common calamities sake, that otherwise he had not come by, if all had bene quiet. Furthermore, he sharpely proceeded against them, which by briberie and vnlausull meanes came to office: and hauing made lawes and ordinances for the administration of Iustice otherwise, he delt iustly and vprightly in all thinges, geuing safetie, order, silence and grauitie, to matters of Iudgement, with force of armes, himselfe being present: sauing that when his father in lawe was also accused among other, he sent for the three hundred & three score Iudges home to his house, praying them to helpe him. Whereupon, when the accuser saw Scipio accompanied by the Iudges themselues, returning into the market place: he let fall his sute. This made Pompey againe be condemned, and blamed also more then before, for that he hauing made a lawe, that no man should praise the offendors, whilst their matter was a hearing: came him selfe and openly praised Plancus being accused. Thereupon Cato being one of the Iudges, stopped his eares with both his handes, saying: that he might not heare an offendor praised, seeing it was forbidden by lawe. But therefore he was refused for a Iudge, before they gaue sentence. Notwithstanding, Plancus was condemned by all the rest of the Iudges, to Pompeys great shame and reproache. Shortly after, Hypseus, one that had bene Consul, being likewise accused, watching Pompey on a time as he came out of his bathe to goe to supper: vpon his knees he besought Pompeys fauor and helpe. But he stately passed by him, and gaue him no other aunswere, but told him, he marred his supper, and said nothing els to him. This inconstancy was much reproued in Pompey. Howbeit otherwise he set all thinges in good order, and chose his father in lawe Scipio, for his colleague and fellow in the Consulshippe, for the fiue last monethes. After that, he caused the gouernment of his prouinces to be appointed him for foure yeares more, with commission to take yearely out of the treasure a thowsand talentes to defraye the charges of this warre. Cæsars frend seeing that, stepped vp for him, and prayed that there might also be had some consideracion of him, that had likewise great warres for the Empire of Rome: saying, that his good seruice deserued, either that they should make him Consul againe, or els that they should prolonge his charge and gouernment, so as he might yet peacibly enioye the honor to commaund that which he had conquered, to thend that no other successor might reape the frute of his labor. Much sturre and contention being about this matter at Rome, Pompey as though for goodwill bement to excuse the enuie they might haue borne Cæsar, said that he had receyued letters from him, by the which he requested a successor, and to be discharged of this warre: and furthermore, that he thought it good they should graunt him priuiledge to demaund the second Consulshippe, although he were absent. Which Cato stowtely withstoode, saying, that he must retorne home as a priuate man, and leauing his armie, should come in person to demaund

A recompence of his contrie. But by cause Pompey made no speche nor answere to the contrarie, men suspected straight that he had no great good liking of Cesar, and the rather, by cause he had sent vnto him for the two legions which he had lent him, vnder colle of his warre against the PARTHIANS. But Cesar though he smelt him where fore he sent for his souldiers, returned them home with liberall reward. About that time, Pompey fell sicke at NAPLES of a dangerous disease, whereof notwithstanding he recouered againe. The NEAPOLITANS thervpon, by perswasion of Brancatius, one of the chiefest men of their cities, did sacrifice vnto the goddes for his recouerie. The like did also their neighbours round about: and in fine it rinne so generally through all ITALY, that there was no citie or towne (great or small) but made open feast and reioycing for many dayes together. Besides, the infinite nomber of people was such, that went to meete him out of all partes: that there was not place enough for them all, but the high wayes, cities, townes and ports of the sea, were all full of people, feasting and sacrificing to the gods, reioycing for his recouerie. Diuers also went to meete him, crowned with garlandes, and so did attend on him, casting nosegayes and flowers apon him. Thus was his iorney the noblest sight that euer was, all the way as he came: how beit men thought also, that this was the chiefest cause of the beginning of the ciuil warres. For he fell into such a pride, and glorious conceit of him selfe, with the exceeding ioye he tooke to see himselfe thus honored: that forgetting his orderly gouernment, which made all his former doings to prosper, he grew to bolde in despising of Cesars power, as though he stoode in no neede of other power or care to withstand him, but that he could ouercome him as he would, farre more easely, then he could haue done before. Furthermore, Appius thereupon returned from GAVLE, that brought him his two legions backe againe which he had lent vnto Cesar, reproching much his doinges which he had done there, and geuing out many fowle words against Cesar. For he said, that Pompey knew not his owne strength and aucthorities, that would seeke to make him selfe stronge, by other power against him: considering that he might ouercome him with his owne legions he should bring with him, so soone as they sawe but Pompey in the face, such ill will did Cesars owne souldiers beare him, and were maruelous desirous besides to see him selfe. These flattering tales so puffed vp Pompey, and brought him into such a securitie and trust of him selfe, that he mocked them to scorne which were affrayed of warres. And to those also which said, that if Cesar came to ROME, they saw not how they could resist his power: he similingly answered them againe, and bad them take no thought for that: for at one time he said he as I doe but stampe with my foote apon the ground of ITALY, I shal bring men enough out of euery corner, both footemen and horsemen. In the meane time, Cesar gathered force still vnto him, and thenceforth drew neerer vnto ITALY, and sent part of his souldiers daily to ROME, to be present at the election of the magistrates, and many of them that were in office, he wanne with money: amongest whom, was Paule, one of the Consules, whom he wanne of his side, by meanes of a thowsand fiue hundred talents. And Curio, the tribune of the people, whom he discharged of an infinite debt he ought: and Marke Antony also, who for Curios sake, was discharged likewise for parte of the debt which Curio ought, being also bound as him selfe. Furthermore, it was found that a captaine or Centurion sent from Cesar, being neere vnto the Senate, vnderstanding that the counsell would not proclaime Cesar gouernment which he required, clapping his hand vpon the pummell of his sword: well said he, this shall geue it him. So, to be shorte, all that was done and said, tended to his end. Notwithstanding, the petitions and requestes that Curio made in Cesars behalfe, seemed somewhat more reasonable for the people: for he required one of the two, either to make Pompey to put downe his armie, or els to licence Cesar to haue his armie as well as he. For, either being both made priuate men, they would fall to agreement of them selues: or els being both of like strength, neither of both would set in any alteration, fearing lest another, but would consider them selues either of them with halfe an eye. Or otherwise, he that should weaken the one, and strengthen the other, should double his power whom he feared. Then euery wholy replyed the Consul Marcellus, calling Cesar, theefe, and said that he should be proclaimed an open enemie to ROME, if he did not dispatche his armie. This notwithstanding, in fine Curio, Antony, and Pelio procured that the Senate should decide the matter. For, said he, all those that would

haue Cæsar leaue his army, and Pompey to keepe his: let them ſtand on thone ſide. Thereupon A the moſt parte of them ſtoode at one ſide. Then he bad them againe come away from them that would haue them both leaue their armies. Then there remained only but two and twentie that ſtoode for Pompey: and all the reſt went of Curioes ſide. Then Curio looking aloft for ioy of the victorie, went into the market place, and there was receiued of his Tribune faction, with ſhowtes of ioy and clapping of handes, and infinite noſegayes and garlandes of flowers throwen vppon him. Pompey was not then preſent to ſee the Senators good will towardes him: bicauſe by the law, ſuch as haue commaundement ouer ſouldiers, can not enter into ROME. Notwithſtanding, Marcellus ſtanding vp, ſayd: that he would not ſtande muſling hearing of orations and argumentes, when he knew that tenne legions were already paſſed ouer the Alpes, intending to come in armes againſt them: and that he would ſend a man B vnto them, that ſhould defende their contrie well enough. Straight they chaunged apparell at ROME, as their manner was in a common calamitie. Marcellus then comminge through the market place vnto Pompey, beinge followed of all the Senate, went to him, and tolde him openly: Pompey, I commaund thee to helpe thy contry with that army thou haſt already and alſo to leauy more to aide thee. The like ſpeeche did Lentulus vſe vnto him, who was appointed one of the Conſulls the yeare following. Now, when Pompey thought to leauy ſouldiers in ROME and to bill them, ſome would not obey him, a few others went vnwillingly to him with heauie hartes, and the moſt of them cried, peace, peace. Antony alſo, againſt the Senates minde, red a letter vnto the people ſent from Cæsar containing certaine offers and reaſonable requeſtes, to draw the common peoples affection towardes him. For his requeſt C was, that Pompey and he ſhould both of them reſigne their gouernments, and ſhould diſmiſſe their armies to make all well, referring them ſelues wholly to the iudgement of the people, and to deliuer vp accompt vnto them of their doinges. Lentulus being nowe entred into his Conſulſhippe, did not aſſemble the Senate. But Cicero lately returned out of CILICIA, practiſed to bring them to agreement, propounding that Cæsar ſhould leaue GAVLE, and all the reſt of his armie, reſeruing onely two legions and the gouernment of ILLYRIA, attending his ſeconde Conſulſhippe. Pompey liked not this motion. Then Cæsars frendes were contented to graunt that he ſhould haue but one of his legions: But Lentulus ſpake againſt it, and Cato cried out on thother ſide alſo, that Pompey was deceiued, and they both. So all treatie of peace was cutte of. In the meane time, newes came to ROME, that Cæsar had wonne ARIMINVM, a fayer great citie of ITALIE, and that he came directly to ROME with a great power. D But that was not true. For he came but with three hundred horſe, and fiue thowſand footemen, and would not tarie for the reſt of his armie that was yet on thother ſide of the mountaines in GAVLE, but made haſt rather to ſurpriſe his enemies apon the ſodaine, being affrayd and in garboyle, not looking for him ſo ſoone: rather then to geue them time to be prouided, and to fight with him when they were ready. For when he was come to the riuers ſide of Rubicon, (which was the vtmoſt confine of the prouince he had in charge towardes ITALIE) he ſtayed ſodainely, weying with him ſelfe the great enterpriſe he tooke in hand. At the laſt, as men that being of a maruelous height from the ground do hedlong throw themſelues downe, E cloſing of their eyes, and withdrawing their mindes from the thought of the daunger: crying out theſe wordes only vnto them that were by, in the greeke tongue, ἀνερρίφθω κύβος in engliſh, let the dyce be caſt (meaning hereby to put all in hasard, and according to our prouerbe, to ſet all on ſix and ſeuen) he paſſed ouer with his armie. Now, the newes of his comming being caried to ROME, they were in ſuch a maruelous feare, as the like was neuer ſeene. For all the Senate ranne immediatly vnto Pompey, and all the other magiſtrates of the citie fled vnto him alſo. Tullius asking Pompey what power he had to reſiſt them, he aunſwered him, faltring ſomewhat in his ſpeach: that he had the two legions ready which Cæsar ſent him backe againe, and that he thought with the number of them which he had leauied, in haſt, he ſhould make vp the nomber of thirtie thowſand fighting men. Then Tullius cryed out openly: ah, thou haſt mocked vs Pompey: for thereupon gaue order they ſhould ſend ambaſſadors vnto Cæsar. There F was one Phaonius in the companie, who otherwiſe was no ill man, ſauing that he was ſomewhat to bolde, thinking to counterfeate Catoes plaine maner of ſpeach: he bad Pompey then

But whē Cato told him alſo, what he had prophecied before hand of Cæſar, he aunſwered him againe: in deed thou haſt prophecied more truly then I, but I haue delte more frendly then he. Then Cato thought good that they ſhould make him lieutenant generall of ROME with full and abſolute power to commaund all, ſaying: that the ſelfe ſame men which doe the greateſt miſchiefe, know beſt alſo how to remedie the ſame. So he immediatly departed into SICILE, hauing the charge and gouernment of that contrie: and alſo euery one of the other Senators went vnto the charge they were appointed. Thus all ITALY being in armes, no man knew what was beſt to be done. For they that were out of ROME, came flying thither from all partes: and thoſe on thother ſide that were within ROME, went

That which might ſerue being willing to obeye, was found very weake: and that on thother ſide which by diſobedience did hurte, was to ſtronge and ill to be gouerned by the magiſtrates, hauing lawe to commaund. For there was no poſſibilitie to pacifie their feare, neither would they ſuffer Pompey to offer thinges as he would: but euery man followed his owne fancie, euen as he found himſelfe greiued, affraid, or in doubt, and in one daie they were in diuers mindes. Pompey could heare nothing of certaintie of his enemies. For ſome, one while would bring him newes one way, and then againe another way: and then if he would not credit them, they were angry with him. At the length, when he ſaw the tumult & confuſion ſo great at ROME, as there was no meane to pacifie it: he commaunded all the Senators to follow him, telling all them that remained

C behinde, that he would take them for Cæſars frendes, and ſo at night departed out of the citie. Then the two Conſuls fled alſo, without doing any ſacrifice to the goddes, as they were wont to do before they went to make any warres. So Pompey, euen in his greateſt trouble and moſt daunger, might thinke him ſelfe happy to haue euery mans goodwill as he had. For, though diuers miſliked the cauſe of this warre, yet no man hated the captaine: but there were more found that could not forſake Pompey for the loue they bare him, then there were that followed him to fight for their libertie. Shortly after Pompey was gone out of ROME, Cæſar was come to ROME, who poſſeſſing the citie, ſpake very gently vnto all them he found there, and pacified their feare: ſauing that he threatned Metellus, one of the Tribunes of the people, to put him to death, bycauſe he would not ſuffer him to take any of the treaſure of the common wealth.

D Vnto that cruell threate, he added a more bitter ſpeach alſo, ſaying: that it was not ſo hard a thing for him to doe it, as to ſpeake it. Thus hauing put downe Metellus, and taken that he needed to ſerue his turne, he tooke apon him to follow Pompey, thinking to drine him out of ITALY, before that his armie he had in SPAYNE ſhould come to him. Pompey in the meane time, hauing taken the citie of BRVNDVSIVM, and gotten ſome ſhippes together: he made the two Conſuls preſently imbarke with thirtie enſeignes of footemen, which he ſent beyond the ſea before vnto DYRRACHIVM. Then the third day after, hauing imbarked all the reſt of his ſouldiers at his pleaſure, he ſodainly liſting vp a ſigne into the ayer, to geue them warning which he had left to gard the rampers: they ſtraight ranne to him with ſpeede, and quickly receyuing them into his ſhippes, he wayed ancker, and hoyſed ſaile. Cæſar perceyuing the walles naked without ward, he ſtraight miſtruſted that Pompey was fled: who haſting after him, had almoſt ronne vpō the ſharpe ſtakes, and fallen into the trenches, had not the BRVNDVSINIANS geuen him warning of them. There came vnto him alſo Tidius Sextius euen into MACEDON, notwithſtanding that he was an old man, and lame of one of his legges: whom others laughing to ſcorne to ſee him come, when Pompey ſaw him, he roſe & went to meete him, iudging it a good token of their goodwills vnto him, when ſuch olde men as he, choſe rather to be with him in daunger, then at home with ſafety. Hereupon they ſate in counſell, and following Catoes opinion, decreed that they ſhould put no citizen of ROME to death but in battel, and ſhould ſacke no citie that was ſubiect to the Empire of ROME: the which made Pompeys part the better liked. For they that had nothing to doe with the warres, either bycauſe they dwelt farre of, or els for that they were ſo poore, as otherwiſe they were not regarded: did yet both in deede and word fauor Pompeys parte, thinking him an enemie both to the goddes and men, that wiſhed not Pompey victorie. Cæſar alſo & onely reſerued the ſouldiers. Then comming ouer the ALPES againe, he paſſed through all ITALY, & came to the citie of BRVNDVSIVM in the winter quarter: and there paſſing ouer the ſea, he went vnto the citie of ORICVM, & lãded there. Now Cæſar hauing Vibius, one of Pompeys famillier frends with him, whom he had takẽ priſoner: he ſent him vnto Pompey to pray againe that they might meete, & both of them deſperſe their armies within three dayes, and being recõciled (geuing their faith one to an other) ſo to retorne into ITALY like good frends together Pompey thought againe, that theſe were new deuiſes to intrappe him. Thereupon he ſodainely wẽt downe to the ſea, & tooke all the places of ſtrẽgth by the ſea ſide, ſafly to lodge his campe in, & all the ports, creekes & harbars for ſhips to lie in rode: ſo that what wind ſo euer blew on the skie, it ſerued his turne, to bring him either men, vittells, or money. Cæſar on thother ſide was ſo diſtreſſed both by ſea & by land, that he was driuẽ to procuer battel, & to aſſaile Pompey euen in his owne forts, to make him come out to fight with him: of whom moſt times he euer had the better in all skirmiſhes, ſauing once, when he was in daunger to haue loſt all his army.

Whereupon Cæsar saide to his frendes, that his enemie had wonne the victorie that day, if he had knowen how to ouercome. This victorie put Pompeys men in such courage, that they would needes hasard battell. And Pompey him selfe also though he wrote letters vnto straunge kinges, captaines, and cities of his confederacie, as if he had already wonne all: was yet afrayed to fight an other battell, thinking it better by tracte of time, and distresse of vittells, to ouercome him. For Cæsars men being olde and expert souldiers, and wont euer to haue the victorie when they fought together: he knew they would be lothe to be brought to fight any other kinde of way, to be driuen to often remouing of their campe from place to place, and still to B fortifie and intrench them selues, and therefore that they would rather put it to aduenture out of hande, and fight it out. But notwithstanding that Pompey had before perswaded his men to be quiet, and not to sturre, perceyuing that after this last bickering Cæsar being scanted with vittells raised his campe, and departed thence to goe into THESSALY, through the contrie of the ATHAMANTANS: then he could no more bridle their glorie and corage, which cried, Cæsar is fled, let vs follow him. And others, let vs retorne home againe into ITALIE. And others also sent their frendes and seruantes before to ROME, to hier them houses neere the market place: intending when they came thether to sue for offices in the commonwelth. Some there were also that in a iollitie would needes take shippe, and saile into the Ile of LESBOS, vnto Cornelia (whom Pompey had sent thether) to cary her that good newes, that the warre was ended. Thereupon assembling the counsell, Afranius thought it best to winne ITALIE, for that C was the chiefest marke to be shot at in this warre: for whosoeuer obteyned that, had straight all SICILE, SARDINIA, CORSICA, SPAYNE, and GAVLE at commaundement. Furthermore, that it was a dishonor to Pompey (which in reason should touche him aboue all thinges) to suffer their contrie to be in such cruell bondage and subiection vnto slaues and flatterers of tyrantes, offering it selfe as it were into their handes. But Pompey neither thought it honorable for him, once againe to flie from Cæsar, and to make him follow him, sithe fortune had geuen him oportunitie to haue Cæsar in chase: nor lawfull also before the gods, to forsake his father in lawe Scipio, and many other also that had bene Consuls, despersed abrode in GRAECE and THESSALY, which should immediatly fall into Cæsars handes, with all their riches and armies D they had. Furthermore, he said, that they had care enough for the citie of ROME, which drew the warres fardest of from them: so as, they remaining safe & quiet at home, (neither hearing nor feeling the misery of warres) might in thend peaceably receiue and welcome him home, that remained conqueror. With this determinacion, he marched forward to follow Cæsar, being determined not to geue him battell, but to besiege him, & only to compasse him in still being neere vnto him, and so to cut him of from vittells. There was also an other reason that made him to follow that determinacion. For it was reported to him, that there was a speech geuen out among the ROMANE knights, that so soone as euer they had ouercome Cæsar, they must also bring Pompey to be a priuate man againe. Some saye therefore, that Pompey would neuer afterwardes imploy Cato in any greater matters of waight in all this warre, but when he E followed Cæsar, he left him captaine of his armie to kepe his cariage by sea, fearing that so soone as Cæsar were once ouercome, he would make him straight also resigne his authoritie. Pompey following Cæsar in this maner, faire and softly, they cryed out apon him, that he made no warre with Cæsar, but against his contrie and the Senate, by cause he might be still in authoritie: and that he would neuer leaue to haue them for his seruauntes and gard about him, which should rule and commaund the world. Furthermore, Domitius Aenobarbus, calling him continually Agamemnon, and king of kinges: made him much to be enuied. Rhamnius also mocked him as much as the other, that spake most boldest: for he went crying vp and downe, my maisters, I geue you warning, you are like to eate no TARSOVAN figges this yeare. And Luring Afranius also, he that had lost the armie which he had in SPAYNE, and F was also suspected for a traitour, seeing Pompey then refused to come to battell: I merualle, said he, that they which accuse me, doe not lustely goe to finde him out, whome they call the marchaunt and common buyer of prouinces, to fight with him presently. With these and many such other lewd speaches, they compelled Pompey in thend (who could not abide to be ill spoken of, and would not denie his frendes any thinge) to follow their vaine hopes and desires, and to forsake his owne wise determination: the which thinge, no good shippe master, and much lesse a chiefe and soueraine captaine, ouer so many nations and so great armies, should haue suffred, and consented vnto. Now, he that did alwayes commend the physitions, that would not follow the sonde desire of the sicke pacientes: was him selfe contented to obey the worst parte of his armie, fearing their displeasure, where their life or health stood in hazard. For who would thinke or iudge them to be wise men, and in their wittes, who walking vp and downe their campe, did already sue to be Consuls and Prætors? considering that Spinther, Damitius, & Scipio, were at strife together, making frendes to be highe bishoppe, (which office Cæsar had) as if they should haue fought with Tigranes king of ARMENIA, or with the king of the NABATHEANS, which had camped by them, and not with Cæsar and his armie: who had taken a thowsand townes by assaulte, had subdued aboue three hundred seuerall nations, and had wonne infinite battells of the GERMANES and GAVLES; and was neuer ouercome: had also taken a million of men prisoners, and had likewise slaine so many at diuers battells. All this notwithstanding, they of Pompeys side still being importunate of him, & troubling him in this sorte: in fine, when they were come into the fields of PHARSALIA, they compelled Pompey to call a counsell. There Labienus, generall of the horsemen standing vp, swore before them all, that he would not returne from the battell, before he had made his enemies to flie. The like othe all the rest did take. The next night following, Pompey thought in his dreame, that he came into the Theater, and that the people to honor him, made a maruelous great clapping of their handes: & that he him selfe did set forth the temple of Venus the conquerour, with many spoiles. This vision partly put him in good courage, & partly againe made him doubt: for that he was affrayed, bycause Cæsars familie was discended from this goddesse Venus, that his dreame did signifie, that he should haue the honor of the victorie, with the spoiles he should winne of him. Besides all this, there ranne sodaine feareful noises & tumultes in his campe without any apparant cause, that waked all the campe vpon it. At the fourth watche, when the watche is renued in the morning, there was seene a maruelous great light ouer Cæsars campe, and they were all at rest. Of that, there came as it were a torche of a burning fire, and fell in Pompeys campe. The which Cæsar him selfe sayed he saw, when he went to search the watche. At the breake of the daye, Cæsar being determined to raise his campe, and to go to the citie of SCOTVSA, as his souldiers were busie about ouerthrowing of their tentes, & sending away their bagges and baggage before: there came skowtes vnto him, that brought him worde they sawe a great deale of armor and weapon caryed to and fro in their enemies campe, and hard a noise and hussling besides, as of men that were preparing to fight. After these came in other skowtes, that brought word also that their vaward was already set in battell raye. Then Cæsar said, that the daye was nowe come they had longed for so sore, and that they should now fight with men, not with hunger, nor with want of vittells: and thereupon gaue order presently that they should put out the red coates or armes vpon his tente, which was the signe all the ROMANES vsed, to shew that they would fight. The souldiers seeing that out, left their cariage and tentes, and with great showtes of ioye ranne to arme them selues. The captaines of euery band also, bestowed euery man in such place as he should fight, and so they conueyed them selues into battell raye, without any tumulte or disorder, as quietly, as if they should haue entred into a daunce. Pompey him selfe led the right winge of his armie against Antony. The middle of the battell he gaue vnto Scipio his father in lawe, being right against Domitius Caluinus. The left winge also was led by Lucius Domitius Aenobarbus, the which was garded with men of armes. For all the horsemen were placed on that side, to distresse Cæsar if they could, that was directly against them: and to ouerthrowe the tenth legion that was so much accounted of, being the valliantest souldiers the enemie had in all his armie, amongest the which Cæsar did euer vse to fight in person. Cæsar then seeing the left winge of his enemies so strong with the garde of the horsemen, and being affrayed of the brightnes of their armor: brought forward six enseignes for supply, which he placed hard behind the tenth legio, comaunding them that no man should sturre, least their enemies should discouer them.

For, ſaid he, theſe braue fellowes and fine daunſers, will neuer abide to haue their faces marred. And this was Cæſars deuiſe at that time. Pompey being a horſe backe, rode vp and downe to conſider the ordinaunce of both battells: and perceyuing that his enemies ſtoode ſtill in their ranckes, looking for the ſignall of battell, & that his owne battell on thother ſide waued vp & downe diſorderly, as men vnskilfull in warres: he was affrayed they would flie before they were charged. But Cæſar diſliked of that deuiſe, for thereby, ſaid he, the force of their blowes was leſſened & in withholding them frō geuing the charge, he not only tooke away that courage which thaſſailant carieth with him that commeth with furie: but made them more ouer fainte hearted, in receyuing the charge of the enemies. In Cæſars armie, there were about two and twentie thowſand fighting men: and in Pompeys armie, ſomewhat aboue twiſe as many. Now, when the worde of battell was geuen of either ſide, and that the trompettes did ſounde the allarme: euery man beganne to looke to him ſelfe. But a few of the chiefeſt of the ROMANES, and certaine GRÆCIANS that were there alſo out of the ſet battel, perceyuing the imminent daunger, beganne to bethinke them, to what paſſe the ambition and wilfull contencion betwene theſe

C two men, had brought the ſtate of ROME. For, the weapons of kinſmen, the bandes of brethern, the enſeignes all alike, the flower of ſo many valliant men of one citie, did ſerue for a notable example, to ſhew how mans nature prickt forward with couetouſnes, is quite blinde and without reaſon. For if they could haue bene contented quietly to haue gouerned that which they had conquered: the greateſt, and beſt part of the world, both by ſea and by land, was ſubiect vnto them. Or otherwiſe, if they could not haue quenched their vnſatiable deſire of victorie & triumphe, they had occaſion of warre enough offred them againſt the PARTHIANS and GERMANES. Furthermore, they had enough to do beſides to conquer SCYTHIA, and the INDIANS: & withal, they had had an honeſt culler to haue cloked their ambitious deſires, if it had bene but to haue brought the barbarous people to a ciuill life. For what horſe men of SCY-

D THIA, or arrowes of PARTHIA, or riches of INDIANS, could haue abidden the power of three ſcore & ten thowſand ROMANE ſouldiers, & ſpecially beinged by two ſo famous captaines, as Pompey, and Cæſar? whoſe names, theſe ſtraunge & farre nations vnderſtood, longe before the name of the ROMANES: ſo great were their victories, hauing conquered ſo many wilde & barbarous people. They both being then in armes the one againſt the other, not regarding their honor, which made them ſo ambitious: did not ſpare their owne contry, who had vntill that time remained vnuincible, both in fame and prowes. For, the alliance that was made betwene them, the loue of Iulia, & marying with her, was ſuſpected frō the beginning to be but a deceit, & a pledge as it were of a cōſpiracie made betwene thē, for a priuate benefit, more thē for any true frendſhip. Now, whē the feildes of PHARSALIA were couered ouer with men, with horſe,

E and armor, and that the ſignall of battell was geuen on either ſide: the firſt man of Cæſars army that aduaunced forward to geue charge, was Caius Craſſinius, captaine of ſix ſcore and fiue men, to performe a great promiſe which he had made vnto Cæſar. For Cæſar, when he came out of his tent in the morning, ſeeing him, called him to him by his name, and aſked him what he thought of the ſucceſſe of this battell? Craſſinius holding out his right hand vnto him, cōragiouſly cryed: Oh Cæſar, thine is the victorie, and this daye thou ſhalt commend me either aliue or dead. Then remembring theſe wordes, he brake out of the ranckes, and many following after him, ranne amongeſt the middeſt of his enemies. Straight they came to the ſword, and made great ſlaughter. But he preſſing forward ſtill, one with a thruſt ranne him through the mouth, that the ſwords pointe came through at his necke. Thereupon Craſſinius

F being ſlaine, the battell was equall. Pompey did not make his left winge marche ouer ſodainely, but ſtayed, and caſt his eyes abroade to ſee what his horſemen would do, the which had already deuided their companies, meaning to compaſſe in Cæſar, and to make the ſmall nomber of horſemen which he had before him to geue backe apon the ſquadron of his footemen. On thother ſide, as ſoone as Cæſar had geuē the ſignal of battel, his horſemen retired backe a lyttle, & the ſix enſeignes which he had placed ſecretly behinde them, (being three thowſand fighting men) ranne ſodainely to aſſaile the enemie vpon the flancke, and when they came neere vnto the horſemen, they threw the pointes of their dartes vpwardes according to Cæſars commaundement, and hyt the younge gentlemen full in their faces. They being vtterly vnskilfull to fight, & leaſt of all looking for ſuch maner of fight: had not the hartes to defend themſelues, nor to abide to be hurt as they were in their faces, but turning their heades, & clapping their hādes on their faces, ſhamefully fled. They being ouerthrowen, Cæſars men made no accompte to follow them, but went and gaue charge vpon the battel of footemen, in that place ſpecially where they had no gard of horſemen, whereby they might the eaſelier be compaſſed about. Thus, they being charged by them in the flancke, and in the vowarde alſo by the tenth legion, perceyuing them ſelues (contrarie to their expectation) compaſſed about by their enemies, where they thought to haue enuironned them: they could make no longer reſiſtance. They alſo being likewiſe driuen to flie, when Pompey ſaw the duſt in the element, & coniectured the flying of his horſemen: what minde he was of then, it was hard to ſay. For by his countenance, a man might well thinke he was like a man amazed, and at his wittes end, forgetting that he was Pompey the great: for that he went ſtraight into his campe, and ſpake neuer a word to any man, rightly verifiyng Homers verſes to this effect.

Pōpeis horſemen put to flight by Cæſar.

Pompeis flying in the fields of Pharſalia.

But mightie Ioue vvho ſittes aloft in yuorie chariot hie, Strake Aiax vvith ſo great a feare that Aiax byandby, Let fall his lethern target made of tough oxe hide ſeuen folde,
And ran avvay, not looking backe, for all he vvas ſo bold.

In this eſtate Pompey entred into his tent, and ſate him downe there a great while, and ſpake neuer a worde: vntill ſuch time as many of the enemies entred pell mell with his men that fled into his campe. And then, he ſaid no more: but what, euen into our campe? and ſo riſing vp, he put a gowne on his backe, euen fit for his misfortune, and ſecretly ſtale out of the campe. The other legions alſo fled: and great ſlaughter was made of the tent kepers, and their ſeruantes that garded the campe. For Aſinius Pollio writeth (who was at that battell on Cæſars ſide) that there were ſlaine onely but ſix thowſand ſouldiers. Howbeit at the taking of their campe, Cæſars ſouldiers then found plainly the madnes & vanitie of Pompeys men. For, all their tentes and pauilions were full of noſegayes and garlandes of mirtle, & their couches all couered with flowers, their tables full of bowles of wine, and men prepared ready to do ſacrifice for ioye, rather then to arme them ſelues to fight. Thus went they to battell, caried away with this vaine & fooliſh hope. Whē Pompey was gone a litle way frō his campe, he ſorſooke his horſe, hauing a very few with him: & perceyuing that no man purſued him, he went a foote faire & ſoftly, his head full of ſuch thoughts and imaginations, as might be ſuppoſed a man of his like calling might haue, who for foure & thirty yeares ſpace together, was wont cōtinually to carry victorie away, and beganne then euen in his laſt caſt, to proue what it was to flie, and to be ouercome: and who thought then with him ſelfe, how in one howres ſpace he had loſt the honor and riches, which he had gotten in ſo many foughten feildes and battels, whereby he was not longe before followed and obeyed of ſo many thowſand men of warre, of ſo many horſemen, and of ſuch a great fleete of ſhippes on the ſea, and then to goe as he did in ſuch poore eſtate, and with ſo ſmall a traine, that his very enemies who ſought him, knew him not. Thus when he was paſſed the citie of LARISSA, and comming to the vallie of Tempé: there being a thirſt, he fell downe of his bellie, and dranke of the riuer. Then riſing vp againe, he went his way thence, and came to the ſea ſide, and tooke a fiſhers cotage where he lay all night. The next morning by breake of the daye, he went into a litle bote vpon the riuer, and tooke the free men with him that were about him: and as for the ſlaues, he ſent them backe againe, and did counſell them boldely to goe to Cæſar, and not to be affrayed. Thus rowing vp and downe the ſhore ſide, in this litle bote, he ſpyed a great ſhippe of burden in the maine ſea, ryding at anker, which was ready to waye anker, and to ſaile awaye. The maſter of the ſhippe was a ROMANE, who, though he was not familiarly acquainted with Pompey, yet knew him

by

A by sight very well. He was called Peticius, who had dreamed the night before, that he saw Pompey speake vnto him, not like the man he was wont to be, but in pouerty and in misery. So he had tolde this dreame vnto the mariners which sailed with him (as men commonly vse to doe, specially when they dreame of such weighty matters, and being at leasure withall) and at the very instant, there was one of the mariners that told him, he sawe a litle bote of the riuer rowing towards them, and that there were men in it that shooke their clokes at them, & held out their hands. Thereupon Peticius standing vp, knew Pompey straight, euen in like case as he had dreamed of him the night before: and clapping his head for anger, commaunded his mariners to let downe his bote, and gaue him his hand, calling him Pompey by his name, mistrusting (seeing him in that estate) what misfortune had happened to him. Thereupon, not looking B to be intreated, nor that he should tell him of his mishappe, he receiued him into his shippe, and all those he would haue with him: and then hoised saile. With Pompey, there were both the Lentuli, & Faonius. Shortly after also, they perceiued king Deiotarus comming from the riuer to them, that beckened and made signes to receiue them: which they did. At supper time, the master of the shippe, made ready such meate as he had abord. Faonius seeing Pompey for lacke of men to waite on him, washing of him selfe: ran vnto him, washed him, and annointed him, and afterwardes continued still to waite vpon him, and to doe such seruice about him, as seruaunts do to their masters, euen to washing of his feete, & making ready of his supper. When a simple man saw him, that could no skill of seruice, he sayd:

Peticius dreame of Pompey.

Good gods, howe euery thing becommeth noble men?

C Pompey passing then by the citie of AMPHIPOLIS, coasted from thence into the Ile of LESBOS, to goe fetch his wife Cornelia and his sonne, being then in the city of MITYLENE. There hauing cast out his ancker, and riding at rode, he put a messenger on the shore & sent him into the citie to his wife: not according to her expectacion, who was still put in good hope by continuall letters and newes brought vnto her, that the warre was ended and determined by the city of DYRRACHIVM. This messenger now finding her in this hope, had not the hart so much as to salute her, but letting her vnderstande rather by his teares then wordes, the great misfortune Pompey had: told her, she must dispatch quickely, if she would see Pompey with one shippe only, and none of his, but borowed. The young Lady hearing these newes, fell downe in a sound before him, and neither spake nor sturred of long time: but after she was come to D her selfe, remembring that it was no time to weepe and lament, she went with speede through the city vnto the sea side. There Pompey meeting her, tooke her in his armes, & imbraced her. But she sincking vnder him, fell downe, and sayd: Out alas, woe worth my hard fortune, not thine (good husband) that I see thee now brought to one poore shippe, who before thou maiedst thy vnfortunate Cornelia, wert wont to saile these seas with fiue hundred shippes. Alas, why art thou come to see me, and why diddest thou not leaue me to cursed fate and my wicked destiny: sith my selfe is cause of all this thy euill? Alas, how happy a woman had I bene, if I had bene dead, before I heard of the death of my first husband Publius Crassus, whom the wretched PARTHIANS slue? And how wise a woman had I bene, (if according to my determinacion) I had killed my selfe immediatly after him: where now I liue to bring yet this misfortune vnto E Pompey the great? It is reported that Cornelia spake these words, and that Pompey also answered her in this maner. Peraduenture, Cornelia mine, thou hast knowen a better fortune, which hath also deceiued thee, bicause she hath continued lenger with me then her maner is. But since we are borne men, we must paciently beare these troubles, and proue fortune againe. For it is no impossible matter for vs againe to come into prosperitie out of this present miserie, as to fall out of late prosperitie into present calamitie. When Cornelia heard him say so, she sent backe into the city for her stuffe and family. The MITYLENIANS also came openly to salute Pompey, and prayed him to come into the city, and to refresh him selfe: but Pompey would not, & gaue them counsell to obey the conqueror, & not to feare any thing, for Cæsar was a iust man, and of a curteous nature. Then Pompey turning vnto Cratippus the Philosopher, who came amõg the F citizens also to see him, made his complaint vnto him, and reasoned a litle with him about diuine prouidence. Cratippus curteously yeelded vnto him, putting him still in better hope, fearing least he would haue growen too hot and troublesome, if he would haue holden him hard to it. For Pompey at the length might haue asked him, what prouidence of the gods there had bene in his doings? And Cratippus might haue aunswered him, that for the ill gouernment of the common wealth at ROME, it was of neceſſity that it ſhould fall into the handes of a ſoueraine Prince. Peraduenture Cratippus might then haue asked him: how, and whereby Pompey wouldeſt thou make vs beleue, if thou haddeſt ouercome Cæſar, that thou wouldeſt haue vſed thy good fortune better then he? But for diuine matters, referre them to the goddes as it pleaſeth them. Pompey taking his wife and frends with him, hoiſed ſaile, and landed no where, but compelled to take freſhe acates and water. The firſt city he came vnto, was ATTALIA in the contry of PAMPHYLIA. Thither came to him certaine gallies out of CILICIA, & many ſouldiers alſo, inſomuch he had a three ſcore Senators of ROME againe in his company. Then, vnderſtanding that his army by ſea was yet whole, and that Cato had gathered together a great number of his ſouldiers after the ouerthrowe, whome he had tranſported with him into AFRICKE: he lamented, and complained vnto his frends, that they had compelled him to fight by land, & not ſuffred him to helpe him ſelfe with his other force wherin he was the ſtronger, and that he kept not ſtill neere vnto his army by ſea, that if fortune failed him by land, he might yet preſently haue prepared to his power ready by ſea, to haue reſiſted his enemy. To confeſſe a troth, Pompey committed not ſo great a fault in all this warre, neither did Cæſar put foorth a better deuiſe, then to make his enemie fight farre from his armie by ſea. Thus Pompey being driuen to attempt ſomewhat according to his ſmall abilitie, he ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the cities. To others, he went him ſelfe in perſon alſo to require money, wherewith he manned and armed ſome ſhips. This notwithſtanding, fearing the ſodaine approach of his enemy, leaſt he ſhould preuent him before he could put any reaſonable force in readines for to reſiſt him: he bethought him ſelfe what place he might beſt retyre vnto for his moſt ſafetie. When he had conſidered of it, he thought that there was neuer a prouince of the ROMANES that could ſaue and defend them. And for other ſtraunge realmes, he thought PARTHIA aboue all other, was the beſt place to receiue them into at that preſent, hauing ſo ſmal power as they had: and that was better able to helpe & aide them with more power then they. Other of his counſell were of minde to go into AFRICKE, vnto king Iuba. But Theophanes LESBIAN ſaid, he thought it a great folly, to leaue ÆGYPT which was but three dayes ſailing from thence, and king Ptolomy, (being but lately comen to mans ſtate, and bound vnto Pompey for the late frendſhippe and fauor his father found of him) and to goe put him ſelfe into the handes of the PARTHIANS, the vileſt, and vnfaithfulleſt nation in the world, and not to proue the modeſty of a ROMANE, that had bene his father in law, whoſe proſperity if he could haue endured, he might haue bene the chiefeſt man: and now to put him ſelfe to Arſaces good will, who could not away with Craſſus when he liued. Further, he thought it an ill parte alſo, for him to go cary his young wife of the noble houſe of Scipio, amongſt the barbarous people, who thinke it lawfull for thē to vſe what villany and inſolency they liſt to any. For, admit ſhe haue no villany offered her by them; yet is it an vndecent thing, to thinke ſhe might haue bene diſhonored, they hauing her in their power to doe it. There was no perſwaſion (as they ſay) but this only that turned Pompey vnto Euphrates: for it ſeemeth that Pompeys counſell, and not his fortune, made him take that way. Being determined therefore to flie into ÆGYPT, he departed out of CYPRVS in a gally of SELEVCIA with his wife Cornelia. The reſidue of his traine imbarked alſo, ſome into gallies, & others into marchauntes ſhippes of great burden, and ſo ſafely paſſed the ſea without daunger. When Pompey heard newes that king Ptolomy was in the citie of PELVSIVM with his armie, making warre againſt his ſiſter: he went thither, and ſent a meſſenger before vnto the king, to aduertiſe him of his arriuall, and to intreate him to receiue him. King Ptolomy was then but a young man, inſomuch as one Pothinus gouerned all the whole realme vnder him. He aſſembled a counſell of the chiefeſt and wiſeſt men of the court, who had ſuch credit and authoritie as it pleaſed him to geue them. They being aſſembled, he cōmaunded euery man in the kings name to ſay his minde touching the receiuing of Pompey, whether the king ſhould receiue him or not. It was a miſerable thinge to ſee Pothinus, an eunuche of the kinges, and Theodotus of CHIO, an hyered ſchoolemaſter to teache the young king rethoricke, and Achillas ÆGYPTIAN to conſult among them ſelues what they ſhould doe with Pompey the great. Theſe were the

A the chiefest counsellers of all his eunuches, and of those that had brought him vp. Nowe did Pompey ride at ancker vpon the shore side, expecting the resolution of this counsell: in the which the opinions of other were diuers, for they would not haue receiued him: the other also, that he should be receiued. But the Rethorician Theodotus to shew his eloquence, perswaded them, that neither the one nor the other was to be accepted. For, sayd he, if we receiue him, we shall haue Cæsar our enemie, and Pompey our Lord: and if they do deny him on the other side, Pompey will blame them for refusing of him, and Cæsar for not keeping of him. Therefore, this should be the best resolution, to send to kill him: for thereby, they should winne the good will of the one, and not feare the displeasure of the other: and some say moreouer, that he added this mocke withall: a dead man bytes not. They being determined of this among them selues, B gaue Achillas commission to doe it. He taking with him Septimius (who had charge afore time vnder Pompey) and Saluius an other Centurion also, with three or foure souldiers besides, they made towards Pompeys gallie, about whom were at that time the chiefest of his traine, to see what would become of this matter. But when they saw the likelihood of their entertainment, and that it was not in Princely show and maner, nor nothing aunswerable to the hope which Theophanes had put them in, seeing so few men come to them in a fisher bote: they began then to mistrust the small accompt that was made of them, & counselled Pompey to returne backe, and to launche againe into the sea, being out of the daunger of the hurling of a dart. In the C meane time, the fisher bote drew neere, and Septimius rose, and saluted Pompey in the ROMANE tongue, by the name of Imperator, as much as souerain Captaine: and Achillas also spake to him in the Greeke tongue, and bad him come into his bote, because that by the shore side, there was a great deale of mudde and sande banckes, so that his gally should haue no water to bring him in. At the very same time, they saw a farre off diuers of the kings gallies which were arming with all speede possible, & all the shore besides full of souldiers. Thus, though Pompey & his company would haue altered their mindes, they could not haue told how to haue escaped: & furthermore, shewing that they had mistrusted the, then they had geuen the murtherer occasion to haue executed his cruelty. So taking his leaue of his wife Cornelia, who lamented his death before his end: he commaunded two Centurions to go down before him into the ÆGYPTIANS bote, and Philip one of his slaues infranchised, with an other slaue called Scynes. When Achillas reached out his hande to receiue him into his bote, he turned him to his wife, and D sonne, and sayd these verses of Sophocles vnto them?

How Pompey is arrested into AEgypt.

These were the last words he spake vnto his people, when he left his owne gally, & went into the ÆGYPTIANS bote. The lande being a great way of from his gally, when he saw neuer a man in the bote speake frendly vnto him, beholding Septimius, he said vnto him: me thinkes my frend I should know thee, for that thou hast serued with me heretofore. The other nodded with his head that it was true, but gaue him no aunswere, nor shewed him any curtesie. Pompey seeing that no man spake to him, tooke a litle booke he had in his hande, in the which he had wrytten an oration that he ment to make vnto king Ptolomy, & beganne to read it. When E they came neere the shore, Cornelia with her seruaunts and frends about her, stoode vp in her shippe in great feare, to see what should become of Pompey. So, she hoped well, when she saw many of the kings people on the shore, comming towards Pompey at his landing, as it were to receiue and honor him. But euen as Pompey tooke Philip his hande to arise more easily, Septimius came first behinde him and thrust him through with his sword. Next vnto him also, Salsius and Achillas drew out their swords in like manner. Pompey then did no more but tooke vp his gowne with his hands, and hidde his face, and manly abidde the wounds they gaue him, onely sighing a litle. Thus being nine and fifty yeare olde, he ended his life the next day after the day of his birth. They that rode at ancker in their shippes, when they saw him murdered, gaue such a feareful crie, that it was hard to the shore: the waying vp their anckers with spede, F they hoysed saile, and departed their way, hauing winde at will that blew a lusty gale, as soone as they had gotten the maine sea. The ÆGYPTIANS which prepared to rowe after them, when they saw they were past their reach, and vnpossible to be ouertaken: they let them goe.

Pompey the great, cruelly slaine as he landed.

The manlines and pacience of Pompey at his death.

Then hauing striken of Pompeys heade, they threwe his body ouer borde, for a miserable spectacle to all those that were desirous to see him. Philip his infranchised bondman remained ouer by it, vntill such time as the ÆGYPTIANS had seene it their bellies full. Then hauing washed his body with salt water, and wrapped it vp in an old shirt of his, bicause he had no other shift to lay it in: he sought vpon the sands, & found at the length a peece of an old fishers boate, enough to serue to burne his naked bodie with, but not all fully out. As he was busie gathering the broken peeces of this bote together, thither came vnto him an old ROMANE, who in his youth had serued vnder Pompey, and sayd vnto him: O friend, what art thou that preparest the funeralls of Pompey the great? Philip answered, that he was a bondman of his infranchised. Well, said he, thou shalt not haue all this honor alone, I pray thee yet let me accompany thee in so deuout a deede, that I may not altogether repent me to haue dwelt so long in a straunge contrie, where I haue abidden such miserie and trouble: but that to recompence me withall, I may haue this good happe, with mine owne hands to touche Pompeys body, and to helpe to bury the only and most famous Captaine of the ROMANES. The next day after, Lucius Lentulus not knowing what had passed, comming out of CYRENE, sailed by the shore side, and perceiued a fire made for funeralls, and Philip standing by it, whom he knew not at the first. So he asked him, what is he that is dead and buried there? But straight fetching a great sigh, alas, sayd he, perhappes it is Pompey the great. Then he landed a litle, and was straight taken and slaine. This was the end of Pompey the great. Not longe after, Cæsar also came into ÆGYPT that was in great warres, where Pompeys head was presented vnto him: but he turned his head aside, and would not see it: and abhorred him that brought it, as a detestable murtherer. Then taking his ringe wherewith he sealed his letters, whereuppon was grauen a Lyon holding a sword: he burst out a weeping. Achillas and Pothinus he put to death. King Ptolomy him selfe also, being ouerthrowen in battell by the riuer of Nilus, vanished away, and was neuer heard of after. Theodotus the Rethoritian escaped Cæsars hands, & wandred vp & downe ÆGYPT in great misery, despised of euery man. Afterwards, Marcus Brutus (who slue Cæsar) conquering ASIA, met with him by chaunce, and putting him to all the torments he could possibly deuise, at the length slue him. The ashes of Pompeys bodie were afterwards brought vnto his wife Cornelia, who buried them in a towne of hers by the citie of ALBA.

NOw that we haue declared vnto you, the liues of Ageſilaus and Pompey: let vs compare their maners and condicions together, which are theſe. Firſt, Pompey came to his honor and greatneſſe, by his integritie and ſo aduanced him ſelfe: and was a great aide vnto Sylla, doing many noble exploits, helping him to rid thoſe tyrans out of ITALIE, who held it in bondage. But Ageſilaus vſurped the kingdom of LACEDÆMON, againſt the law of gods and men, condemning Leotychides for a baſtard, whom his brother auowed to be his lawfull ſonne: and contemned beſides the oracle of the gods, which gaue warning of a lame king. Furthermore, Pompey did honor Sylla while he liued, and when he was dead, gaue his body honorable buriall in deſpite of Lepidus: and maried his daughter vnto Fauſtus, the ſonne of Sylla. Ageſilaus contrarily did diſhonor Lyſander, apon light occaſion: but Pompey had done no leſſe for Sylla, than Sylla had done for him. Lyſander on thother ſide, had made Ageſilaus king of LACEDÆMON, and Lieutenant generall of all GRÆCE. Thirdly, the iniuries that Pompey did vnto the common weale, were done of neceſſitie, to pleaſe Cæſar and Scipio, both of them his fathers in law. Ageſilaus alſo, to ſatiſfie his ſonnes loue, ſaued Sphodrias life that had deſerued death, for the miſchiefe he had done the ATHENIANS: and he willingly alſo tooke parte with Phebidas, not ſecretly, but openly, bicauſe he had broken the peace made with the THEBANS. To conclude, what hurt Pompey did vnto the ROMANES, either through ignorance, or to pleaſure his frends: the ſame did Ageſilaus vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, through anger & ſelfe wil, in renuing warre with the BOEOTIANS, apon a full peace concluded. If we ſhall reckon of the fortune of the one and the other, in the faultes they committed: Pompeis fortune vnto the ROMANES was vnlooked for. But Ageſilaus would not ſuffer the LACEDÆMONIANES to auoyd the lame kingdom, though they knew it before. For, though Leotychides had bene proued a baſtard ten thouſand times, yet had not the race of the Eurytiontides failed, but they could haue found an other lawfull king among them, that ſhould haue gone vpright: had not Lyſander, fauoring Ageſilaus, kept the true meaning of the oracle from the LACEDÆMONIANS. On thother ſide againe for matters of gouernment, there was neuer ſuch an excellent deuiſe found out, as was done by Ageſilaus: to helpe the feare and daunger the LACEDÆMONIANS were in, for thoſe that fled at the battell of LEVCTRES, when he counſelled them to let the law ſleepe for that day. Neither can any man matche Pompeis with the like: who, to ſhew his frends what power he was of, did breake the lawes which him ſelfe had made. For Ageſilaus being driuen of neceſſity to aboliſh the law, to ſaue the life of his citizens, found ſuch a deuiſe that the law was not hurtfull to the common wealth, neither yet was put downe for feare it ſhould doe hurt. I muſt needes commende this for a great vertue and ciuility in Ageſilaus, who ſo ſoone as he

receiued the Scytala (or ſcrowle of parchement from the Ephori) returned into his contrie, and left the warre of Asia. He did not as Pompey, who made him ſelfe great to the benefit of the common wealth, and for the common wealthes ſake, did forſake ſuch honor and ſo great authoritie, as neuer Captaine before him, but Alexander the great, had the like in thoſe partes. But now to other matter. Touching their battells and exploytes in warres, the multitude of victories and triumphes that Pompey obtained, and the great armies that he led: Xenophon him ſelfe if he were aliue, could not compare Ageſilaus victories vnto his: although for the ſingular vertues and qualities he had in him, for recompence thereof he had libertie graunted him, to wryte and ſpeake of Ageſilaus what he thought good. Me thinkes alſo, there was great difference betwext Pompey and Ageſilaus, in their equitie and clemencie towardes their enemies. For, whileſt Ageſilaus went about to conquer Thebes, and vtterly to race and deſtroy the citie of Messina, the one being an auncient citie of his contrie, and the other the capitall citie of Boeotia: he had almoſt loſt his owne citie of Sparta, for at the leaſt he loſt the commaundement and rule he had ouer the reſt of Græce. The other contrarily gaue cities vnto pirates to dwell in, which were willing to chaunge their trade and maner of life: and when it was in his choyſe to lead Tigranes king of Armenia, in triumphe at Rome, he choſe rather to make him a confederat of the Romanes, ſaying, that he preferred perpetuall honor before one dayes glorie. But ſince it is reaſon we ſhould geue the firſt place and honor of the diſcipline of warres, vnto a Captaine of the greateſt skill and experience in warres: the Lacedæmonian then leaueth the Romane farre behind. For firſt of all Ageſilaus neuer forſooke his citie, though it was beſieged with three ſcore and ten thowſand men, and that there were very fewe within the ſame to defende it, the which alſo a litle before had bene ouerthrowen at the battell of Leuctres. And Pompey on thother ſide, hearinge that Cæſar with fiue thowſand footemen onely had taken a towne in Italie: fled from Rome in verie feare. And therein he can not be excuſed of one of theſe two: either that he fled cowardly for ſo few men, or elſe that he had a falſe imagination of more. For he conueyed his wife and children away, but he left all the reſt without defence, and fled: where in deede he ſhould either haue ouercome, valliantly fighting for defenſe of his contrie, or elſe haue receiued the condicions of peace which the conquerors ſhould haue offered him. For, he was a citizen and allied vnto him. For he that thought it an vntollerable thing to prolong the tearme of his gouernment, or to graunt him a ſecond Conſulſhippe: did now geue him oportunitie, ſuffering him to take the city of Rome, to ſay vnto Metellus the Tribune, & the reſt, that they were all his priſoners. Sith therefore it is the chiefeſt point of an excellent Captaine, to compell his enemies to fight when he findeth him ſelfe the ſtronger, and alſo to keepe him ſelfe from compulſion of fight when he is the weaker: Ageſilaus excelling in that, did euer keepe him ſelfe inuincible. Cæſar alſo had great skill therein, to keepe him ſelfe from daunger being the weaker, and againe could tell howe to compell Pompey to hazard battell, to his vtter deſtruction by lande, where he was the weaker: and by this meanes he made him ſelfe Lorde of the treaſure, vittells, and alſo of the ſea, which his enemies had in their handes, without fighting. That which they alleage in his excuſe, is that which moſt doth condemne him, ſpecially for ſo great and skilfull a Captaine. For as it is likely enough, that a young General of an armie may eaſily be brought from his wiſe and ſafe counſell, with rumor and tumult of a few fearefull men, that ſhould perſwade him it were a ſhame and diſhonor for him if he did otherwiſe: yet were this no ſtraunge matter, but a fault to be pardoned. But for Pompey the great, whoſe campe the Romanes called their contrie, and his tent the Senate, and called all the Prætors and Conſuls that gouerned at Rome, rebells and traitors to the common wealth of Rome: who coulde excuſe him (who was neuer ſeene commaunded by other then him ſelfe, but had bene alwayes chiefe Captaine and Generall in any warre he made, and euer had the vpper hand) but that he was drawen on by the ſcoffes of Faonius, and Domitius, to hazard battell, to endaunger the whole Empire and liberty of Rome, only for feare they ſhould call him king Agamemnon? Who, if he had ſo much regarded preſent infamie, he ſhould haue fought from the beginning for defence of the citie of Rome, and not to haue taken example of Themiſtocles policie by flying, and afterwards to thinke it a ſhame as he did, to lye in Theſ-

A salie a time without fighting. Neither did God appoint them the fieldes of Pharſalia for a Theater, or cloſe campe, of neceſſitie to fight which of them ſhoulde haue the Empire of Rome. Further, there was no Heraulde to ſummone him to fight, as there are at games of price, where he muſt aunſwere to his name, and come and fight, or elſe to looſe the honor of the crowne vnto an other. But there were infinite other fieldes and townes (and as a man woulde ſay the whole earth) which the commoditie of his armie by ſea gaue him choyſe to conquer if he would rather haue followed the ſteppes of Fabius Maximus, of Marius, of Lucullus, or of Ageſilaus him ſelfe: who did paciently abide no leſſe tumultes within the citie ſelfe of Sparta, when the Thebans went to ſummone him to come out to fight, for all the reſt of his contrie. And in Ægypt alſo, he did abide many falſe accuſations againſt him, B wherewith the king him ſelfe did burden him, praying him alwayes to haue a litle pacience. In fine, hauing followed the beſt counſell which he had determined with him ſelfe from the beginning, he ſaued the Ægyptians againſt their willes: and furthermore, he did not only keepe the citie of Sparta from ſo great a daunger, but did alſo ſet vp tokens of triumphe in the ſame againſt the Thebans, whereby, he was not compelled at that time to lead them out to the ſlaughter, and beſides that, gaue his citizens occaſion to obtaine victorie afterwardes. Hereupon Ageſilaus was highly praiſed of them, whoſe liues he had ſaued againſt their wills. And Pompey contrarily was blamed by them ſelues, through whom he had offended: yet ſome ſay, that he was deceiued by his father in law Scipio. For he meaning to keepe the moſt parte of the money to him ſelfe which he had brought out of Asia, did haſten and perſwade Pom-
C pey to geue battell, telling him that there was no money left. The which though it had bene true, a worthie Captaine ſhould not ſo lightly haue bene brought into error, vpon a falſe accompt, to hazard him ſelfe to looſe all. Thus may we ſee what both of them were, by comparing them together. Furthermore for their iorneys into Ægypt, the one fled thither by force: the other willingly went thither with ſmall honor, for moneys ſake to ſerue the barbarous people, with intent afterwards to make warre with the Græcians.

Ageſilaus conſtanter than Pompey.

Pompeys flying into AEgypt is excuſed.

Laſtly, in that which we accuſe the Ægyptians for Pompeys ſake: for the like matter doe they againe accuſe Ageſilaus. For, the one was cruelly put to death, & betrayed by them whom he truſted: & Ageſilaus forſooke them which truſted him, and went to the enemies, hauing brought aide to fight againſt them.

The end of Pompeys life.

Alexander the great.

HAuing determined in this volume to write the life of king Alexander, & of Iulius Cæsar, that ouercame Pompey: hauing to speake of many things, I will vse none other preface, but only desire the readers not to blame me though I do not declare al things at large, but briefly touch diuers, chiefly in those their nobleſt acts & moſt worthy of memory. For they muſt remember, that my intent is not to write hiſtories, but only liues. For, the nobleſt deedes doe not alwayes ſhew mens vertues and vices, but oftētimes a light occaſion, a word, or ſome ſporte makes mens naturall diſpoſitions and maners appeare more plaine, then the famous battells wonne, wherein are ſlaine tenne thowſande men, or the great armies, or cities wonne by ſiege or aſſault. For like as painters or drawers of pictures, which make no accompt of other partes of the bodie, do take the reſemblaunces of the face and fauor of the countenance, in the which conſiſteth the iudgement of their maners & diſpoſition: euen ſo they muſt geue vs leaue to ſeeke out the ſignes and tokens of the minde only, and thereby ſhewe the life of either of them, referring you vnto others to wryte the warres, battells, and other great thinges they did. It is certaine that Alexander was diſcended from Hercules by Caranus, and that of his mothers ſide, he came of the blood of the AEacides by Neoptolemus. They ſay alſo, that king Philip his father when he was a young man, fell in fancie with his mother Olympias, which at that time alſo was a younge maiden, and an orphane without father or mother, in the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where they were both receiued into the miſterie and fraternity of the houſe of the religious: and that afterwards, he did aske her in mariage of her brother Arymbas, with whoſe conſent they were maried together. The night before they lay in wedded bed, the bride dreamed, that lightning fell into her belly, and that withall, there was a great light fire that diſperſed it ſelfe all about into diuers flames. King Philip her husband alſo, ſhortly after he was maried, dreamed that he did ſeale his wiues belly, and that the ſeale wherewith he ſealed, left behinde the printe of a Lyon. Certaine wiſards and ſoothſayers, tolde Philip that this dreame gaue him warning to looke ſtraightly to his wife. But Ariſtander TELMESIAN aunſwered againe, that it ſignified his wife was conceiued with childe, for that they doe not ſeale a veſſell that hath nothinge in it: and that ſhe was with childe with a boy, which ſhoulde haue a

Lions

A Lions hart. It is reported alſo, that many times as ſhe lay a ſleepe in her bed, there was ſeene a ſerpent lying by her, the which was the chiefeſt cauſe (as ſome preſuppoſe) that withdrewe Philips loue and kindnes from her, and cauſed him that he lay not ſo oft with her, as before he was wont to doe: either for that he feared ſome charme or enchauntment, or elſe for that he thought him ſelfe vnmeete for her company, ſuppoſing her to be beloued of ſome god. Some do alſo report this after an other ſort: as in this maner. That the women in thoſe parts of long time, haue bene commonly poſſeſt with the ſpirite of Orpheus, and the diuine fury of Bacchus, whereupon they are called Clodones, & Mimallones (as much as warlicke, & fierce) and doe many things like vnto the women of EDONIA, and THRACIA, dwelling about the mountaine Æmus. Hereby it appeareth, that this word Threskeuin (ſignifying in the Greeke tongue, too B ſuperſtitiouſly geuen to the ceremonies of the gods) came from them. For Olympias aboue other wome, louing to be inſpired with ſuch diuine madnes & fury: did celebrate their ſolemne ſacrifices with a certaine horrible & barbarous maner. For in theſe daunces to Bacchus, ſhe caried a great number of tame ſnakes about her, the which gliding apon the Iuie wherewith the women were dreſſed in thoſe ceremonies, & winding the ſelues about the litle iauelings they had in their hands, & the garlands about their heades: therby they made men the more afraid of them. Whereupon Philip after this dreame, ſent Chero MEGALOPOLITAN vnto the oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, to inquier what it ſignified. Anſwere was geuen him, that he ſhould do ſacrifice vnto Iupiter Hammon, & honor him aboue all gods: & that he had loſt one of his eyes, with the which he peeping in at a crany of his chamber dore, ſaw the god in forme of a ſnake C lye by his wife. Furthermore, Olympias (as Eratoſthenes writeth) bidding her ſonne farewel whē he went to conquer ASIA, after ſhe had ſecretly tolde him alone, by whom he was begotten: ſhe prayed him to be valliant, & to ſhew himſelfe worthy his ſonne, that begat him. Others tel alſo, that ſhe was angry with this report, ſaying: will Alexander neuer leaue to make me ſuſpected of Iuno? So it is, that Alexander was borne on the ſixt day of the moneth of Hecatombæon, (in engliſh, Iune) which the MACEDONIANS call Lous. On the very ſame day, the temple of Diana in the city of EPHESVS was burnt, as Hegeſias MAGNESIAN doth witneſſe, whoſe crie & exclamation was ſo terrible & cold, that it was enough to haue quenched that fire. It is not to be wondred at, that Diana ſuffred her temple to be burnt, being like a midwife, buſie about Alexanders birth. But this is true, that all the prieſts, magitians and ſoothſayers, which were at D that time in EPHESVS, iudging that this did prognoſticate ſome maruelous great miſſortune to come, like men beſtraught of their wits, they ran vp & downe the city, ſmiting of their faces, & crying that ſome great plague & miſchief was borne that day vnto ASIA. Shortly after that king Philip had wonne the city of POTIDÆA, three meſſengers came to him the ſame day that brought him great newes. The firſt, that Parmenio had wonne a notable battell of the ILLYRIANS: the ſecond, that his horſe only wan the bell & price at the Olympian games: & the third, that his wife had brought him a ſonne called Alexander. Philip being maruelous glad to heare theſe newes, the ſoothſayers did make his ioy yet greater: aſſuring him that his ſonne which was borne with three victories all together, ſhould be inuincible. Now for his ſtature & perſonage, the ſtatues and images made of him by Lyſippus doe beſt declare it, for that he would be E drawen of no man but him only. Diuers of his ſucceſſors & frends did afterwards counterfeat his image, but that excellent workeman Lyſippus only, of all other the chiefeſt, hath perfectly drawen and reſembled Alexanders maner of holding his neck, ſomwhat hanging downe towards the left ſide, & alſo the ſwete looke & caſt of his eyes. But when Apelles painted Alexander, holding lightning in his hand, he did not ſhew his freſh colour, but made him ſomewhat blacke and ſwarter, then his face in deede was: for naturally he had a very fayre white colour, mingled alſo with red, which chiefly appeared in his face & in his breſt. I remember I red alſo in the cōmentaries of Ariſtoxenus, that his skin had a maruelous good ſauor, & that his breath was very ſwete, inſomuch that his body had ſo ſwete a ſmell of it ſelfe, that all the apparell he wore next vnto his body, tooke thereof a paſſing delightfull ſauor, as if it had bene perfumed. F And the cauſe hereof peraduenture might be, the very temperature & conſtitucion of his body, which was hot and burning like fire. For Theophraſtus is of opinion, that the ſweete ſauor commeth by meanes of the heate that dryeth vp the moiſture of the bodie. By which reaſon also it appeareth, that the drie & hot contries pearched with heate of the sunne, are those that deliuer vnto vs the best spices: bicause that the sunne drieth vp the moysture of the outward parts, as a matter of corruption. This natural heate that Alexander had, made him (as it appeareth) to be giuen to drinke, & to be hasty. Euen from his childhood they saw that he was giuen to be chast. For though otherwise he was very hot & hasty, yet was he hardly moued with lust or pleasure of the body, & would moderately vse it. But on thother side, the ambition & desire he had of honor, shewed a certaine greatnes of minde & noble corage, passing his yeares. For he was not (as his father Philip) desirous of all kind of glory: who like a Rethoritian had a delite to vtter his eloquence, & stamped in his coynes, the victories he had wonne at the Olympian games, by the swift running of his horse & coches. For when he was asked one day (bicause he was swift of foote) whether he would assay to run for victory at the Olympian games: I could be content, said he, so I might run with kings. And yet to speake generally, he misliked all such contention for games. For it seemeth that he vtterly misliked all wrestling & other exercise for prise, where men did vse all their strength: but otherwise he him self made certen festiual daies & games of prise, for common stage plaiers, musitians, & singers, & for the very Poets also. He delighted also in hunting of diuers kindes of beastes, and playing at the staffe. Ambassadors being sent on a time from the king of PERSIA, whilest his father was in some iorney out of his realme: Alexander familliarly entertaining of them, so wan them with his curteous entertainment, (for that he vsed no childish questions vnto them, nor asked them trifling matters, but what distance it was frō one place to an other, & which way they went into the high contries of ASIA, & of the king of PERSIA him selfe, how he was towards his enemies, & what power he had) that he did rauish them with delight to heare him, insomuch that they made no more account of Philips eloquence & sharpe wit, in respect of his sonnes corage, & noble minde, to attempt great enterprises. For when they brought him newes that his father had taken some famous city, or had won some great battell, he was nothing glad to heare it, but would say to his playfellowes: sirs, my father will haue all, I shall haue nothing left me to conquer with you, that shalbe ought worth. For he delighting neither in pleasure nor riches, but only in valliantnes & honor, thought, that the greater conquests & realmes his father should leaue him, the lesse he should haue to do for himselfe. And therfore, seing that his fathers dominions & Empire increased dayly more and more, perceiuing all occasion taken from him to do any great attempt: he desired no riches nor pleasure, but warres & battells, & aspired to a signory where he might win honor. He had diuers men appointed him (as it is to be supposed) to bring him vp: as schoolemasters, gouernors, & groomes of his chamber to attend vpon him: and among those, Leonidas was the chiefest man that had the gouernment & charge of him, a man of a seuere disposition, & a kinseman also vnto the Queene Olympias. He misliked to be called a maister or tutor, though it be an office of good charge, wherupō the others called him Alexanders gouernor, bicause he was a noble man, & allied to the Prince. But he that bare the name of his schoolemaster, was Lysimachus, an ACARNANIAN borne, who had no other maner of ciuility in him, sauing that he called him selfe Phœnix, Alexander Achilles, & Philip Peleus: & therfore he was well thought of, and was the seconde person next vnto Leonidas. At what time Philonicus THESSALIAN had brought Bucephal the horse to sell vnto king Philip, asking thirteene talents, they went into the field to ryde him. The horse was found so rough & churlish that the ryders said he would neuer do seruice, for he would let no man get vp on his backe, nor abide any of the gentlemens voyces about king Philip, but would yerke out at them. Thereupon, Philip being affrayed, commaunded them to cary him away as a wild beast, & altogether vnprofitable: the which they had done, had not Alexander that stoode by said, O gods, what a horse do they turne away, for lacke of skil & hart to handle him. Philip heard what he said, but held his peace. Alexander oft repeating his wordes, seeming to be sory that they should send backe the horse againe: why, said Philip, doest thou control them that haue more experience than thou, & that know better then thou how to handle a horse? Alexander answered, & yet me thinkes I should hādle him better thā all they haue done. But if thou canst not, no more thē they, replied Philip: what wilt thou forfet for thy folly? I am cōtent (q. Alexander) to ieopard the price of the horse. Euery man laughed to heare his aunswere: and the wager was layed betwene them. Then ran

A Alexander to the horſe, and tooke him by the bridle: and turned him towardes the ſunne. It ſeemed that he had marked (as I ſuppoſe) how madde the horſe was to ſee his owne ſhadow, which was euer before him in his eye, as he ſturred to & fro. Then Alexander ſpeaking gently to the horſe, and clapping him on the backe with his hand, till he had left his fury & ſnorting: ſoftly let fall his cloke from him, and lightly leaping on his backe, got vp without any daunger, and holding the reines of the bridle hard, without ſtriking or ſturring the horſe, made him to be gentle enough. Then when he ſawe that the furie of the horſe was paſt, and that he beganne to galloppe, he put him to his full career, and layed on ſpurres and voyce a good. Philip at the firſt with feare beholding his ſonnes agility, leaſt he ſhould take ſome hurt, ſaid neuer a word: but when he ſaw him redily turne the horſe at the end of his career, in a brauery for that

B he had done, all the lookers on gaue a ſhowte for ioy. The father on thother ſide (as they ſay) fell a weeping for ioy. And when Alexander was lighted from the horſe, he ſayd vnto him kiſſing his head: O ſonne, thou muſt needes haue a realme that is meete for thee, for MACEDON will not hold thee. Furthermore, conſidering that of nature he was not to be won by extreamity, & that by gentle meanes and perſwaſion he could make him do what he would: he euer ſought rather to perſwade then cõmaund him in any thing he had to do. Now Philip putting no great affiãce in his ſchoolemaſters of muſicke & humanity, for the inſtruction & education of his ſonne, whom he had appointed to teach him, but thinking rather that he needed men of greater learning than their capacities would reache vnto: and that as Sophocles ſayth,

Philip propheciеth of his ſonne Alexander.

He needed many reynes, and many bits at one:

C He ſent for Ariſtotle (the greateſt Philoſopher in his time, & beſt learned) to teach his ſonne, vnto whom he gaue honorable ſtipend. For Philip hauing won & take before, the city of STAGYRA, where Ariſtotle was borne: for his ſake he built it againe, & repleniſhed it with inhabitãts which fled away, or otherwiſe were in bondage. He appointed them for a ſchoole houſe and dwelling place, the pleaſant houſe that is by the city of MIEZA. In that place are yet ſeene ſeats of ſtone which Ariſtotle cauſed to be made, & cloſe walks to walke in the ſhadow. It is thought alſo, that Alexander did not only learne of Ariſtotle, moral philoſophy & humanity, but alſo he heard of him other more ſecret, hard, & graue doctrine, which Ariſtotles ſchollers do properly call Acroamata, or Epoptica, meaning things ſpeculatiue, which requireth the maſters teaching to vnderſtand thẽ, or els are kept from cõmon knowledge: which ſciences, they did not

D cõmonly teach. Alexander being paſſed into ASIA, & hearing that Ariſtotle had put out certen bookes of that matter: for the honors ſake of philoſophy, he wrote a letter vnto him, ſomwhat too plaine, & of this effect. Alexander, vnto Ariſtotle greeting. Thou haſt not done well to put forth the Acroamatical ſciences. For wherin ſhal we excell other, if thoſe things which thou haſt ſecretly taught vs, be made cõmon to all? I do thee to vnderſtand, that I had rather excell others in excellency of knowledge, then in greatnes of power. Farewel. Wherunto Ariſtotle to pacifie this his ambitious humor, wrote vnto him againe, that theſe bookes were publiſhed, & not publiſhed. For to ſay truly, in al his treatiſes which be called μετὰ τὰ φυσικὰ: there is no plain inſtruction profitable for any man, neither to picke out by himſelfe, nor yet to be taught by any other, then Ariſtotle him ſelfe, or his ſchollers. So that it is written as a memoriall for them

An Epiſtle of Alexander vnto Ariſtotle.

E that haue bene entred & brought vp in the Peripatetticke ſect & doctrine. It ſeemeth alſo, that it was Ariſtotle aboue all other, that made Alexander take delight to ſtudy phiſick. For Alexander did not only like the knowledge of ſpeculation, but would exerciſe practiſe alſo, & help his frends when they were ſicke: & made beſides certaine remedies, & rules to liue by: as appeareth by his letters he wrote, that of his owne nature he was much geuẽ to his booke, & deſired to read much. He learned alſo the Iliades of Homer, of Ariſtotles correction, which they call ἡ ἐκ τοῦ νάρθηκος the corrected, as hauing paſſed vnder the rule: & laid it euery night vnder his beds head with his dagger, calling it (as Oneſicrates writeth) the inſtitution of martiall diſcipline. And when he was in the high contries of ASIA, where he coulde not readily come by other bookes, he wrote vnto Harpalus to ſend them to him. Harpalus ſent him the hiſtories of Phili-

F ſtus, with diuers tragedies of Euripides, Sophocles, and Æſchylus: and certaine hymnes of Teleſtus and Philoxenus. Alexander did reuerence Ariſtotle at the firſt, as his father, and ſo he tearmed him: bicauſe from his natural father he had life, but from him, the knowledge to liue.

But afterwardes he ſuſpected him ſomewhat, yet he did him no hurt, neither was he ſo friendly to him as he had bene: whereby men perceiued that he did not beare him the good will he was wont to doe. This notwithſtanding, he left not that zeale and deſire he had to the ſtudie of Philoſophie, which he had learned from his youth, and ſtill continued with him. For he ſhewed diuers teſtimonies thereof. As, the honor he did vnto Anaxarchus the Philoſopher. The fiftie talentes which he ſent vnto Xenocrates, Dandamis, and Calanus: of whome he made great account. When king Philip made warre with the BIZANTINES, Alexander being but ſixteene yeare olde, was left his Lieutenaunt in MACEDON, with the cuſtodie and charge of his great ſeale: at what time he alſo ſubdued the MEDARIANS which had rebelled againſt him, and hauing wonne their citie by aſſault, he draue out the barbarous people, and made a Colonie of it of ſundrie nations, and called it ALEXANDROPOLIS, to ſay, the citie of Alexander. He was with his father at the battell of CHÆRONEA againſt the GRÆCIANS, where it was reported, that it was he that gaue charge firſt of all apon the holie bande of the THEBANS. Furthermore, there was an old oke ſeene in my time, which the contry men commonly call Alexanders oke, bicauſe his tent or pauillion was faſtned to it: and not farre from thence is the charnell houſe, where thoſe MACEDONIANS were buried that were ſlaine at the battell. For theſe cauſes, his father Philip loued him very deerely, and was glad to heare the MACEDONIANS call Alexander king, & him ſelfe their Captaine. Howbeit the troubles that fell out in his court afterwards, by reaſon of Philippes new mariages and loues, bred great quarrell and ſtrife amongeſt the women: for the miſchiefe of diſſention & gealozy of women, doth ſeparate the harts of kings one from an other, whereof was chiefeſt cauſe, the ſharpenes of Olympias, who being a gealous woman, fretting, and of a reuenging minde, did incenſe Alexander againſt his father. But the chiefeſt cauſe that prouoked Alexander, was Attalus at the mariage of Cleopatra, whom Philip maried a maiden, falling in fancie with her when him ſelfe was paſt mariage. This was the matter: Attalus being vncle vnto this Cleopatra, fell droncke at the mariage, and hauing in his cuppes, he perſwaded the MACEDONIANS that were at the feaſt, to pray to the goddes, that they might haue a lawfull heire of Philippe and Cleopatra, to ſucceede him in the kingdome of MACEDON. Alexander being in a rage therewith threwe a cuppe at his head, and ſayd vnto him: why, traytor, what am I: doſt thou take me for a baſtard? Philip ſeeing that, roſe from the bourd, and drew out his ſword, but by good fortune for them both, being troubled with choller and wine, he fell downe on the grounde. Then Alexander mocking him, loe, ſayd he, to the MACEDONIANS, here is the man that prepared to go out of EVROPE into ASIA, and ſtepping onely from one bedde to an other, ye ſee him layed alongeſt on the ground. After this great inſolency, he tooke his mother Olympias away with him, and carying her into his contrie of EPIRVS, he left her there, and him ſelfe afterwards went into ILLYRIA. In the meane time, Demaratus CORINTHIAN, a frend of king Philippes, and very familliar with him, came to ſee him. Philip when he had curteouſly welcommed him, asked him howe the GRÆCIANS did agree together. Truely, O king, quod he, it importes you much to inquier of the agreement of the GRÆCIANS, when your owne court is ſo full of quarrell & contencion. Theſe words nipped Philip in ſuch ſorte, & cauſed him to know his fault, that through Demaratus meanes, whom he ſent to perſwade Alexander to returne, Alexander was made to come backe againe. Now whē Pexodorus, a Prince of CARIA (deſiring for neceſſities ſake, to enter in league and frendſhip with Philip) offred his eldeſt daughter in mariage vnto Aridæus king Philips ſonne, & had ſent Ariſtocritus Ambaſſador into MACEDON for that purpoſe: the frends of Alexander & his mother, began againe to inueigle him with new reports and ſuſpicions, how Philip by this great mariage would aduaunce Aridæus to his vtter vndoing, and leaue him his heire in the kingdom. Alexander being nettled therwith ſent one Theſſalus a plaier of tragedies into CARIA to Pexodorus: to perſwade him to leaue Aridæus, that was a baſtard & a foole, & rather to make alliāce with Alexander. This offer pleaſed Pexodorus far better, to haue Alexander his ſonne in law, than Aridæus. Philip vnderſtanding this, went himſelf into Alexanders chāber, taking Philotas with him (the ſonne of Parmenio) one of his familliars, & bitterly tooke vp Alexander, telling him that he had a baſe mind, & was vnworthy to be left his heire after his death, if he would caſt himſelfe away, marying the daughter of a CARIAN, that was a ſlaue & ſubiect of

And furthermore, he baniſhed out of MACEDON, Harpalus, Nearchus, Phrygius, & Ptolomy, his ſonnes companions: whom Alexander afterwards called home againe, & placed them in great authority about him. Shortly after, Pauſanias ſuſteining villany by the counſell and commaundement of Attalus & Cleopatra, craning Iuſtice of Philip, and finding no amends: he conuerted all his anger againſt him, and for ſpight ſlue him him ſelfe. Of this murther, moſt men accuſed Quene Olympias, who (as it is reported) allured this young man, hauing iuſt cauſe of anger, to kill him. And Alexander alſo went not cleare from ſuſpition of this murther. For ſome ſay, that Pauſanias after this villanie was done him, complained vnto Alexander, and told him how he had bene abuſed: who recited theſe verſes to him of Euripides, in the tragedie of Notwithſtanding, afterwardes he cauſed diligent ſearche to be made, and all them to be ſeuerely puniſhed that were of the conſpiracie: and was angrie alſo that his mother Olympias had cruelly ſlaine Cleopatra. So he came to be king of MACEDON at twenty yeares of age, and found his realme greatly enuyed & hated of daungerous enemies, and euery way full of daunger. For, the barbarous nations that were neere neighbours vnto MACEDON, could not abide the bondage of ſtraungers, but deſired to haue their naturall kinges. Neither had Philip time enough to bridle and pacifie GRÆCE, which he had conquered by force of armes: but hauing

C a litle altered the gouernmentes, had through his inſolencie left them all in great trouble and ready to rebell, for that they had not long bene aquainted to obey. Thereupon Alexanders counſell of MACEDON, being affraid of the troubleſome time, were of opinion, that Alexãder ſhould vtterly forſake the affaires of GRÆCE, and not to follow them with extremitie, but that he ſhould ſeeke to winne the barbarous people by gentle meanes, that had rebelled againſt him, and wiſely to remedy theſe new ſturres. But he farre otherwiſe determined to ſtabliſh his ſafety by corage and magnanimitie: perſwading him ſelfe, that if they ſaw him ſtowpe and yeeld at the beginning, how litle ſo euer it were, euery one would be apon him. Thereupon, he ſtraight quenched all the rebellion of the barbarous people, inuading them ſodainely with his armie, by the riuer of DANVBY, where in a great battell he ouerthrew Syrmus, king of the

D TRIBALLIANS. Furthermore, hauing intelligence that the THEBANS were reuolted, and that the ATHENIANS alſo were confederate with them: to make them know that he was a man, he marched with his armie towardes the ſtreight of Thermopiles, ſaying that he would make Demoſthenes the Orator ſee (who in his oratiõs, whileſt he was in ILLYRIA, & in the contry of the TRIBALLIANS, called him child) that he was growen a ſtripling paſſing through THESSALY, & ſhould finde him a man before the walles of ATHENS. When he came with his armie vnto the gates of THEBES, he was willing to geue them of the citie occaſion to repent them: and therefore onely demaunded Phœnix and Prothytes, authors of the rebellion. Furthermore, he proclaimed by trompet, pardon and ſafetie vnto all them that would yeld vnto him. The THEBANS on thother ſide, demaunded of him Philotas, & Antipater, two of his chiefeſt ſeruauntes,

E & made the crier proclaime in the citie, that all ſuch as would defend the libertie of GRÆCE, ſhould ioyne with them. Then did Alexander leaue the MACEDONIANS at libertie to make warre with all crueltie. Then the THEBANS fought with greater corage and deſire then they were able, conſidering that their enemies were many againſt one. And on thother ſide alſo, when the garriſon of the MACEDONIANS which were within the caſtell of CADMIA, made a ſalie vpon them, and gaue them charge in the rereward: then they being enuironned of all ſides, were ſlaine in maner euery one of them, their citie taken, deſtroyed, & raſed euen to the hard ground. This he did, ſpecially to make all the reſt of the people of GRÆCE afraid by example of this great calamitie and miſerie of the THEBANS, to thend none of them ſhould dare from thenceforth once to riſe againſt him. He would cloke this crueltie of his vnder the com-

F plaintes of his confederates, the PHOCIANS and PLATEIANS: who complaining to him of the iniuries the THEBANS had offred, could not denie them iuſtice. Notwithſtãding, excepting the prieſts, and the religious, and all ſuch as were frendes vnto any of the Lords of MACEDON, all the frendes and hinſmen of the poet Pindarus, and all thoſe that had diſſwaded them which were the rebells: he ſold all the reſt of the citie of THEBES for ſlaues, which amounted to the nomber of thirtie thowſand perſones, beſides them that were ſlaine at the battell, which were ſix thowſand moe. Now amongeſt the other miſeries & calamities of the poore citie of THEBES, there were certaine THRACIAN ſouldiers, who hauing ſpoyled and defaced the houſe of Timoclea, a vertuous ladie and of noble parentage, they deuided her goods among them: and their captaine hauing rauiſhed her by force, asked her, whether ſhe had any where hidden any gold or ſiluer. The ladie told him, ſhe had. Then leading him into her garden, ſhe brought him vnto a well: where ſhe ſaid ſhe had caſt all her iuells and precious things, when ſhe heard the citie was taken. The barbarous THRACIAN ſtouped to looke into the well: ſhe ſtanding behind him, thruſt him in, and then threw ſtones enow on him, and ſo killed him. The ſouldiers when they knew it, tooke and bound her, and ſo caried her vnto Alexander. When Alexander ſaw her countenance, & marked her gate: he ſuppoſed her at the firſt to be ſome great lady, ſhe followed the ſouldiers with ſuch a maieſtie & boldnes. Alexãder thẽ asking her what ſhe was: She aunſwered, that ſhe was the ſiſter of Theagenes, who fought a battell with king Philip before the citie of CHÆRONEA, where being generall he was ſlaine, valiantly fighting for the defenſe of the libertie of GRÆCE. Alexander wondering at her noble aunſwere and couragious deede, cõmaunded no man ſhoud touche her nor her children, & ſo freely let her goe whether ſhe would. He made league alſo with the ATHENIANS, though they were very ſory for their miſerable fortune. For the day of the ſolemne feaſt of their miſteries being come, they left it of, mourning for the THEBANS: courteouſly enterteining all thoſe, that flying from THEBES came to them for ſuccour. But whether it was for that his anger was paſt him, following therein the nature of lyons: or bycauſe that after ſo great an example of crueltie, he would ſhew a ſinguler clemency againe: he did not only pardon the ATHENIANS of all faults committed, but did alſo counſell them to looke wiſely to their doings, for their citie one daie ſhould commaund all GRÆCE, if he chaunced to die. Men report, that certenly he oftentimes repented him that he had delt ſo cruelly with the THEBANS, and the griefe he tooke apon it was cauſe that he afterwardes ſhewed him ſelfe more mercifull vnto diuers others. Afterwardes alſo he did blame the furie of Bacchus, who to be reuenged of him, made him kill Clitus at the table being droncke, and the MACEDONIANS alſo to refuſe him to goe any further to conquer the INDIANS, which was an imperfection of his enterpriſe, and a miniſhing alſo of his honor. Beſides, there was neuer THEBAN afterwardes, that had eſcaped the furie of his victorie, and did make any peticion to him, but he had his ſute. Thus was the ſtate of THEBES as you haue heard. Then the GRÆCIANS hauing aſſembled a generall counſell of all the ſtates of GRÆCE within the ſtraights of Peloponneſus: there it was determined that they would make warre with the PERSIANS. Whereupon they choſe Alexander generall for all GRÆCE. Then diuers men comming to viſite Alexander, aſwell philoſophers, as gouernors of ſtates, to congratulate with him for his electiõ, he looked that Diogenes Sinopian (who dwelt at CORINTH) would likewiſe come as the reſt had done: but when he ſaw he made no reckoning of him, and that he kept ſtill in the ſuburbes of CORINTHE, at a place called CRANIVM, he went him ſelfe vnto him, and found him layed all a long in the ſunne. When Diogenes ſaw ſo many comming towardes him, he ſate vp a litle, and looked full apon Alexander. Alexander courteouſly ſpake vnto him, and asked him, if he lacked any thinge. Yea ſaid he, that I do: that thou ſtand out of my ſunne a litle. Alexander was ſo well pleaſed with this aunſwere, and maruelled ſo much at the great boldnes of this man, to ſe how ſmall account he made of him: that when he went his way from him, Alexanders familliers laughing at Diogenes, & mocking him, he told them: maſters ſay what you lyſt, truely if I were not Alexander, I would be Diogenes. Alexander being deſirous to heare what the oracle of Apollo DELPHIAN would ſay vnto him touching the ſucceſſe of his iorney into ASIA: he went vnto the citie of DELPHES. It chaunced ſo, that he came thither in the dayes which they call vnfortunate, on which dayes no man vſed to aske Apollo any thing. This notwithſtanding, he ſent firſt vnto the Nunne which pronounced the oracles, to pray her to come to him. But ſhe refuſed to come, alleaging the cuſtome which forbad her to goe. Thereupon, Alexander went thither him ſelfe in perſon, and brought her out by force into

A into the temple. She seeing then that he would not be denyed, but would needs haue his will told him, My sonne, for that I see, thou art inuincible, Alexander hearing that, said he desired no other oracle, and that he had as much as he looked for. Afterwardes religion or was euer ready to go on with his voyage, he had diuers signes and tokens from the gods: amongest other, an image of the Poet Orpheus made of cypres, in the citie of Leibethra, in the which dayes did sweate marueilously. Many men fearing that signe, Aristander the soothsayer bad Alexander be of good cheere, and hope well, for he should obtaine noble victories that should neuer be forgotten, the which should make the Poets and musicians sweate to write and singe them.
Then, for his armie which he led with him, they that doe set downe the least nomber, say that they were thirtie thowsand footemen, and fiue thowsand horsemen: and they that say more, B doe write, foure & thirtie thowsand footemen, and foure thowsand horsemen. Aristobulus writteth, that Alexander had no more but three score and tenne talents to paie his souldiers with:
and Duris writeth, that he had no more prouision of vittells, then for thirtie dayes only. And Onesicritus sayeth moreouer, that he did owe two hundred talents. Now, notwithstanding that he beganne this warre with so small ability to mainteine it, he would neuer take shippe before he vnderstood the state of his frendes, to know what abilitie they had to goe with him, and before he had geuen vnto some landes, and vnto other, a towne, and to others againe, the custome of some hauen. Thus by his bountie hauing in maner spent almost the reuenues of the crowne of Macedon, Perdiccas asked him: my Lord, what will you kepe for your selfe? hope, sayd he. Then, quod Perdiccas againe, we will also haue some parte, since we goe with you: and C so refused the reuenue which the king had geuen him for his pencion. Many others did also the like. But such as were contented to take his liberalitie, or would aske him any thing, he gaue them very frankly, and in such liberallitie spent all the reuenue he had. With this desier & determination, he went on to the straight of Hellespont, & going to the citie of Ilium, he did sacrifice vnto Diana, and made funerall effusions vnto the demy goddes (to wit, vnto the princes which died in the warre of Troia, whose bodies where buried there) and specially vnto Achilles, whose graue he annointed with oyle, and ranne naked round about it with his familliers, according to the auncient custome of funeralls. Then he couered it with nosegayes and flowers, saying, that Achilles was happy, who while he liued had a faithfull frend, and after his death an excellent herauld to singe his praise. When he had done, & went vp and downe D the citie to see all the monumentes and notable thinges there: one asked him, if he would see Paris harpe. He aunswered againe, he would very faine see Achilles harpe, who played & sunge apon it all the famous actes done by valliant men in former times. In the meane time, Darius king of Persia, hauing leauied a great armie, sent his captaines and leuetenants to tary Alexander at the riuer of Granicus. There was Alexander to fight of necessitie, being the onely barre to stoppe his entrie into Asia. Moreouer, the captaines of his counsell about him, were afraid of the depth of this riuer, and of the height of the bancke on thother side, which was ve-rie hie and steepe, & could not be wonne without fighting. And some said also, that he should haue speciall care of the auncient regard of the moneth: bycause the kings of Macedon did neuer vse to put their armie into the field in the moneth of Dason, which is Iune. For that, E said Alexander, we will remedy soone: let them call it the second moneth, Artemisium, which is Maye. Furthermore Parmenio was of opinion, that he should not medle the first day, bycause it was very late. Alexander made aunswere againe, that Hellespont would blush for shame, if he were now affraid to passe ouer the riuer, since he had already commen ouer an arme of the sea. Thereupon he him selfe first entred the riuer with thirteene guidons of horsemen, and marched forwardes against an infinite nomber of arrowes which the enemies shot at him, as he was comming vp the other bancke, which was very highe and steepe, and worst of all, full of armed men and horsemen of the enemies: which stayed to receiue him in battell raye, thrusting his men downe into the riuer, which was very deepe, and ranne so swifte, that it almost caried them downe the streame: insomuch that men thought him more rash than wise, to F leade his men with such daunger. This notwithstanding, he was so wilfully bent that he would needes ouer, & in thend with great a doe recouered the other side, specially bycause the earth slidde away, by reason of the mudde. So when he was ouer, he was driuen to fight pelmel one

vpon another, bycause his enemies did set vpon the first that were passed ouer, before they could put them selues into battell raye, with great cryes, keeping their horses very close together, and fought first with their dartes, and afterwardes came to the sworde when their dartes were broken. Then many of them set vpon him alone, for he was easely to be knowen aboue the rest by his shield & the hinder part of his helmet, about the which, there hong from thone side to thother, a maruelous faier white plume. Alexander had a blow with a dart on his thigh, but it hurt him not. Thereupon Roesaces & Spithridates, both two chiefe captaines of the PERSIANS, setting apon Alexander at once, he left the one, and riding straight to Roesaces, who was excellently armed, he gaue him such a blow with his launce, that he brake it in his hand, and straight drew out his sword. But so soone as they two had closed together, Spithridates comming at toe side of him, raised him selfe vpon his stirroppes and gaue Alexander with all his might such a blow of his head with a battell axe, that he cut the creast of his helmet, and one of the sides of his plume, and made such a gash, that the edge of his battell axe touched the very heare of his head. And as he was lifting vp his hand to strike Alexander againe, great Clitus preuenting him, thrust him through with a partisan, and at the very same instant, Roesaces also fell dead from his horse with a wound which Alexander gaue him with his sword. Now whilest the horsemen fought with such furie, the squadron of the battell of footemen of the MACEDONIANS had passed the riuer, and both the battells beganne to march one against the other. The PERSIANS stucke not manfully to it any long time, but straight turned their backes and fled, sauing the GRÆCIANS which tooke paie of king Darius: they drew together vpon a hill, and craued mercy of Alexander. But Alexander setting vpon them, more of will then discretion, had his horse killed vnder him, being thrust through the flancke with a sword. This was not Bucephal, but an other horse he had. All his men that were slaine or hurt at this battell, were hurte amongest them valliantly fighting against desperate men. It is reported that there were slaine at this first battell, twenty thowsand footemen of these barbarous people, & two thowsand fiue hundred horsemen. Of Alexanders side, Aristobulus writeth, that there were slaine foure and thirty men in all, of the which, twelue of them were footemen. Alexander to honor their valliantnes, caused euery one of their images to be made in brasse by Lysippus. And bycause he would make the GRÆCIANS partakers of this victorie, he sent vnto the ATHENIANS three hundred of their targettes, which he had wonne at the battell, and generally vpon all the other spoiles, he put this honorable inscription. Alexander the sonne of Philip, and the Græcians, excepting the Lacedæmonians, haue vvonne this spoile apon the barbarous Asians. As for plate of gold or siluer, also purple silkes, or other such precious ware which he gat among the PERSIANS: he sent them all vnto his mother, a few except. This first victorie of Alexander, brought such a sodaine chaunge amongest the barbarous people in Alexanders behalfe, that the citie selfe of SARDIS, the chiefe citie of the Empire of the barbarous people, or at the least through all the lowe contries and coastes apon the sea, they yeelded straight vnto him, sauing the cities of HALICARNASSVS and MILETVM, which did still resist him: howbeit at length he tooke thē by force. When he had also conquered all thereabouts, he stood in dout afterwards what he were best to determine. Sometime he had a maruelous desire, whotly to follow Darius whereseuer he were, and to venter all at a battell. An other time againe, he thought it better first to occupy himselfe in conquering of these low contries, & to make him selfe strong with the money and riches he should finde among them, that he might afterwardes be the better able to follow him. In the contrie of LYDIA neere vnto the citie XANTHVM, they say there is a springe that brake of it selfe, and ouerflowing the banckes about it, cast out a litle table of copper from the bottome, vpon the which were graued certen carectes in olde letters, which said: that the kingdome of the PERSIANS should be distroyed by the GRÆCIANS. This did further so encorage Alexander, that he made hast to cleere all the sea coast, euen as farre as CILICIA and PHOENICIA. But the wonderfull good successe he had, runninge alongest all the coast of PAMPHILIA, gaue diuers historiographers occasion to set forth his doinges with admiration, saying that it was one of the wonders of the worlde, that the furie of the sea, which vnto all other was extreame roughe, and many times would swell ouer the toppes of the highe rockes vpon the cliffes, fell calme vnto him. And it appeareth that Menander

A nander him ſelfe in a comedie of his doth witneſſe this wonderfull happynes of Alexander, when merily he ſayeth:

O great Alexander, hovv great is thy ſtate?
For thou vvith thy ſelfe mayſt thus iuſtly debate.
If any man lyuing I liſt for too call,
He commeth and humbly before me doth fall.
And if through the ſourges my iorney doe lye,
The vvaues giue me vvay, and the Sea becomes drye.

Yet Alexander him ſelfe ſimply writeth in his epiſtles (without any great wonder) that by ſea he paſſed a place called the ladder, and that to paſſe there, he tooke ſhippe in the citie of B Phaselides. There he remained many dayes, and when he ſaw the image of Theodectes Phaselitan, ſtanding in the market place: he went in a daunce thither one euening after ſupper, and caſt flowers and garlandes apon his image, honoring the memorie of the dead, though it ſeemed but in ſporte, for that he was his companion when he lyued, by meanes of Ariſtotle and his philoſophie. After that he ouercame alſo the Pisidians, who thought to haue reſiſted him, and conquered all Phrygia beſides. There in the citie of Gordivs, which is ſaid to be the auncient ſeate of king Midas: he ſaw the charret that is ſo much ſpoke of, which is bound with the barcke of a cornell tree, and it was told him for a trothe, of the barbarous people, that they beleued it as a prophecy: that whoſoeuer could vndoe the bande of that barcke, was certenly ordeyned to be king of all the world. It is commonly reported, that Alexander prouing C to vndoe that bande, and finding no endes to vndoe it by, they were ſo many folde wreathed one within the other: he drew out his ſword, and cut the knot in the middeſt, So that then many endes appeared. But Ariſtobulus writeth, that he had quickly vndone the knot by taking the bolt out of the axtree, which holdeth the beame and body of the charret and ſo ſeuered them a ſoonder. Departing thence, he conquered the Paphlagonians & Cappadocians, and vnderſtood of the death of Memnon, that was Darius generall of his army by Sea, and in whom was all their hope to trouble and withſtand Alexander: whereupon he was the bolder to goe on with his determination to leade his army into the highe contries of Asia. Then did king Darius him ſelfe come againſt Alexander, hauing leauied a great power at Svsa, of ſix hundred thowſand fighting men, truſting to that multitude, and alſo to a dreame, the which D his wiſards had expounded rather to flatter him, then to tell him truly. Darius dreamed that he ſaw all the armie of the Macedonians on a fire, and Alexander ſeruing of him in the ſelfe ſame attier that he him ſelfe wore when he was one of the chamber vnto the late king his predeceſſor: and that when he came into the temple of Belus, he ſodainely vaniſhed from him. By this dreame it plainly appeared, that the gods did ſignifie vnto him, that the Macedonians ſhould haue noble ſucceſſe in their doinges, & that Alexander ſhould conquer all Asia, euen as king Darius had done, when he was but Aſgandes vnto the king: and that ſhortly after, he ſhould end his life with great honor. This furthermore made him bolde alſo, when he ſaw that Alexander remained a good while in Cilicia, ſuppoſing it had bene for that he was afraid of him. Howbeit it was by reaſon of a ſickneſs he had, the which ſome ſay he got, by ex- E treame paines and trauell, & others alſo, by cauſe he waſhed him ſelfe in the riuer of Cydnus, which was cold as Iſe. Howſoeuer it came, there was none of the other phiſitians that durſt vndertake to cure him, thinking his diſeaſe vncurable, and no medicines to preuaile that they could giue him, and fearing alſo that the Macedonians would laie it to their charge, if Alexander miſcaried. But Philip Acarnanian, conſidering his maſter was very ill, and bearing him ſelfe of his loue and good will towardes him, thought he ſhoulde not doe that became him, if he did not proue (ſeeing him in extremitie and daunger of life) the vtmoſt remedies of phiſicke, what daunger ſo euer he put him ſelfe into: and therefore tooke apon him to miniſter phiſicke vnto Alexander, and perſwaded him to drincke it boldly if he would quickly be whole, & goe to the warres. In the meane time, Parmenio wrote him a letter from the campe, F aduertiſing him, that he ſhould beware of Philip his phiſitian, for he was bribed and corrupted by Darius, with large promiſes of great riches, that he would geue him with his daughter in mariage, to kill his maſter. Alexander when he had redde this letter, layed it vnder his beddes head, and made none of his neereſt familliers acquainted therewith. When the hower came that he ſhould take his medicine, Philip came into his chamber with other of the kings familliers, & brought a cup in his hand with the pocion he ſhould drinke. Alexander then gaue him the letter, & withall, cheerefully tooke the cup of him, ſhewing no maner of feare or miſtruſt of any thing. It was a wonderfull thing and worth the ſight, how one reading the letter, and thother drinking the medicine both at one inſtant, they looked one apon another, howbeit not both with like cheerefull countenaunce. For Alexander looked merily apon him, plainly ſhewing the truſt he had in his phiſitian Philip, and how much he loued him: and the phiſitian alſo beheld Alexander, like a man perplexed & amazed, to be ſo falſly accuſed, & ſtraight lift vp his handes to heauen, calling the goddes to witneſſe that he was innocent, and then came to Alexanders bed ſide, and prayed him to be of good cheere, and boldly to doe as he would aduiſe him. The medicine beginning to worke, ouercame the diſeaſe, and draue for the time, to the loweſt partes of his body, all his naturall ſtrength and powers: in ſomuch as his ſpeach failed him, and he fell into ſuch a weaknes, and almoſt ſooning, that his pulſe did ſcant beate, and his ſences were welneere taken from him. But that being paſt, Philip in few dayes recouered him againe. Now, when Alexander had gotten ſome ſtrength, he ſhewed him ſelfe openly vnto the MACEDONIANS: for they would not be pacified, nor perſwaded of his health vntill they had ſeene him. In king Darius campe, there was one Amyntas a MACEDONIAN, & baniſht out of his contrie, who knew Alexanders diſpoſition very well. He finding that Darius ment to meete with Alexander within the ſtraightes and vallies of the mountaines: beſought him to tarie rather where he was, being a plaine open contrie round about him, conſidering that he had a great hoſte of men to fight with a few enemies, and that it was moſt for his aduantage to meete with him in the open field. Darius aunſwered him againe, that he was afraid of nothing but that he would flie, before he could come to him. Amyntas replied, for that, O king, I praie you feare not: for I warrant you apon my life he will come to you, yea and is now onwards on his way comming towards you. All theſe perſwaſions of Amyntas could not turne Darius from making his campe to marche towardes CILICIA. At the ſelfe ſame time alſo, Alexander went towardes SYRIA to meete with him. But it chaunced one night, that the one of them miſſed of the other, and when day was come, they both retorned backe againe: Alexander being glad of this happe, & making haſt to meete with his enemy within the ſtraights. Darius alſo ſeeking to winne Alexanders lodging from whence he came, and to bring his army out of the ſtraites: beganne then to find the fault & error committed, for that he had ſhut him ſelfe vp in the ſtraights, (holden in on the one ſide with the mountaine, and on the other with the Sea, and the riuer of Pindarus that ranne betwene both) and that he was driuen to diſperſe his armie into diuers companies, in a ſtonie and ill fauored contrie, ill for horſemen to trauell, being on the contrarie ſide a great aduantage for his enemies, which were excellent good footemen, and but few in nomber. But now, as fortune gaue Alexander the field as he would wiſhe it to fight for his aduantage: ſo could he tell excellently well how to ſet his men in battell raye to winne the victorie. For albeit that Alexander had the leſſe nomber by many then his enemie, yet he had ſuch policy and caſt with him, that he foreſaw all, and would not be enuironned: For he did put out the right winge of his battell a great deale further, then he did his left winge, and fighting him ſelfe in the left winge in the foremoſt ranckes, he made all the barbarous people flie that ſtood before him: howbeit, he was hurt on his thighe with a blow of a ſword. Chares writeth, that Darius ſelfe did hurte him, and that they fought together man to man. Notwithſtanding Alexander ſelfe writing of this battell vnto Antipater ſayeth, that in deede he was hurte on the thighe with a ſword, howbeit it did put him in no daunger: but he writeth not that Darius did hurte him. Thus hauing wonne a famous victory, and ſlaine about a hundred and tenne thowſand of his enemies, he could not yet take Darius, bycauſe he fled, hauing ſtill foure or fiue forlonges vantage before him: howbeit he tooke his charriot of battell wherein he fought, and his bow alſo. Then he retorned from the chaſe, & found the MACEDONIANS ſacking & ſpoiling all the reſt of the campe of the barbarous people, where there was infinite riches (although they had left the moſt parte of their cariage behind them in the citie of DAMAS, to come lighter to the battell) but yet reſerued for him ſelfe all king Darius tent,

A tent, which was full of a great nomber of officers, of riche moueables, and of gold and siluer. So, when he was come to the campe, putting of his armor, he entred into the bathe and sayed: come on, lette vs goe and washe of the sweate of the battell in Darius owne bathe. Naye, replyed one of his familliers againe, in Alexanders bathe: for the goodes of the vanquished are rightly the vanquishers. When he came into the bathe, and sawe the basons and yewers, the boxes, and vyolles for perfumes, all of cleane gold, excellently wrought, all the chamber perfumed passing sweetely, that it was like a parradise: then going out of his bathe, and comming into his tent, seeing it so stately and large, his bedde, the table, and supper, and all ready in such sumptuous sort, that it was wonderfull, he turned him vnto his familliers and

B said: this was a king in deede, was he not thinke ye? As he was ready to goe to his supper, word was brought him, that they were bringing vnto him amongest other Ladies taken prisoners, king Darius mother and his wife, and two of his daughters vnmaried: who hauing seene his chariot and bowe, burst out into lamentable cries, and violent beating of them selues thinking Darius had bene slaine. Alexander pawsed a good while and gaue no aunswere, pitying more their misfortune, then reioycing at his owne goodhappe. Then he presently sent one Leonatus vnto them, to let them vnderstand, that Darius was a liue, and that they should not neede to be afraid of Alexãder, for he did not fight with Darius, but for his kingdome only: and as for them, that they should haue at his handes all that they had of Darius before, when he had his whole kingdome in his handes. As these wordes pleased the captiue Ladies, so the deedes that followed, made them finde his clemencie to be no lesse. For first he suffred them

C to burie as many of the Persian Lordes as they would, euen of them that had bene slaine in the battell, and to take as much silkes of the spoiles, iuells, and ornamentes, as they thought good to honor their funeralles with: & also did lessen no parte of their honor, nor of the nomber of their officers and seruauntes, nor of any iotte of their estate which they had before, but did allowe them also greater pencions, then they had before. But aboue all, the princelyest grace, and most noble fauor that Alexander shewed vnto these captiue princesses, which had alwayes liued in honorable fame and chastitie, was this: That they neuer heard worde, or so much as any suspition that should make them afrayed to be dishonored or deflowred: but were priuately among them selues vnuisited or repayred vnto by any man, but of their owne, not as if they had bene in a campe of their enemies, but as if they had bene kept in some close

D monasterie: although Darius wife (as it is written) was passing faire, as Darius also was a goodly prince, and that his daughters likewise did resemble their father and mother. Alexander thinking it more princely for a kinge, as I suppose to conquer him selfe, then to ouercome his enemies: did neither touche them nor any other, maide or wife, before he maried them, Barsine onely excepted, who being left Memnons widow (generall of kinge Darius by sea) was taken by the citie of Damas. She being excellently well learned in the Greeke tongue, and of good enterteinment (being the daughter of Artabazus, who came of a kinges daughter) Alexander was bolde with her by Parmenioes procurement, (as Aristobulus writeth) who intised him to embrace the companie of so excellent a woman, and passing faire besides. Furthermore, beholding the other Persian Ladies besides which were

E prisoners, what goodly faire women they were: he spake it pleasauntly, that the Ladies of Persia made mens eyes sore to behold them. Notwithstanding, preferring the beautie of his continencie, before their sweete faire faces: he passed by without any sparke of affection towardes them, more then if they had bene images of stone without life. To confirme this, Philoxenus whom he had left his lieutenaunt in the lowe contries apon the sea coast, wrote vnto him on a time, that one Theodorus a marchaunt of Tarentvm, had to sell two goodly young boies, maruelous faire: and therefore that he sent vnto him to knowe his pleasure, if he would bye them. Therewith he was so offended, that many times he cried out alowde: O, my frendes, what villany hath euer Philoxenus seene in me, that he should deuise (hauing nothing to doe there) to purchace me such infamie? whereuppon he wrote vnto him from

F the campe, with reprochfull wordes, that he should send that vile Tarentin marchaunt Theodorus and his marchaundise to the Deuill. He sharpely punished also one Agnon, that wrote vnto him he would bye a young boye called Crobylus (who for beautie bare the onely, name in CORINTHE,) and bring hin to him. An other time alſo, when he heard that Damon and Timotheus MACEDONIANS, vnder Parmenioes charge, had deflowred two of the ſouldiers wiues that were ſtraungers, and waged of him: he wrote vnto Parmenio to looke vnto it, and to examine the matter. And if he found them giltie of the rape, that then he ſhould put them both to death, as brute beaſtes borne to deſtroie mankinde. And in that letter he wrote thus of him ſelfe. For my ſelfe, ſaid he, I haue neither ſeene, nor deſired to ſee Darius wife: neither haue I ſuffred any ſpeach of her beawtie before me. Moreouer he ſaied, that he did vnderſtand that he was mortall by theſe two thinges: to wit, ſleepe, and luſt: for, from the weakenes of our nature proceedeth ſleepe and ſenſualitie. He was alſo no greedy gutte, but temperate in eating, as he ſhewed by many prooſes: but chiefly in that he ſaide vnto the princeſſe Ada, whom he adopted for his mother, and made her Queene of CARIA. For wh (for the loue ſhe bare him) ſhe daily ſent him ſundrie delicate diſhes of meate, tartes, and marchpaines, and beſides the meate it ſelfe, the paſtlers and cookes to make them, which were excellent workemen: he aunſwered that he could not tell what to doe with them, for he had better cookes than thoſe appointed him by his gouernour Leonidas, to witte: for his diner, to riſe before daye; and to marche by night: and for his ſupper, to eate litle at diner. And my gouernour, ſaid he, would oftentimes open the cheſtes where my bedding and apparell lay, to ſee if my mother had put any fine knackes or conceites among them. Furthermore, he was leſſe geuen to wine, then men would haue iudged. For he was thought to be a greater bibber than he was, bycauſe he ſate longe at the bourde, rather to talke then drinke. For euer when he dranke, he would propound ſome tedious matter, and yet but when he was at leyſure. For hauing matters to doe, there was neither feaſte, bancket, plaie, mariage, nor any paſtime that could ſtaie him: as they had done other captaines. The which appeareth plainely by the ſhortenes of his life, and by the wonderfull and notable deedes he did, in that litle time he liued. When he had leyſure, after he was vp in the morning, firſt of all he would doe ſacrifice to the goddes, and then would goe to diner, paſſing awaie all the reſt of the daye, in hunting, writing ſome thinge, taking vp ſome quarell betwene ſouldiers, or els in ſtudying. If he went any iourney of no haſtie buſines, he would exerciſe him ſelfe by the waie as he went, ſhooting in his bowe, or learning to get vp or out of his charret ſodenly, as it ranne. Oftentimes alſo for his paſtime he would hunte the foxe, or ketche birdes, as appeareth in his booke of remembraunces for euerie daie. Then when he came to his lodging, he would enter into his bath, and rubbe and nointe him ſelfe: and would aske his pantelers and caruers if his ſupper were ready. He would euer ſuppe late, and was very curious to ſee, that euery man at his bourde were a like ſerued, and would ſit longe at the table, bycauſe he euer loued to talke, as we haue told you before. Otherwiſe he was as noble a prince and gracious to waite apon, and as pleaſaunt, as any king that euer was. For he lacked no grace nor comelines to adorne a prince, ſauing that he would be ſomething ouer buſie in glorying in his owne deedes, much like vnto a bragging ſouldier: neither was he contented him ſelfe to pleaſe his owne humour that waie, but would alſo ſuffer his familliers to ſoothe him euen to his teeth. And this was many times the deſtruction of honeſt men about him, the which would neither praiſe him in his preſence, hating the flatterers, not yet durſt faye leſſe of the praiſes which they gaue him. For of the firſt they were aſhamed, and by the ſecond they fell in daunger. After ſupper, he would waſhe him ſelfe againe, and ſleepe vntill noone the next daye following, and oftentimes all daye longe. For him ſelfe, he was nothing curious of dainty diſhes: for when any did ſend him rare frutes, or fiſhe, from the countries neere the ſea ſide, he would ſend them abroad vnto his frendes, and ſeldom kepe any thinge for him ſelfe. His table notwithſtanding was alwayes very honorably ſerued, and did ſtill increace his fare, as he did enlarge his conqueſtes: till it came to the ſumme of tenne thowſand drachmas a daye. But there he ſtayed, and would not exceede that ſumme, and moreouer commaunded all men that would feaſt him, that they ſhould not ſpend aboue that ſumme. After this battell of ISSVS, he ſent vnto the citie of DAMAS, to take all the gold and ſiluer, the cariage, and all the women and children of the PERSIANS which were left there, where the men of armes of the THESSALIANS ſpedde them full well. For therefore did

How Leonidas brought vp Alexander.

Alexanders life when he was at leiſure.

Alexander a pleaſant prince as any could be.

A did he send them thither, bycause he sawe that they had fought valliantly at the daye of the battell: and so were the reste of his armie also well stored with money. There the MACEDONIANS hauing tasted first of the golde, siluer, women, and barbarous life: as dogges by cent doe follow the tracke of beastes, euen so were they greedy to follow after the goodes of the PERSIANS. First Alexander thought it best to winne all the sea coaste. Thether came the kinges of CYPRVS, and PHOENICIA, and deliuered vp to him the whole Iland & all PHOENICIA, sauing onely the citie of TYRE. That citie he beseeged seuen moneths together by lande, with great bulwarkes and diuers engines of batterie, and by sea, with two hundred gallies. During this sege, Alexander dreamed one night, that Hercules held out his hand vnto him ouer the walles of the citie, and called him by his name: and there were diuers TYRIANS B also that dreamed in likewise, that Apollo told them that he would goe vnto Alexander, bycause he was not pleased with their doinges in the citie. Thereupon they bound his image, (which was of a wonderfull bignes) with grat chaines, and nailed him downe fast to the base, as if he had bene a traitour that would haue yeelded him selfe vnto their enemies, and called him Alexandrine, as much as fauoring Alexander. Alexander had there also an other dreame. For he dreamed that he sawe a Satyre a farre of sporting with him, and when he thought to haue commen neere to haue taken him, he still escaped from him: vntill at the length, after he had ronne a good while after him, and intreated him, he fell into his handes. The soothesayers being asked what this dreame should signifie, aunswered probably, by deuiding Satyros into two, and then it is Σὰ τύρος: which signifieth, the citie of TYRE shalbe thine. And they C doe yet show vnto this daie, the fountaine where Alexander thought he saw the Satyre. Continuing this seege, he went to make warre with the ARABIANS, that dwell apon the mountaine Antiliban, where he was in great daunger of being cast away, onely bycause he heard his tutor Lysimachus that followed him, saye bostingly, that he was not inferior, nor older than the Phœnix. For when they came at the foote of the mountaine, they left their horses, and went vp a foote: and Alexander was of so courteous a nature, that he would not leaue his tutor Lysimachus behind him (who was so wery that he could goe no further) but bycause it was darke night, & for that the enemies were not farre from them, he came behind to encorage his tutor, and in maner to carie him. By this meanes, vnwares, he was farre from his armie with very few men about him, and benighted besides: moreouer it was very colde, and D the waie was very ill. At the length, perceyuing diuers fires which the enemies had made, some in one place, and some in an other, trusting to his valliantnes, hauing alwayes prouided remedie in extremitie, when the MACEDONIANS were distressed, him selfe euer putting to his owne hand: he ranne vnto them that had made the fires next him, and killing two of the barbarous people that laye by the fire side, he snatched awaye a fire brand, and ranne with it to his owne men, who made a great fire. At this the barbarous people were so afraid, that they ranne their waye as fast as they could. Other also thinking to come and sette vppon him, he slue them euery man, and so laye there that night, him selfe and his men without daunger. Thus Chares reporteth this matter. Now for the seege of TYRE, that fell out thus. Alexander caused the most parte of his armie to take rest, being ouerharried and E wearyed with so many battelles as they had fought: and sent a few of his men onely to geue assault vnto the citie, to kepe the TYRIANS occupied, that they should take no rest. One daye the soothesayer Aristander sacrifycing vnto the goddes, hauing considered of the signes of the intralles of the beastes: did assure them that were present, that the citie should be taken by the later ende of the moneth. Euery bodie laughed to heare him: for that daye was the very last daye of the moneth. Alexander seeing him amated, as one that could not tell what to saie to it, seeking euer to bringe those tokens to effect, which the soothesayers did prognosticate: commaunded them that they should not reckon that daye the thirtie day, but the seuen and twentie, and immediatly vpon it, made the trompet sounde the allarme, & geue a hotter assault to the walle, then he had thought to haue done before. They fought valliantly F on both sides, in so much as they that were left in the campe, could not kepe in, but must needs runne to thassault to helpe their companions. The TYRIANS seeing thassault so hot on euery side, their hartes began to faile them, and by this meanes was the citie taken the selfe same day.

An other time alſo, when Alexander was before GAZA, the chiefe citie of SYRIA, there fell a clodde of earth vpon his ſhoulder, out of the which there flewe a birde into the ayer. The birde lightinge apon one of the engines of his battrie, was cought with the nettes made of ſinewes which couered ouer the ropes of the engines. Ariſtander did prognoſticate, that it ſignified he ſhould be hurt in his ſhoulder, notwithſtāding, that he ſhould yet take the towne. And in deede ſo it came to paſſe. When he ſent great preſentes of ſpoiles which he wanne at the ſacke of this citie, vnto his mother Olympias, Cleopatra, and diuers others of his frendes, among other thinges, he ſent vnto Leonidas his gouernor, fiue hundred talentes waight of frankenſence, and a hundred talentes waight of myrre: remembring the hope he put him into when he was a childe. For, as Alexander was vpon a daye ſacrifycing vnto the goddes, he tooke both his handes full of frankenſence to caſt into the fire, to make a perfume thereof. When his gouernour Leonidas ſaw him, he ſaied thus vnto him: When thou haſt conquered the contrie where theſe ſweete thinges grow, then be liberall of thy perfume: but now, ſpare that litle thou haſt at this preſent. Alexander calling to minde at that time his admonition, wrote vnto him in this ſorte: we do ſend thee plenty of frankenſence & myrre, bicauſe thou ſhouldeſt no more be a niggard vnto the goddes. There was brought vnto him a litle coffer alſo, which was thought to be the precioueſt thinge and the richeſt, that was gotten of all the ſpoiles and riches, taken at the ouerthrow of Darius. When he ſaw it, he asked his familliers that were about him, what they thought fitteſt, and the beſt thinge to be put into it. Some ſaid one thinge, ſome ſaid an other thinge: but he ſaid, he would put the Iliades of Homer into it, as the worthieſt thinge. This is confirmed by the beſt hiſtoriographers. Now if that which the ALEXANDRIANS report vpon Heraclides wordes, be true: then it appeareth that he did profitte him ſelfe much by Homer in this iorney. For it is reported that when he had conquered ÆGYPT, he determined to builde a great citie, and to repleniſh it with a great nomber of GRÆCIANS, and to call it after his name. But as he was about to incloſe a certen ground, which he had choſen by thaduiſe of his enginers and workemaſters: the night before he had a maruelous dreame, that he ſawe an olde man ſtanding before him, full of white heares, with an honorable preſence, and comming towardes him ſaid theſe verſes.

Againſt the ſhore of Egypt, which of auncient Pharos hight.

Aſſoone as he roſe the next morning, he went to ſee this Ile of PHAROS, the which at that time was a litle aboue the mouth of the riuer of Nylus, called Canobia, howbeit it is now ioyned vnto firme lande, being forced by mans hand. This, he thought the meeteſt place that could be, to build the citie which he had determined. For it is as a tongue or a great barre of earth, broade enough, that ſeperateth a great lake on the one ſide, and the ſea on thother, the which doeth ioyne hard to a great hauen. Then he ſaid that Homer was wonderfull in all his thinges, but that amongeſt others, he was an excellent Architecture: and commaunded, that ſtraight they ſhould caſt the platforme of the citie, according to the ſituation of the place. Now they found at that time, no chalke, nor white earth there to marke withall, wherefore they were driuen to take meale, and with that did marke out vpon the earth being blacke the compaſſe of the towne that was round and circular, and being deuided into two equall partes, either of them reſembled the skirtes and facion of the MACEDONIAN cloke. Alexander liked this draught paſſingly well. But there roſe apon the ſodaine out of the riuer or lake, ſuch an infinite multitude of great fowle of all ſortes, that they couered the element as it had bene a clowde, and lighting within this circuite, did eate vp all the meale, and left not a crumme. Alexander liked not theſe ſignes. Notwithſtanding, his ſoothſayers bad him not be diſcouraged, for they told him it was a ſigne that he ſhould build a citie there, ſo plentifull of all thinges, that he ſhould mainteine all ſortes of people. Then he commaunded them, vnto whom he had geuen the charge of the building, that they ſhould goe forward with their worke, and he him ſelfe in the meane time, tooke his iorney to goe viſite the temple of Iupiter Hammon. The Iorney was long, and there were many troubles by the waie, but two daungers aboue all the reſt moſt ſpeciall. The firſt, lacke of water, by cauſe they had to trauell many

Alexanders iourney vnto the oracle of Hammon.

dayes

A dayes iorney through a great desert. The second was, the daunger of the rising of the southe winde by the waie, to blow the sand abroade, which was of a wonderfull length. And it is reported, that on a time there rose such a tempest in that desert, that blew vp whole hilles of sand, which slue fiftie thowsand men of Cambyses armie. Euery man in Alexanders traine did know these daungers very well: howbeit it was hard to dissuade Alexander from any thing which he had a desire vnto. For, fortune fauoring him in all his attemptes, made him constant and resolute in his determinations: and his noble corage besides, made him inuincible in all thinges he tooke in hand, in somuch as he did not only compell his enemies, but he had power also of time and place. In that voyage, in stead of these former daungers spoken of, he had many helpes, the which are supposed were sent him from the goddes, by the oracles B that followed afterwardes. For in a certen sorte, they haue beleued the oracles that were written of him. First of all, the wonderfull water and great showers that fell from the element did kepe him from feare of the first daunger, and did quenche their thirst, and moysted the drienes of the sand in such sorte, that there came a swete freshe ayer from it. Furthermore, when the markes were hidden from the guides to shew them the waie, and that they wandred vp and downe, they could not tell where: there came crowes vnto them that did guide them flying before them: flying fast when they saw them follow them, and stayed for them when they were behind. But Callisthenes writeth a greater wonder then this, that in the night time, with the very noise of the crowes, they brought them againe into the right waie which had lost their waie. Thus Alexander in thend, hauing passed through this wildernes, he came vnto C the temple he sought for: where, the prophet or chiefe priest saluted him from the god Hammon, as from his father. Then Alexander asked him, if any of the murtherers that had killed his father, were left aliue. The priest aunswered him, and bad him take heede he did not blaspheme, for his father was no mortall man. Then Alexander againe rehersing that he had spoken, asked him, if the murderers that had conspired the death of Philip his father were all punished. After that, he asked him touching his kingdome, if he would graunt him to be king ouer all the world. The god aunswered him by the mouth of his prophet, he should: and that the death of Philip was fully reuenged. Then did Alexander offer great presentes vnto the god, and gaue money large to the priests, & ministers of the temple. This is that the most parte of writers doe declare, touching Alexanders demaund, and the oracles geuen him. Yet did Alex- D xander him selfe write vnto his mother, that he had secret oracles from the god, which he would onely impart vnto her, at his retorne into MACEDON. Others saie also, that the prophet meaning to salute him in the Greeke tongue to welcome him the better, would haue said vnto him, O Paidion, as much as deere sonne: but that he tripped a litle in his tongue, by cause the Greeke was not his naturall tongue, and placed an s, for an n, in the latter ende, saying, O Pai dios, to wit, O sonne of Iupiter: and that Alexander was glad of that mistaking. Whereupon there ranne a rumor straight among his men, that Iupiter had called him his sonne. It is said also, that he heard Psammon the philosopher in EGYPT, and that he liked his E wordes very well, when he saide that god was king of all mortall men: For (q he) he that commaundeth all things, must needes be god. But Alexander selfe spake better, and like a philosopher, when he said: That god generally was father to all mortall men, but that particularly he did elect the best sorte for him selfe. To conclude, he shewed him selfe more arrogant vnto the barbarous people, and made as though he certainly beleued that he had bene begotten of some god: but vnto the GRÆCIANS he spake more modestly of diuine generation. For in a letter he wrote vnto the ATHENIANS touching the citie of SAMOS, he said: I gaue ye not that noble free citie, but it was geuen you, at that time by him whom they called my Lord & father: meaning Philip. Afterwardes also being striken with an arrow, and feeling great paine of it: My frendes said he, This blood which is spilt, is mans blood, and not as Homer said,

No such as from the immortall gods doth flowe.

And one day also in a maruelous great thunder, when euery man was afraid, Anaxarchus F the Rethoritian being present, said vnto him: O thou sonne of Iupiter, wilt thou doe as much? no said he, laughing on him, I will not be so fearefull to my frends, as thou wouldest haue me: disdaining the seruice of sishe to my borde, bycause thou seest not princes heades serued in.

The saying of Psammon the philosopher of the providẽce of God.

Alexander ascribeth godhead to himselfe.

And the report goeth also, that Alexander vpon a time sending a litle fishe vnto Hephestion, Anaxarchus should saye as it were in mockery, that they which aboue others seeke for fame with great trouble and hazard of life, haue either small pleasure in the world, or els as litle as others haue. By these proofes and reasons alleaged, we maie thinke that Alexander had no vaine nor presumptuous opinion of him selfe, to thinke that he was otherwise begotten of a god, but that he did it in policie to kepe other men vnder obedience, by the opinion conceiued of his godhead. Returning out of PHOENICIA into EGYPT, he made many sacrifices, feastes, and processions in honor of the goddes, sondry daunces, Tragedies, and such like pastimes goodly to behold: not onely for the sumptuous setting out of them, but also for the good will and diligence of the setters forth of them, which striued euery one to exceede the other. For the kings of the CYPRIANS were the setters of them forth, as at ATHENS they draw by lot a citizen of euery tribe of the people, to defraie the charges of these pastimes. These kinges were very earnest who should doe best, but specially Nitocreon, king of SALAMINE in CYPRVS: and Pasicrates, Lord of the citie of SOLES. For it fell to their lot to fourniish two of the excellentest plaiers, Pasicrates fournished Athenodorus, and Nicocreon Thessalus: whom Alexander loued singulerly well, though he made no shew of it, vntill that Athenodorus was declared victor, by the iudges deputed to geue sentence. For when he went from the plaies, he told them he did like the iudges opinion well, notwithstanding, he would haue bene contented to haue geuen the one halfe of his realme, not to haue seene Thessalus ouercome. Athenodorus being condemned vpon a time by the ATHENIANS, bycause he was not in ATHENS at the feastes of Bacchus, when the Comedies and Tragedies were plaied, and a fine set on his head for his absence: he besought Alexãder to write vnto them in his behalfe, that they would release his penalty. Alexander would not so doe, but sent thether his money whereof he was condemned, and paide it for him of his owne purse. Also when Lycon SCARPHIAN, an excellent stage player had pleased Alexander well, and did foiste in a verse in his comedy, containing a petition of tenne talents: Alexander laughing at it, gaue it him. Darius at that time wrote vnto Alexander, and vnto certen of his frendes also, to pray him to take tenne thousand tallentes for the raunsom of all those prisoners he had in his handes, and for all the contries, landes and signories on this side the riuer of Euphrates, and one of his daughters also in mariage, that from thence forth he might be his kinsman and frend. Alexander imparted this to his counsell. Amongest them Parmenio said vnto him: if I were Alexander, q he, surely I would accept this offer. So would I in deede, q Alexander againe, if I were Parmenio. In fine, he wrote againe vnto Darius, that if he would submit him selfe, he would vse him courteously: if not, that then he would presently marche towardes him. But he repented him afterwardes, when king Darius wife was dead with childe: For without dissimulation it greeued him much, that he had lost so noble an occasion to shew his courtesie and clemencie. This notwithstanding, he gaue her body honorable buriall, sparing for no cost. Amongest the Eunuches of the queenes chamber, there was one Tireus taken prisoner, among the women: who stealing out of Alexanders campe, taking his horse backe, rode vnto Darius to bring him newes of the death of his wife. Then Darius beating of his head, & weping bitterly, cried out alowd: Oh goddes! what wretched happe haue the PERSIANS? that haue not onely had the wife and sister of their king taken prisoners euen in his life time, but now that she is dead also in trauell of childe, she hath bene depriued of princely buriall? Then spake the Eunuch to him, and said: For her buriall, most gracious king, & for all due honor that might be wisshed her, PERSIA hath no cause to complaine of her hard fortune. For, neither did Queene Statira your wife whilest she liued prisoner, nor your mother, nor daughters, want any parte or iot of their honor they were wont to haue before, sauing onely to see the light of your honour, the which, god Oromasdes graunt to restore againe (if it be his will) vnto your maiestie: neither was there any honor wanting at her death (to set forth her stately funeralles) that might be gotten, but more, was lamented also with the teares of your enemies. For Alexander is as mercifull in victorie, as he is valliant in battell. Darius hearing the Eunuches wordes, being vexed in minde for very griefe: tooke the Eunuche aside into the secretest place of his tent, and said vnto him. If thou be not, with the misfortune of the PERSIANS, becomen a MACEDONIAN, but dooest in thy hart

Tireus reporte to Darius of Statiraes buriall.

Darius talke with Tireus the Eunuch,

A hast acknowledge Darius, for thy soueraine Lord and master: I pray thee, and I also coniure thee, by the reuerence thou beareſt vnto this bright light of the ſunne, and to the right hande of the king, that thou doe tell me truely. Are theſe the leaſt euills which I lament in Statira, her imprisonment and death? And did ſhe not in her life make vs more miſerable by her diſhonor, than if we had diſhonorably fallen into the hands of a cruell enemy? For, what honeſt communication I pray thee, can a young victorious Prince haue with his enemies wife a priſoner hauing done her ſo much honor as he hath done? Darius going on with theſe ſpeeches, Tireus the eunuch fell downe on his knees, & beſought him not to ſay ſo, neither to blemiſh the vertue of Alexander in that ſorte, nor yet ſo to diſhonor his ſiſter and wife deceaſed, and thereby alſo to depriue him ſelfe of the greateſt comfort he could wiſh to haue in this calamitie, which was, to be ouercome by an enemy that had greater vertues than a man could poſſibly haue: but rather that he ſhould wonder at Alexanders vertue, who had ſhewed him ſelfe chaſter to the Ladies, than valliant againſt the PERSIANS. And therewithall, the eunuch confirmed the great honeſty, chaſtity, and noble minde of Alexander, by many great and deepe othes. Then Darius comming out among his frendes againe, holding vp his handes vnto the heauens, made this prayer vnto the gods. O heauenly gods, creators of men, & protectors of kings and realmes: firſt, I beſeech you graunt me, that reſtoring the PERSIANS againe to their former good ſtate, I may leaue the realme vnto my ſucceſſors, with that glorie and fame I receiued it of my predeceſſors: that obtaining victory, I may vſe Alexander with that great honor and curteſie, which he hath in my miſery ſhewed vnto thoſe I loued beſt in the world. Or otherwiſe, if the time appointed be come, that the kingdom of PERSIA muſt nedes haue end, either through diuine reuenge, or by naturall chaunge of earthly things: Then, good goddes yet graunt, that none but Alexander after me, may ſit in Cyrus throne. Diuers writers do agree, that theſe things came euen thus to paſſe. Now Alexander hauing conquered all ASIA on this ſide of the riuer of Euphrates, he went to meete with Darius, that came downe with ten hundred thouſand fighting men. It was told him by ſome of his frendes to make him laugh, that the ſlaues of his army had deuided them ſelues in two parts, and had choſen them a Generall of either parte, naming the one Alexander, and the other Darius: and that at the firſt, they beganne to skirmiſh only with cloddes of earth, and afterwardes with ſtiftes, but at the laſt, they grew ſo hot, that they came to plaine ſtones and ſtaues, ſo that they could not be parted. Alexander hearing that, would nedes haue the two Generalls fight hand to hand one with the other: and Alexander ſelfe did arme him that was called Alexander, & Philotas the other which was called Darius. All the army thereupon was gathered together to ſee this combat betweene the, as a thing that did betoken good or ill lucke to come. The fight was ſharp betweene them, but in thend, he that was called Alexander ouercame the other: and Alexander to reward him, gaue him twelue villages, with priuiledge to goe after the PERSIAN manet. Thus it is written by Eratoſthenes. The great battell that Alexander fought with Darius, was not (as many writers report) at Arbeles, but at Gauſameles, which ſignifieth in the PERSIAN tongue, the houſe of the cammell. For ſome one of the auncient kings of PERSIA that had ſcaped from the handes of his enemies, flying vpon a drumbledary cammell, lodged him in that place, and therefore appointed the reuenues of certaine villages to keepe the cammell there. There fell out at that time an eclipſe of the moone, in the moneth called Boedromion (now Auguſt) about the time that the feaſt of the miſteries was celebrated at ATHENS. The eleuenth night after that, both their armies being in ſight of the other, Darius kept his men in battell ray, and went him ſelfe by torche light viewing his bandes and companies. Alexander on thother ſide whileſt his MACEDONIAN ſouldiers ſlept, was before his tent with Ariſtander the Soothſayer, and made certaine ſecret ceremonies and ſacrifices vnto Apollo. The auncient Captaines of the MACEDONIANS, ſpecially Parmenio, ſeeing all the vallie betwixt the riuer of Niphates, and the mountaines of the GORDIEIANS, all on a bright light with the fires of the barbarous people, and hearing a dreadfull noiſe as of a confuſed multitude of people that filled their campe with the ſound thereof: they were amazed, and conſulted, that in one day it was in maner vnpoſſible to fight a battell with ſuch an incredible multitude of people. Thereupon they went vnto Alexander after he had ended his ceremonies, and did counſell him to geue battell by night, bicause the darkenes thereof should helpe to keepe all feare from his men, which the sight of their enemies would bring them into. But then he gaue them this notable aunswere: I will not steale victorie, quoth he. This aunswere seemed very fonde and arrogant to some, that he was so pleasaunt, being neere so great daunger. Howebeit others thinke that it was a present noble corage, and a deepe consideration of him, to thinke what should happen: thereby to geue Darius no maner of occasion (if he were ouercomen) to take hart againe, and to proue an other battell, accusing the darkenes of the night as cause of his ouerthrow: as he had done at the first conflict, imputing his ouerthrowe to the mountaines, the straights, and the sea. For, sayd he, Darius will neuer leaue to make warres with vs for lacke of men, nor munition, hauing so large a realme as he hath, & such a world of people besides: but then he will no more hasard battell, when his hart is done, and all hope taken from him, and that he seeth his army at noone dayes ouerthrowen by plaine battell. After his Captaines were gone from him, he went into his tent, and layed him downe to sleepe, and slept all that night more soundly than he was wont to doe before: insomuch as the Lordes and Princes of his campe comming to waite apon him at his vprising, marueled when they found him so sounde a sleepe, and therefore of them selues they commaunded the souldiers to eate. Afterwards, perceiuing that time came fast apon them, Parmenio went into Alexanders chamber, and comming to his bedde side, called him twise or thrise by his name, till at the last he waked him, and asked him how it chaunced that he slept so long, like one that had already ouercome, & that did not thinke he should fight as great and daungerous a battell as euer he did in his life. Why, sayd Alexander laughing on him: doest thou not thinke we haue already ouercomen, being troubled no more with running after Darius vp and downe a contrie vtterly destroyed, as we should otherwise haue bene compelled to haue done, if he would not haue comen to battell, and destroyed the contrie before vs? Now Alexander did not only shew him selfe before the battell, but euen at the very instant of battell, a noble man of corage, and of great iudgement. For Parmenio leading the left wing of his battell, the men of armes of the BACTRIANS gaue such a fierce onset vpon the MACEDONIANS, that they made them geue backe: and Mazeus also, king Darius Lieutenant, sent certaine troupes of horsemen out of their battell, to geue charge vpon them that were left in the campe to garde the cariage. Parmenio being amazed with either of both attempts, sent immediatly to aduertise Alexander, that all their campe and cariage would be lost, if he did not send presently to aide the rereward. When these newes came to Alexander from Parmenio, he had already geuen the signall of battell vnto his men for to geue charge. Whereupon he aunswered the messenger that brought him these newes, that he should tell Parmenio he was a mad man and out of his wits, not remembring that if they wanne the battell, they should not only saue their owne cariage, but also winne the cariage of their enemies: & if it were their chaunce to lose it, then that they should not neede to care for their cariage, nor for their slaues, but only to thinke to dye honorably, valliantly fighting for his life. Hauing sent this message vnto Parmenio, he put on his helmet. The rest of his armor for his body, he had put it on before in his tent, which was, a SICILIAN cassocke, and vpon that a brigandine made of many foldes of canuas with oylet holes, which was gotten among the spoyles at the battell of ISSVS. His head peece was as bright as siluer, made by Theophilus the armorer: his coller sutelike to the same, all set full of pretious stones, and he had a sword by his side, marueious light, and of excellent temper, which the king of the CITIBIANS had geuen him, vsing commonly to fight with his sword at any set battel. His coate armor was marueious rich, and of sumptuous workemanshippe, farre aboue all the rest he ware. It was of the workemanshippe of Hellicon, the which the RHODIANS gaue him for a present, and this he commonly wore when he went to battell. Now when he did set his men in battell ray, or made any oration vnto them, or did ryde alongest the bands to take view of them: he alwayes vsed to ryde vpon an other horse to spare Bucephal, bicause he was then somewhat olde: notwithstanding, when he ment in deede to fight, then Bucephal was brought vnto him, and as soone as he was gotten vp on his backe, the tromper sounded, & he gaue charge. Then, after he had made long exhortacions to incorage the men of armes of the THESSALIANS, and the other GRECIANS also, and when they had all promised him they would sticke to him like men, and prayed him

A to lead them, and geue charge vppon the enemies: he tooke his launce in his left hande, and holding vp his right hande vnto heauen, besought the goddes (as Callisthenes writeth) that if it were true, he was begotten of Iupiter, that it would please them that day to helpe him, and to encorage the GRÆCIANS. The Soothsayer Aristander was then a horsebacke hard by Alexander, apparelled all in white, & a crowne of gold on his head, who shewed Alexander when he made his prayer, an Eagle flying ouer his head, and pointing directly towards his enemies. This maruelously encoraged all the armie that saw it, and with this ioy, the men of armes of Alexanders side, encoraging one an other, did set spurres to their horse to charge apon the enemies. The battell of the footemen of the PERSIANS, beganne a litle to geue way, and before the foremest could come to geue them charge, the barbarous people turned their backs, B and fled. The chase was great, Alexander driuing them that fled vppon the middest of their owne battell, where Darius selfe was in person. He spied him a farre of ouer the foremest rankes in the middest of his battel, being a goodly tall Prince, standing in a charriot of warre, compassed in rounde with great troupes of horsemen, all set in goodly ordinaunce to receiue the enemy. But when they saw Alexander at hand with so grimme a looke, chasing them that fled, through those that yet kept their ranks: there fell such a feare among them, that the most parte dispersed them selues. Notwithstanding, the best and most valliantest men fought it out to the death before their king, and falling dead one apon an other, they did let them that the enemies could not so well follow Darius. For they lying one by an other on the ground, drawing on to the last gaspe, did yet take both men and horses by the legges to hinder them. Darius C then seeing nothing but terror and destruction before his eyes, and that the bandes which he had set before him for safegard, came backe vpon him, so as he could not deuise how to turne his charriot forward nor backward, the wheeles were so hindered and stayed with the heapes of dead bodies, and that the horse also being set apon and hidde in maner in this conflict, fell to leapinge and plunginge for feare, so that the charrettiers coulde no lenger guide nor driue them: he got vp vpon a mare that lately had fole, and so saued him selfe flying apon her. And yet had he not thus escaped, had not Parmenio once againe sent vnto Alexander to pray him to come and aide him: bicause there was yet a great squadron whole together that made no countenaunce to flie. Somewhat there was in it, that they accused Parmenio that day to haue delt but slackely and cowardly, either bicause his age had taken his corage from him, or else D for that he enuied Alexanders greatnes and prosperity, who against his will became ouer great as Callisthenes sayd. In fine, Alexander was angry with the second message, and yet told not his men truely the cause why, but faining that he would haue them leaue killing, and bicause also night came on: he caused the trompet sound retreate, and so went towards his army, whom he thought to be in distresse. Notwithstanding, newes came to him by the way, that in that place also, they had geuen the enemies the ouerthrowe, and that they fled euery way for life. The battell hauing this successe, euery man thought that the kingdom of the PERSIANS was vtterly ouerthrowen, and that Alexander likewise was become only king of all ASIA: whereupon he made sumptuous sacrifices vnto the goddes, and gaue great riches, houses, lands and possessions vnto his frendes and familliars. Furthermore, to shewe his liberalitie also vnto the E GRÆCIANS, he wrote vnto them, that he would haue all tyrannies suppressed through out all GRÆCE, and that all the GRÆCIANS should liue at libertie vnder their owne lawes. Particularly also he wrote vnto the PLATÆIANS, that he woulde reedifie their citie againe, bicause their predecessors in time past, had geuen their contrie vnto the GRÆCIANS, to fight against the barbarous people for the defence of the common libertie of all GRÆCE. He sent also into ITALIE vnto the CROTONIANS, parte of the spoyle, to honor the memory of the valliantnes, and good will of Phayllus their citizen, who in the time of the warres with the MEDES, (when all the GRÆCIANS that dwelt in ITALIE had forsaken their naturall contrie men of GRÆCE it selfe, bicause they thought they could not otherwise scape) went with a shippe of his vnto SALAMINA, which he armed and set forth at his owne charges, bicause he would be at the bat- F tell and partake also of the common daunger with the GRÆCIANS: such honor did Alexander beare vnto prowes, that he loued to reward & remember the worthy deedes of men. Then Alexander marching with his army into the contry of BABYLON, they all yelded straight vnto him. When he came into the contrie of the ECBATANIANS, he marueled when he saw an opening of the earth, out of the which there came continuall sparkes of fire as out of a well: & that hard by also the earth spued out continually a kinde of *mawnd or chalkie clay somwhat lyquid, of such aboundaunce, as it seemed like a lake. This maund or chalke is like vnto a kind of lyme or clay, but it is so easie to be sette a fire, that not touching it with any flame, by the brightnes only of the light that commeth out of the fire, it is set afire, & doth also set the ayer a fire which is betwene both. The barbarous people of that contrie, being desirous to shewe Alexander the nature of that Naptha, scattered the streete that led to his lodging, with some of it. Then the day being shut in, they fired it at one of the endes, and the first droppes taking fire, in the twinckling of an eye, all the rest from one end of the streete to the other was of a flame, and though it was darke and within night, lightned all the place thereabout. Alexander being in bath at that time, and waited apon by a page called Steuen: (a hard fauored boy, but yet that had an excellent sweete voyce to sing) one Athenophanes an ATHENIAN, that alwayes nointed & bathed the king, & much delighted him with his pleasaunt conceites, asked him if he would see the triall of this Naptha apon Steuen: for if the fire tooke and went not out, then he would say it had a wonderfull force, and was vnquencheable. The page was contented to haue it proued apon him. But so soone as they had layed it on him, and did but touche it only, it tooke straight of such a flame, and so fired his body, that Alexander him selfe was in a maruelous perplexitie withall. And sure had it not bene by good happe, that there were many by ready with vessells full of water to put into the bath, it had bene vnpossible to haue saued the boy from being burnt to nothing: and yet so he escaped narrowly, and besides was sicke long after. Now some apply this Naptha vnto the fable of Medea, saying that therwith she rubbed the crowne and lawne she gaue vnto the daughter of Creon at her mariage, so much spoken of in the tragedies. For neither the crowne nor the lawne could cast fire of them selues, neither did the fire light by chaunce. But by oyling them with this Naptha she wrought a certaine aptnes to receiue more forcibly the operation of the fire, which was in place where the bride sate. For the beames which the fire casteth out, haue ouer some bodies no other force, but to heet and lighten them. But such as haue an oyly drie humor, and thereby a simpathy and proportionable conformitie with the nature of the fire: it easily enflameth and setteth a fire, by the forcible impression of his beames. Howbeit they make a great question of the cause of this naturall force of Naptha,* or whether this liquid substance and moyst humor that taketh fire so easily, doth come of the earth that is fatty and apt to conceiue fire. For this contrie of BABYLON is very hot, insomuch as oftentimes barley being put into the ground, it bloweth it vp againe, as if the earth by vehement inflammacion had a strong blast to cast it out: and men in the extreamest heate of the sommer, doe sleepe there, vpon great leather budgets filled full of fresh water. Harpalus, whom Alexander left there his Lieutenaunt & Gouernor of that contry, desiring to set forth and beawtifie the gardens of the kings pallace & walkes of the same, with all maner of plantes of GREECE: he brought all the rest to good passe, sauing Iuie only, which the earth could neuer abide, but it euer dyed, bicause the heate and temper of the earth killed it, and the Iuie of it selfe liketh fresh ayer and a cold ground. This digression is somwhat from the matter, but peraduenture the reader will not thinke it troublesome, howe hard soeuer he finde it, so it be not ouer tedious. Alexander hauing wonne the city of SVSA, he found within the castell foure thowsand talentes in ready coyne, gold and siluer, besides other infinite treasure and inestimable, amongest the which (it is sayd) he found to the value of fiue thousand talentes weight of * purple HERMIONA silke which they had safe locked vp & kept the space of two hundred yeres saue ten, and yet the colour kept as freshe as if it had bene newly made. Some say that the cause why it was so well kept, came by meanes of the dying of it, with Iuie, in silkes which before had bene dyed redde, and with white oyle in white silkes. For, there are silkes seene of that colour of as long a time, that keepe colour as well as the other. Plinie writeth furthermore, that the kinges of PERSIA made water to be brought from the riuers of Nylus and Ister (otherwise called Danubie) which they did locke vp with their other treasure for a confirmation of the greatnes of their Empire, and to shew that they were Lordes of the world. The wayes to enter into PERSIA being very hard of passage, and in maner vnpassable, (both

A (both for the illnes of the wayes, as alſo for the gard that kept them, which were the choiſeſt men of PERSIA) Darius alſo being fled thither: there was one that ſpake the Greeke and PERSIAN tongue (whoſe father was borne in the contry of LYCIA, & his mother a PERSIAN) that guided Alexander into PERSIA, by ſome compaſſe fetched about not very long, according to the Oracles aunſwere of Alexander geuen by the mouth of Nunne Pythias, when he was a child: that a LYCIAN ſhould guide and lead him againſt the PERSIANS. There was then great ſlaughter made in PERSIA of the priſoners that were taken. For Alexander him ſelfe wryteth, that he commaunded the men ſhould be put to the ſword, thinking that the beſt way to ſerue his turne. It is ſayd alſo, that there he found a maruelous treaſure of gold and ſiluer in readie money, as he had done before in the citie of SVSA: the which he caried away with all the reſt B of the kinges rich wardroppe, and with it laded tenne thowſande moyles, and fiue thowſande cammells. Alexander entring into the caſtell of the chiefe citie of PERSIA, ſaw by chaunce a great image of Xerxes lye on the ground, the which vnwares was throwen downe by the multitude of the ſouldiers that came in, thronging one apon an other. Thereupon he ſtayed, and ſpake vnto it as if it had bene aliue, ſaying: I can not tell whether I ſhould paſſe by thee, and let thee lye, for the warre thou madeſt ſomtime againſt the GRÆCIANS: or whether I ſhould lift thee vp, reſpecting the noble minde & vertues thou haddeſt. In thend, when he had ſtoode mute a long time, conſidering of it, he went his way: and meaning to refreſh his weary army, bicauſe it was the winter quarter, he remained there foure monethes together. The reporte goeth, that the firſt time that Alexander ſate vnder the cloth of ſtate of king Darius, all of rich C golde: Demarathus CORINTHIAN (who firſt beganne to loue him euen in his father Philippes time) burſt out in teares for ioy, good old man, ſaying that the GRÆCIANS long time dead before, were depriued of this bleſſed happe, to ſee Alexander ſet in king Xerxes princely chaier. After that, preparing againe to goe againſt Darius, he would needes make mery one day, and refreſh him ſelfe with ſome bancket. It chaunced ſo, that he with his companions was bidden to a priuate feaſt priuately, where was aſſembled ſome fine curtiſans of his familiars who with their frendes taried at the banket. Amongeſt them was that famous Thais, borne in the contry of ATTICA, & then concubine to Ptolomy, king of ÆGYPT after Alexanders death. She finely praiſing Alexander, and partely in ſporting wiſe, began to vtter matter in affection of her contrie, but yet of greater importance than became her mouth: ſaying, that that day ſhe founde D her ſelfe fully recompenced to her great good liking, for all the paines ſhe had take, trauelling through all the contries of ASIA, following of his armie, now that ſhe had this fauor & good happe to be mery and pleaſaunt, in the prowde and ſtately pallace of the great kings of PERSIA. But yet it would doe her more good, for a recreation, to burne Xerxes houſe with the fire of ioy, who had burnt the city of ATHENS: and her ſelfe to geue the fire to it, before ſo noble a Prince as Alexander. Bicauſe euer after it might be ſaid, that the women following his campe, had taken more noble reuenge of the PERSIANS, for the wronges and iniuries they had done vnto GRÆCE: than all the Captaines of GRÆCE that euer were had done, either by lande or ſea. When ſhe had ſayd, Alexanders familiars about him, clapped their hands, and made great noiſe for ioy, ſaying: that it were as good a deede as could be poſſible, and perſwaded Alexan- E der vnto it. Alexander yeelding to their perſwaſions, roſe vp, and putting a garland of flowers apon his head, went formeſt him ſelfe: and all his familliars followed after him, crying and dauncing all about the caſtell. The other MACEDONIANS hearing of it alſo, came thither immediatly with torches light and great ioy, hoping that this was a good ſigne that Alexander ment to returne againe into MACEDON, and not to dwell in the contrie of the barbarous people, ſith he did burne and deſtroy the kings caſtell. Thus, and in this ſorte it was thought to be burnt. Some writers thinke otherwiſe: that it was not burnt with ſuch ſport, but by determination of the counſell. But howſoeuer it was, all they graunt, that Alexander did preſently repent him, and commaunded the fire to be quenched ſtraight. For his liberality, that good will and readines to geue, increaſed with his conqueſtes: and when he did beſtowe giftes of any, F he would beſides his gift euer geue them good countenance, on whom he beſtowed his grace and fauor. And here I will recite a few examples thereof. Ariſto being Collonell of the PAEONIANS, hauing ſlaine one of his enemies, he brought him his head, and ſayd: ſuch a preſent,

O king, by vs, is euer rewarded with a cuppe of golde. Yea, q. Alexander, ſmyling apon him: A with an emptie cuppe. But I drinke to thee this cuppe full of good wine, and doe geue thee cuppe & all. An other time, he met with a poore MACEDONIAN that led a moyle loden with gold of the kings: and when the poore moyle was ſo weary that ſhe could no lenger cary her burden, the moyleter put it apon his owne backe, and loded him ſelfe withall, carying it ſo a good pretie way: howbeit in thende being ouerloden, was about to throwe it downe on the ground. Alexander perceiuing it, asked him what burden he caried. When it was tolde him well, q. he to the moyletter, be not weary yet, but carie it into the tent, for I geue it thee. To be ſhort, he was angrier with them that would take nothing of him, then he was with thoſe that would aske him ſomewhat. He wrote alſo vnto Phocion, that he would take him no more for his frend, if he would refuſe his giftes. It ſeemed that he had geuen nothing vnto a young B boy called Serapion (who euer did ſerue them the ball that played at tenis) bicauſe he asked him nothing. Wherefore, the king playing on a time, this young boy threw the ball to others that played with him, and not to him ſelfe. The king marueling at it, at the length ſayd vnto him:
why, my boy, doeſt thou not geue me the ball? Bicauſe your maieſtie doth not aske it me, q.
he. Alexander then vnderſtanding his meaning, laughed at the boy, & did much for him afterwards. There was attending on him alſo one Proteas, a pleaſaunt conceited man, & that could ſlent finely. It chaunced vpon ſome occaſion that Alexander fell out with him: whereuppon ſome of his frends were interceſſors to the king for him, & beſought him to pardon him: and Proteas him ſelfe alſo being preſent, craued pardon with teares in his eyes. Alexander thereupon forgaue him. Then pleaſauntly replied Proteas, I deſire it may pleaſe your grace, that I C may receiue ſome teſtimonie to aſſure me I am in your fauor. Thereuppon the king ſtraight commaunded one to geue him fiue talents. The goods and riches he gaue vnto his familliars and gard about him, were very great, as it appeareth plainly by a letter which his mother Olympias wrote vnto him, to this effect: I know thou ſpareſt not to geue thy frends large giftes, and that thou makeſt much of them: but thereby thou makeſt them kings fellowes, they get many frendes, and leaue the poſte alone without any. His mother did many times write ſuch like matters vnto him, the which Alexander kept very ſecret, ſauing one day when he opened one of them, Hephæſtion being preſent drew neere, and red the letter with him, as he was wont to do. Alexander did let him alone, but when he had red it, he plucked the ſeale of armes from his finger, wherewith he did vſe to ſeale his letters, and put it to Hephæſtions mouth. He gaue D alſo vnto the ſonne of Mazeus, (that was the chiefeſt man about Darius) a ſeconde gouernment, beſides that which he had before, and greater than the firſt. This young noble man re-fuſed it, ſaying: why, and it pleaſe your grace, before there was but one Darius, but you now make many Alexanders. He gaue vnto Parmenio alſo, Bagoas houſe, where (as is reported) he found a thowſand talents worth, of the ſpoyles and goods of the SVSIANS. He wrote alſo vnto Antipater, that he ſhould keepe a gard about his perſon, for he had many enemies that lay in waite for him. He did ſend alſo many goodly preſents vnto his mother, but withall he wrote vnto her, that ſhe would meddle no more with his matters nor gifts, taking vpon her the office of a Captaine. She ſtorming at it, he paciently did brooke her anger. Antipater an other time, wryting a long letter vnto him againſt his mother Olympias, when he had red it ouer: loe, ſaid E he, Antipater knoweth not, that one teare of the mothers eye will wipe out tenne thowſande ſuch letters. Furthermore, Alexander perceiuing on a time, that his frendes became very diſ-ſolute & licentious in dyet and life, and that Agnon TEIAN had his corked ſhooes nayled with ſiluer nayles, that Leonatus alſo cauſed diuers cammells to be loden amongeſt his cariage with powder of ÆGYPT, to put apon him when he wreſtled or vſed any other exerciſe of body: & that alſo they caried after Philotas, toyles for chaſe and hunting, of a hundred furlong long, and that there were alſo that vſed pretious perfumes & ſwete ſauors when they bathed themſelues, more then there were that rubbed them ſelues with plaine oyle, and that they had fine chamberlaines to rubbe them in the bath, and to make their beddes ſoft and delicate: he wiſely and curteouſly rebuked them and ſayd. I maruell, ſayd he, that you which haue fought in ſo F often and great battells, doe not remember that they which trauell, doe ſleepe more ſweete and ſoundly, than they that take their eaſe and doe nothing: and that you doe not marke, that comparing

A comparing your life, with the manner of the life of the PERSIANS, to liue at pleasure is a vile thinge, and to trauell is Princely. And howe I pray you, can a man take paine to dresse his owne horse, or to make cleane his launce or helmet, that for slothfull curiosities sake, disdaineth to rubbe his owne bodie with his fine fingers? Are you ignorant, that the type of honor in all our victorie consisteth, in scorning to doe that which we see them doe, whom we haue vanquished and ouercome? To bring them therefore by his example, to acquaint them selues with hardnes: he tooke more paines in warres and in hunting, and did hazard him selfe more daungerously, then euer he had done before. Whereuppon an Ambassador of LACEDÆMON being present to see him fight with a Lyon, and to kill him, sayd vnto him: truely your grace hath fought well with this Lyon, and tried which of you two should be king. Craterus after B that, caused this hunting to be set vp in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES: where are the images of the Lyon, of the dogges, and of the king fighting with the Lyon, and of him selfe also that came to helpe him, all those images being of copper, some made by Lysippus, the rest by Leochares. Thus Alexander did put him selfe vnto all iuberdies, as well to exercise his strength and corage, as also to allure his men to doe the like. This notwithstanding, his frendes and familiars hauing wealth at will, as men exceeding riche, they would needes liue delicately and at ease, and woulde take no more paines, misliking vtterly to goe vp and downe the contries to make warre here and there: and thereuppon beganne a litle to finde fault with Alexander, and to speake euill of him. Which at the first Alexander tooke quietly, saying, that it was honor for a king to suffer him selfe to be slaundered and ill spoken of, for doing of good. And yet the C least good turnes he did vnto his frendes, did shewe his hartie loue and honor he bare them, as shall appeare vnto you by some examples that followe. Peucestas being bitten by a beare, did let his frendes vnderstande it by letters, but he wrote nothing thereof vnto Alexander. Alexander was offended therewith, and wrote vnto him thus. Sende me worde at the least yet how thou doest, and whether any of thy fellowes did forsake thee at the hunting, to thende they may be punished. Hephestion being absent about certaine businesse he had, Alexander wrote vnto him, that as they were hunting a beast called Ichnewmon, Craterus vnfortunately crossinge Perdiccas darte, was striken through both his thighes. Peucestas being cured of a great disease, Alexander wrote vnto Alexippus his Phisitian that had cured him, and gaue him thankes. Craterus also being sicke, he dreamed of him one night, and therefore made certaine D sacrifices for the recouerie of his health, and sent vnto him, willing him to doe the like. And when the Phisitian Pausanias ment to geue him a drinke of Eelleborum, he wrote letters vnto him, telling him what daunger he was in, and prayed him to be carefull how he receiued that medicine. He did also put Ephialtes and Cissus in prison, who brought him the first newes of Harpalus flying, bicause they did wrongfully accuse & slaũder him. When he had cõmaunded there should be a bill made of all the olde mens names, and diseased persones that were in his campe, to sende them home againe into their contry: there was one Eurylochus ÆGEIAN that made his name be billed among the sicke persons, & it was found afterwardes that he was not sicke, and confessed that he did it only to follow a young woman called Telesippa, with whom he was in loue, who was returning homewardes towardes the sea side. Alexander asked him, E whether this woman were free or bond: he answered him, that she was a curtisan free borne. Then sayd Alexander vnto Eurylochus, I would be glad to further thy loue, yet I can not force her to tarie: but seeke to winne her by giftes and fayer wordes to be contented to tarie, sithence she is a free woman. It is a wonderfull thing to see what paines he would take, to write for his frendes, euen in such trifles as he did. As, when he wrote into CILICIA for a seruaunt of Seleucus that was fled from his master, sending straight commaundement, that they should carefully lay for him. And by an other letter he commendeth Peucestas, for that he had stayed and taken one Nicon, a slaue of Craterus. And by one other letter also vnto Megabizus, touching an other bondman that had taken sanctuarie in a temple: he commaunded him also to seeke to intise him out of the sanctuarie, to laye hold on him if he could, but otherwise not to F meddle with him in any case. It is sayd also, that at the first when he vsed to sit in iudgement to heare criminall causes, whilest the accuser went on with his complaint and accusation: he alwayes vsed to lay his hande vppon one of his eares to keepe that cleane from the matter of accusation, thereby reseruing it to heare the purgacion and iustificacion of the person condemned. But afterwardes, the number of accusations that were brought before him, did so prouoke and alter him, that he did beleue the false accusations, by the great number of the true that were brought in. But nothinge put him more in rage, then when he vnderstoode they had spoken ill of him: and then he was so fierce, as no pardon would be graunted, for that he loued his honor, more then his kingdome or life. Then at that time he went against Darius, thinking that he ment to fight againe: but vnderstanding that Bessus had taken him, then he gaue the THESSALIANS leaue to departe home into their contrie, and gaue them two thowsand talentes, ouer and aboue their ordinarie pay. Alexander had then a marueilous long, hard, and painefull iorney in following of Darius: for in eleuen dayes, he rode three thowsande three hundred furlong, insomuch as the most parte of his men were euen wearie, and done, for lacke of water. It chaunced him one day to meete with certaine MACEDONIANS that caried (vppon moyles) goate skinnes full of water, which they had fetched from a riuer. They seeing Alexander in manner deade for thirst, being about noone ranne quickely to him, and in a headpeece brought him water. Alexander asked them, to whom they caried this water. They answered him againe, that they caried it to their children, but yet we would haue your grace to liue: for though we lose them, we may get more children. When they had sayd so, Alexander tooke the helmet with water, and perceiuing that the men of armes that were about him, and had followed him, did thrust out their neckes to looke vpon this water, he gaue the water backe againe vnto them that had geuen it him, and thanked them, but dranke none of it. For, sayd he, if I drinke alone, all these men here will faint. Then they seeing the noble corage and curtesie of Alexander, cried out that he should lead them: and therewithall beganne to spurre their horses, saying, that they were not wearie nor a thirst, nor did thinke them selues mortall, so long as they had such a king. Euerie man was a like willing to followe Alexander, yet had he but three score only that entred with him into the enemies campe. There, passinge ouer much golde and siluer which was scattered abroade in the market place, and going also by many charriottes full of women and children, which they found in the fields, flying away at all aduenture: they ranne vpon the spurre vntill they had ouertaken the foremost that fled, thinking to haue founde Darius amongest them. But at the length, with much a doe, they founde him layed along in a coche, hauing many woundes vpon his bodie, some of darts and some speares. So, he being almost at the last cast, called for some drinke, and dranke colde water, which Polystratus gaue him. To whom when he had dronke, he sayd: this is my last mishappe, my frend, that hauing receiued this pleasure, I can not requite thee: howbeit Alexander will recompence thee, and the goddes, Alexander, for the liberalitie and curtesie which he hath shewed vnto my wife and children, whom I pray thee embrace for my sake. At these last wordes, he tooke Polystratus by the hande, and so gaue vp the goast. Alexander came immediatly after, and plainely shewed that he was sorie for his death and misfortune: and vndoing his owne cloke, he cast it vpon the body of Darius. After that, hauing by good happe gotten Bessus into his hands, he tare him in peces with two high straight trees which he bowed downewards, and tied his legges to eche of them: so that when the trees were let goe, they gaue a sodaine cruell ierke vp and caried either tree, a peece of his bodie with it. Then Alexander hauing geuen Darius corse Princely buriall, and embalned him: he sent it vnto his mother, and receiued his brother Exathres for one of his frendes. From thence he went into the contrie of HYRCANIA with all the flower of his armie, where he sawe the gulfe of the sea Caspium, which he thought of no lesse greatnesse, then the sea of PONTVS, howbeit calmer then the other seas be. He could not then certainly finde out what it was, nor from whence it came: but of likelyhoode he thought it was some breaking out of the lake or marrish of Meotin. Yet some auncient naturall Philosophers seemed to know truely what it was. For many yeares before Alexanders voyage and conquest, they wrote, that of the foure chiefest gulfes of the sea that commeth from the Ocean, and doe entre within maine land, that which is most northerly, is the sea Caspium, which they call also Hyrcanium. As Alexander went through the contrie, certaine barbarous people sodainely sette vppon them that led Bucephal his horse, and tooke him: but with that he was in such a rage, that

A that he sent a Heraulde into their contrie to proclaime open warres vppon them, and that he would put man, woman, and childe to the sword, if they brought him not his horse againe. Whereuppon, when his horse was returned home, and that they yeelded vp their cities and fortes into his handes: he did vse them all very curteously, and moreouer did gene them mo-ney for the raunsome of his horse, which they restored. Departing thence, he entred into the contrie of PARTHIA. There hauinge leasure enough, he beganne to apparell him selfe after the facion of the barbarous people, bicause he thought thereby the better to winne the harts of the contriemen, framing him selfe vnto their owne facions: or else to trye the hartes of the MACEDONIANS, to see how they would like the maner of the PERSIANS (which he ment to bring them vnto) in reuerencing of him as they did their king, by litle and litle acquainting B them to allow the alteracion and chaunge of his life. This notwithstanding, he would not at the first take vp the apparell of the MEDES, which was verie straunge, and altogether barba-rous. For he went not without briches, nor did weare a long gowne trailing on the grounde, nor a high coptan cap hatte, but tooke a meane apparell betwext the MEDES & the PERSIANS, more modest then theirs, and more costly than the last: and yet at the first he did not weare it, but when he would talke with the barbarous people, or else priuately amongest his frendes and familliars. Afterwards notwithstanding, he shewed him selfe openly to the people in that apparel, when he gaue them audience. This sight grieued the MACEDONIANS much, but they had his vertues in such admiration, that they thought it meete in some things he should take his owne pleasure, sithence he had bene often hurt in the warres, and not long before had his C legge broken with an arrow, and an other time, had such a blow with a stone full in his necke, that it made him spurre blinde a great while after, and yet neuertheless he neuer eschewed any bodely daunger. For he passed ouer the riuer of Orexartes, which he tooke to be Tanais, and hauinge in battell ouerthrowen the SCYTHIANS, he followed them in chase about a hundred furlong, notwithstanding that at that instant he had a loosenesse of bodie. Thither came vnto him (as it is reported) the Queene of the AMAZONES, as many wryters doe testi-fie: among the which are these, Clitarchus, Polycritus, Onesicritus, Antigenes, and Hister. But Chares, Ptolomy, Anticlides, & Philon THEBAN, Philip the historiographer, Hecateus ERETRIAN, Philip CHALCIDIAN, and Duris SAMIAN, all these doe wryte that it was not true: and it see-meth also that Alexander selfe doth confirme it. For, wryting all things particularly vnto *An-*D tipater as they happened vnto him, he wrote vnto him that the king of SCYTHIA offered him his daughter in mariage: but there he maketh no mencion at all of any AMAZON. It is also sayd, that Onesicritus long time after that did reade vnto king Lysimachus, the fourth booke of his historie, where he did speake of the AMAZON. Lysimachus smyling, sayd vnto him: Why, and where was I then? But for that matter, to credit or not credit it, Alexander's estimacion thereby is neither impayred nor aduaunced. Furthermore, Alexander fearing that the MA-CEDONIANS, being wearie with this long warre, would goe no further: he left all the rest of his armie behinde, and tooke only twentie thowsande footemen, and three thowsand horse-men of the choycest men of his armie, and with them inuaded the contrie of HYRCANIA. There he made an oration vnto them, and told them, that the barbarous people of ASIA had E but seene them as it were in a dreame, and if they should now returne backe into MACEDON, hauing but onely sturred them, and not altogether subdued ASIA: the people offended with them, woulde sette vppon them as they went home, as if they were no better than women. Neuertheless, he gaue any man leaue to returne that would, protesting therewith against them that would goe, how they did forsake him, his frends, and those who had so good harts towards him, as to follow him in so noble a iorney, to conquer the whole earth vnto the MA-CEDONIANS. This selfe matter is reported thus in a letter which Alexander wrote vnto Anti-pater: and there he wryteth furthermore, that hauing made this oration vnto them, they all cried out, and bad him leade them into what parte of the world he would. When they had graunted their good wills, it was no hard matter afterwards, to winne the rest of the common F sorte who followed the example of the chiefest. Thereuppon he did frame him selfe the more to liue after the facion of the contrie there, and enterchaungeablie also to bring the men of that contrie vnto the manner of the MACEDONIANS: being perswaded, that by this mixture and enterchaunge of manners one with an other, he ſhould by frendſhippe more then force make them agree louingly together, when that he ſhould be ſo farre from the contry of PERSIA. For this purpoſe therefore, he choſe thirty thowſand of their children of that contry, and ſet them to learne the Greke tongue, and to be brought vp in the diſcipline of warres, after the MACEDONIANS maner: and gaue them ſchoolemaſters and Captaines to traine them in ech facultie. And for the marrying of Roxane, he fancied her, ſeeing her at a feaſt where he was, which fell out as well for his turne, as if he had with better aduiſe and counſell loued her. For the barbarous people were verie prowde of this matche when they ſawe him make alliance with them in this ſorte, inſomuch as they loued him better then they did before, bicauſe they ſaw in thoſe things he was alwayes ſo chaſt and continent, that notwithſtanding he was marueilouſly in loue with her, yet he would not diſhonorably touche this young Ladie, before he was maried vnto her. Furthermore, Alexander conſidering that of the two men which he loued beſt, Hephæſtion liked well of his matche, and went apparelled as him ſelfe did, and that Craterus contrarily did ſtill vſe the MACEDONIAN manner: he delt in all affayres with the barbarous people, by Hephæſtion, and with the GRÆCIANS and MACEDONIANS, by Craterus. To be ſhort, he loued the one, and honored the other: ſaying, that Hephæſtion loued Alexander, and Craterus loued the king. Hereuppon theſe two perſons bare one an other grudge in their harts, and oftentimes brake out in open quarrell: inſomuch as on a time being in INDIA, they drewe their ſwordes and fought together, and diuers of their frendes ranne to take part with either ſide. Thither came Alexander ſelfe alſo, who openly before them all, bitterly tooke vp Hephæſtion, and called him foole and bedlem, ſaying: doeſt thou not know, that whatſoeuer he be that ſhould take Alexander from me, he ſhould neuer liue? Priuatly alſo, he ſharply rebuked Craterus, and calling them both before him, he made them frendes together, ſwearing by Iupiter Hammon, and by all the other gods, that he loued them two of all men liuing, neuertheles if euer he founde that they fell out together againe, they ſhould both dye for it, or him at the leaſt that firſt beganne to quarrell. So euer after that, they ſay, there was neuer fowle word nor deede betwene them, not ſo much as in ſport only. There was alſo one Philotas, the ſonne of Parmenio, a man of great authority among the MACEDONIANS, who next vnto Alexander was the moſt vallianteſt man, the pacienteſt to abide paine, the liberalleſt, and one that loued his men & frends better then any noble man in the campe whatſoeuer. Of him it is reported, that a frend of his came to him on a time to borrow money: and he commaunded ſtraight one of his men to let him haue it. His purſe bearer aunſwered him, that he had none. Why, ſayd his maſter, doeſt thou tell me ſo? Haſt thou not plate, and apparell to ſell or gage to helpe him to ſome? Howbeit otherwiſe, he had ſuch a pride & glory to ſhew his riches, to apparell himſelfe ſo ſumptuouſly, and to be more fine and princked then became a priuate man, that this made him to be hated: bicauſe he tooke vpō him to be a great man & to looke bigge on the matter, which became him ill fauoredly, and therfore euery man through his owne folly, fell in miſliking with him. Inſomuch as his owne father ſaid one day vnto him: ſonne I pray thee be more humble & lowly. This Philotas had long before bene cōplained vpon vnto Alexander, bicauſe that when the cariage of king Darius armie (which was in the citie of DAMAS) was taken after the battell of CILICIA, among many priſoners that were taken and brought vnto Alexanders campe, there was one Antigona, a paſſing fayer young curtiſan, borne in the citie of PIDNA. Philotas founde meanes to gette her, and like a young man that was in loue with her, making merie with her at the table, fondly lette fall braue wordes and boaſtes of a ſouldier, ſaying, that what notable thinges were done, they were done by him ſelfe and his father: and called Alexander at euerie worde, young man, and ſayd that by their meanes he helde his name and kingdome. This courtiſan tolde one of his frendes what he ſayd, and that frende tolde an other frende, and ſo went from man to man (as commonly it doth) till at the length it came to Craterus eares. He tooke the courtiſan, and brought her vnto Alexander, vnto whom ſhe told as much as ſhe had ſayd before. Alexander bad her ſtill make much of Philotas, and to tell him euery word what he ſayd of him. Philotas knowing nothing that he was thus circumuented, did euer frequent her companie, and would be bold commonly to ſpeake many fooliſh and vndiſcreete words againſt the king, ſomtime in anger, & ſomtime againe in a brauery.

Alexander

A Alexander this notwithstanding, though he had manifest proofe and cause to accuse Philotas, yet he dissembled it for that time, and would not be knowen of it: either for that he knew Parmenio loued him, or else for that he was affrayed of their great power and authoritie. About that time there was one Limnus Chalastrian a MACEDONIAN, that layed great and secret waite to kill Alexander: and being in loue with a young man called Nicomachus, entised him to helpe him to doe this deede. The young man wisely denied it, & told the same to his brother called Balinus. He went vnto Philotas, and prayed him to bring them both before Alexander, for they had a matter of great importance to impart vnto him. Philotas would not let him speake with the king (but why, no man could tell) telling them that the king had greater matters in hande, and was not at leasure. Then they went vnto an other, and he brought them vnto Alexander, B vnto whome first they opened the treason of Limnus conspired against him: and by the way they tolde also, how they had bene twise before with Philotas, who would not let them come in, nor speake with them. That angred Alexander greatly, and he was the more offended also when Limnus was slaine by him, whome he sent to apprehende him, resisting him for that he would not be taken: and thought that by his death he had lost a great meanes to come to the light of this treason and conspiracie. Then Alexander frowning vppon Philotas, brought all his enemies vpon his backe, that of long time had hated him. For they beganne to speake boldly, that it was time for the kinge to looke about him, for it was not to be supposed that this Limnus Chalastrian of him selfe durst haue entred into that treason, but rather that he was a minister, and a chiefe instrument, set on by a greater personage then he: and therefore C that it stoode Alexander vpon to examine them straightly, which had cause to kepe this treason secret. After Alexander once gaue eare vnto such wordes and vehement presumptions, there was straight brought in a thowsand accusations against Philotas. Thereupon he was apprehended, and in the presence of diuers Lordes and familliars of the king put to the torter, Alexander selfe being behinde a hanginge, to heare what he would say. It is reported, that when he heard howe faintly and pitiefully he besought Hephestion to take pitie of him, he sayd vnto him selfe: alas, poore Philotas, thou that hast so faint a hart, howe durst thou take vppon thee so great matters? In fine, Philotas was put to death, and immediatly after he was executed, Alexander sent also with speede vnto the realme of MEDIA to kill Parmenio, who was his Lieutenaunt there, and one that had serued king Philippe his father, in his greatest af- D fayers, and who onely of all other the olde seruauntes of his father had procured Alexander to take in hande the conquest of ASIA: and who also of three sonnes which he brought out with him, had seene two of them dye before him, and afterwardes was slaine him selfe with the third. This crueltie of Alexander made his frendes affrayed of him, and specially Antipater: who secretly sent Ambassadors vnto the ÆTOLIANS, to make league with them, because they them selues also were affrayed of Alexander, for that they had put the Oeniades to death. Alexander hearing that, sayd, that he him selfe, and not the sonnes of the Oeniades, would be reuenged of the ÆTOLIANS. Not long after that, followed the murther of Clitus, the which to heare it simplie tolde, would seeme much more cruell than the death of Philotas. But reporting the cause and the time together in which it chaunced: it will be founde E that it was not of sette purpose, but by chaunce, and vnfortunately, that Alexander being ouercome with wine, did vnluckely wreake his anger vpon Clitus. The manner of his misfortune was this. There came certaine men of the lowe contries from the seaside, that brought apples of GRÆCE vnto Alexander. Alexander wondering to see them so greene and fayer, sent for Clitus to shewe him them, and to geue him some of them. Clitus by chaunce did sacrifice at that time vnto the goddes, and left his sacrifice to goe vnto Alexander: howebeit there were three weathers that followed him, on whome the accustomed sprincklinges had bene done alreadie to haue sacrificed them. Alexander vnderstandinge that, tolde it to his Soothsayers, Aristander, and Cleomantis LACONIAN, who both did answere him, that it was an ill signe. Alexander thereuppon gaue order straight, that they shoulde doe sacrifice F for the health of Clitus, and specially for that three dayes before he dreamed one night that he sawe Clitus in a mourninge gowne, sittinge amongest the sonnes of Parmenio, the which were all dead before. This notwithstanding, Clitus did not make an ende of his sacrifice, but came straight to supper to the kinge, who had that day sacrificed vnto Castor and Pollux. At this feast there was olde drinking, and all the supper time there were certaine verses song and made by a Poet, called Pranichus, (or as others say, of one Pierion) against certaine Captaines of the MACEDONIANS, which had not long before bene ouercome by the barbarous people, and only to shame them, and to make the compania laugh. With these verses, auncient men that were at this feast, became much offended, and grewe angrie with the Poet that made them, and the minstrell that song them. Alexander on thother side, and his familiars liked them verie well, and commaunded the minstrell to sing still. Clitus therewithall being ouertaken with wine, and besides of a churlish nature, prowde and arrogant, fell into greater choller, and sayd: that it was neither well nor honestlie done in that sorte to speake ill of those poore MACEDONIAN Captaines (and speciallie amongest the barbarous people their enemies) which were farre better men then they, that laughed them to scorne, although their fortune much worse then theirs. Alexander then replied, and sayd, that saying so, he pleaded for him selfe, calling cowardlinesse, misfortune. Then Clitus standing vp, sayd againe: but yet this my cowardlynes saued thy life, that callest thy selfe the sonne of the goddes, when thou turnedst thy backe from Spithridates sword: and the blood which these poore MACEDONIANS did shedde for thee, and the woundes which they receiued of their bodies fighting for thee, haue made thee so great, that thou disdainest now to haue king Philip for thy father, and wilt needes make thy selfe the sonne of Iupiter Hammon. Alexander being moued with these words, straight replied: O, villen, thinkest thou to scape vnpunished for these prowde words of thine, which thou vsest continually against me, making the MACEDONIANS rebell against Alexander? Clitus answered againe, too much are we punished, Alexander, for our paines and seruice to receiue such reward: nay, most happy thinke we them that long sence are dead and gone, not now to see the MACEDONIANS scourged with roddes of the MEDES, & compelled to curry fauor with the PERSIANS, to haue accesse vnto their king. Thus Clitus boldly speaking against Alexander, and Alexander againe answering and reuiling him: the grauest men sought to pacifie this sturre and tumult. Alexander then turning him selfe vnto Xenodochus CARDIAN, and Artemius COLOPHONIAN: doe you not thinke (sayd he) that the GREEKS are amongest the MACEDONIANS, as demy goddes that walke among brute beastes? Clitus for all this would not geue ouer his impudency and mallapertnesse, but cried out, and bad Alexander speake openlie what he had to say, or else not to bidde free men come to supper with him that were wont to speake franckely: if not, to keepe with the barbarous slaues that honored his PERSIAN girdell, and long white garment. Then coulde Alexander no longer hold his choller, but tooke an apple that was vpon his table, and threw it at Clitus, and looked for his sworde, the which Aristophanes, one of his gard that waited on him, had of purpose taken from him. And when euerie man came straight about him to stay him, and to pray him to be contented: he immediatly rose from the borde, and called his gard vnto him in the MACEDONIAN tongue, (which was a signe of great trouble to followe after it) and commaunded a trompetor to sound the allarme. But he drawing backe, would not sound: whereuppon Alexander strake him with his fist. Notwithstanding, the trompetor was greatly commended afterwards, for that he only kept the campe that they rose not. All this could not quiet Clitus, whereupon his frends with much a doe thrust him out of the halle: but he came in againe at an other dore, and arrogantly and vnreuerently rehearsed this verse of the Poet Euripides, out of Andromaches tragedie:

Alas for sorowe, euill wayes
Are into Grece crept nowe a dayes.

The malapertnes of Clitus against Alexander.

Then Alexander taking a partisan from one of his gard, as Clitus was comming towardes him, and had lift vp the hanging before the dore, he ranne him through the body, so that Clitus fell to the ground, and fetching one grone, died presently. Alexanders choller had left him straight, and he became maruelous sorowfull: and when he saw his frendes round about him say neuer a word, he pluckt the partisan out of his body, & would haue thrust it into his owne throte. Howbeit his gard about him caught him by the hands, & caried him perforce into his chamber: & there he did nothing all that night but weepe bitterly, & the next day following,

Alexander slue Clitus, & grieuously repented him.

A vntill such time as he was able to crie no more, but lying on the ground, onely laie sighing. His frendes hearing his voice no more, were afraid, and came into his chamber by force to comfort him. But Alexander would heare none of them, saving Anaxander the Soothesayer, who remembred him of his dreame he had of Clitus before, which was a prognostication of that which had happened: whereby it appeared that it was his destenie before he was borne. This seemed to comfort Alexander. Afterwardes they brought in Callisthenes the philosopher, a kinsman of Aristotles, and Anaxarchus borne in Abdera. Of these two, Callisthenes sought by gentle talke, not mouing any matter offensiue to comfort Alexanders sorow. But Anaxarchus that from the beginning had taken a way by him selfe in the studie of philosophie, being accompted a braine sicke man, and one that despised his companions: he comming into Alexanders chamber also with him, cryed out at the dore as he came in: See, yonder is Alexander the great whom all the world lookes apon, and is affraid of. See where he lies, weeping like a slaue on the ground, that is affraid of the lawe, and of the reproche of men: as if he himselfe should not geue them law, and stablish the boundes of iustice or iniustice, sithence he hath ouercome to be Lord and master, and not to be subiect and slaue to a vaine opinion. Knowest thou not that the poets saie, that Iupiter hath Themis, to wit, right and iustice placed of either hand on him? what signifieth that, but all that the prince doth, is wholy right, and iust? These wordes of Anaxarchus did comfort the sorowfull harte of king Alexander at that time, but therewithall, they made Alexanders maners afterwardes more fierce and dissolute. For, as he thereby did marueilously grow in fauor with the king, euen so did he make the company of Callisthenes, (who of him selfe was not very pleasaunt, because of his grauety and sowrenes) much more hatefull and misliked then before. It is written also that there was certain talke one night at king Alexanders borde touching the seasons of the yeare, & temperatenes of the ayer, and that Callisthenes was of their opinion which maintained, that the contry they were in at that time was much colder, and the winter also sharper then in Greece. Anaxarchus held the contrary opinion, and stiffly maintained it, in so much as Callisthenes said vnto him: and yet must thou graunt, that it is colder here then there. For there, all the winter time thou couldest goe with a single cloke on thy backe onely, and here thou must haue three or foure garments vpon thee when thou art at thy borde. This galled Anaxarchus to the quicke, and made him more angry then before: and for the other rethoritians and flatterers, they did also hate him, bicause they saw him followed of young men for his eloquence, and beloued also of olde men for his honest life, the which was very graue, modest, and contented with his owne, desiring no mans els. Whereby men found, that the reason he alleaged for following of Alexander in this voyage, was true: for he said that he came to be an humble suter to the king to restore his banished citizens into their contrie againe, and to repleniish their citie with inhabitantes. Now, though his estimation made him chiefly to be enuyed, yet did he him selfe geue his enemies occasion to accuse him. For often times being inuited by the king to supper, either he would not come, or if he came, he would be mute, and say nothing, showing by his grauety and silence, that nothing pleased him that was either said or done. Whereupon Alexander selfe said on a time vnto him:

Callisthenes, and Anaxarchus, do comfort Alexander.

The cause why Callisthenes was enuyed.

I can not thinke that person wyse,
That in his owne case hath no eyes.

It is reported of him also, that being at supper on a time with the king, diuers requesting him to make an oration on the suddein in commendation of the Macedonians, he made such an eloquent oration vpon that matter, that all they that heard him rose from the boorde, and clapping their handes for ioy, cast nosegayes and flowers vpon him. But yet Alexander at that time said vnto him that, which the Poet Euripides said:

It is no maystry to be eloquent,
In handling of a plentious argument.

Nay, but vtter then thy eloquence in reprouing of the Macedonians, that hearing their faultes, they may learne to amend. Then Callisthenes chaunging copy, spake boldly many thinges against the Macedonians: Declaring, that the dissention amongest the Grecians did increase king Philips power, alleaging these verses:

Where discord reignes in Realm or towne, Euen vvicked folke doe vvin renovvne.

But by this occasiõ, he purchased him selfe great ill will of the MACEDONIANS: in somuch, as Alexander selfe said at that time, that he had not so much shewed his eloquence, as the malice he bare vnto the MACEDONIANS. Hermippus the historiographer writeth, that one Stesibius a clearke of Callisthenes did afterwardes tell it vnto Aristotle in this sorte: and that Callisthenes seeing king Alexander offended with him, did recite these verses of Homer three or foure times as he went.

Patroclus vvho farre passed thee, VV as slaine as thou art like to be.

Aristotle thought Callisthenes eloquent, but not wise.

And therefore very wisely said Aristotle, that Callisthenes was eloquent, but not wise. For like a philosopher, he stowtely stood against kneeling to the king, and said that openly, which the noblest & auncientest men among the MACEDONIANS durst but whisper one in an others eare, though they did all vtterly mislike it: whereby he did yet deliuer GRÆCE from open shame, & Alexander from a greater, bringing him from that maner of adoration of his person. This notwithstanding, he vndid him selfe bicause he would seeme rather by presumption to bringe him to it, then by reason to perswade him. Chares MITYLENIAN hath written, that Alexander hauing dronke at a certain feast where he hapned to be, reached his cuppe vnto one of his frendes, who after he had taken it of him, rose vp first on his feete, and dranke also, turning him towardes the goddes, and first making solemne reuerence, he went and kissed Alexander, and then sate him downe againe. All the rest that were at the feast, did the like one after an other, and Callisthenes also, who tooke the cuppe when it came to his turne, (the king not looking on him, but talking with Hephestiõ,) after he had dronke, came to the king to kisse him as others had done. Howbeit one Demetrius called Phidõ, said vnto the king: kisse him not, I pray your grace, for he of all men hath done you no reuerence. Alexander turned his head a side, and would not kisse him. Then cryed Callisthenes out alowde: well, q[uo]he, then I will goe my waie, with lesse then others, by a kisse. And thus beganne Alexanders grudge first against Callisthenes, by meanes whereof Hephestion was credited the better, when he said that Callisthenes had promised him to reuerence Alexander, although that he had broken promise. After him also Lysimachus, Agnon, and diuers others beganne to plaie their partes against him, saying, that this Sophister went bragging vp and downe, as if he had destroyed a whole tyrannie, and that all the young men followed him to honor him, as if among so many thowsand souldiers, neuer a man of them had so noble a harte as he. And therefore, when the treason of Hermolaus against Alexanders person was discouered, they found the accusation probable, the which some false detracters had informed against Callisthenes: who had aunswered Hermolaus that asked him, how he could come to be famous aboue all men, thus: in killing the famousest person. And to animate him to goe forward with this treason, he had told him further, that he should not be affraid of a golden bedde, but remember that he had to doe with a man, which was somtime sicke and hurte as other men were. This notwithstanding, there was neuer a one of Hermolaus confederates, that would once name Callisthenes, what tormentes soeuer they abidde, to bewray who were their companions. And Alexander selfe also writing of this treason immediatly after, vnto Craterus, Attalus, and Alcetas, said, that their seruauntes which had bene tacked and put to the torter, did constantly affirme that they onely had conspired his death, and no man els was priuie vnto it. But afterwardes, he sent an other letter vnto Antipater, wherein he directly accused Callisthenes, and said, that his seruauntes had already bene stoned to death by the MACEDONIANS, howbeit that he him selfe would afterwardes also punish the master, and those that had sent vnto him, and that had receiued the murtherers into their cities, who came of purpose to kill him. And therein he plainly shewed the ill will he bare vnto Aristotle, for that Callisthenes had bene brought vp with him, being his kinsman, and the sonne of Hero, Aristotles neece. Some saie, that Alexander trussed Callisthenes vp. Others againe report, that he died of sickenes in prison. Neuertheles Chares writeth, that Callisthenes was kept prisoner seuen moneths together, bicause he should haue had his indgement in open counsaill euen in the presence of Aristotle him selfe: howbeit, being very farte, he

Callisthenes suspected of treaso against Alexander.

The death of Callisthenes the rethorician.

A he was eaten in the ende by lice, and so died, about the time that Alexander was hurt, fighting against the MALLIANS OXYDRACIANS, in the conquest of INDIA, but these thinges chaunced a good while after. Demaratus CORINTHIAN being very old, had a great desire to goe see Alexander: and when he had seene him, he said that the GRECIANS which were dead long before, were depriued of that blisse and happynes, that they could not see Alexander sitte in the royall seate of king Darius. Howbeit, he did not long enioy the kinges goodwill vnto him, for he died of a sicknes soone after he came vnto his campe, & Alexander did honor his funeralls: for all the armie in their armor did cast vp a mounte of earth facioned like a tombe, which was a great compasse about, & foure score cubittes high. His asshes afterwardes were brought with an honorable conuoye, vnto the sea side, in a charriot with foure horses richely set out.

The iourney of Demaratus Corinthiã vnto Alexander, and his death.

B Alexander being ready to take his iorney to goe conquer INDIA, perceyuing that his armie was very heauy & vnwildsom to remoue, for the wonderfull cariage and spoiles they had with them: the cartes one morning being loden, he first burnt his owne cariage, & next his frendes, & then commaunded that they should also set the cariage of the MACEDONIANS a fire, which counsell seemed more daungerous to be resolued of, then the proofe of the execution fell out difficulte. For there are very few of them that were angry therewith, & the most part of them (as if they had bene secretly moued by some god) with lowde cryes of ioy, one of them gaue vnto an other such necessary thinges as they had neede of, and afterwardes of them selues did burne and spoile all the rest. This made Alexander much more rigorous then he was before, besides that he was already become cruell enough, and without mercy or perdon, did sharpely

C punish euery man that offended. For hauing commaunded Menander one of his frendes, to kepe him a strong holde: he put him to death, bicause he would not remaine there. Furthermore, he him selfe slue Orsodates (a captaine of the barbarous people) with a darte, for that he rebelled against him. About that time, there was an eawe that had eaned a lambe, which had apon her head, the forme and purple culler of the kinges hatte, after the PERSIAN maner, called Tiara, hauing two stones hanging on ech side of it. Alexander abhorred this monsterous signe, insomuch as he pourged him selfe by certain BABYLONIAN priestes, which he alwayes caried about with him for that purpose, and said vnto his frendes: that this monster did not so much moue him for respect of him selfe, as it did for them, fearing that the goddes after his death had predestined the force and power of his kingdom to fall into the handes of some

D base cowardly person. This notwithstanding, an other signe and token which chaunced in the necke of that, did take away this feare and discouragement he had. For a MACEDONIAN called Proxenus, that had charge of the kinges cariage, as he digged in a certain place by the riuer of Oxus, to set vp the kinges tent and his lodging, he found a certain fatte and oylie vaine, which after they had drawen out the first, there came out also an other cleerer, which differed nothing, neither in smell, taste, nor sauor, from naturall oyle, hauing the glosse and fattnes so like, as there could be discerned no difference betwene them: the which was so much more to be wondred at, bicause that in al that contry there were no olyues. They say also, that the water of the riuer selfe of Oxus is very soft, & maketh their skinnes fatte, which wash or bathe them selues therein. And yet it appeareth by that which Alexander selfe wrote vnto Antipater, that

A spring of oyle found by the riuer of Oxus.

E he was very glad of it, putting that amongest the greatest signes which the goddes had sent vnto him. The Soothesayers did interprete this wonder, that it was a signe, that he should haue a noble, but yet a painefull voyage: for the goddes, said they, haue geuen oyle vnto men to refresh their wearynes. And truly so did he susteine many daungers in those warres, and was oftentimes hurt in fight. But the greatest losse he had of his men, was for lacke of vittells, and by the infection of the ayer. For he, striuing to ouercome fortune by valiantnes, and her force by vertue, thought nothing impossible for a valiant man, neither any thing able to withstand a noble harte. It is reported, that when he went to besiege a strong holde which Sisimethres kept, being thought vnsaltable, and that his souldiers were in dispeire of it: he asked one Oxyarthes, what hart Sisimethres had. Oxyarthes answered him, that he was the veriest coward Oyle refresheth wearynes.

F in the world. O, that is well, q. Alexander: then it is to be wonne, if that be true thou saiest, sithence the captaine of the peece is but a coward. So he tooke it of a sodaine, by putting Sisimethres in a great feare. After that also, he did besiege an other peece of as great strength, and difficultie to assault as the other, and making the young souldiers of the MACEDONIANS to go A to thassault, he called one of them vnto him, whose name also was Alexander, vnto whom he said thus. Alexander, this daie thou must fight like a man, and it be but for thy name sake. The yong man did not forget his words, for he fought so valliantly, that he was slaine, for whom Alexander was very sory. At an other time when his men were affraid, & durst not come neere vncame to the riuers side, and said; oh, what a coward am I, that neuer learned to swimme? and so prepared him selfe to swimme ouer apon his shielde. After he had caused them to retire from the assault, there came ambassadors vnto him from the cities besieged, to craue pardon of him. They wondered at him at the first, when they saw him armed, without any pompe or other ceremonie about him: but much more, when a chaier was brought him to sit downe B on, that he commaunded the oldest man amongest them called Acuphis, to take it to him, and sit him downe. Acuphis mareling at Alexanders great curtesie, asked him: what they should doe for him, thenceforth to be his good frendes. I will, said Alexander, that they from whom thou comest as ambassador vnto vs, doe make thee their king: and withall that they doe send rule them better, O king, if I send you the worst, and not the best. There was a king called Ta-xiles a very wise man, who had a great contrie in INDIA, no lesse in biggenes and circuit then all ÆGYPT, and as full of good pasture and frutes as any country in the world could be: who fight, and make warres one with an other, if thou comest not to take away our water, and our

As for other goods, if I be richer then thou, I am ready to giue thee of myne: and if I haue lesse, I will not thinke skorne to thanke thee, if thou wilt giue me some of thine. Alexander be-this meeting of ours can be without fight, for all these goodly fayre wordes? no, no, thou hast wonne nothing by that: for I will fight and contend with thee in honestie and curtesie, by-cause thou shalt not exceede me in bowntie and liberalitie. So Alexander taking diuers giftes of him, but giuing more vnto Taxiles: he dranke to him one night at supper, and said, I drinke to thee a thowsand talents in golde. This gifte misliked Alexanders frendes: but in recompence thereof, he wanne the hartes of many of those barbarous Lordes and Princes of that D country. There was a certeine number of souldiers of the INDIANS, the warlikest men of all that country: who beeing mercenary souldiers, were euer enterteyned in seruice of the great free cities, which they valiantly defended, and did great hurt vnto Alexander in diuers places.

Alexander disshonorably brake the peace he had made. Alexander hauing made peace with them in a citie where they were kept in: when they came abrode apon suertie of this peace which they had made, he met with them as they went their way, and put them all to the sworde. There was but this onely fault, to bleamish the honor of his noble deedes in all his warres: for in all thinges els, he shewed mercy and equitie. Furthermore, the graue Philosophers and wise men of INDIA did greatly trouble him also. For they reproued the kinges and Princes of the INDIANS for that they yelded vnto Alexander, & procured the free cities to take armes against him. But by their occasion, he tooke diuers of their E Alexanders actes against king Porus. Hydaspes fl. cities. For king Porus, Alexander selfe writeth in his Epistles, all his actes at large which he did against him. For he sayth, that both their campes lying on either side of the riuer of Hydaspes, king Porus set his Elephants apon the banke of the riuer with their heades towards their enemies, to keepe them from passing ouer: and that he him selfe did continually make a noise and tumult in his campe, to acquaint his men not to be afraid of the barbarous people. Furthermore, that in a darke night when there was no moone light, he tooke part of his footemen, & the choice of his horsemen, and went farre from his enemies to get ouer into a litle Ilande.
When he was come into the Iland, there fel a wonderful shower of raine, great windes, lightnings and thunders apon his campe, insomuch as he saw many of his men burnt by lightning in this litle Ilande. This notwithstanding, he did not leaue to get ouer to the other side of the F riuer. The riuer being swollen with the great flud of rayne that fell the night before, ouerflow-ing the bankes, it did eate into the ground where the water ranne: so that Alexander when he had

A had passed ouer the riuer, and was come to the other side, found him selfe in very ill case, for that he could hardly keepe his feete, bicause the earth was very slippery vnder him, and the rage of the water had eaten into it, and broke it downe on euery side. It is written of him, that then he sayd vnto the ATHENIANS: O ATHENIANS, could ye thinke that I could take such paines, and put my selfe into so many daungers, onely to be praised of you? Thus Onesicritus reporteth it. But Alexander selfe writeth, that they left their rafters or great peeces of tymber pinned together whereuppon they had passed ouer the streame of the mayne riuer: and that they waded thorow the other arme or gutt of the water which had broken the earth, vppe to their breasts with their harnesse on their backes. Furthermore, when he had passed ouer both waters, he rode with his horsemen twenty furlonges before the battell of his footemen: thin-
B king that if his enemies came to giue him charge with their men of armes, that he was the stronger: and if they would also aduawnce their footemen forwarde, that his footemen also should come tyme enough. One of the twaine fel out as he had gessed. For, a thowsand horsemen, and three skore charrets armed with his ennemies, gaue him charge before their great company, whom he ouerthrew, and tooke all their charrets, & slue foure hundred of the men of armes in the fielde. King Porus then knowing by those signes that Alexander was there in person, and had passed ouer the riuer: he marched towardes him with all his armie in battell ray, sauing a few which he left behinde to resist the MACEDONIANS, if they shewed force to passe ouer the riuer. Alexander being afraid of the great multitude of his ennemies, and of the terror of the Elephants, did not giue charge apon the middest of the battell, but being him selfe
C in the left winge, gaue charge apon the corner of the enemies left winge, and also commaunded them that were in the right winge to doe the like. So, both the endes of the enemies armie were broken and put to flight: and they that fled, ranne vnto the Elephants, & gathered them selues together about them. Thus the battell being begon, the conflict continued long, insomuch as the enemies were scantly all ouerthrowne by three of the clocke in the afternoone. Many writers doe agree, that Porus was foure cubits and a shaft length hier and bigger then the Elephant, although the Elephant was very great, and as bigge as a horse: and besides that the Elephant did shew great wit and care, to saue the king his Maister. For whilest he perceyued his Maister was stronge enough, he lustily repulsed those which came to assayle him: but when he found that he began to faint, hauing many woundes apon his body, and arrowes stic-
D king in it: then being afraid lest his Maister should fall downe from his backe, he softely fell on his knees, and gently taking his dartes and arrowes with his troncke, which he had in his body, he pluckt them all from him one after an other. Porus beeing taken, Alexander asked him, howe he should handle him, princely, aunswered Porus. Alexander asked him agayne, if he would saye any thing els. I comprehend all, sayde he, in this word princely. Thereupon Alexander did not onely leaue him his prouinces and Realmes, whereof before he was king, by the name of his Liefetenant: but gaue him many other contries also. When he had subdued all the free people, of the which there were fifteene seuerall nations, fiue thowsand of no small cities, besides an infinite number of villages, and thryse as many other contries: he made Philip one of his friendes, his Liefetenant of all those contries: his horse Bucephal dy-E ed at this battell, not in the fielde, but afterwardes whilest he was in cure for the woundes he had on his body: but as Onesicritus sayth, he dyed euen worne for very age. Alexander was as sory for his death, as if he had lost any of his familiar friendes: and for proofe thereof, he built a great citie in the place where his horse was buryed, apon the riuer of Hydaspes, the which he called after his name, Bucephalia. It is reported also, that hauing lost a dogge of his called Peritas, which he had brought vppe of a whelpe, and loued very dearely: he built also a citie, and called it after his name. Sotion writeth, that he hearde it reported thus of Potamon LESBIAN. This last battell against king Porus, killed the MACEDONIANS hartes, and made them that they had no desire to goe any further to conquer INDIA. For, finding that they had such a doe to ouercome them, though they were but twenty thowsand footemen, F and two thowsand horse, they spake yll of Alexander when he went about to compell them to passe ouer the ryuer of Ganges, vnderstanding by the contrymen that it was two and thirty furlong ouer, and a hundred fadam deepe: and howe that the banke of the ryuer was full of ſouldiers, horſemen, and Elephants. For it was reported, that the kings of the GANGARIDES, & the PRÆSIANS were on thother ſide with foure ſcore thowſand horſemen, two hundred thowſand footemen, eight thowſand charrets or carts of warre wel armed, and ſix thowſand Elephants of warre. This was no fable, nor fryuolous tale. For, a king called Androcottus (who raigned not long after,) gaue vnto Seleucus, fiue hundred Elephants at one time, & conquered all INDIA with ſixe hundred thowſand fighting men. Alexander then offended with his mens refuſall, kept cloſe in his tent for certeine daies, and lay vpon the ground, ſaying, that he did not thanke them, for all that they had done thithervnto, vnles they paſſed ouer the ryuer of Ganges alſo: And that to returne backe againe, it was as much as to confeſſe that he had bene ouercome. At the length, when he ſawe and conſidered that there was great reaſon in his friendes perſwaſions which labored to comfort him, and that his ſouldiers came to the dore of his tent, crying and lamenting, humbly beſeeching him to leade them backe againe: in thende he tooke pitie of them, and was contented to returne. This notwithſtanding, before he departed from thoſe parties, he put forth many vaine and falſe deuiſes to make his name immortall amonge that people. He made armors of greater proportion then his owne, and mangers for horſes, higher then the common ſort: moreouer, he made bytts alſo farre heauier then the common ſort, and made them to be throwen and ſcattered abroad in euery place. He built great aultars alſo in honor of the godds, the which the kings of the PRÆSIANS haue in great veneration at this day: and paſſing ouer the riuer, doe make ſacrifices there, after the manner of the GRÆCIANS. Androcottus at that time was a very young man, and ſawe Alexander him ſelfe, and ſayd afterwards, that Alexander had well neare taken and wonne all the contry, the king which then raigned, was ſo hated of all his ſubiectes, for his wicked life, and baſe parentage he came of. Departing thence, he went to ſee the great ſea Oceanum, and made diuers botes with ores, in the which he eaſily went downe the riuers at his pleaſure. Howbeit, this his pleaſant going by water, was not without warre: for he would land oftentymes, and did aſſaile cities, and conquered all as he went. Yet in aſſailing the citie of the MALLIANS, (which they ſay are the warlikeſt men of all the INDIANS) he was almoſt ſlaine there. For, hauing with darts repulſed the ennemies from the wall, he him ſelfe was the firſt man that ſette foote on a ladder to gett vp, the which brake aſſoone as euer he was gotten vpon the ramper. Then the barbarous people comming together againſt the wall, did throwe at him from beneathe, and many tymes lighted vpon him. Alexander hauing fewe of his men about him, made no more a doe, but leaped downe from the wall in the middeſt of his ennemies, and by good happe lighted on his feete. His harnes making a great noyſe with the fall, the barbarous people were afraid, thinking they had ſeene ſome light or ſpirite goe before him: ſo that at the firſt they all betooke them to their legges, and ranne ſcatteringly here and there. But after that, when they came againe to them ſelues, and ſawe that he had but two gentlemen onely about him, they came and ſette apon him of all handes, and fought with him at the ſworde or puſhe of the pyke, and ſo hurt him very ſore through his armor: but one amonge the reſt, being ſomewhat further of, gaue him ſuch a terrible blowe with an arrowe, that he ſtrake him through his curats, and ſhot him in at the ſide vnder his breſt. The blow entred ſo into his body, that he fell downe on one of his knees. Whereuppon, he that had ſtriken him with his arrow, ranne ſodainly to him with a cimiter drawen in his hand. Howbeit Peuceſtas & Limneus ſtepped before him, and were both hurt: Limneus was ſlaine preſently, and Peuceſtas fought it out, till at the length, Alexander ſelfe ſlew the barbarous man with his owne hand, after he had many greeuous woundes vpon his body. At the length he had a blow with a dart on his necke that ſo aſtonied him, that he leaned againſt the wall looking apon his enemies. In the meane time, the MACEDONIANS compaſſing him round about, tooke him, and caried him into his tent halfe in a ſownde, and was paſt knowledge: Whereupon, there ranne a rumor ſtraight in the campe, that Alexander was dead. They had much a doe to cut the arrow aſonder that was of wodde: ſo his curats being plucked of with great paine, yet were they to plucke the arrow head out of his body, which ſtucke in one of his bones: the which as it is reported, was foure fingers long, and three fingers broad. So that when they plucked it out, he ſownded ſo oft, that he was almoſt dead. This notwithſtanding, he ouercame the daunger, and eſcaped. Being very weake,

A weake, he kept diet a long time to recouer him selfe, and neuer came out of his tent vntill he heard the MACEDONIANS cry, and make great noyse about his tent, desirous to see him. Then he put on a night gowne, and came out amongest them all: and after he had done sacrifice vnto the godds for recouery of his health, he went on his iorney againe, and in the same did conquer many great contreyes, and tooke diuers goodly cities. He did also take tenne of the wise men of the contry, which men doe all go naked, and therefore are called GYMNOSOPHISTAE, (to wit, Philosophers of INDIA) who had procured Sabbas to rebell against him, and had done great hurt vnto the MACEDONIANS. And bicause they were taken to be the sharpest and readiest of aunswer, he did put them (as he thought) many hard questions, & told them he would put the first man to death, that aunswered him worst, and so the rest in order: and made the el-

B dest amonge them Iudge of their aunswers. The question he asked the first man, was this:

Whether the dead or the liuing, were the greater number. He aunswered, the liuing. For the dead sayd he, are no more men.

The second man he asked: whether the earth, or the sea brought forth most creatures. He aunswered, the earth. For the sea sayd he, is but a part of the earth.

To the third man: which of all beastes was the subtilleste. That (sayd he) which man hetherto neuer knew.

To the fourth: why he did make Sabbas rebell? bicause sayd he, he should liue honorably, or dye vilely.

To the fift, which he thought was first, the daye, or the night? He aunswered, the daye, by a

C day. The kinge finding his aunswer straunge, added to this speech: straunge questions, must needes haue straunge aunswers.

Comming to the sixt man, he asked him: how a man should come to be beloued: If he be a good man sayd he, not terrible.

To the seuenth, how a man should be a god? In doing a thing, said he, impossible for a man.

To the eight, which was the stroger: life or death? life, said he, that suffreth so many troubles.

And vnto the ninth and last man: how long a man should liue? vntill sayd he, he thinke it better to dye, then to liue.

When Alexander had heard these aunswers, he turned vnto the Iudge, & bad him giue his iudgement vpon them. The Iudge said, they had all aunswered one worse then another. Then

D shalt thou die first, said Alexander, bicause thou hast giuen such sentence: not so, O king, q. he, if thou wilt not be a lier: bicause thou saidst, that thou wouldest kil him first, that had aunswered worst. In fine, Alexander did let them go with rewardes. He sent Onesicritus also vnto the other wise men of the INDIANS, which were of greatest fame among the, & that led a solitary & quiet life: to pray them to come vnto him. This Onesicritus the Philosopher, was Diogenes the Cinika scholler. It is reported, that Calanus one of these wise men, very sharply & proudly, bad him put of his clothes, to heare his words naked: or otherwise that he would not speake to him, though he came from Iupiter him self. Yet Dandamis aunswered him more gently. For he hauing learned what maner of men Socrates, Pythagoras, and Diogenes were, said, that they seemed to haue bene wise men, & wel borne, notwithstanding that they had reuerenced the lawe too much in

E their life time. Others write notwithstanding, that Dandamis said nothing els, but asked why Alexander had take so painful a iorney in hand, as to come into INDIA. For Calanus (whose right name other wise was Sphines) king Taxiles perswaded him to go vnto Alexander, who bicause he saluted those he met, in the INDIAN tongue, saying Cale, as much to say, as God saue ye: the GRECIANS named him Calanus. It is reported, that this Calanus did shew Alexander a figure & similitude of his kingdom, which was this. He threw down before him a dry seare peece of leather, & then put his foote apon one of the endes of it. The leather being troden down on that side, rose vp in al partes els, & going vp & down with all still treading vpon the sides of the leather: he made Alexander see, that the leather being troden down on the one side, did rise vp on

F al sides els, vntil such time as he put his foote in the middest of the leather, & then al the whole leather was plain alike. His meaning thereby, was to let Alexander vnderstand, that the most part of his time he should keepe in the middest of his contry, & not to goe farre from it. Alexander cotinued seuen moneths trauelling vpon the riuers, to go see the great sea Oceanum. Then he

tooke ship, & sailed into a litle Iland called SCYLLVRIS, howbeit others call it PSITVLCIS. There he landed, made sacrifices vnto the gods, & viewed the greatnes & nature of the sea Oceanū, & all the situacion of the coast apon that sea, as farre as he could go. Then he made his praiers vnto the gods, that no conqueror liuing after him should go beyond the bounds of his iorney & conquest, & so returned homeward. He cōmaunded his ships should fetch a cōpasse about, & leaue INDIA on the right hand: & made Nearchus Admirall of all his fleete, & Onesicritus chiefe Pilote. He him self in the meane time went by land through the contry of the ORITES, & there he found great scarsitye of vittels, & lost many of his men: so that he caried not out of INDIA the fourth part of his men of war which he brought thither, which were in all six score thowsand foote men, & fiftéen thowsand horsmen. Some of thē died of greuous diseases, others, by ill diet, others, by extreme heat & drowght, & the most of thē by hunger, trauailing through this barren contry, where the poore men liued hardly, & had onely a few sheepe which they fed with sea fish, that made their flesh sauor very il fauoredly. At the lēgth, when three score daies iorney he had painfully trauelled through this contry, he thē entred into the cōtry called GEDROSIA, where he found great plēty of al kind of vittels, which the gouernors, kings, & princes, neighbours vnto the same, did sēd vnto him. After he had refreshed his army there a litle, he wēt through the cōtry of CARMANIA, where he continued seuē daies together banketing, going stil through the cōntry. For night & day, he was feasting continually with his frends apon a scaffold lōger then broad, rising vp of height, & drawn with eight goodly horse. After that scaffold followed diuers other charrets couered ouer, some with goodly rich arras, & purple silk, others with trim fresh boughes which they renued at euery fields end: & in those were Alexanders other frends & captaines with garlands of flowers apon their heades, which drank & made merry together. In all this armie, there was neither helmet, pike, dart, nor targe seene: but gold & siluer bowles, cups, & flagons in the souldiers hands, al the way as they went, drawing wine out of great pipes & vessels which they caried with them, one drinking to another, some marching in the fields going forward, & others also set at the table. About thē were the minstrels playing & piping on their flutes & shalmes, & womē singing & daunsing, & fooling by the way as they wēt. In all this dissolute marching through the cōtry, & in the middest of their dronkēnes, they mingled with it sport: that euery mā did striue to coūterfeat all the insolēcies of Bacchus, as if god Bacchus him self had ben there in person, & had led the mommery. Whē he came vnto the kings castel of GEDROSIA, he staied there also certein daies to refresh his army with feasting & bāketing. It is said, that one day whē he had dronke hard, he went to see the games for daunsing: & amongst thē, the games which a yong man called Bagoas had set forth, (with whō Alexander fel in liking) & bare the bel. This Bagoas being in his daunsing gamēts, came through the Theater, & sat him downe by Alexander. The MACEDONIANS were so glad of it, that they showted & clapped their hands for ioy, crying out alowde, to kisse him: so that in fine he toke him in his armes, & kissed him, before them all. Thither came Nearchus his Admiral vnto him: who made report what he had sene & done in his nauigatiō. Alexander was so glad of that, as he was desirous to saile by sea him self: & so, entring into the sea oceanum by the mouth of Euphrates, with a great fleete of ships, to cōpasse in all the coasts of ARABIA & AFRICKE, & thēce into Mare Mediterraneū, by the straights of the pillers of Hercules. To this intēt he built a great nūber of ships in the city of THAPSACVS, & sent for mariners, shipmasters, & pilots, out of al parts. But now, the difficultie of the iorney which he tooke apon him for the cōquest of INDIA, the daunger he was in whē he fought with the MALLIANS, & the nūber of his mē which he lost besides which was very great, al these things cōsidered together, making mē beleue that he should neuer return with safetie: they made all the people (which he had cōquered) bold to rise against him, & gaue his gouernors & Lieuetenants of prouinces occasion to cōmit great insolēcies, robberies, & exactiōs of people. To be short, it put al his kingdom in broile & sedition. Insomuch as Olympias & Cleopatra rising against Antipater, they deuided his gouernmēt betweene thē: Olympias choosing for her, the kingdō of EPIRVS: & Cleopatra, the kingdō of MACEDON. Which whē Alexander had heard, he said his mother was the wisest: for the realme of MACEDON would neuer haue suffred a womā to raigne ouer thē. Therupon he sent Nearchus back again to the sea, determining to fil all the sea coasts with warre. As he trauelled through

A through the cõtries farre frõ the ſea, he put his capteines & gouernors to death, which had reuolted againſt him: & of thoſe he ſlue Oxyarthes, one of Abulites ſonnes, by his own hãd, rõning him thorow with a pike. And whẽ Abulites ſelf alſo had brought Alexãder iij thowſãd talẽts only, without any other prouiſiõ made for vittels for his army: he made him put the money before his horſe, which would not once touch it. Then ſayd he vnto him: I pray thee to what purpoſe ſerueth this prouiſiõ? & therwithal immediatly cõmitted him to priſõ. As he came through the cõtry of PERSIA, he firſt renued the old cuſtõ there, which was: that as often times as the kings did return home frõ any far iorney, they gaue vnto euery womã a crown a peece. It is ſaid therfore that for this cauſe, ſome of their natural kings many times did not returne again into their cõtry: & that Ochus amõgſt others did not ſo much as once returne back again, willingly bani-

B ſhing him ſelf out of his cõtry, of niggardlines, becauſe he would not be at this charg. After that, Cyrus tomb (king of PERSIA) being toũd & brokẽ vp, he put him to death that did it, although he were a MACEDONIAN of the citye of PELLA, (and none of the meaneſt) called Polymachus. Whẽ he had red the inſcriptiõ writtẽ apõ it in the Perſian tõgue, he would needes alſo haue it writtẽ in the Greeke tõgue: & this it was. O mã, vvhat ſo thou art, & vvhẽceſoeuer thou cõmeſt, fro I knovve thou ſhalt come: I am Cyrus that conquered the Empire of Perſia, I pray thee enuy me not for this litle earth that couereth my body. Theſe words pearced Alexanders hart, whẽ he cõſidered the vncertainty of worldly things. There alſo, Calanus the INDIAN Philoſopher, hauing had a flyxe a litle while, praied that they would make him a ſtacke of wod, ſuch as they vſe to burne dead bodies on, & then rode thither a horſe back: & after he had made his praier vnto the godds, he

C caſt thoſe ſprincklings apon him, which were vſed to be ſprinckled at the funerals of the dead. Then cutting of a locke of his heare before he went vp on the wodſtacke, he bad al the MACEDONIANS that were there farewel, & ſhooke them by the hands, praying thẽ that day to be mery, and drinke freely with the king, whom he would ſee ſhortly after in the citye of BABYLON. When he had ſaid theſe words, he layd him down vpon the wodſtack, couered his face, & neuer ſturred hand nor foote, nor quinched when the fire tooke him, but did ſacrifice him ſelf in this ſort, as the maner of his contry was, that the wiſe men ſhould ſo ſacrifice thẽſelues. An other INDIAN alſo, who followed Iulius Cæſar, did the like many yeares after in the citye of ATHENS: & there is his tombe yet to be ſeene, cõmonly called the INDIANS tombe. When Alexander came from ſeing this ſacrifice of Calanus, he did bid diuers of his frends & Capteines to

D ſupper to him: & there did bring forth a crown for a reward vnto him that drank beſt. He that drank moſt of al other, was one Promachus, that drank foure gallons of wine, & wan the crown, worth a talent: but he liued not aboue three dayes after. And of other alſo that fell in ſport to quaffing, who ſhould drink moſt, there died of thẽ (as Chares writeth) one & forty perſons: of an extreme cold that tooke thẽ in their dronkennes & wine. When they were in the citie of SVSA, he married certein of his frends, & him ſelf alſo married Statira, one of king Darius Daughters, diſpoſing alſo of the other PERSIAN Ladies (according to their eſtate and birth) vnto his beſt frends. He made alſo a ſolemne feaſt of cõmon mariages amongſt the MACEDONIANS, of thẽ that had ben maried before: At which feaſt, it is writtẽ, that nine thowſand perſons ſitting at the bords, he gaue vnto euery one of them a cup of gold to offer wine in honor of the gods.

E And there alſo amongſt other wõderful gifts, he did pay al the dets the MACEDONIANS ought vnto their creditors, the which amounted vnto the ſumme of tenne thowſand talents ſauing a hundred & thirty leſſe. Wherupon Antigenes with one eye, falſely putting in his name amongeſt the number of the detters, & bringing in one that ſaid he had lent him money: Alexander cauſed him to be paid. But afterwards, when it was proued to his face, that there was no ſuch matter: Alexander then was ſo offended with him, that he baniſhed him his court, & depriued him of his captainſhip, notwithſtanding that he had before ſhewed him ſelf a valiant mã in the warrs. For whẽ he was but a yong man, he was ſhot into the eye, before the city of PERINTHE, which king Philip did beſeege: & at that preſent time they would haue pluckt the arrow out of his eye, but he neuer fainted for it, neither would ſuffer thẽ to pul it out, before he had firſt dri-

F uẽ his enemies within the wals of their citie. He toke this infamy very inwardly, & he was ſo ſory for it, that euery mã might ſee he was like to die for ſorow. Thẽ Alexander fearing he ſhould die, did pardõ him, & bad him beſides kepe the money which was giuẽ him. Now the 30000.

young boyes which Alexander had left to the gouernment of Capteines, to trayne & exercise them in the discipline of warre: they being growen stronge men, & lusty youthes, excellently well trained & ready in armes: Alexander reioyced when he saw them. This notwithstanding did much discorage the MACEDONIANS, & made them greatly affraid, bicause they thought that from thenceforth the king would make lesse accompt of thē. For when Alexander would haue sent the sicke and impotent persons, which had bene maimed in the warres, into the low contry, to the sea side: they aunswered him, that so doing he should do them great wronge, to send these poore men frō him in that sort, (after they had done him all the seruice they could) home to their contry & frends, in worse case then he tooke them from thence. And therefore they said, if he would send away some, let him send them all away as men vnseruiceable, specially sithence he had now such goodly yong daunsers about him, with whom he might go conquer the world. Alexander was maruelously offended with their prowd words, insomuch that in his anger he reuiled them all, put away his ordinary gard, & tooke other PERSIANS in their place, making some the gard about his owne person, others, his vshers, heraulds, & ministers to execute his will and commaundement. The poore MACEDONIANS seeing Alexander thus waited on, & them selues so shamefully reiected: they let fall their stoutnes, and after they had cōmoned of the matter together, they were ready to teare thēselues for spite & malice. In fine whē they had laid their heads together, they cōsented to go vnto his tent & without weapōs, naked in their shirts to yeld thēselues vnto him, weping & howling, beseching him to do with thē what pleased him, & so vse thē like wretched vnthankful creatures. But Alexander, though his anger was now somwhat pacified, did not receiue thē the first time, neither did they also go their waies, but remained there 2. daies & nights together, in this pitiful state, before the dore of his tent, lamenting vnto him, & calling him their soueraine & king: vntill that he came him self out of his tent the third day, & seing the poore wretches in this greeuous & pitiful state, he him self fel a weeping a long time. So, after he had a litle rebuked thē, he called thē curteously, & gaue the impotēt & sick persons leaue to depart home, rewarding thē very honorably. Furthermore, he wrote vnto Antipater his Lieutenant, that he should alwaies giue thē the highest place in al cōmon sports & assemblies, & that they should be crowned with garlands of flowers. Moreouer, he cōmaūded that the orphans whose parents were slaine in the warrs, should receiue the pay of their fathers. After Alexander was come vnto the citie of ECBATANA, in the kingdō of MEDEA, & that he had dispatched his waightiest causes: he gaue him self again vnto publike sportes, feasts, & pastimes, for that there were newly come vnto him out of GRÆCE, thowsand excellent masters & deuisers of such sports. About that time it chaūced, that Hephæstion fell sicke of an agew. But he beeing a young man of warre, did not regard his mouth as he should haue done, but hauing spyed oportunitie that his Phisitian Glaucus was gone vnto the Theater, to see the sports & pastimes: He went to dinner, and eate a roasted Capon whole, and dranke a great pot full of wine, which he had caused to be set in water: whereuppon his feuer tooke him so sorely, that he liued not long after. Alexander vnwisely tooke the chaunce of his death, & cōmaūded all the heares of his horse & mules to be presently shorn in tokē of mourning, & that al the battlemēts of the wals of cities should also be ouerthrown, & hong vp pore Glaucus his Phisitian vpon a crosse, & cōmaūded that no minstrel should be heard play of any kind of instrument within his campe: vntil that there was brought him an oracle from Iupiter Hammon, cōmaūding that Hephæstion should be worshipped & sacrificed vnto, as a demy god. In thend, to passe ouer his mourning and sorow, he went vnto the warres, as vnto a hunting of men, and there subdued the people of the COSSÆIANS, whom he pluckt vp by the rootes, and slue man, woman, and childe. And this was called the sacrifice of Hephæstions funeralls. Alexander furthermore beeing desirous to bestowe tenne thowsand talents coste vppon his obsequies and funeralls, and also to exceede the charge by the rarenes and excellencie of workemanshippe: amongest all other excellent workemasters, he desired one Stasicrates, for he had euer passing inuention, and his worke was alwayes stately and sumptuous in any newe thinges he tooke in hande. For he talking one daye with Alexander, tolde him, that of all the Mountaynes he knewe in the worlde, he thought there was none more excellent to resemble the statue or image of a man, then was Mount Atho in THRACIA: and that if it were his

A his pleaſure, he would make him the nobleſt and moſt durable image, that ſhould bee in the world, which in his left hand ſhould hold a citie to conteine ten thowſand perſons, and out of his right hand, there ſhould ronne a great riuer into the ſea. Yet Alexander would not harken to him, but then was talking with other workemen of more ſtraunge inuentions, & farre greater coſt. Now as he was ready to take his iorney to go vnto BABYLON: Nearchus his Admirall came againe vnto him from the great ſea Oceanum, by the riuer of Euphrates, and tolde him, how certaine CHALDEAN Soothſayers came vnto him, who did warne him that he ſhould not goe into BABYLON. Howbeit Alexander made no reckoning of it, but went on. But when he came hard to the walls of BABYLON, he ſaw a great number of crowes fighting & killing one of another, & ſome of them fell downe deade hard by him. Afterwards being told him that A-
B pollodorus the gouernor of the citie of BABYLON, hauing ſacrificed vnto the goddes, to knowe what ſhould happen to him: he ſent for the Soothſayer Pithagoras, to knowe of him if it were true. The Soothſayer denied it not. Then Alexander asked him, what ſignes he had in the ſacrifice. He aunſwered, that the lyuer of the beaſt had no head. O gods, ſaid Alexander then, this is an ill ſigne: notwithſtanding he did Pithagoras no hurt, but yet he repented him that he did not beleue Nearchus words. For this reſpect therefore Alexander lay much abroade in the contry from BABYLON, & did take his pleaſure rowing vp & downe the riuer of Euphrates. Yet had he many other ill ſignes & tokēs one vpō another, that made him afraid. For there was a tame aſſe that killed one of the greateſt & goodlieſt Lions in all BABYLON, with one of his feete. A- Diuers ſignes before Alexanders death.
nother time when Alexander had put of his clothes, to be nointed to play at tennis: When he C ſhould put on his apparel again, the yong gentlemen that plaied with him, found a man ſet in his chaier of eſtate, hauing the kings diademe on his head, & his gowne on his back, & ſaid neuer a word. Then they asked him what he was? It was long before he made them aunſwer, but at the length comming to him ſelf, he ſaid his name was Dionyſius, borne in MESSINA: & being accuſed for certein crimes committed, he was ſent from the ſea thether, where he had bene a long time priſoner, & alſo that the god Serapis had appeared vnto him, & vndone his irons, & that he commaunded him to take the kings gowne & his diademe, and to ſit him downe in his chaier of eſtate, & ſay neuer a word. When Alexander heard it, he put him to death according to the counſail of his Soothſayers: but then his mind was troubled, & feared that the gods had forſaken him, & alſo grew to ſuſpect his frends. But firſt of al, Alexander feared Antipater & his Alexander feared Antipater.
D ſonnes, aboue all other. For one of them called Iolas, was his firſt cupbearer: & his brother called Caſſander, was newly come out of GRÆCE vnto him. The firſt time that Caſſander ſaw ſome of the barbarous people reuerencing Alexander, he hauing bene brought vp with the libertie of GRÆCE, & had neuer ſeene the like before: fel into a lowd laughing very vnreuerētly. Therwith king Alexander was ſo offended, that he tooke him by the heare of his head with both his hands, & knocked his head & the wal together. Another time alſo whēn Caſſander did aunſwer ſome that accuſed his father Antipater: king Alexander tooke him vp ſharply, & ſaid vnto him. What ſaieſt thou, ſaid he? Dooſt thou thinke that theſe men would haue gon ſo long a iorney as this, falſly to accuſe thy father, if he had not done them wrong? Caſſander again replyed vnto Alexander, & ſaid, that that was a manifeſt proofe of their falſe accuſatiō, for that they did now
E accuſe him being ſo farre of, bicauſe they thought they could not ſodainly be diſproued. Alexander thereat fel a laughing a good, & ſaid, lo, theſe are Ariſtotles quiddities to argue pro & cōtra: but this wil not ſaue you from puniſhment, if I find that you haue done theſe men wronge. In fine, they report that Caſſander tooke ſuch an inward feare & conceit vpon it, that long time after when he was king of MACEDON, and had all GRÆCE at his commaundement: going vp and downe the citie of DELPHES, and beholding the monuments and images that are there, he found one of Alexander, which put him into ſuch a ſodaine feare, that the heares of his head ſtoode vpright, and his body quaked in ſuch ſort, that it was a great time before he could come to him ſelfe againe. Nowe aftet that Alexander had left his truſt and confidence in the goddes, his minde was ſo troubled and affraide, that no ſtraunge thinge happened vnto him, F (how litle ſo euer it was) but he tooke it ſtraight for a ſigne and prediction from the godds: ſo that his tent was alwayes full of Prieſtes and Soothſayers that did nothing but ſacrifice and purifie, and tende vnto diuinements. So horrible a thing, is the miſtruſt and contempt of the

godds, when it is begotten in the harts of men, and ſuperſticion alſo ſo dreadfull, that it filleth the gilty conſciences and fearefull hartes like water diſtilling from aboue: as at that time it filled Alexander with all folly, after that feare had once poſſeſſed him. This notwithſtãding, after that he had receiued ſome aunſwers touching Hephæſtion from the oracle of Iupiter Hammon, he left his ſorow, and returned again to his bankets and feaſting. For he did ſumptuouſly feaſt Nearchus, and one day when he came out of his bathe according to his manner, beeing ready to goe to bed, Medius one of his Capteines beſought him to come to a banket to him at his lodging. Alexander went thither, and dranke there all that night and the next day, ſo that he got an agew by it. But that came not (as ſome write) by drinking vppe Hercules cuppe all at a drawght: neither for the ſodaine paine he felt betweene his ſhowlders, as if he had beene thruſt into the backe with a ſpeare. For all theſe were thought to be written by ſome, for lyes and fables, bicauſe they would haue made the ende of this great tragedie lamentable and pitifull. But Ariſtobulus writeth, that he had ſuch an extreame feuer and thirſt withall, that he dranke wine, & after that fel a rauing, & at the lẽgth dyed the thirtie day of the month of Iune. In his houſhold booke of things paſſed dayly, it is written, that his feuer beeing apon him, he ſlept in his hottehouſe on the eyghtenth day of Iune. The next morning after he was come out of his hottehouſe, he went into his chamber, and paſſed away all that daye with Medius, playing at dyce: and at nyght very late, after he had bathed him ſelfe and ſacrificed vnto the goddes, he fell to meate, and had his feuer that nyght. And the twenty daye alſo, bathing him ſelfe againe, and making his ordinary ſacrifice to the goddes, he did ſitte downe to eate within his ſtooue, harkening vnto Nearchus that tolde him ſtraunge thinges he had ſeene in the great ſea Oceanum. The one and twenty day alſo hauing done the like as before, he was much more inflamed then he had bene, & felt him ſelfe very ill all night, and the next day following in a great feuer: and on that day he made his bed to be remoued, and to be ſet vppe by the fiſh pondes, where he commoned with his capteines touching certaine roomes that were void in his armie, and commaunded them not to place any men that were not of good experience. The three and twenty day hauing an extreame feuer vpon him, he was caried vnto the ſacrifices, and commaunded that his chiefeſt Capteines onely ſhould remaine in his lodging, and that the other meaner ſort, as centiniers or Lieuetenants of bands, that they ſhould watch & ward without. The foure and twenty day, he was caried vnto the other pallace of the kings, which is on thother ſide of the lake, where he ſlept a litle, but the feuer neuer left him: & when his Capteines & noble men came to doe him humble reuerence, & to ſee him, he lay ſpeechles. So did he the fiue and twenty day alſo: inſomuch as the MACEDONIANS thought he was dead. Then they came & knocked at the pallace gate, & cried out vnto his friendes and familiers, and threatned them, ſo that they were compelled to open them the gate. Thereuppon the gates were opened, & they comming in their gownes went vnto his bed ſide to ſee him. That ſelfe day Python & Seleucus were appointed by the kings friends to go to the temple of the god Serapis, to knowe if they ſhould bringe king Alexander thither. The god aunſwered them, that they ſhould not remoue him from thence. The eight and twenty day at night Alexander dyed. Thus it is written word for word in manner, in the houſhold booke of remembrance. At that preſent tyme, there was no ſuſpition that he was poyſoned. Yet they ſay, that ſix yeares after, there appeared ſome proofe that he was poiſoned. Whereupon his mother Olympias put many men to death, and caſt the aſhes of Iolas into the wind, that was dead before, for that it was ſaid he gaue him poyſon in his drinke. They that thinke it was Ariſtotle that counſelled Antipater to do it, by whoſe meane the poyſon was brought: they ſay that Agnothemis reported it, hauing heard it of king Antigonus owne mouth. The poyſon (as ſome ſay) was cold as Iſe, and falleth from a rocke in the territory of the citie of NONACRIS, & it is gathered as they would gather a deawe into the horne of the foote of an aſſe, for there is no other kinde of thinge that wil keepe it, it is ſo extreme cold & percing. Others defend it, & ſay, that the report of his poyſoning is vntrue: & for proofe therof they alleage this reaſon, which is of no ſmal importance, that is: That the chiefeſt Capteines fel at great variance after his death, ſo that the corps of Alexander remained many dayes naked without buriall, in a whot dry contry, & yet there neuer appeared any ſigne or token apon his body, that he was poyſoned, but was ſtill a cleane and fayre

A faire corps as could be. Alexander left Roxane great with childe, for the which the MACEDONIANS did her great honor: but ſhe did malice Statira extreamely, & did finely deceiue her by a counterfeat letter ſhe ſent, as if it had comen from Alexander, willing her to come vnto him. But when ſhe was come, Roxane killed her and her ſiſter, and then threw their bodies into a well, and filled it vp with earth, by Perdiccas helpe and conſent. Perdiccas came to be king, immediatly after Alexanders death, by meanes of Arideus, whom he kept about him for his gard and ſafety. This Arideus, beeing borne of a common ſtrumpet and common woman, called Philinna, was halfe lunaticke, not by nature nor by chaunce: but, as it is reported, put out of his wits when he was a young towardly boy, by drinkes, which Olympias cauſed to be geuen him, and thereby continued franticke.

AT what time Sylla was made Lord of all, he would haue had Cæſar put away his wife Cornelia, the daughter of Cinna Dictator: but when he ſaw, he could neither with any promiſe nor threate bring him to it, he tooke her ioynter away from him. The cauſe of Cæſars ill will vnto Sylla, was by meanes of mariage: for Marius thelder, maried his fathers own ſiſter, by whom he had Marius the younger, whereby Cæſar & he were coſin germaines. Sylla being troubled in waightie matters, putting to death ſo many of his enemies, when he came to be cõqueror, he made no reckoning of Cæſar: but he was not contented to be hidden in ſafety, but came and made ſute vnto the people for the Prieſthoodſhippe that was voyde, when he had ſcant any heare on his face. Howbeit he was repulſed by Syllaes meanes, that ſecretly was againſt him. Who, when he was determined to haue killed him, ſome of his frendes told him, that it was to no purpoſe to put ſo young a boy as he to death. But Sylla told them againe, that they did not conſider that there were many Marians in that young boy. Cæſar vnderſtanding that, ſtale out of ROME, and hidde him ſelfe a long time in the contrie of the SABINES, wandring ſtill from place to place. But one day being caried from houſe to houſe, he fell into the handes of Syllaes ſouldiers, who ſearched all thoſe places, and tooke them whom they found hidden. Cæſar bribed the Captaine, whoſe name was Cornelius, with two talentes which he gaue him. After he had eſcaped them thus, he went vnto the ſea ſide, and tooke ſhippe, and ſailed into BITHYNIA to goe vnto king Nicomedes. When he had bene with him a while, he tooke ſea againe, and was taken by pyrates about the Ile of PHARMACVSA: for thoſe pyrates kept all vppon that ſea coaſt, with a great fleete of ſhippes and botes. They asking him at the firſt twentie talentes for his ranſome, Cæſar laughed them to ſcorne, as though they knew not what a man they had taken, & of him ſelfe promiſed them fiftie talents. Then he ſent his men vp and downe to get him this money, ſo that he was left in maner alone among theſe theeues of the CILICIANS, (which are the cruelleſt butchers in the world) with one of his frends, and two of his ſlaues only: and yet he made ſo litle reckoning of them, that when he was deſirous to ſleepe, he ſent vnto them to commaunde them to make no noyſe. Thus was he eight and thirtie dayes among them, not kept as priſoner, but rather waited vppon by them as a Prince. All this time he woulde boldly exerciſe him ſelfe in any ſporte or paſtime they would goe to. And other while alſo he woulde wryte verſes, and make orations, and call them together to ſay them before them: and if any of them ſeemed as though they had not vnderſtoode him, or paſſed not for them, he called them blockeheades, and brute beaſtes, and laughing, threatned them that he would hang them vp. But they were as merie with the matter as could be, and tooke all in good parte, thinking that this his bold ſpeach came, through the ſimplicity of his youth. So when his raunſome was come from the citie of MILETVM, they being payed their money, and he againe ſet at libertie: he then preſently armed, and manned out certaine ſhips out of the hauen of MILETVM, to follow thoſe theeues, whom he found yet riding at ancker in the ſame Iland. So he tooke the moſt of them, & had the ſpoile of their goods, but for their bodies, he brought them into the city of PERGAMVM, & there committed thē to priſon, whileſt he him ſelfe went to ſpeake with Iunius, who had the gouernment of ASIA, as vnto whom the execution of theſe pirats did belong, for that he was Prætor of that contrie. But this Prætor hauing a great fancie to be fingering of the money, bicauſe there was good ſtore of it: anſwered, that he would conſider of theſe priſoners at better leaſure. Cæſar leauing Iunius there, returned againe vnto PERGAMVM, and there hung vp all theſe theeues openly vpon a croſſe, as he had oftentimes promiſed them in the Ile he would doe, when they thought he did but ieaſt. Afterwardes when Syllaes power beganne to decay, Cæſars frendes wrote vnto him, to pray him to come home againe. But he ſailed firſt vnto RHODES, to ſtudie there a time vnder Apollonius the ſonne of Molon, whoſe ſcholler alſo Cicero was, for he was a very honeſt man, & an excellent good Rethoritian. It is reported that Cæſar had an excellent naturall gift to ſpeake well before the people, & beſides that rare gift, he was excellently well ſtudied, ſo that doubteleſſe he was counted the ſecond man for eloquence in his time, and gaue place to the firſt, bicauſe he would be the firſt and chiefeſt man of warre and authoritie, being not yet comen to the degree of perfection to ſpeake well, which his nature coulde haue performed in him, bicauſe he was geuen rather to followe warres and to mannage great matters, which in thende brought him to be Lord of all ROME. And therefore in a booke he wrote againſt that which Cicero made in the praiſe of Cato, he prayeth the readers not to compare the ſtile of a ſouldier, with the eloquence of an excellent Orator, that had followed it the moſt parte of his life. When he was returned againe vnto ROME, he accuſed Dolabella for his ill behauior in the gouernment of his prouince, and he had diuers cities of GRÆCE that gaue in euidence againſt him. Notwithſtanding, Dolabella at the length was diſmiſſed. Cæſar, to requite the good will of the GRÆCIANS, which they had ſhewed him in his accuſation of Dolabella, tooke their cauſe in hand, when they did accuſe Publius Antonius before Marcus Lucullus, Prætor of MACEDON: and followed it ſo hard againſt him in their behalfe, that Antonius was driuen to appeale before the Tribunes at ROME, alleaging, to colour his appeale withall, that he coulde haue no iuſtice in GRÆCE againſt the GRÆCIANS. Now Cæſar immediatly wan many mens good willes at ROME, through his eloquence, in pleading of their cauſes: and the people loued him maruelouſly alſo, bicauſe of the curteous manner he had to ſpeake to euery man, and to vſe them gently, being more ceremonious therein, then was looked for in one of his yeres. Furthermore, he euer kept a good bourde, and fared well at his table, and was very liberall beſides:

besides: the which in deede did aduaunce him forward, and brought him in estimacion with the people. His enemies iudging that this fauor of the common people would soone quaile, when he could no longer hold out that charge and expence: suffered him to runne on, till by litle and litle he was growen to be of great strength & power. But in fine, when they had thus geuen him the bridell to grow to this greatnes, and that they could not then pull him backe, though in dede in sight it would turne one day to the destruction of the whole state and common wealth of Rome: too late they found, that there is not so litle a beginning of any thing, but continuaunce of time will soone make it strong, when through contempt there is no impediment to hinder the greatnes. Thereuppon, Cicero like a wise shipmaster that feareth the calmnes of the sea, was the first man that mistrusting his manner of dealing in the common wealth, found out his craft & malice, which he cunningly cloked vnder the habit of outward curtesie and familliaritie. And yet, sayd he, when I consider howe finely he combeth his faire bush of heare, and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scrat his head with one finger only: my minde giues me then, that such a kinde of man should not haue so wicked a thought in his head, as to ouerthrow the state of the common wealth. But this was long time after that. The first shewe and proofe of the loue and good will which the people did beare vnto Cæsar, was: when he sued to be Tribune of the souldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thowsand footemen) standding against Caius Pompilius, at what time he was preferred and chosen before him. But the second & more manifest proofe then the first, was at the death of his aunt Iulia, the wife of Marius the elder. For being her nephew, he made a solemne oration in the market place in commendacion of her, and at her buriall did boldly venter to shew foorth the images of Marius: the which was the first time that they were seene after Syllaes victorie, bicause that Marius and all his confederates had bene proclaimed traitors and enemies to the common wealth. For when there were some that cried out apon Cæsar for doing of it: the people on thother side kept a sturre, and reioyced at it, clapping of their handes, and thanked him, for that he had brought as it were out of hell, the remembraunce of Marius honor againe into Rome, which had so long time bene obscured & buried. And where it had bene an auncient custom of long time, that the Romanes vsed to make funerall orations in praise of olde Ladies and matrons when they dyed, but not of young women: Cæsar was the first that praised his owne wife with funerall oration when she was deade, the which also did increase the peoples good willes the more, seeing him of so kinde & gentle nature. After the buriall of his wife, he was made Treasorer, vnder Antistius Vetus Prætor, whom he honored euer after: so that when him selfe came to be Prætor, he made his sonne to be chosen Treasorer. Afterwardes, when he was come out of that office, he maried his thirde wife Pompeia, hauing a daughter by his first wife Cornelia, which was maried vnto Pompey the great. Now for that he was very liberal in expences, bying (as some thought) but a vaine and short glorie of the fauor of the people: (where in deede he bought good cheape the greatest thinges that coulde be.) Some say, that before he bare any office in the common wealth, he was growen in debt, to the summe of thirteene hundred talentes. Furthermore, bicause he was made ouerseer of the worke, for the high way going vnto Appius, he disbursed a great summe of his owne money towardes the charges of the same. And on the other side, when he was made Ædilis, for that he did show the people the pastime of three hundred & twentie cople of sword players, and did besides exceede all other in sumptuousnes in the sportes and common feastes which he made to delight them withall: (and did as it were drowne all the stately shewes of others in the like, that had gone before him) he so pleased the people, & wan their loue therwith, that they deuised daily to giue him new offices for to requite him. At that time there were two factions in Rome, to wit, the faction of Sylla, which was very strong and of great power, & the other of Marius, which then was vnder foote & durst not shew it selfe. But Cæsar, bicause he would renue it again, euen at that time when he being Ædilis, all the feasts and common sports were in their greatest ruffe: he secretly caused images of Marius to be made, and of victories that caried triumphes, and those he set vp one night within the Capitol. The next morning when euery man saw the glistering of these golden images excellently well wrought, shewing by the inscriptions, that they were the victories which Marius had wonne apon the Cimbres: euery one marueled much at the boldnes

Then ſome cried out apon Cæſar, and ſayd it was a tyranny which he ment to ſet vp, by renuing of ſuch honors as before had bene troden vnder foote, and forgotten, by common decree and open proclamation: and that it was no more but a baite to gage the peoples good wils, which he had ſet out in the ſtately ſhewes of his cõmon playes, to ſee if he had brought them to his lure, that they would abide ſuch partes to be played, and a new alteracion of things to be made. They of Marius faction on thother ſide, incoraging one an other, ſhewed them ſelues ſtraight a great nũber gathered together, and made the mount of the Capitoll ring againe with their cries and clapping of handes: inſomuch as the teares ranne downe many of their cheekes for very ioy, when they ſawe the images of Marius, and they extolled Cæſar to the skies, iudging him the B worthieſt man of all the kinred of Marius. The Senate being aſſembled thereuppon, Catulus Luctatius one of the greateſt authoritie at that time in Rome, roſe, and vehemently inueyed againſt Cæſar, and ſpake that then which euer ſince hath bene noted much: that Cæſar did not now couertly go to worke, but by plaine force ſought to alter the ſtate of the common wealth. Neuertheleſſe, Cæſar at that time aunſwered him ſo that the Senate was ſatisfied. Thereupon they that had him in eſtimacion did grow in better hope then before, & perſwaded him, that hardily he ſhoulde geue place to no man, and that through the good will of the people, he ſhould be better than all they, and come to be the chiefeſt man of the citie. The ſute being equall betwext either of them, Catulus, bicauſe he was a man of greater calling and dignitie than the other, doubting the vncertaintie of the election: ſent vnto Cæſar a good ſumme of money, to make him leaue of his ſute. But Cæſar ſent him word againe, that he would lend a greater ſumme then that, to maintaine the ſute againſt him. When the day of thelection came, his mother bringing him to the dore of his houſe, Cæſar weeping, kiſſed her, and ſayd: Mother, this day thou ſhalt ſee thy ſonne chiefe Biſhoppe of Rome, or baniſhed from Rome. Then Catulus and Piſo fell flatly out with Cicero, and condemned him, for that he did not bewray Cæſar, when he knew that he was of conſpiracie with Catiline, and had oportunitie to haue done it. For when Catiline was bent and determined, not onely to ouerthrow the ſtate of the common wealth, but vterly to deſtroy the Empire of Rome, he ſcaped out of the handes of iuſtice for lacke of ſufficient proofe, before his full treaſon and determination was knowen. Notwithſtanding he left Lentulus and Cethegus in the citie, companions of his conſpiracie: vnto whom, whether Cæſar did geue any ſecret helpe or comfort, it is not well knowen. Yet this is manifeſt, that when they were conuinced in open Senate, Cicero being at that time Conſul, asking euery mans opinion in the Senate, what puniſhment they

And therefore, that if they were put in priſon in ſome citie of Italie, where Cicero thought beſt, vntill that Catiline were ouerthrowen: the Senate then might at their pleaſure quietly take ſuch order therein, as might beſt appeare vnto their wiſedoms. This opinion was thought more gentle, and withall was vttered with ſuch a paſſing good grace and eloquence, that not only they which were to ſpeake after him did approue it: but ſuch alſo as had ſpoken to the contrarie before, reuoked their opinion and ſtucke to his, vntil it came to Cato and Catulus to ſpeake. of

A of young men which garded Cicero for the safetie of his person, did sette upon him with their swordes drawen. But some say, that Curio couered Cæsar with his gowne, and tooke him out of their handes. And Cicero selfe, when the young men looked upon him, beckened with his head that they should not kil him, either fearing the fury of the people, or else that he thought it too shamefull and wicked a parte. But if that were true, I maruell why Cicero did not put it into his booke he wrote of his Consulshippe. But certainly they blamed him afterwards, for that he tooke not the opportunitie offered him against Cæsar, onely for ouermuch feare of the people, that loued him verie dearely. For shortly after, when Cæsar went into the Senate, to cleere him selfe of certaine presumptions and false accusations obiected against him, and being bitterly taunted among them, the Senate keeping him longer then they were wont: the B people came about the counsell house, and called out alowde for him, bidding them let him out. Cato then fearing the insurrection of the poore needie persons, which were they that put all their hope in Cæsar, and did also mone the people to stirre: did perswade the Senate to make a franke distribucion of corne vnto them, for a moneth. This distribucion did put the common wealth to a new charge of fiue hundred & fiftie Myriades. This counsell quenched a present great feare, and did in happie time scatter and disperse abroade the best parte of Cæsars force and power, at such time as he was made Prætor, and that for respect of his office he was most to be feared. Yet all the time he was officer, he neuer sought any alteration in the common wealth, but contrarily he him selfe had a great misfortune fell in his owne house, which was this. There was a young nobleman of the order of the PATRICIANS, called Publius
C Clodius, who lacked neither wealth nor eloquence, but otherwise as insolent and impudent a person, as any was else in ROME. He became in loue with Pompeia Cæsars wife, who misliked not withall: notwithstanding she was so straightly looked to, and that Aurelia (Cæsars mother) an honest gentlewoman had such an eye of her, that these two louers could not meete as they would, without great perill and difficultie. The ROMANES doe vse to honour a goddesse which they call the good goddesse, as the GRECIANS haue her whom they call Gynæcia, to wit, the goddesse of women. Her, the PHRYGIANS doe claime to be peculiar vnto them, saying: that she is king Midas mother. Howbeit the ROMANES hold opinion, that it is a nimphe of woodde, maried vnto god Faunus. The GRECIANS, they say also, that she was one of the mothers of D the god Bacchus, whom they dare not name. And for proofe hereof, on her feast day the women make certaine tabernacles of vine twigges, and leaues of vine braunches, and also they make as the tale goeth, a holie dragon for this goddesse, and doe set it by her: besides, it is not lawful for any man to be present at their sacrifices, no not within the house it selfe where they are made. Furthermore, they say that the women in these sacrifices do many things amongst them selues, much like vnto the ceremonies of Orpheus. Now when the time of this feast is in the husband, (whether he were Prætor or Consul) and all his men & the boyes in the house, doe come out of it, and leaue it wholly to his wife, to order the house at her pleasure, & there the sacrifices and ceremonies are done the most parte of the night, and they vse besides passe the night away in songes and musicke. Pompeia, Cæsars wife, being that yeare to celebrate this E feast, Clodius who had yet no heare on his face, & thereby thought he should not be discouered disguised him selfe in a singing wenches apparell, but his face was verie like vnto a young wenche. He finding the gates open, being secretly brought in by her chamberlaine that was made priuie vnto it: she left him, and tolde to Pompeia her mistres, to tell her of whom she was come. The chamber maide tarried long before she came againe, in so much as Clodius being wearie waiting for her where she left him, he tooke his pleasure, and went from one place to another in the house, which had very large roomes in it, still shunning the lights, vntil he by chaunce met with all by one of Aurelias maides, who taking him for a woman, prayed him to play. Clodius refusing to play, the maide pulled him forward, and asked him what he was: Clodius then answered her, that he taried for Abra one of Pompeias women. So Aurelias maide knowing him by his voyce, ranne straight where the lightes and Ladies were, and cried out F that there was a man disguised in womans apparell. The women there with were soe amazed, that Aurelia caused them presently to leaue of the ceremonies of the feastiue, and to hide their secret thinges, and hauing seene the gates fast locked, went immediatly vp and downe the house with torche light to seeke out this man: who at the last was found out in the chamber of Pompeias maide, with whom he hidde him selfe. Thus Clodius being found out, & knowen of the women, they thrust him out of the dores by the shoulders. The same night the women tolde their husbandes of this chaunce as soone as they came home. The next morning, there ranne a great rumor through the citie, how Clodius had attempted a great villanie, and that he deserued, not only to be punished of them whom he had slaundred, but also of the common wealth and the goddes. There was one of the Tribunes of the people that did indite him, & accuse him of high treason to the gods. Furthermore, there were also of the chiefest of the nobilitie and Senate, that came to depose against him, and burdened him with many horrible and detestable facts, and specially with incest committed with his owne sister, which was maried vnto Lucullus. Notwithstanding, the people stowtly defended Clodius against their accusations: and this did helpe him much against the Iudges, which were amazed, & afraid to time the people. This notwithstanding, Cæsar presently put his wife away, and thereupon being brought by Clodius accuser to be a witnes against him, he aunswered, he knew nothing of that they obiected against Clodius. This aunswere being cleane contrarie to their expectacion that heard it, the accuser asked Cæsar, why then he had put away his wife: bicause I will not, sayd he, that my wife be so much as suspected. And some say, that Cæsar spake truely as he thought. But others thinke, that he did it to please the common people, who were very desirous to saue Clodius. So Clodius was discharged of this accusation, bicause the most parte of the Iudges gaue a confused iudgement, for the feare they stoode one way of the daunger of the common people if they condemned him; and for the ill opinion of thother side of the nobilitie, if they did quit him. The gouernment of the prouince of SPAYNE being fallen vnto Cæsar for that he was Prætor: his creditors came and cried out apon him, and were importunate of him to be payed. Cæsar being vnable to satisfie them, was compelled to goe vnto Crassus, who was the richest man of all ROME, and that stoode in neede of Cæsars boldnes and courage to withstand Pompeys greatnes in the common wealth. Crassus became his suretie vnto his greediest creditors for the summe of eight hundred and thirtie talentes: whereuppon they suffered Cæsar to departe to the gouernment of his prouince. In his iorney it is reported, that passinge ouer the mountaines of the Alpes, they came through a litle poore village that had not many householdes, and yet poore cotages. There, his frendes that did accompanie him, asked him merily, if there were any contending for offices in that towne, and whether there were any strife there amongest the noble men for honor. Cæsar speaking in good earnest, aunswered: I can not tell that sayd he, but for my parte, I had rather be the chiefest man here, then the second person in ROME. An other time also when he was in SPAYNE, reading the history of Alexanders actes, when he had red it, he was sorowfull a good while after, & then burst out in weeping. His frends seeing that, marueled what should be the cause of his sorow. He answered them, do ye not thinke sayd he, that I haue good cause to be heauie, when king Alexander being no older than my selfe is now, had in old time wonne so many nations and countries, and that I hitherunto haue done nothing worthy of my selfe? Therefore when he was come into SPAYNE, he was very carefull of his busines, and had in few dayes ioyned ten ensignes more of footemen, vnto the other twenty which he had before. Then marching forward against the GALLACIANS and LVSITANIANS, he conquered all, & went as farre as the great sea Oceanum, subduing all the people which before knew not the ROMANES for their Lordes. There he tooke order for pacifying of the warre, and did as wisely take order for the establishing of peace. For he did reconcile the cities together, and made them frendes one with an other, but specially he pacified all sutes of law, & strife, betwext the detters and creditors, which grewe by reason of vsurie. For he ordained that the creditors shoulde take yearely two partes of the reuenue of their detters, vntill such time as they had payed them selues: and that the detters should haue the third parte to them selues to liue withall. He hauing wonne great estimacion by this good order taken, returned from his gouernment very riche, and his souldiers also full of rich spoyles, who called him Imperator, to say souraine Captaine. Now the ROMANES hauing a custome, that such as demaunded honor of triumphe, should remaine a while without the city, and that they on thother side which sued for the Consulship, should

A of neceſſitie be there in perſon: Cæſar comming vnhappely at that very time when the Conſuls were choſen, he ſent to pray the Senate to do him that fauor, that being abſent, he might by his frendes ſue for the Conſulſhippe. Cato at the firſt did vehemently inuey againſt it, vowching an expreſſe law forbidding the contrarie. But afterwards, perceiuing that notwithſtanding the reaſons he alleaged, many of the Senators (being wonne by Cæſar) fauored his requeſt: yet he cunningly ſought all he could to preuent them, prolonging time, dilating his oration vntill night. Cæſar thereupon determined rather to geue ouer the ſute of his triumphe, and to make ſute for the Conſulſhippe: and ſo came into the citie, and had ſuch a deuiſe with him, as went beyond them all, but Cato only. His deuiſe was this. Pompey and Craſſus, two of the greateſt perſonages of the city of Rome, being at iarre together, Cæſar made them frends, B and by that meanes got vnto him ſelfe the power of them both: for, by colour of that gentle acte and frendſhippe of his, he ſubtilly (vnwares to them all) did greatly alter and chaunge the ſtate of the common wealth. For it was not the priuate diſcord betwene Pompey and Cæſar, as many men thought, that cauſed the ciuill warre: but rather it was their agreement together, who ioyned all their powers firſt to ouerthrowe the ſtate of the Senate and nobilitie, and afterwardes they fell at iarre one with an other. But Cato, that then foreſaw and prophecied many times what woulde followe, was taken but for a vaine man: but afterwardes they found him a wiſer man, then happie in his counſell. Thus Cæſar being brought vnto the aſſemblie of the election, in the middeſt of theſe two noble perſons, whom he had before reconciled together: he was there choſen Conſull, with Calphurnius Bibulus, without gaine C ſaying or contradiction of any man. Now when he was entred into his office, he beganne to put foorth lawes meeter for a ſeditious Tribune of the people, than for a Conſull: bicauſe by them he preferred the diuiſion of landes, and diſtributing of corne to euerie citizen, Gratis, to pleaſe them withall. But when the noble men of the Senate were againſt his deuiſe, he deſiring no better occaſion, beganne to crie out, and to proteſt, that by the ouerhardneſſe and auſteritie of the Senate, they draue him againſt his will to leane vnto the people: and thereupon hauing Craſſus on thone ſide of him, and Pompey on thother, he asked them openly in thaſſemblie, if they did geue their conſent vnto the lawes which he had put forth. They both aunſwered, they did. Then he prayed them to ſtande by him againſt thoſe that threatned him with force of ſworde to let him. Craſſus gaue him his worde, he would. Pompey alſo did the D like, and added thereunto, that he would come with his ſword and target both, againſt them that would withſtand him with their ſwords. Theſe wordes offended much the Senate, being farre vnmeete for his grauetie, and vndecent for the maieſtie and honor he caried, and moſt of all vncomely for the preſence of the Senate whome he ſhould haue reuerenced: and were ſpeaches fitter for a raſh light headed youth, than for his perſon. Howbeit the common people on thother ſide, they reioyced. Then Cæſar bicauſe he would be more aſſured of Pompeis power and frendſhippe, he gaue him his daughter Iulia in mariage, which was made ſure before vnto Seruilius Cæpio, and promiſed him in exchaunge Pompeis wife, the which was ſure alſo vnto Fauſtus the ſonne of Sylla. And ſhortly after alſo, Cæſar ſelfe did marie Calphurnia the daughter of Piſo, whom he cauſed to be made Conſul, to ſucceede him the next yeare follow- E ing. Cato then cried out with open mouth, and called the gods to witnes, that it was a ſhamefull matter, and not to be ſuffered, that they ſhould in that ſorte make haucke of the Empire of Rome, by ſuch horrible bawdie matches, diſtributing among them ſelues through thoſe wicked mariages, the gouernments of the prouinces, and of great armies. Calphurnius Bibulus, fellow Conſul with Cæſar, perceiuing that he did contend in vaine, making all the reſiſtaunce he could to withſtand this lawe, and that oftentimes he was in daunger to be ſlaine with Cato, in the market place and aſſemblie: he kept cloſe in his houſe all the reſt of his Conſulſhippe. When Pompey had maried Iulia, he filled all the market place with ſouldiers, & by open force authoriſed the lawes which Cæſar made in the behalfe of the people. Furthermore, he procured that Cæſar had Gavle on this ſide, and beyond the Alpes, and all Illyria, with foure le- F gions graunted him for fiue yeares. Then Cato ſtanding vp to ſpeake againſt it: Cæſar bad his officers lay holde of him, and carie him to priſon, thinking he would haue appealed vnto the Tribunes. But Cato ſayd neuer a worde, when he went his way. Cæſar perceiuing then, that not onely the Senators and nobilitie were offended, but that the common people alſo for the reuerence they bare vnto Catoes vertues, were aſhamed, and went away with ſilence: he him ſelfe ſecretly did pray one of the Tribunes that he would take Cato from the officers. But after he had played this parte, there were few Senators that would be Preſident of the Senate vnder him, but left the citie, bicauſe they could not away with his doinges. And of them, there was an old man called Conſidius, that on a time boldly told him, the reſt durſt not come to counſel, bicauſe they were afrayed of his ſouldiers. Cæſar aunſwered him againe: and why then, doeſt not thou kepe thee at home, for the ſame feare? Conſidius replied, bicauſe my age taketh away feare from me: for hauing ſo ſhort a time to liue, I haue no care to prolonge it further. The ſhamefulleſt parte that Cæſar played while he was Conſul, ſeemeth to be this: when he choſe P. Clodius Tribune of the people, that had offred his wife ſuch diſhonor, and profaned the holy auncient miſteries of the women, which were celebrated in his owne houſe. Clodius ſued to be Tribune to no other end, but to deſtroy Cicero: & Cæſar ſelfe alſo departed not from Rome to his army, before he had ſet them together by the eares, and driuen Cicero out of Italy. All theſe things they ſay he did, before the warres with the Gavles. But the time of the great armies & cõqueſts he made afterwards, & of the warre in the which he ſubdued al the Gavles: (entring into an other courſe of life farre contrarie vnto the firſt) made him to be knowen for as valliant a ſouldier & as excellent a Captaine to lead men, as thoſe that afore him had bene counted the wiſeſt and moſt valliantest Generalles that euer were, and that by their valliant deedes had atchieued great honor. For whoſoeuer would compare the houſe of the Fabians, of the Scipioes, of the Metellians, yea thoſe alſo of his owne time, or long before him, as Sylla, Marius, the two Lucullians, and Pompey ſelfe,

VVhoſe fame aſcendeth vp vnto the heauens:

It will appeare that Cæſars prowes and deedes of armes, did excell them all together. The one, in the hard contries where he made warres: an other, in enlarging the realmes and contries which he ioyned vnto the Empire of Rome: an other, in the multitude and power of his enemies whome he ouercame: an other, in the rudeneſſe and auſtere nature of men with whom he had to doe, whoſe maners afterwardes he ſoftned and made ciuill: an other, in curteſie and clemencie which he vſed vnto them whome he had conquered: an other in great bountie and liberality beſtowed vpon them that ſerued vnder him in thoſe warres: and in fine, he excelled them all in the number of battells he had fought, and in the multitude of his enemies he had ſlaine in battell. For in leſſe then tenne yeares warre in Gavle he tooke by force and aſſault aboue eight hundred townes, he conquered three hundred ſeuerall nations: and hauing before him in battell thirty hundred thowſand ſouldiers, at ſundrie times he ſlue tenne hũdred thowſand of them, & tooke as many more priſoners. Furthermore, he was ſo entirely beloued of his ſouldiers, that to doe him ſeruice (where otherwiſe they were no more then other men in any priuate quarrell) if Cæſars honor were touched, they were inuincible, & would ſo deſperatly venter them ſelues, & with ſuch furie, that no man was able to abide them. And this appeareth plainly by the exãple of Acilius: who in a battell by ſea before the city of Marſelles, bording one of his enemies ſhippes, one cut of his right hand with a ſword, but yet he forſooke not his target which he had in his left hand, but thruſt it in his enemies faces, & made them flie, ſo that he wanne their ſhippe from them. And Caſſius Scæua alſo, in a conflict before the city of Dyrrachivm, hauing one of his eyes put out with an arrow, his ſhoulder ſtriken through with a dart, and his thigh with an other, and hauing receiued thirty arrowes vpon his ſhield: he called to his enemies, and made as though he would yeelde vnto them. But when two of them came running to him, he claue one of their ſhoulders from his bodie with his ſword, and hurt the other in the face: ſo that he made him turne his backe, & at the length ſaued him ſelfe, by meanes of his companions that came to helpe him. And in Britayne alſo, when the Captaines of the bandes were driuen into a marriſſe or bogge full of mire and durt, and that the enemies did fiercelie aſſaile them there: Cæſar then ſtandinge to viewe the battell, he ſawe a priuate ſouldier of his thruſt in among the Captaines, and fought ſo valliantlie in their defence, that at the length he draue the barbarous people to flye, and by his meanes ſaued the Captaines, which otherwiſe were in great daunger to haue bene caſt away.

Then

A Then this ſouldier being the hindemoſt man of all the Captaines, marching with great paine through the myre & durt, halfe ſwimming, and halfe a foote: in the end got to the other ſide, but left his ſhield behinde him. Cæſar wondring at his noble corage, ranne to him with ioy to imbrace him. But the poore ſouldier hanging downe his head, the water ſtanding in his eyes, fell downe at Cæſars feete, and beſought him to pardon him, for that he had left his targate behinde him. And in AFRICKE alſo, Scipio hauing taken one of Cæſars ſhippes, and Granius Petronius abourde on her amongeſt other, not long before choſen Treaſorer: he put all the reſt to the ſword but him, and ſayd he would geue him his life. But Petronius aunſwered him againe: that Cæſars ſouldiers did not vſe to haue their liues geuen them, but to geue others their liues: and with thoſe wordes he drewe his ſworde, and thruſt him ſelfe through. Nowe

B Cæſars ſelfe did breede this noble corage and life in them. Firſt, for that he gaue them bountifully, & did honor them alſo, ſhewing thereby, that he did not heape vp riches in the warres to maintaine his life afterwards in wantonneſſe and pleaſure, but that he did keepe it in ſtore, honorably to reward their valliant ſeruice: and that by ſo much he thought him ſelfe riche, by howe much he was liberall in rewarding of them that had deſerued it. Furthermore, they did not wonder ſo much at his valliantneſſe in putting him ſelfe at euery inſtant in ſuch manifeſt daunger, and in taking ſo extreame paines as he did, knowing that it was his greedie deſire of honor that ſet him a fire, and pricked him forward to doe it: but that he alwayes continued all labour and hardneſſe, more then his bodie could beare, that filled them all with admiration. For, concerning the conſtitucion of his bodie, he was leane, white, and ſoft skinned, and often ſubiect to headache, and otherwhile to the falling ſickenes: (the which tooke him the firſt time, as it is reported, in CORDVBA, a citie of SPAYNE) but yet therefore yeelded not to the diſeaſe of his bodie, to make it a cloke to cheriſhe him withall, but contrarilie, tooke the paines of warre, as a medicine to cure his ſicke bodie fighting alwayes with his diſeaſe, trauelling continually, liuing ſoberly, and commonly lying abroade in the field. For the moſt nights he ſlept in his coch or litter, and thereby beſtowed his reſt, to make him alwayes able to do ſome thing: and in the day time, he would trauell vp and downe the contrie to ſee townes, caſtels, and ſtrong places. He had alwayes a ſecretarie with him in his coche, who did ſtill wryte as he went by the way, and a ſouldier behinde him that caried his ſword. He made ſuch ſpeede the firſt time he came from ROME, when he had his office: that in eight dayes

D he came to the riuer of Rhone. He was ſo excellent a rider of horſe from his youth, that holding his handes behinde him, he would galloppe his horſe vpon the ſpurre. In his warres in GAVLE, he did further exerciſe him ſelfe to indite letters as he rode by the way, and did occupie two ſecretaries at once with as much as they could wryte: and as Oppius wryteth, more then two at a time. And it is reported, that Cæſar was the firſt that deuiſed frendes might talke together by wryting ciphers in letters, when he had no leaſure to ſpeake with them for his vrgent buſines, and for the great diſtaunce beſides from ROME. How litle accompt Cæſar made of his dyet, this example doth proue it. Cæſar ſupping one night in MILANE with his frende Valerius Leo, there was ſerued ſparrage to his bourde, and oyle of perfume put into it in ſtead of fallet oyle. He ſimplie eate it, and found no fault, blaming his frendes that were offended:

E and told them, that it had bene enough for them to haue abſteyned to eate of that they miſliked, and not to ſhame their frend, and how that he lacked good manner that found fault with his frend. An other time as he trauelled through the contrie, he was driuen by fowle weather on the ſodaine to take a poore mans cottage, that had but one litle cabin in it, and that was ſo narrowe, that one man could but ſcarce lye in it. Then he ſayd to his frendes that were about him: greateſt roomes are meeteſt for greateſt men, and the moſt neceſſarie roomes, for the ſickeſt perſons. And thereuppon he cauſed Oppius that was ſicke to lye there all night: and he him ſelfe, with the reſt of his frendes, lay with out dores, vnder the eaſing of the houſe. The firſt warre that Cæſar made with the GAVLES, was with the HELVETIANS and TIGVRINIANS, who hauing ſette fire of all their good cities, to the number of twelue, and foure hun-and soules in all) whereof there were a hundred, foure score, and tenne thowsande fighting men. Of those, it was not Cæsar him selfe that ouercame the TIGVRINIANS, but Labienus his Lieutenaunt, that ouerthrewe them by the riuer of Arax. But the HELVETIANS them selues came sodainly with their armie to set apon him, as he was going towardes a citie of his confederates. Cæsar perceiuing that, made haste to get him some place of strength, and there did sette his men in battell raye. When one brought him his horse to gette vp on which he vsed in battell, he sayd vnto them: when I haue ouercome mine enemies, I will then get vp on him to followe the chase, but nowe lette vs geue them charge. Therewith he marched forward a foote, and gaue charge: and there fought it out a long time, before he coulde make them flie that were in battell. But the greatest trouble he had, was to distresse their campe, and to breake their strength which they had made with their cartes. For there, they that before had fledde from the battell, did not onely put them selues in force, and valliantly fought it out: but their wiues and children also fighting for their liues to the death, were all slaine, and the battell was scant ended at midnight. Nowe if the act of this victorie was famous, vnto that he also added an other as notable, or exceeding it. For of all the barbarous people that had escaped from this battell, he gathered together againe aboue a hundred thowsande of them, and compelled them to returne home into their contrie which they had forsaken, and vnto their townes also which they had burnt: bicause he feared the GERMAINES would come ouer the riuer of Rheyne, and occupie that contrie lying voyde. The second warre he made, was in defence of the GAVLES against the GERMAINES: although before, he him selfe had caused Ariouistus their king, to be receiued for a confederate of the ROMANES. Notwithstanding, they were growen very vnquiet neighbours, and it appeared plainely, that hauing any occasion offered them to enlarge their territories, they woulde not content them with their owne, but ment to inuade and possesse the rest of GAVLE. Cæsar perceiuing that some of his Captaines trembled for feare, but specially the young gentlemen of noble houses of ROME, who thought to haue gone to the warres with him, as onely for their pleasure and gaine: he called them to counsell, and commaunded them that were affrayed, that they should depart home, and not put them selues in daunger against their willes, sith they had such womanishe faint hartes to shrinke when he had neede of them. And for him selfe, he sayd, he would set apon the barbarous people, though he had left him but the tenth legion onely, saying, that the enemies were no vallianter than the CIMBRI had bene, nor that he was a Captaine inferior vnto Marius. This oration being made, the souldiers of the tenth legion sent their Lieutenauntes vnto him, to thanke him for the good opinion he had of them: and the other legions also fell out with their Captaines, and all of them together followed him many dayes iorney with good will to serue him, vntill they came within two hundred furlonges of the campe of the enemies. Ariouistus corage was well cooled, when he sawe Cæsar was come, and that the ROMANES came to seeke out the GERMAINES, where they thought, and made accompt, that they durst not haue abidden them: and therefore nothinge mistrustinge it woulde haue come so to passe, he wondered much at Cæsars corage, and the more when he sawe his owne armie in a maze withall. But muche more did their corages fall, by reason of the foolishe women propheciers they had among them, which did foretell thinges to come: who, consideringe the waues and trouble of the riuers, and the terrible noyse they made runninge downe the streame, did forewarne them not to fight, vntill the newe moone. Cæsar hauinge intelligence thereof, and perceiuinge that the barbarous people thereuppon sturred not: thought it best then to sette vppon them, being discoraged with this superstitious feare, rather then losinge time, he shoulde tarie their leasure. So he did skirmishe with them euen to their fortes, and litle hilles where they lay, and by this meanes prouoked them so, that with great furie they came downe to fight. There he ouercame them in battell, and followed them in chase, with great slaughter, three hundred furlonge, euen vnto the riuer of Rheyn: and he filled all the fieldes thitherto with deade bodies and spoyles. Howebeit Ariouistus flyinge with speede, gotte ouer the riuer of Rheyn, and escaped with a fewe of his men. It is sayd that there were slaine foure score thowsande persons at this battel. After this exployte, Cæsar left his armie amongest the SEQVANES to winter there, and

A & he him ſelfe in the meane time, thinking of thaffayres at Rome, went ouer the mountaines into Gavle about the riuer of Po, being parte of his prouince which he had in charge. For there, the riuer called Rubico, deuideth the reſt of Italie from Gavle on this ſide the Alpes. Ceſar lying there, did practiſe to make frendes in Rome, bicauſe many came thither to ſee him: vnto whom he graunted their ſutes they demaunded, and ſent them home alſo, partely with liberall rewards, and partely with large promiſes and hope. Now during all this conqueſt of the Gavles, Pompey did not conſider how Ceſar enterchaungeablie did conquer the Gavles with the weapons of the Romanes, and wanne the Romanes againe with the money of the Gavles. Ceſar being aduertiſed that the Belgæ (which were the warlikeſt men of all the Gavles, and that occupied the third parte of Gavle) were all vp in armes,

B and had raiſed a great power of men together: he ſtraight made towardes them with all poſſible ſpeede, and founde them ſpoyling and ouerrunninge the contrie of the Gavles, their neighbours, and confederates of the Romanes. So he gaue them battell, and they fighting cowardly, he ouerthrew the moſt parte of them which were in a troupe together, & ſlue ſuch a number of them, that the Romanes paſſed ouer deepe riuers and lakes a foote, vpon their dead bodies, the riuers were ſo full of them. After this ouerthrow, they that dwelt neereſt vnto the ſea ſide, and were next neighbours vnto the Ocean, did yeeld them ſelues without any compulſion or fight: whereupon, he led his army againſt the Nervians, the ſtowreſt warriers of all the Belgæ. They dwelling in the wodde contrie, had conueyed their wiues, children and goods, into a maruelous great forreſt, as farre from their enemies as they could: and be-

C ing about the number of fiue ſcore thowſand fighting men and more, they came one day and ſet apon Ceſar, when his armie was out of order, and fortifying of his campe, litle looking to haue fought that day. At the firſt charge, they brake the horſemen of the Romanes, and compaſſing in the twelfth & ſeuenth legion, they ſlue all the Centurions & Captaines of the bands. And had not Ceſar ſelfe taken his ſhield on his arme, and flying in amongeſt the barbarous people, made a lane through them that fought before him: & the tenth legion alſo ſeeing him in daunger, ronne vnto him from the toppe of the hill where they ſtoode in battell, and broken the rankes of their enemies: there had not a Romane eſcaped a liue that day. But taking example of Ceſars valliantnes, they fought beſperatly beyond their power, and yet could not make the Nervians flie, but they fought it out to the death, till they were all in manner

D ſlaine in the field. It is wrytten that of three ſcore thowſand fighting men, there eſcaped only but fiue hundred: and of foure hundred gentlemen and counſellers of the Romanes, but three ſaued. The Senate vnderſtanding it at Rome, ordained that they ſhoulde doe ſacrifice vnto the goddes, and keepe feaſtes and ſolemne proceſſions fifteene dayes together without intermiſſion, hauing neuer made the like ordinaunce at Rome, for any victorie that euer was obteined. Bicauſe they ſaw the daunger had bene maruelous great, ſo many nations riſing as they did in armes together againſt him: and further, the loue of the people vnto him made his victory much more famous. For when Ceſar had ſet his affaires at a ſtay in Gavle, on the other ſide of the Alpes: he alwayes vſed to lye about the riuer of Po in the winter time, to geue direction for the eſtabliſhing of thinges at Rome, at his pleaſure. For, not only they that made

E ſute for offices at Rome were choſen Magiſtrates, by meanes of Ceſars money which he gaue them, with the which, bribing the people, they bought their voyces, and when they were in office, did al that they could to increaſe Ceſars power and greatnes: but the greateſt & chiefeſt men alſo of the nobilitie, went vnto Luca vnto him. As Pompey, Craſſus, Appius Prætor of Sardinia, and Nepos, Proconſull in Spayne. Inſomuch that there were at one time, fiue ſcore ſergeaunts carying roddes and axes before the Magiſtrats; and aboue two hundred Senators beſides. There they fell in conſultation, and determined that Pompey & Craſſus ſhould againe be choſen Conſuls the next yere following. But furthermore, they did appoint, that Ceſar ſhould haue money againe deliuered him to pay his armie, and beſides, did proroge the time of his gouernment, fiue yeares further. This was thought a very ſtraunge & an vnreaſonable matter

F vnto wiſe men. For they thē ſelues that had taken ſo much money of Ceſar, perſwaded the Senate to let him haue money of the cōmon treaſure, as though he had had none before: yea to ſpeake more plainly, they compelled the Senate almoſt, ſighing & lamenting to ſee the decrees they passed. Cato was not there then, for they had purposely sent him before into Gaule. Howbeit Faonius that followed Catoes steppes, when he sawe that he could not preuaile, nor withstande them: he went out of the Senate in choller, and cried out amongest the people, that it was a horrible shame. But no man did hearken to him: some for the reuerence they bare vnto Pompey, and Crassus, and others fauoring Cæsars proceedinges, did put all their hope and trust in him: and therefore did quiet them selues, and sturred not. Then Cæsar returning into Gaule beyonde the Alpes vnto his armie, founde there a greate warre in the contrie. For two great nations of Germanie had not long before passed ouer the riuer of Rheyn, to conquer newe landes: and the one of these people were called Ipes, and the other Tenterides. Now touching the battell which Cæsar fought with them, he him selfe doth describe it in his commentaries, in this sorte. That the barbarous people hauing sent Ambassadours vnto him, to require peace for a certaine time: they notwithstanding, against lawe of armes, came and sette apon him as he trauelled by the way, insomuch as eight hundred of their men of armes ouerthrewe fiue thowsande of his horsemen, who nothinge at all mistrusted their comming. Againe, that they sent him other Ambassadours to mocke him once more: but that he kept them, and therewith caused his whole armie to marche against them, thinking it a follie, and madnesse, to keepe faith with such trayterous barbarous breakers of leagues. Canutius wryteth, that the Senate appointing againe to doe newe sacrifice, processions, and feastes, to geue thankes to the goddes for this victorie: Cato was of contrarie opinion, that Cæsar should be deliuered into the handes of the barbarous people, for to pourge their city and common wealth of this breache of faith, and to turne the curse apon him, that was the author of it. Of these barbarous people, which came ouer the Rheyn (being about the number of foure hundred thowsand persons) they were all in maner slaine, sauing a very fewe of them, that flying from the battell got ouer the riuer of Rheyn againe, who were receiued by the Sicambrians, an other people of the Germaines. Cæsar taking this occasion against them, lacking no good will of him selfe besides, to haue the honor to be counted the first Romane that euer passed ouer the riuer of Rheyn with an armie: he built a bridge ouer it. This riuer is maruelous broade, and runneth with great furie. And in that place specially where he built his bridge, for there it is of a great bredth from one side to thother, and it hath so strong and swift a streame besides: that men casting downe great bodies of trees into the riuer (which the streame bringeth downe with it) did with the great blowes and force thereof maruelously shake the postes of the bridge he had set vp. But to preuent the blowes of those trees, and also to breake the furie of the streame: he made a pile of great wodde aboue the bridge a good way, and did forcibly ramme them in to the bottome of the riuer, so that in ten dayes space, he had set vp and finisht his bridge of the goodliest carpenters worke, and most excellent inuention to see to, that could be possibly thought or deuised. Then passing ouer his army vpon it, he found none that durst any more fight with him. For the Svevians, which were the warlikest people of all Germany, had gotten them selues with their goodes into wonderfull great valleis and bogges, full of woddes and forrestes. Nowe when he had burnt all the contrie of his enemies, and confirmed the league with the confederats of the Romanes: he returned backe againe into Gaule after he had taried eighteene dayes at the most in Germany, on thother side of the Rheyn. The iorney he made also into England, was a noble enterprise, and very commendable. For he was the first that sailed the west Ocean with an army by sea, & that passed through the sea Atlanticum with his army, to make warre in that so great & famous Ilande: (which many auncient wryters would not beleue that it was so in deede, and did make them vary about it, saying that it was but a fable & a lye) and was the first that enlarged the Romane Empire, beyonde the earth inhabitable. For twise he passed ouer the narrowe sea against the firme lande of Gaule, and fighting many battells there, did hurt his enemies more, then enriche his owne men: because, of men hardlie brought vp, and poore, there was nothing to be gotten. Whereupon his warre had not such successe as he looked for, and therefore takinge pledges onely of the kinge, and imposing a yearely tribute apon him, to be payed vnto the people of Rome: he returned againe into Gaule. There he was no sooner landed, but he founde letters ready to be sent ouer the sea vnto him,

A in the which he was aduertised from ROME, of the death of his Daughter, that she was dead with child by Pompey. For the which, Pompey & Cæsar both, were maruelous sorowfull: & their friends mourned also, thinking that this alliance which maintained the common wealth (that otherwise was very tickle) in good peace and concord, was now seuered, and broken a sonder, and the rather likely, because the childe liued not long after the mother. So the common people at ROME tooke the corps of Iulia, in dispite of the Tribunes, and buried it in the fielde of Mars. Now Cæsar being driuen to deuide his armie (that was very great) into sundry garrisons for the winter time, and returning againe into ITALY as he was wont: all GAVLE rebelled againe, and had raysed great armies in euery quarter to set apon the ROMANES, and to assay if they could distresse their forts where they lay in garrison. The greatest number and most warlike men of these GAVLES, that entred into action of rebellion, were led by one Ambiorix: and first did set vpon the garrisons of Cotta, and Titurius, whom they slue, and all the souldiers they had about them. Then they went with three score thowsand fighting men to beseege the garrison which Quintus Cicero had in his charge, and had almost taken them by force, because all the souldiers were euery man of them hurt: but they were so valiant and courageous, that they did more then men (as they say) in defending of them selues. These newes being come to Cæsar, who was farre from thence at that time, he returned with all possible speede, and leuying seuen thowsand souldiers, made haste to helpe Cicero that was in such distresse. The GAVLES that did beseege Cicero, vnderstanding of Cæsars comming, raysed their seege incontinently, to goe and meete him, making accompt that he was but a handfull in their handes, they were O so fewe. Cæsar to deceiue them, still drewe backe, and made as though he fled from them, lodging in places meete for a Captaine that had but a few, to fight with a great number of his enemies, and commaunded his men in no wise to sturre out to skirmish with them, but compelled them to rayse vp the rampers of his campe, and to fortifie the gates, as men that were afraid, because the enemies should the lesse esteeme of them: vntill that at length he tooke opportunitie, by their disorderly coming to assaile the trenches of his campe, (they were growen to such a presumptuous boldnes and brauery) and then salying out apon them, he put them all to flight with slaughter of a great number of them. This did suppresse all the rebellions of the GAVLES in those parties, and furthermore, he him selfe in person went in the middest of winter thether, where he heard they did rebell: for that there was come a newe supply out of D ITALY of three whole legions in their roome, which he had lost: of the which, two of them Pompey lent him, and the other legion, he him selfe had leuyed in GAVLE about the riuer of Po. During these sturres, brake forth the beginning of the greatest & most daungerous warre that he had in all GAVLE, the which had bene secretly practised of long time by the chiefest & most warlike people of that contry, who had leuied a wonderfull great power. For euery where they leuied multitudes of men, & great riches besides, to fortesse their stronge holdes. Furthermore the contry where they rose, was very ill to come vnto, and specially at that time being winter, when the riuers were frosen, the woodes and forrests couered with snowe, the meadowes drowned with fluddes, and the fieldes so deepe of snow, that no wayes were to be found, neither the marishes nor riuers to be decerned, all was so ouerflowen and drowned with E water: all which troubles together were enough (as they thought) to keepe Cæsar from setting vpon the rebels. Many nations of the GAVLES were of this conspiracy, but two of the chiefest were the ARVERNIANS and CARNVTES: who had chosen Vercingentorix for their Lieuetenant generall, whose father the GAVLES before had put to death, because they thought he aspired to make him selfe king. This Vercingentorix deuiding his armie into diuers partes, and appointing diuers Captaines ouer them, had gotten to take his part, all the people and contries thereabout, euen as farre as they that dwell towards the * sea Adriatick, hauing further determined (vnderstanding that ROME did cõspire against Cæsar) to make all GAVLE rise in armes against him. So that if he had but taried a litle lenger, vntill Cæsar had entred into his cruell warres: he had put all ITALY in as great feare and daunger, as it was when the CIMBRI did F come and inuade it. But Cæsar, that was very valiant in all assaies and daungers of warre, and that was very skilfull to take time and oportunitie, so soone as he vnderstoode the newes of the rebellion, he departed with speede, and returned backe the selfe same way which he had

ſar. Inſomuch as Cæſar ſelfe comming that way by occaſion, ſawe it, and fell a laughing at it.
But ſome of his friendes going about to take it away, he would not ſuffer them, but bad them let it alone, and touch it not, for it was a holy thinge. Notwithſtanding, ſuch as at the firſt had ſaued them ſelues by fleeing, the moſt of them were gotten with their king into the citie of A- C The ſeege of Alexia. LEXIA, the which Cæſar went and beſeeged, although it ſeemed inexpugnable, both for the height of the wals, as alſo for the multitude of ſouldiers they had to defend it. But now during this ſeege, he fell into a maruelous great daunger without, almoſt incredible. For an armie of Cæſars daunger, and wiſe policie. three hundred thowſand fighting men of the beſt men that were among all the nations of the GAVLES, came againſt him, being at the ſeege of ALEXIA, beſides them that were within the citie, which amounted to the number of three ſcore and tenne thowſand fighting men at the leaſt: ſo that perceiuing he was ſhut in betwixt two ſo great armies, he was driuen to fortifie him ſelfe with two walls, the one againſt them of the citie, and the other againſt them without. For if thoſe two armies had ioyned together, Cæſar had bene vtterly vndone. And therefore, this ſeege of ALEXIA, and the battell he wanne before it, did deſeruedly winne him more D honor and fame, then any other. For there, in that inſtant and extreame daunger, he ſhewed more valiantnes and wiſdom, then he did in any battell he fought before. But what a wonder-Cæſars great victorie at Alexia. full thing was this? that they of the citie neuer heard any thing of them that came to ayde them, vntill Cæſar had ouercome them: and furthermore, that the ROMANES them ſelues which kept watch vpon the wall that was built againſt the citie, knew alſo no more of it, then they, but when it was done, and that they heard the cryes and lamentacions of men & women in ALEXIA, when they perceiued on thother ſide of the citie ſuch a nũber of gliſtering ſhields of gold and ſiluer, ſuch ſtore of bloody corſelets and armors, ſuch a deale of plate and mouen ables, and ſuch a number of tents and pauilyons after the facion of the GAVLES, which the ROMANES had gotten of their ſpoyles in their campe. Thus ſodainely was this great armie va- E niſhed, as a dreame or viſion: where the moſt part of them were ſlaine that day in battell. Fur-Alexia yelded vp to Cæſar. thermore, after that they within the citie of ALEXIA had done great hurt to Cæſar, and them ſelues alſo: in the ende, they all yelded them ſelues. And Vercingentorix (he that was their king and Capteine in all this warre) went out of the gates excellently well armed, and his horſe fur-niſhed with riche cappariſon accordingly, and rode round about Cæſar, who ſate in his chayer of eſtate. Then lighting from his horſe, he tooke of his cappariſon and furniture, and vnarmed him ſelfe, and layed all on the ground, and went and ſate downe at Cæſars feete, and ſayd neuer a word. So Cæſar at length committed him as a priſoner taken in the warres, to leade him afterwards in his triumphe at ROME. Nowe Cæſar had of long time determined to deſtroy Pom- pey, and Pompey him alſo. For Craſſus being killed amongeſt the PARTHIANS, who onely did ſee, F that one of them two muſt needes fall: nothing kept Cæſar from being the greateſt perſon, but bicauſe he deſtroied not Pompey, that was the greater: neither did any thing let Pompey to withſtand

A ſtand that it ſhould not come to paſſe, but becauſe he did not firſt ouercome Cæſar, whom onely he feared. For till then, Pompey had not long feared him, but alwayes before ſeelight by him, thinking it an eaſie matter for him to put him downe when he would, ſithe he had brought him to that greatnes he was come vnto. But Cæſar contrarily, hauing had that drift in his head from the beginning, like a wreſtler that ſtudieth for trickes to ouerthrowe his aduerſary: he went farre from Rome, to exerciſe him ſelfe in the warres of Gavle, where he did trayne his armie, and preſently by his valiant deedes did increaſe his fame and honor. By theſe meanes became Cæſar as famous as Pompey in his doings, and lacked no more to put his enterpriſe in execution, but ſome occaſions of quarrell, which Pompey partly gaue him, and partly alſo the tyme deliuered him, but chiefly, the hard fortune and ill gouernment at that tyme of the com-

B mon wealth at Rome. For they that made ſute for honor and offices, bought the voyces of the people with ready money, which they gaue out openly to vſury, without ſhame or feare. Thereupon, the common people that had ſold their voyces for money, came to the market place at the day of election, to fight for him that had hyered them: not with their voices, but with their bowes, ſlings, and ſwordes. So that the aſſembly ſeldom tyme brake vp, but that the pulpit for orations was defiled and ſprinckled with the bloode of them that were ſlayne in the market place, the citie remayning all that tyme without gouernment of Magiſtrate, like a ſhippe left without a Pilote. Inſomuch, as men of deepe iudgement & diſcreſſion ſeing ſuch furie & madnes of the people, thought thẽ ſelues happy if the cõmon wealth were no worſe troubled, thẽ with the abſolut ſtate of a Monarchy & ſoueraine Lord to gouerne them. Furthermore, there

C were many that were not affraid to ſpeake it openly, that there was no other help to remedy the troubles of the cõmon wealth, but by the authority of one man only, that ſhould cõmaund thẽ all: & that this medicine muſt be miniſtred by the hands of him, that was the getleſt Phiſition, meaning couertly Pompey. Now Pompey vſed many fine ſpeeches, making ſemblance as though he would none of it, and yet cunningly vnder hand did lay all the yrons in the fire he could, to bring it to paſſe, that he might be choſen Dictator. Cato finding the mark he ſhot at, & fearing leaſt in the end the people ſhould be compelled to make him Dictator: he perſwaded the Senat rather to make him ſole Conſul, that contenting him ſelf with that more iuſt & lawful gouernment, he ſhould not couet the other vnlawfull. The Senate following his counſel, did not only make him Conſul, but further did prorogue his gouernment of the prouinces he had. For

D he had two prouinces, all Spayne, & Affrick, the which he gouerned by his Lieuetenants: & further, he receiued yearely of the common treaſure to pay his ſouldiers a thowſand talents. Hereuppon Cæſar tooke occaſion alſo to ſend his men to make ſute in his name for the Conſulſhip, & alſo to haue the gouernment of his prouinces proroged. Pompey at the firſt held his peace. But Marcellus and Lentulus (that otherwiſe hated Cæſar) withſtood them, and to ſhame and diſhonor him, had much needeles ſpeech in matters of weight. Furthermore, they tooke away the fredom from the Colonyes which Cæſar had lately brought vnto the citie of Novvm Comvm in Gavle towards Italy, where Cæſar not long before had lodged them. And moreouer, when Marcellus was Conſul, he made one of the Senators in that citie to be whipped with roddes, who came to Rome about thoſe matters: & ſaid, he gaue him thoſe markes, Cæſar ſueth the ſecond time to be Conſul, and to haue his gouernment proroged.

E that he ſhould know he was no Romane Citizen, and bad him goe his way, and tel Cæſar of it. After Marcellus Conſulſhip, Cæſar ſetting open his cofers of the treaſure he had gotte among the Gavles, did franckely giue it out amongeſt the Magiſtrates at Rome, without reſtrainte or ſpare. Firſt, he ſet Curio, the Tribune cleare out of debt: and gaue alſo vnto Paule the Conſul a thowſand fiue hundred talents, with which money he built that notable pallace by the market place, called Paules Baſilicke, in the place of Fulvius Baſilicke. Then Pompey being affraid of this practiſe, began openly to procure, both by him ſelfe and his friends, that they ſhould ſend Cæſar a ſucceſſor: and moreouer, he ſent vnto Cæſar for his two legions of men of warre which he had lent him, for the conqueſt of Gavle. Cæſar ſent him them againe, and gaue euery priuate ſouldier, two hundred and fiftie ſiluer drachmas. Now, they that brought theſe two legilice and secret spite which the gouernours there did beare him, he could hardly obteyne that A he desired: yet in GAVLE he might assure him selfe, that all the armie was at his commaunde-ment. They added further also, that if the souldiers there did once returne ouer the moun-taines againe into ITALY, they would all straight come to him, they did so hate Cæsar: bicause he wearied them with too much labor and continuall fight, and withal, for that they suspected he aspired to be king. These words breeding securitie in Pompey, & a vaine conceit of him selfe, made him negligent in his doings, so that he made no preparatiō for warre, as though he had no occasion to be affraid: but onely studied to thwart Cæsar in speech, & to crosse the sutes he made. Howbeit Cæsar passed not of all this. For the report went, that one of Cæsars Captaines which was sent to ROME to prosecute his sute, being at the Senate dore, and hearing that they denied to proroge Cæsars time of gouernment which he sued for: clapping his hand vpon his B sword, he said, sith you wil not graūt it him, this shal giue it him. Notwithstanding, the requests Cæsars requests vnto the Senate. that Cæsar propownded, caried great semblance of reason with them. For he said, that he was contented to lay downe armes, so that Pompey did the like: & that both of them as priuat persons should come & make sute of their Citizens to obtaine honorable recompence: declaring vnto them, that taking armes from him, & graunting them vnto Pompey, they did wrongefully accuse him in going about to make him selfe a tyranne, & in the meane time to graunt the other meanes to be a tyranne. Curio making these offers & perswasions openly before the people, in the name of Cæsar: he was heard with great reioycing & clapping of hands, and there were some that cast flowers and nosegayes vpon him when he went his way, as they commonly vse to doe vnto any man, when he hath obteined victorye, and wonne any games. Then Antonius C one of the Tribunes, brought a letter sent from Cæsar, and made it openly to be read in despite of the Consuls. But Scipio in the Senate, Pompeys father in law, made this motion: that if Cæsar did not dismisse his armie by a certaine day appoynted him, the ROMANES should proclayme him an enemie vnto ROME. Then the Consuls openly asked in the presence of the Senators, if they thought it good that Pompey should dismisse his armie: But few agreed to that demaund.

After that againe they asked, if they liked that Cæsar should dismisse his armie: thereto they all in manner aunswered, yea, yea. But when Antonius requested agayne that bothe of them should lay downe armes: then they were all indifferently of his minde. Notwithstanding, bi-cause Scipio did insolently behaue him selfe, and Marcellus also, who cryed that they must vse force of armes, & not mens opinions against a theefe: the Senate rose straight vpon it without D further determination, & men chaunged apparel through the citie bicause of this dissention, as they vse to do in a common calamity. After that, there came other letters from Cæsar, which semed much more reasonable: in the which he requested that they would graunt him GAVLE, that lyeth betwene the Mountaines of the Alpes & ITALY, & ILLYRIA, with two legions only, & then that he would request nothing els, vntil he made sute for the second Consulship. Cicero the Orator, that was newly come from his gouernment of CILICIA, trauelled to reconcile them together, & pacified Pompey the best he could: who told him, he would yeld to any thing he would haue him, so he did let him alone with his armie. So Cicero perswaded Cæsars friends to be contented, to take those two prouinces, and six thowsand men onely, that they might be friends & at peace together. Pompey very willingly yelded vnto it, & graunted them. But Lentu- E lus the Consul would not agree to it, but shamefully draue Curio and Antonius out of the Senate: whereby they them selues gaue Cæsar a happy occasion & culler, as could be, stirring vp his souldiers the more against them, whē he shewed them these two notable men & Tribunes of the people that were driuen to flie, disguised like slaues, in a cariers cart. For, they were dri-in all about him, aboue fiue thowsand footemen, and three thowsand horsemen: for the rest of his armie, he left on thother side of the Mountaines to be brought after him by his Lieuete-nants. So, considering that for the execution of his enterprise, he should not neede so many men of warre at the first, but rather sodainly stealing vpon them, to make them affraid with his va-liantnes, taking benefit of the oportunitie of tyme, bicause he should more easily make his e- F nemies affraid of him, comming so sodainly when they looked not for him, then he should otherwise distresse them, assailing them with his whole armie, in giuing them leysure to pro-

A uide further for him: he commaunded his Captaines and Lieuetenants to go before, without any other armor then their ſwords, to take the citie of ARIMINVM, (a great citie of GAVLE, being the firſt citie men come to, when they come out of GAVLE) with as litle bloodſhed and tumult, as they could poſſible. Then committing that force and armie he had with him, vnto Hortenſius one of his friends: he remeyned a whole day together, openly in the ſight of euery man, to ſee the ſworde players handle their weapons before him. At night he went into his lodging, and bathing his body a litle, came afterwards into the hall amongeſt them, and made mery with them a while, whome he had bidden to ſupper. Then when it was well forwarde night, and very darke, he roſe from the table, and prayed his company to be mery, and no man to ſturre, for he would ſtraight come to them againe: howebeit he had ſecretly before com-B maunded a fewe of his truſtieſt friendes to followe him, not altogether, but ſome one way, and ſome an other way. He him ſelfe in the meane tyme tooke a coche he had hyered, and made as though he woulde haue gonne ſome other waye at the firſt, but ſodainely he turned backe againe towardes the citie of ARIMINVM. When he was come vnto the litle ryuer of Rubicon, which deuideth GAVLE on this ſide the Alpes from ITALY: he ſtayed vppon a ſodaine. For, the nearer he came to execute his purpoſe, the more remorſe he had in his conſci-C ence, to thinke what an enterpriſe he tooke in hand: & his thoughts alſo fell out more doubtfull, when he entred into conſideration of the deſperatnes of his attempt. So he fell into many thoughts with him ſelfe, and ſpake neuer a word, wauing ſometime one way, ſometime an other way, and often times chaunged his determination, contrary to him ſelfe. So did he talke much alſo with his friends he had with him, amongeſt whom was Aſinius Pollio, telling them what miſchieues the beginning of this paſſage ouer that riuer would breede in the world, and how much their poſteritie and them that liued after them, would ſpeake of it in time to come. But at length, caſting from him with a noble courage, all thoſe perillous thoughts to come, & ſpeaking theſe words which valiant men commonly ſay, that attempt daungerous and deſperat enterpriſes, A deſperat man feareth no daunger, come on: he paſſed ouer the riuer, and when D he was come ouer, he ranne with his coche and neuer ſtaied, ſo that before day light he was within the citie of ARIMINVM, and tooke it. It is ſaid, that the night before he paſſed ouer this riuer, he dreamed a damnable dreame, that he carnally knew his mother. The citie of ARIMINVM being taken, and the rumor thereof diſperſed through all ITALY, euen as if it had bene open warre both by ſea & land, & as if all the lawes of ROME, together with thextreme bounds and confines of the ſame had bene broken vp: a man would haue ſayd, that not onely the men and women for feare, as experience proued at other times, but whole cities them ſelues leauing their habitations, fled from one place to another through all ITALY. And ROME it ſelfe
E alſo was immediatly filled with the flowing repaire of all the people their neighbours thereabouts, which came thither from all parties like droues of cattell, that there was neither officer nor Magiſtrate that could any more commaund them by authoritie, neither by any perſwaſion of reaſon bridle ſuch a confuſed and diſorderly multitude: ſo that ROME had in maner deſtroyed it ſelfe for lacke of rule and order. For in all places, men were of contrary opinions, and there were daungerous ſturres and tumults euery where: bicauſe they that were glad of this F trouble, could keepe in no certaine place, but running vp and downe the citie, when they met with others in diuers places, that ſeemed either to be affraid or angry with this tumult (as otherwiſe it is impoſſible in ſo great a citie) they flatly fell out with them, and boldly threatned them with that that was to come. Pompey him ſelfe, who at that time was not a litle amazed, was yet much more troubled with the ill wordes ſome gaue him on the one ſide, and ſome on the other. For ſome of them reproued him, and ſayd that he had done wiſely, and had paid for his folly, becauſe he had made Cæſar ſo great and ſtronge againſt him & the common wealth. And other againe did blame him, bicauſe he had refuſed the honeſt offers and reaſonable condicions of peace, which Cæſar had offered him, ſuffering Lentulus the Conſul to abuſe him too much. On thother ſide, Phaonius ſpake vnto him, and bad him ſtampe on the ground with his foote: For Pompey beeing one day in a brauerie in the Senate, ſayd openly: let no man take thought for preparation of warre, for when he lyſted, with one ſtampe of his foote on the ground, he would fill all ITALY with ſouldiers. This notwithſtanding, Pompey at that tyme had greater number of ſouldiers then Cæſar: but they would neuer let him follow his owne determination. For they brought him ſo many lyes, and put ſo many examples of feare before him, as if Cæſar had bene already at their heeles, and had wonne all: ſo that in the ende he yelded vnto them, and gaue place to their furie and madnes, determining (ſeeing all thinges in ſuch tumult and garboyle) that there was no way but to forſake the citie, and thereuppon commaunded the Senate to follow him, and not a man to tary there, vnles he loued tyrannie, more then his owne libertie and the common wealth. Thus the Conſuls them ſelues, before they had done their common ſacrifices accuſtomed at their going out of the citie, fled euery man of them. So did likewiſe the moſte parte of the Senators, taking their owne thinges in haſte, ſuch as came firſt to hande, as if by ſtealth they had taken them from another. And there were ſome of them alſo that alwayes loued Cæſar, whoſe witts were then ſo troubled and beſides them ſelues, with the feare they had conceyued: that they alſo fled, and followed the ſtreame of this tumult, without manifeſt cauſe or neceſſitie. But aboue all thinges, it was a lamentable ſight to ſee the citie it ſelfe, that in this feare and trouble was left at all aduenture, as a ſhippe toſſed in ſtorme of ſea, forſaken of her Pilots, and diſpairing of her ſafetie. This their departure being thus miſerable, yet men eſteemed their baniſhment (for the loue they bare vnto Pompey) to bee their naturall contry, and reckoned Rome no better then Cæſars campe. At that tyme alſo Labienus, who was one of Cæſars greateſt friendes, and had bene alwayes vſed as his Lieuetenant in the warres of Gavle, and had valiantly fought in his cauſe: he likewiſe forſooke him then, and fled vnto Pompey. But Cæſar ſent his money and cariage after him, and then went and encamped before the citie of Corfinivm, the which Domitius kept, with thirty cohorts or enſignes. When Domitius ſawe he was beſeeged, he ſtraight thought him ſelfe but vndone, and diſpayring of his ſucceſſe, he bad a Phiſition, a ſlaue of his, giue him poyſon. The Phiſition gaue him a drinke which he dranke, thinking to haue dyed. But ſhortly after, Domitius hearing them reporte what clemencie and wonderfull curteſie Cæſar vſed vnto them he tooke: repented him then that he had dronke this drinke, and beganne to lament and bewayle his deſperate reſolucion taken to dye. The Phiſition did comfort him againe, and tolde him, that he had taken a drinke, onely to make him ſleepe, but not to deſtroy him. Then Domitius reioyced, and went ſtraight and yelded him ſelfe vnto Cæſar: who gaue him his life, but he notwithſtanding ſtale away immediatly, and fled vnto Pompey. When theſe newes were brought to Rome, they did maruelouſly reioyce and comfort them that ſtill remayned there: and moreouer there were of them that had forſaken Rome, which returned thither againe. In the meane time, Cæſar did put all Domitius men in paye, and he did the like through all the cities, where he had taken any Captaines, that leauied men for Pompey. Now Cæſar hauing aſſembled a great and dreadfull power together, went ſtraight where he thought to finde Pompey him ſelfe. But Pompey taried not his comming, but fled into the citie of Brvndvsivm, from whence he had ſent the two Conſuls before with that armie he had, vnto Dyrrachivm: and he him ſelfe alſo went thither afterwards, when he vnderſtoode that Cæſar was come, as you ſhall heare more amply hereafter in his life. Cæſar lacked no good will to follow him, but wanting ſhippes to take the ſeas, he returned forthwith to Rome: So that in leſſe then three skore dayes, he was Lord of all Italy, without any blood ſhed. Who when he was come to Rome, and found it much quietter then he looked for, and many Senatours there alſo: he curteouſly intreated them, and prayed them to ſend vnto Pompey, to pacifie all matters betweene them, apon reaſonable conditions. But no man did attempt it, eyther bicauſe they feared Pompey for that they had forſaken him, or els for that they thought Cæſar ment not as he ſpake, but that they were wordes of courſe, to culler his purpoſe withall. And when Metellus alſo, one of the Tribunes, would not ſuffer him to take any of the common treaſure out of the temple of Saturne, but tolde him that it was againſt the lawe: Tuſhe, ſayd he, tyme of warre and lawe are two thinges. If this that I doe, quoth he, doe offende thee, then get thee hence for this tyme: for warre can not abyde this francke and bolde ſpeeche. But when warres are done, and that we are all quiet agayne, then thou ſhalt ſpeake in the pulpit what thou wilt: and yet I doe tell thee this of fauor, impayring ſo much my right, for thou art myne, both thou, and all them that haue riſen againſt me, and whom I haue in my hands.

When

A When he had ſpoken thus vnto Metellus, he went to the temple dore where the treaſure laye: and finding no keyes there, he cauſed Smythes to be ſent for, and made them breake open the lockes. Metellus thereuppon beganne agayne to withſtande him, and certen men that ſtoode by prayſed him in his doing: but Cæſar at length ſpeaking biggely to him, threatned him he would kill him preſently, if he troubled him any more: and told him furthermore, younge man, quoth he, thow knoweſt it is harder for me to tell it thee, than to doe it. That word made Metellus quake for feare, that he gotte him away rowndly: and euer after that, Cæſar had all at his commaundement for the warres. From thence he went into SPAYNE, to make warre with Petreius and Varro, Pompeys Lieuetenants: firſt to gette their armies and prouinces into his hands which they gouerned, that afterwardes he might follow Pompey the better, B leauing neuer an enemie behinde him. In this iorney he was oftentymes him ſelfe in daunger, through the ambuſhes that were layde for him in diuers ſtraunge ſortes and places, and likely alſo to haue loſt all his armie for lacke of vittells. All this notwithſtanding, he neuer left following of Pompeys Lieuetenants, prouoking them to battell, and intrenching them in: vntill he had gotten their campe & armies into his handes, albeit that the Lieuetenants them ſelues fled vnto Pompey. When Cæſar returned agayne to ROME, Piſo his father in lawe gaue him counſell to ſende Ambaſſadors vnto Pompey, to treate of peace. But Iſauricus, to flatter Cæſar, was againſt it. Cæſar beeing then created Dictator by the Senate, called home againe all the baniſhed men, and reſtored their children to honor, whoſe fathers before had beene ſlayne in Syllaes tyme: and did ſomewhat cutte of the vſuries that did oppreſſe them, and be- C ſides, did make ſome ſuch other ordinances as thoſe, but very fewe. For he was Dictator but eleuen dayes onely, and then did yeld it vppe of him ſelfe, and made him ſelfe Conſul, with Seruilius Iſauricus, and after that determined to followe the warres. All the reſt of his armie he left comming on the way behind him, and went him ſelfe before with ſix hundred horſe, and fiue legions onely of footemen, in the winter quarter, about the moneth of Ianuary, which after the ATHENIANS, is called POSIDEON. Then hauing paſt ouer the ſea Ionium, and landed his men, he wanne the cities of ORICVM and APOLLONIA. Then he ſent his ſhippes backe againe vnto BRVNDVSIVM, to tranſport the reſt of his ſouldiers that could not come with that ſpeede he did. They as they came by the way, (like men whoſe ſtrength of bo- dy, & luſty youth, was decayed) being wearied with ſo many ſundry battells as they had fought D with their enemies: complayned of Cæſar in this ſorte. To what ende and purpoſe doth this man hale vs after him, vp and downe the world, vſing vs like ſlaues and drudges? It is not our armor, but our bodies that beare the blowes away: and what, ſhall we neuer be without our harnes of our backes, and our ſhieldes on our armes? ſhould not Cæſar thinke, at the leaſt when he ſeeth our blood and woundes, that we are all mortall men, and that we feele the miſerie and paynes that other men doe feele? And now euen in the dead of winter, he putteth vs vnto the mercie of the ſea and tempeſt, yea which the gods them ſelues can not withſtand: as if he fled before his enemies, and purſued them not. Thus ſpending time with this talke, the ſouldiers ſtill marching on, by ſmall iorneys came at length vnto the citie of BRVNDVSIVM. But when they were come, & found that Cæſar had already paſſed ouer the ſea, then they ſtraight chaun- E ged their complaints and mindes. For they blamed them ſelues, and tooke on alſo with their Captaines, bicauſe they had not made them make more haſte in marching: and ſitting vpon the rockes and clyffes of the ſea, they looked ouer the mayne ſea, towards the Realme of EPIRVS, to ſee if they could diſcerne the ſhippes returning backe, to tranſport them ouer. Cæſar in the meane time being in the citie of APOLLONIA, hauing but a ſmall armie to fight with Pompey, it greued him for that the reſt of his armie was ſo long a comming, not knowing what way to take. In the ende he followed a daungerous determinacion, to imbarke vnknowen in a litle pynnaſe of twelue ores onely, to paſſe ouer the ſea againe vnto BRVNDVSIVM: the which he could not doe without great daunger, conſidering that all that ſea was full of Pompeys ſhippes and armies. So he tooke ſhippe in the night apparelled like a ſlaue, and went aborde vpon this F litle pynnaſe, & ſaid neuer a word, as if he had bene ſome poore man of meane condicion. The pynnaſe laye in the mouth of the riuer of Anius, the which commonly was wont to be very calme & quiet, by reaſon of a litle wind that came from the ſhore, which euery morning draue backe the waues farre into the maine sea. But that night, by il fortune, there came a great wind from the sea that ouercame the land wind, insomuch as the force & strength of the riuer fighting against the violence of the rage & waues of the sea, the encownter was maruailous daungerous, the water of the riuer being driuen backe, and rebounding vpward, with great noyse and daunger in turning of the water. Thereuppon the Maister of the pynnase seeing he could not possibly get out of the mouth of this riuer, bad the Maryners to cast about againe, and to returne against the streame. Cæsar hearing that, straight discouered him selfe vnto the Maister of the pynnase, who at the first was amazed when he saw him: but Cæsar then taking him by the hand sayd vnto him, good fellow, be of good cheere, and forwardes hardily, feare not, for thou hast Cæsar and his fortune with thee. Then the Maryners forgetting the daunger of the storme they were in, laid on lode with ores, and labored for life what they could against the winde, to get out of the mouth of this riuer. But at length, perceiuing they labored in vaine, and that the pynnase tooke in aboundance of water, and was ready to sincke: Cæsar then to his great griefe was driuen to returne backe again. Who when he was returned vnto his campe, his souldiers came in great companies vnto him, & were very sory, that he mistrusted he was not able with them alone to ouercome his enemies, but would put his person in daunger, to goe fetch them that were absent, putting no trust in them that were present. In the meane time Antonius arriued, and brought with him the rest of his armie from Brvndvsivm. Then Cæsar finding him selfe strong enough, went & offered Pompey battel, who was passingly wel lodged, for vittelling of his campe both by sea & land. Cæsar on thother side, who had no great plenty of vittels at the first, was in a very hard case: insomuch as his men gathered rootes, & mingled thē with milke, & eate them. Furthermore, they did make breade of it also, & sometime when they skirmished with the enemies, & came alongest by them that watched and warded, they cast of their bread into their trenches, and sayd: that as longe as the earth brought forth such frutes, they would neuer leaue beseeging of Pompey. But Pompey straightly commaunded them, that they should neither cary those words nor bread into their campe, fearing least his mens hartes would faile them, and that they would be affraid, when they should thinke of their enemies hardnes, with whome they had to fight, sithe they were weary with no paynes, no more then brute beastes. Cæsars men did daily skirmishe hard to the trenches of Pompeys campe, in the which Cæsar had euer the better, sauing once only, at what tyme his men fled with such feare, that all his campe that daye was in greate hazarde to haue beene caste awaye. For Pompey came on with his battell apon them, and they were not able to abyde it, but were fought with, and dryuen into their campe, and their trenches were filled with deade bodyes, which were slayne within the very gate and bullwarkes of their campe, they were so valiantly pursued. Cæsar stoode before them that fledde, to make them to turne heade agayne: but he coulde not preuayle. For when he woulde haue taken the ensignes to haue stayed them, the ensigne bearers threw them downe on the grounde: so that the enemyes tooke two and thirtye of them, and Cæsars selfe also scaped hardely with lyfe. For stryking a greate bigge souldier that fledde by him, commaunding him to staye, and turne his face to his enemie: the souldier beeing affrayde, lift vppe his sworde to stryke at Cæsar. But one of Cæsars Pages preuenting him, gaue him suche a blowe with his sworde, that he strake of his showlder. Cæsar that daye was brought vnto so greate extremitie, that (if Pompey had not eyther for feare, or spytefull fortune, left of to followe his victorie, and retyred into his campe, beeing contented to haue dryuen his enemyes into their campe) returning to his campe with his friendes, he sayde vnto them: the victorie this daye had beene our enemies, if they had had a Captayne, that coulde haue tolde howe to haue ouercome. So when he was come to his lodging, he went to bedde, and that nyght troubled him more, then any nyght that euer he had. For still his mynde ranne with great sorowe of the fowle faulte he had committed in leading of his armie, of selfe will to remaine there so longe by the sea side, his enemies being the stronger by sea: considering that he had before him a goodly contrie, riche and plentifull of all thinges, and goodly cities of Macedon and Thessaly, and had not the witte to bringe the warre from thence, but to lose his tyme in a place, where he was rather beseeged of his enemyes for lacke of vittells, then that he did beseege them by force

Cæsars armie fled from Pompey.

Cæsars wordes of Pompeys victory.

Cæsar troubled in mind, after his losse.

A force of armes. Thus, fretting and chafing to see him selfe so strayghted with vittells, and to thinke of his yll lucke, he rayſed his campe, intending to goe sette vppon Scipio, making accompt, that either he ſhould drawe Pompey to battell againſt his will, when he had not the ſea at his backe to furniſh him with plentye of vittells: or els that he ſhould eaſily ouercome Scipio, finding him alone, vnles he were ayded. This remoue of Cæſars campe, did much encourage Pompeys armie and his captaines, who would needes in any caſe haue followed after him, as though he had bene ouercome, and had fled. But for Pompey him ſelfe, he would in no reſpect hazard battell, which was a matter of ſo great importance. For finding him ſelfe wel prouided of all thinges neceſſary to tary tyme, he thought it better to drawe this warre out in length, by tract of time, the rather to conſume this litle ſtrength that remayned in Cæſars armie: of the which, the beſt men were marueilous well trayned and good ſouldiers, and for valiantnes, at one daies battell, were incomparable. But on thother ſide againe, to remoue here and there ſo ofte, and to fortifie their campe where they came, and to beſeege any wall, or to keepe watch all night in their armor, the moſt part of them could not doe it, by reaſon of their age, beeing then vnable to away with that paynes, ſo that the weakenes of their bodies did alſo take away the life and courage of their hartes. Furthermore, there fell a peſtilent diſeaſe amonge them that came by ill meates hunger draue them to eate: yet was not this the worſt. For beſides, he had no ſtore of money, neither could tell how to come by vittells: ſo that it ſemed in all likelihood, that in very ſhort tyme he would come to nothing. For theſe reſpectes, Pompey would in no caſe fight, and yet had he but Cato onely of his minde in that, who ſtucke in it the rather, bicauſe he would auoyde ſheding of his contry mens bloode. For when Cato had viewed the deade bodies ſlayne in the campe of his enemies, at the laſt skirmiſh that was betweene them, the which were no leſſe then a thowſand perſons: he couered his face, and went away weeping. All other but he, contrarily fell out with him, and blamed him, bycauſe he ſo long refrayned from battell: and ſome prickt him forward, and called him Agamemnon, and king of kinges, ſaying, that he delayed this warre in this ſort, bicauſe he would not leaue his authoritie to commaund them all, and that he was glad alwaies to ſee ſo many Captaines round about him, which came to his lodging to honor him, and waite vpon him. And Faonius alſo, a harebrayned fellowe, frantykly counterfeating the round and playne ſpeeche of Cato, made as though he was maruailous angry, and ſayd: is it not great pitie, that we ſhall not eate this yeare of TVSCVLVM figges, and all for Pompeys ambicious minde to raigne alone? and Afranius, who not long before was but lately come out of SPAYNE, (where, bicauſe he had but ill ſucceſſe, he was accuſed of treaſon, that for money he had ſolde his armie vnto Cæſar:) he went buſily asking, why they fought not with that Marchant, vnto whom they ſayde he had ſolde the prouince of SPAYNE? So that Pompey with theſe kinde of ſpeeches, againſt his will, was driuen to followe Cæſar, to fight with him. Then was Cæſar at the firſt, maruailouſly perplexed, and troubled by the waye: bicauſe he founde none that would giue him any vittells, beeing deſpiſed of euery man, for the late loſſe and ouerthrowe he had receyued. But after that he had taken the citie of GOMPHES in THESSALY, he did not onely meete with plentie of vittells to relieue his armie with: but he ſtraungely alſo did ridde them of their diſeaſe. For the ſouldiers meeting with plentie of wyne, drinking harde, and making mery: draue awaye the infection of the peſtilence. For they diſpoſed them ſelues vnto dauncing, masking, and playing the BACCHERIANS by the waye: inſomuch that drinking droncke they ouercame their diſeaſe, and made their bodies newe agayne. When they both came into the contry of PHARSALIA, and both campes laye before thother: Pompey returned agayne to his former determination, and the rather, bicauſe he had ill ſignes and tokens of misfortune in his ſleepe. For he thought in his ſleepe that when he entred into the Theater, all the ROMANES receyued him with great clapping of handes. Whereuppon, they that were about him grewe to ſuche boldnes and ſecuritie, aſſuring them ſelues of victorie: that Domitius, Spinther, and Scipio, in a brauery contended betweene them ſelues, for the chiefe Biſhoppricke which Cæſar had. Furthermore, there were diuers that ſent vnto ROME to hyre the neareſt houſes vnto the market place, as beeing the fitteſt places for Prætors, and Conſuls: making their accompt already, that thoſe offices could not ſcape them, incontinently after the warres. But beſides thoſe, the younge gentlemen, and ROMANE knightes were maruelous deſirous to fight, that were brauely mounted, and armed with gliſtering gilt armors, their horſes fat and very finely kept, and them ſelues goodly young men, to the number of ſeuen thowſand, where the gentlemen of Cæſars ſide, were but one thowſand onely. The number of his footemen alſo were much after the ſame reckoning. For he had fiue and forty thowſand againſt two and twenty thowſand. Wherefore Cæſar called his ſouldiers together, & told thē how Cornificius was at hande, who brought two whole legions, and that he had fifteene enſignes led by Calenus, the which he made to ſtay about MEGARA & ATHENS. Then he asked them if they would tary for that ayde or not, or whether they would rather them ſelues alone venter battell. The ſouldiers cryed out to him, and prayed him not to deferre battell, but rather to deuiſe ſome fetche to make the enemy fight aſſoone as he could. Then as he ſacrificed vnto the gods, for the purifying of his armie: the firſt beaſt was no ſooner ſacrificed, but his Soothſayer aſſured him that he ſhould fight within three dayes. Cæſar asked him againe, if he ſaw in the ſacrifices, any lucky ſigne, or token of good lucke. The Soothſayer aunſwered, for that, thou ſhalt aunſwer thy ſelfe, better then I can doe: for the gods doe promiſe vs a maruelous great chaunge, and alteracion of thinges that are now, vnto an other cleane contrary. For if thou beeſt wel now, doeſt thou thinke to haue worſe fortune hereafter? and if thou be ill, aſſure thy ſelf thou ſhalt haue better. The night before the battell, as he went about midnight to viſite the watch, men ſaw a great firebrand in the element, all of a light fire, that came ouer Cæſars campe, and fell downe in Pompeys. In the morning alſo when they releeued the watche, they heard a falſe alarom in the enemies campe, without any apparant cauſe: which they commonly call, a ſodaine feare, that makes men beſides them ſelues. This notwithſtāding, Cæſar thought not to fight that day, but was determined to haue raiſed his camp from thence, and to haue gone towards the citie of SCOTVSA: and his tents in his campe were already ouerthrowen when his skowtes came in with great ſpeede, to bringe him newes that his enemies were preparing them ſelues to fight. Then he was very glad, & after he had made his prayers vnto the gods to helpe him that day, he ſet his men in battell ray, & deuided them into three ſquadrons: giuing the middle battell vnto Domitius Caluinus, and the left winge vnto Antonius, and placed him ſelfe in the right winge, chooſing his place to fight in the tenth legion. But ſeeing that againſt that, his enemies had ſet all their horſemen: he was halfe affraid when he ſaw the great number of them, and ſo braue beſides. Wherefore he cloſely made ſix enſignes to come from the rerewarde of his battell, whom he had layd as an ambuſhe behind his right winge, hauing firſt appointed his ſouldiers what they ſhould do, when the horſemen of the enemies came to giue them charge. On thother ſide, Pompey placed him ſelf in the right winge of his battell, gaue the left winge vnto Domitius, and the middle battell vnto Scipio his father in law. Now all the ROMANE knightes (as we haue told you before) were placed in the left winge, of purpoſe to enuyrone Cæſars right wing behinde, and to giue their hotteſt charge there, where the generall of their enemies was: making their accompt, that there was no ſquadron of footemen how thicke ſoeuer they were, that could receiue the charge of ſo great a trowpe of horſemen, and that at the firſt onſet, they ſhould ouerthrow them all, and marche vpon their bellies. When the trompets on either ſide did ſound the alarom to the battell, Pompey commaunded his footemen that they ſhould ſtande ſtill without ſturring, to receyue the charge of their enemies, vntill they came to throwing of their darts. Wherefore Cæſar afterwardes ſayde, that Pompey had committed a fowle faulte, not to conſider that the charge which is giuen ronning with furie, beſides that it giueth the more ſtrength alſo vnto their blowes, doth ſette mens hartes alſo a fire: for the common hurling of all the ſouldiers that ronne together, is vnto them as a boxe of the eare that ſettes men a fire. Then Cæſar making his battell marche forwarde to giue the onſette, ſawe one of his Captaines (a valiant man, and very skillfull in warre, in whome he had alſo greate confidence) ſpeaking to his ſouldiers that he had vnder his charge, encouraging them to fight lyke men that daye. So he called him alowde by his name, and ſayde vnto him: well, Caius Craſſinius, what hope ſhall we haue to day? how are we determined, to fight it out manfully? Then Craſſinius caſting vp his hand, aunſwered him alowd: this day, O Cæſar, we ſhall haue a noble victory, and I promiſe thee

A thee ere night thou ſhalt prayſe me alyue or dead. When he had told him ſo, he was him ſelfe the foremoſt man that gaue charge vpon his enemies, with his band following of him, beeing about ſix ſcore men, and making a lane through the foremoſt rankes, with great ſlaughter he entred farre into the battell of his enemies: vntill that valiantly fighting in this ſort, he was thruſt in at length in the mouth with a ſworde, that the poynt of it came out agayne at his necke. Nowe the footemen of both battells being come to the ſworde, the horſemen of the left winge of Pompey, did marche as fiercely alſo, ſpreading out their trowpes, to compaſſe in the right winge of Cæſars battell. But before they beganne to giue charge, the ſix enſignes of footemen which Cæſar had layed in ambuſhe behinde him, they beganne to runne full apon them, not throwing away their dartes farre of as they were wont to doe, neyther ſtriking
B their enemies on the thighes nor on the legges, but to ſeeke to hit them full in the eyes, and to hurt them in the face, as Cæſar had taught them. For he hoped that theſe luſty younge gentlemen that had not bene often in the warres, nor were vſed to ſee them ſelues hurt, & the which, beeing in the pryme of their youth and beautie, would be affrayd of thoſe hurtes, aſwell for the feare of the preſent daunger to be ſlayne, as alſo for that their faces ſhould not for euer be deformed. As in deede it came to paſſe, for they coulde neuer abyde that they ſhoulde come ſo neare their faces, with the poyntes of their dartes, but honge downe their heades for feare to be hitte with them in their eyes, and turned their backes, couering their face, becauſe they ſhoulde not be hurt. Then, breaking of them ſelues, they beganne at length cowardly to flye, and were occaſion alſo of the loſſe of all the reſt of Pompeys armie. For they C that had broken them, ranne immediatly to ſette vpon the ſquadron of the footemen behind, and ſlue them. Then Pompey ſeeing his horſemen from the other winge of his battell, ſo ſcattered and diſperſed, flying away: forgate that he was any more Pompey the great which he had bene before, but rather was like a man whoſe wittes the goddes had taken from him, being affrayde and amazed with the ſlaughter ſent from aboue, and ſo retyred into his tent ſpeaking neuer a worde, and ſate there to ſee the ende of this battell. Vntill at length all his army beeing ouerthrowen, and put to flight, the enemies came, and gotte vp vpon the rampers and defence of his campe, and fought hande to hande with them that ſtoode to defende the ſame. Then as a man come to him ſelfe agayne, he ſpake but this onely worde: What, euen into our campe? So in haſte, caſting of his coate armor and apparell of a generall, he D ſhifted him, and put on ſuch, as became his miſerable fortune, and ſo ſtale out of his campe. Furthermore, what he did after this ouerthrowe, and howe he had put him ſelfe into the handes of the ÆGYPTIANS, by whome he was miſerably ſlayne: we haue ſette it forthe at large in his life. Then Cæſar entring into Pompeys campe, and ſeeing the bodies layed on the grounde that were ſlayne, and others alſo that were a killing, ſayde, fetching a great ſighe: it was their owne doing, and againſt my will. For Caius Cæſar, after he had wonne ſo many famous conqueſts, and ouercome ſo many great battells, had beene vtterly condemned notwithſtanding, if he had departed from his armie. Aſinius Pollio writeth, that he ſpake theſe wordes then in Latyn, which he afterwards wrote in Greeke, and ſayeth furthermore, that E the moſte parte of them which were put to the ſworde in the campe, were ſlaues and bondmen, and that there were not ſlayne in all at this battell, aboue ſix thowſand ſouldiers. As for them that were taken priſoners, Cæſar did put many of them amongeſt his legions, and did pardon alſo many men of eſtimation, amonge whome Brutus was one, that afterwardes ſlue Cæſar him ſelfe: and it is reported, that Cæſar was very ſory for him, when he could not immediatly be founde after the battell, and that he reioyced againe, when he knewe he was alyue, and that he came to yeelde him ſelfe vnto him. Cæſar had many ſignes and tokens of victorie before this battell: but the notableſt of all other that hapned to him, was in the citie of TRALLES. For in the temple of victorie, within the ſame citie, there was an image of Cæſar, and the earth all about it very hard of it ſelfe, and was paued beſides with hard ſtone: and yet ſome ſay that there ſprange vppe a palme hard by the baſe of the ſame image. In the citie of PADUA, F Caius Cornelius an excellent Soothſayer, (a contry man and friende of Titus Liuius the Hiſtoriographer) was by chaunce at that time ſet to beholde the flying of birdes. He (as Liuie reporteth) knewe the very tyme when the battell beganne, and tolde them that were preſent, and made an othe that he would neuer put it on againe, till the euent of his prediction had vnto the THESSALIANS, in respect of the victory which he wanne in their contry, he followed after Pompey. When he came into ASIA, he gaue freedom also vnto the GVIDIANS for Theo-

the tribute which the inhabitants payd vnto the ROMANES. Then he came into ALEXANturned his head at toe side bicause he would not see it. Notwithstanding, he tooke his seale, and beholding it, wept. Furthermore, he curteously vsed all Pompeys friendes and families, who wandring vp and downe the contry, were taken of the king of ÆGYPT, and wanne them ly to shame Cæsar, and to stirre vp the people to enuie him. For he made his souldiers haue the worst and oldest wheate that could be gotten: then if they did complayne of it, he told them, they must be contented, seeing they eate at anothers mans coste. And he would serue them also at the table in treene and earthen dishes, saying, that Cæsar had away all their gold and siluer, for a debt that the kings father (that then raigned) did owe vnto him: which was, a thousand seuen hundred and fiftie Miriades, whereof Cæsar had before forgiuen seuen hundred & D fiftie thowsand vnto his children. Howbeit then he asked a Myllion to paye his souldiours withall. Thereto Pothinus aunswered him, that at that tyme he should doe better to follow his other causes of greater importance, and afterwardes that he should at more leysure recouer his dette, with the kinges good will and fauor. Cæsar replyed vnto him, and sayd, that he would not aske counsell of the ÆGYPTIANS for his affayres, but would be payd: and thereupon se-Cleopatra cretly sent for Cleopatra which was in the contry to come vnto him. She onely taking Apollodo-

Cæsar, vpon Apollodorus backe. but afterwards, when he sawe her sweete conuersation and pleasaunt entertainment, he fell then in further liking with her, & did reconcile her again vnto her brother the king, with condition, that they two ioyntly should raigne together. Apon this newe reconciliation, a great feast being prepared, a slaue of Cæsars that was his barber, the fearefullest wretch that liued, ful busily prying and listening abroad in euery corner, being mistrustfull by nature: found that Po-

did sette such sure watch about the hall, where the feaste was made, that in fine, he slue the Euenuke Pothinus him selfe. Achillas on thother side, saued him selfe, and fled vnto the kinges F campe, where he raysed a maruelous daūgerous & difficult warre for Cæsar: bicause he hauing then but a few men about him as he had, he was to fight against a great & strong city. The first

A daunger he fell into, was for the lacke of water he had: for that his enemies had stopped the mouth of the pipes, the which conueyed the water vnto the castell. The seconde daunger he had, was, that seeing his enemies came to take his shippes from him, he was driuen to repulse that daunger with fire, the which burnt the arsenall where the shippes lay, and that notable librarie of ALEXANDRIA withall. The third daunger was in the battell by sea, that was fought by the tower of Phar: where meaning to helpe his men that fought by sea, he dept from the peere, into a boate. Then the ÆGYPTIANS made towardes him with their oares on euerie side: but he leaping into the sea, with great hazard saued him selfe by swimming. It is sayd, that then holding diuers bookes in his hand, he did neuer let them go, but kept them alwayes vpon his head aboue water, & swamme with the other hand, notwithstanding that they shot

B maruelously at him, and was driuen sometime to ducke into the water: howbeit the boate was drowned presently. In fine, the king comming to his men that made warre with Cæsar, he went against him, and gaue him battell, and wanne it with great slaughter, and effusion of blood. But for the king, no man could euer tell what became of him after. Thereupon Cæsar made Cleopatra his sister, Queene of ÆGYPT, who being great with childe by him, was shortly brought to bedde of a sonne, whom the ALEXANDRIANS named Cæsarion. From thence he went into SYRIA, and so going into ASIA, there it was told him that Domitius was ouerthrowen in battell, by Pharnaces, the sonne of king Mithridates, and was fled out of the realme of PONTE, with a few men with him: and that this king Pharnaces greedily following his victorie, was not contented with the winning of BITHYNIA, & CAPPADOCIA, but further would

C needes attempt to winne ARMENIA the lesse, procuring all those kinges, Princes, and Gouernors of the prouinces thereabouts, to rebell against the ROMANES. Thereupon Cæsar went thither straight with three legions, and fought a great battell with king Pharnaces, by the citie of ZELA, where he slue his armie, & draue him out of all the realme of PONTE. And bicause he would aduertise one of his frendes of the sodainnes of this victorie, he onely wrote three words vnto Anitius at ROME: Veni, Vidi, Vici: to wit, I came, I saw, I ouercame. These three wordes ending all with like sound and letters in the Latin, haue a certaine shorte grace, more pleasaunt to the eare, then can be well expressed in any other tongue. After this, he returned againe into ITALIE, and came to ROME, ending his yeare for the which he was made Dictator the seconde time, which office before was neuer graunted for one whole yeare, but vnto

D him. Then he was chosen Consul for the yeare following. Afterwardes he was very ill spoken of, for that his souldiers in a mutine hauing slaine two Prætors, Cosconius, and Galba, he gaue them no other punishment for it, but in steade of calling them souldiers, he named them citizens, and gaue vnto euery one of them, a thousand Drachmas a man, and great possessions in ITALIE. He was much misliked also for the desperate parts and madnes of Dolabella, for the couetousnes of Anitius, for the dronkennes of Antonius and Cornificius, which made Pompeys house be pulled downe and builded vp againe, as a thing not bigge enough for him, wherewith the ROMANES were maruelously offended. Cæsar knew all this well enough, and would haue bene contented to haue redressed them: but to bring his matters to passe he pretended, he was driuen to serue his turne by such instrumentes. After the battell of Pharsalia, Cato and

E Scipio being fled into AFRICKE, king Iuba ioyned with them, & leauied a great puissant armie. Wherefore Cæsar determined to make warre with them, & in the middest of winter, he tooke his iorney into SICILE. There, bicause he would take all hope from his Captaines and souldiers to make any long abode there, he went and lodged vpon the very sander by the sea side, and with the next gale of winde that came, he tooke the sea with three thousand footemen, and a few horsemen. Then hauing put them a land, whwares to them, he hoysed sayle againe, to goe fetche the rest of his armie, being afrayed least they should meete with some daunger in passing ouer, and meeting them midde way, he brought them all into his campe. Where, when it was tolde him that his enemies trusted in an auncient Oracle, which sayd, that it was predestined vnto the family of the Scipises to be conquerors in AFRICKE: either of purpose

Cæsars iorney into Africke, against Cato and Scipio.

F to mocke Scipio the Generall of his enemies, or otherwise in good earnest to take the benefit of this name (geuen by the Oracle) vnto him selfe, in all the skirmishes & battells he fought, he gaue the charge of his army, vnto a man of meane quality and accompt, called Scipio Sal-

Iutius, who came of the race of Scipio AFRICAN, and made him alwayes his Generall whom he fought. For he was eftsoones compelled to weary and harrie his enemies: for that neither his men in his campe had corne enough, nor his beasts forrage, but the souldiers were driuen to take sea weedes, called Alga: and (washing away the brackishnes thereof with fresh water) putting to it a litle erbe called doggestooth) to cast it to their horse to eate. For the NVMIDIANS (which are light horsemen, and very ready of seruice) being a great number together, would be on a sodaine in euery place, and spred all the fieldes ouer thereabout, so that no man durst peepe out of the campe to goe for forrage. And one day as the men of armes were staying to beholde an AFRICAN doing notable thinges in dauncing, and playing with the flute, they being set downe quietly to take their pleasure of the viewe thereof, hauing in the meane time geuen their slaues their horses to hold, the enemies stealing sodainly vpon them, compassed them in round about, and slue a number of them in the field, and chasing the other also so that fled, followed them pell mell into their campe. Furthermore had not Cæsar him selfe in person, and Asinius Pollio with him gone out of the campe to the rescue, and stayed them that fled: the warre that day had bene ended. There was also an other skirmish where his enemies had the vpper hande, in the which it is reported, that Cæsar taking the ensigne bearer by the coller that caried the Eagle in his hande, stayed him by force, and turning his face, tolde him: see, there be thy enemies. These aduantages did lift vp Scipions hart aloft, and geue him corage to hazard battell: and leauing Afranius on the one hand of him, and king Iuba on the other hande, both their campes lying neere to other, he did fortifie him selfe by the citie of THAPSACVS, aboue the lake, to be a safe refuge for them all in this battell. But whilest he was busie intrenching of him selfe, Cæsar hauing maruelous speedily passed through a great countrie full of wod, by bypathes which men would neuer haue mistrusted, he stale vpon some behinde, and sodainly assailed the other before, so that he ouerthrewe them all, and made them flie. Then following this first good happe he had, he went forthwith to set apon the campe of Afranius, the which he tooke at the first onset, and the campe of the NVMIDIANS also, king Iuba being fled. Thus in a litle peece of the day only, he tooke three campes, & slue fifty thousand of his enemies, and lost but fifty of his souldiers. In this sorte is set downe the effect of this battell by some wryters. Yet others doe wryte also, that Cæsar selfe was not there in person at the execution of this battell. For as he did set his men in battell ray, the falling sickenesse tooke him, whereunto he was geuen, and therefore feeling it comming, before he was ouercome withall, he was caried into a castell not farre from thence, where the battell was fought, and there tooke his rest till the extremity of his disease had left him. Now, for the Prætors & Consulls that scaped from this battell, many of them being taken prisoners, did kill them selues, and others also Cæsar did put to death: but he being specially desirous of all men else to haue Cato aliue in his hands, he went with all possible speede vnto the citie of VTICA, whereof Cato was Gouernor, by meanes whereof he was not at the battell. Notwithstanding being certified by the way that Cato had slaine him selfe with his owne handes, he then made open shew that he was very sory for it, but why or wherfore, no man could tell. But this is true, that Cæsar sayd at that present time: O Cato, I enuy thy death, bicause thou diddest enuy my glory, to saue thy life. This notwithstanding, the booke that he wrote afterwardes against Cato being dead, did shew no very great affection nor pitifull hart towardes him. For how could he haue pardoned him, if liuing he had had him in his handes: that being dead did speake so vehemently against him? Notwithstanding, men suppose he would haue pardoned him, if he had taken him aliue, by the clemencie he shewed vnto Cicero, Brutus, and diuers others that had borne armes against him. Some reporte, that he wrote that booke, not so much for any priuate malice he had to his death, as for a ciuil ambition, apon this occasion. Cicero had written a booke in praise of Cato, which he intituled, Cato. This booke in likelyhoode was very well liked of, by reason of the eloquence of the Orator that made it, and of the excellent subiect thereof. Cæsar therewith was maruelously offended, thinking that to praise him, of whose death he was author, was euen as much as to accuse him self: & therfore he wrote a letter against him, & heaped vp a number of accusations against Cato, and intituled the booke Anticaton. Both these bookes haue fauorers vnto this day, some defending the one for the loue they bare to Cæsar,

A and others allowing the other for Catoes sake. Cæsar being now returned out of Africke, first of all made an oration to the people, wherein he greatly praised and commended this his last victorie, declaring vnto them, that he had conquered so many contries vnto the Empire of Rome, that he coulde furnishe the common wealth yearely, with two hundred thowsande bussheils of wheate, & twenty hundred thowsand pound weight of oyle. Then he made three triumphes, the one for Ægypt, the other for the kingdom of Ponte, and the third for Africke: not bicause he had ouercome Scipio there, but king Iuba. Whose sonne being likewise called Iuba, being then a young boy, was led captiue in the showe of this triumphe. But this his imprisonment fel out happily for him: for where he was but a barbarous Nvmidian, by the study he fell vnto when he was prisoner, he came afterwards to be reckoned one of the

B wisest historiographers of the Græcians. After these three triumphes ended, he very liberally rewarded his souldiers: and to curry fauor with the people, he made great feasts & common sportes. For he feasted all the Romanes at one time, at two and twenty thowsand tables, and gaue them the pleasure to see diuers sword players to fight at the sharpe, and battells also by sea, for the remembraunce of his daughter Iulia, which was dead long afore. Then after all these sportes, he made the people (as the manner was) to be mustered: and where there were at the last musters before, three hundred and twenty thowsande citizens, at this muster only there were but a hundred and fifty thowsand. Such misery and destruction had this ciuill warre brought vnto the common wealth of Rome, and had consumed such a number of Romanes not speaking at all of the mischieues and calamities it had brought vnto all the rest of

C Italie, and to the other prouinces pertaining to Rome. After all these thinges were ended, he was chosen Consul the fourth time, and went into Spayne to make warre with the sonnes of Pompey: who were yet but very young, but had notwithstanding raised a maruelous great army together, and shewed to haue had manhoode and corage worthie to commaunde such an armie, insomuch as they put Cæsar him selfe in great daunger of his life. The greatest battell that was fought betwene them in all this warre, was by the citie of Mvnda. For then Cæsar seeing his men sorely distressed, and hauing their hands full of their enemies: he ranne into the prease among his men that fought, and cried out vnto them: what, are ye not ashamed to be beaten and taken prisoners, yeelding your selues with your owne handes to these young boyes? And so, with all the force he could make, hauing with much a doe put his enemies to Battell fought betwext Cæsar and the young Pompeyes, by the city of Munda.

D flight: he slue aboue thirty thowsand of them in the fielde, and lost of his owne men a thowsand of the best he had. After this battell he went into his tent, and told his frends, that he had often before fought for victory, but this last time now, that he had fought for the safety of his owne life. He wanne this battell on the very feast day of the Bacchanalians, in the which men say, that Pompey the great went out of Rome, about foure yeares before, to beginne this ciuill warre. For his sonnes, the younger scaped from the battell: but within few dayes after, Diddius brought the heade of the elder. This was the last warre that Cæsar made. But the triumphe he made into Rome for the same, did as much offend the Romanes, and more, then any thing that euer he had done before: bicause he had not ouercome Captaines that were straungers, nor barbarous kinges, but had destroyed the sonnes of the noblest man in Rome, Cæsars victory of the sonnes of Pompey.

Cæsars triumphe of Pompeis sonnes.

E whom fortune had ouerthrowen. And bicause he had plucked vp his race by the rootes, men did not thinke it meete for him to triumphe so, for the calamities of his contrie, reioycing at a thing for the which he had but one excuse to alleage in his defence, vnto the gods and men: that he was compelled to doe that he did. And the rather they thought it not meete, bicause he had neuer before sent letters nor messengers vnto the common wealth at Rome, for any victorie that he had euer wonne in all the ciuill warres: but did alwayes for shame refuse the glorie of it. This notwithstanding, the Romanes inclining to Cæsars prosperity, and taking the bit in the mouth, supposing that to be ruled by one man alone, it would be a good meane for them to take breth a litle, after so many troubles and miseries as they had abidden in these ciuill warres: they chose him perpetuall Dictator. This was a plaine tyranny: for to this ab-

Cæsar Dictator perpetuall.

F solute power of Dictator, they added this, neuer to be affraied to be deposed. Cicero propounded before the Senate, that they should geue him such honors, as were meete for a man: howbeit others afterwardes added to, honors beyonde all reason. For, men striuing who shoulde moſt honor him, they made him hatefull and troubleſome to them ſelues that moſt fauored him, by reaſon of the vnmeaſurable greatnes and honors which they gaue him. Thereuppon it is reported, that euen they that moſt hated him, were no leſſe fauorers and furtherers of his honors, then they that moſt flattered him: bicauſe they might haue greater occaſions to rise, and that it might appeare they had iuſt cauſe and colour to attempt that they did againſt him. And now for him ſelfe, after he had ended his ciuill warres, he did ſo honorably behaue himſelfe, that there was no fault to be founde in him: and therefore me thinkes, amongeſt other honors they gaue him, he rightly deſerued this, that they ſhould builde him a temple of clemency, to thanke him for his curteſie he had vſed vnto them in his victorie. For he pardoned many of them that had borne armes againſt him, and furthermore, did preferre ſome of them to honor and office in the common wealth: as amongeſt others, Caſſius and Brutus, both the which were made Prætors. And where Pompeys images had bene throwen downe, he cauſed them to be ſet vp againe: whereupon Cicero ſayd then, that Cæſar ſetting vp Pompeys images againe, he made his owne to ſtand the ſurer. And when ſome of his frends did counſell him to haue a gard for the ſafety of his perſon, and ſome alſo did offer them ſelues to ſerue him: he would neuer conſent to it, but ſayd, it was better to dye once, then alwayes to be affrayed of death. But to win him ſelfe the loue and good will of the people, as the honorableſt gard and beſt ſafety he could haue: he made common feaſts againe, & generall diſtributions of corne. Furthermore, to gratifie the ſouldiers alſo, he repleniſhed many cities againe with inhabitantes, which before had bene deſtroyed, and placed them there that had no place to repaire vnto: of the which the nobleſt & chiefeſt cities were theſe two, Carthage, & Corinthe, and it chaunced ſo, that like as aforetime they had bene both taken and deſtroyed together, euen ſo were they both ſet a foote againe, and repleniſhed with people, at one ſelfe time. And as for great perſonages, he wanne them alſo, promiſing ſome of them, to make them Prætors and Conſulls in time to come, and vnto others, honors and preferrements, but to all men generally good hope, ſeeking all the wayes he coulde to make euerie man contented with his raigne. Inſomuch as one of the Conſulls called Maximus, chaunсing to dye a day before his Conſulſhippe ended, he declared Caninius Rebilius Conſull onely for the day that remained. So, diuers going to his houſe (as the manner was) to ſalute him, & to congratulate with him of his calling and preferrement, being newly choſen officer: Cicero pleaſauntly ſayd, come, let vs make haſt, and be gone thither, before his Conſulſhippe come out. Furthermore, Cæſar being borne to attempt all great enterpriſes, & hauing an ambitious deſire beſides to couet great honors: the proſperous good ſucceſſe he had of his former conqueſtes bred no deſire in him quietly to enioy the frutes of his labours, but rather gaue him hope of thinges to come, ſtill kindling more and more in him, thoughts of greater enterpriſes, and deſire of new glory, as if that which he had preſent, were ſtale and nothing worth. This humor of his was no other but an emulation with him ſelfe as with an other man, and a certaine contencion to ouercome the thinges he prepared to attempt. For he was determined, & made preparacion alſo, to make warre with the Perſians. Then when he had ouercome them, to paſſe through Hyrcania (compaſſing in the ſea Caſpium, and mount Caucaſus) into the realme of Pontus, and ſo to inuade Scythia: and ouerrunning all the contries and people adioyning vnto high Germany, and Germany it ſelfe, at length to returne by Gavle into Italie, and ſo to enlarge the Romane Empire round, that it might be euery way compaſſed in with the great ſea Oceanum. But whileſt he was preparing for this voiage, he attempted to cut the barre of the ſtraight of Peloponnesvs, in the place where the city of Corinthe ſtandeth. Then he was minded to bring the riuers of Anienes and Tiber, ſtraight from Rome, vnto the citie of Circeis, with a deepe channell and high banckes caſt vp on either ſide, and ſo to fall into the ſea at Terracina, for the better ſafety and commodity of the marchants that came to Rome to trafficke there. Furthermore, he determined to draine and ſeawe all the water of the mariſſes betwext the cities of Nomentvm and Setivm, to make it firme land, for the benefit of many thowſandes of people: and on the ſea coaſt next vnto Rome, to caſt great high bankes, and to cleanſe all the hauen about Ostia, of rockes and ſtones hidden vnder the water, and to take away all other impedimentes that made the harborough daungerous

A or shippes, and to make new hauens and arsenalls meete to harbor such shippes, as did continually trafficke thither. All these thinges were purposed to be done, but tooke no effecte. But, the ordinaunce of the kalender, and reformation of the yeare, to take away all confusion of time, being exactly calculated by the Mathematicians, and brought to perfection, was a great commoditie vnto all men. For the ROMANES vsing then the auncient computacion of the yeare, had not only such incertainty and alteracion of the moneth and times, that the sacrifices and yearely feasts came by litle and litle to seasons contrary for the purpose they were ordained: but also in the reuolution of the sunne (which is called Annus Solaris) no other nation agreed with them in account: and of the ROMANES them selues, only the priests vnderstood it. And therefore when they listed, they sodainly (no man being able to controll them) B did thrust in a moneth, aboue their ordinary number, which they called in old time, * Mercedonius. Some say, that Numa Pompilius was the first, that deuised this way, to put a moneth betwene: but it was a weake remedy, and did litle helpe the correction of the errors that were made in the account of the yeare, to frame them to perfection. But Cæsar committing this matter vnto the Philosophers, and best expert Mathematicians at that time, did set foorth an excellent and perfect kalender, more exactly calculated, then any other that was before: the which the ROMANES doe vse vntill this present day, and doe nothing erre as others, in the difference of time. But his enemies notwithstanding that enuied his greatnes, did not sticke to finde fault withall. As Cicero the Orator, when one sayd, to morow the starre Lyra will rise: yea, sayd he, at the commaundement of Cæsar, as if men were compelled so to say and thinke, C by Cæsars edict. But the chiefest cause that made him mortally hated, was the couetous desire he had to be called king: which first gaue the people iust cause, and next his secret enemies, honest colour to beare him ill will. This notwithstanding, they that procured him this honor & dignity, gaue it out among the people, that it was written in the Sybilline prophecies, how the ROMANES might ouercome the PARTHIANS, if they made warre with them, and were led by a king, but otherwise that they were vnconquerable. And furthermore they were so bold besides, that Cæsar returning to ROME from the citie of ALBA, when they came to salute him, they called him king. But the people being offended, and Cæsar also angry, he said he was not called king, but Cæsar. Then euery man keeping silence, he went his way heauy and sorowfull. When they had decreed diuers honors for him in the Senate, the Consulls and Prætors ac- D companied with the whole assembly of the Senate, went vnto him in the market place, where he was set by the pulpit for orations, to tell him what honors they had decreed for him in his absence. But he sitting still in his maiesty, disdaining to rise vp vnto them when they came in, as if they had bene priuate men, aunswered them: that his honors had more neede to be cut of, then enlarged. This did not onely offend the Senate, but the common people also, to see that he should so lightly esteeme of the Magistrates of the common wealth: insomuch as euery man that might lawfully goe his way, departed thence very sorrowfully. Thereupon also Cæsar rising, departed home to his house, and tearing open his doblet coller, making his necke bare, he cried out alowde to his frendes, that his throte was readie to offer to any man that would come and cut it. Notwithstanding, it is reported, that afterwardes to excuse this folly, E he imputed it to his disease, saying, that their wittes are not perfit which haue his disease of the falling euil, when standing of their feete they speake to the common people, but are soone troubled with a trembling of their body, and a sodaine dimnes and guidines. But that was not true. For he would haue risen vp to the Senate, but Cornelius Balbus one of his frendes (but rather a flatterer) would not let him, saying: what, doe you not remember that you are Cæsar, and will you not let them reuerence you, and doe their dueties? Besides these occasions and offences, there followed also his shame and reproache, abusing the Tribunes of the people in this sorte. At that time, the feast Lupercalia was celebrated, the which in olde time men say was the feast of sheapheards or heard men, and is much like vnto the feast of the LYCÆANS in ARCADIA. But howesoeuer it is, that day there are diuers noble mens sonnes, young F men, (and some of them Magistrats them selues that gouerne then) which run naked through the city, striking in sport them they meete in their way, with leather thonges, heare and all on, to make them geue place. And many noble women, and gentle women also, goe of purpose to ſtand in their way, and doe put forth their handes to be ſtriken, as ſchollers hold them out to their ſchoolemaſter, to be ſtriken with the ferula: perſwading them ſelues that being with childe, they ſhall haue good deliuerie, and alſo being barren, that it will make them to conceiue with child. Cæſar ſate to beholde that ſport apon the pulpit for orations, in a chayer of gold, apparelled in triumphing manner. Antonius, who was Conſull at that time, was one of them that ranne this holy courſe. So when he came into the market place, the people made a lane for him to runne at libertie, and he came to Cæſar, and preſented him a Diadeame wreathed about with laurell. Whereuppon there roſe a certaine crie of reioycing, not very great, done onely by a few, appointed for the purpoſe. But when Cæſar refuſed the Diadeame, then all the people together made an outcrie of ioy. Then Antonius offering it him againe, there was a ſecond ſhoute of ioy, but yet of a few. But whē Cæſar refuſed it againe the ſecond time, then all the whole people ſhowted. Cæſar hauing made this proofe, found that the people did not like of it, and thereuppon roſe out of his chayer, and commaunded the crowne to be caried vnto Iupiter in the Capitoll. After that, there were ſet vp images of Cæſar in the city with Diadeames vpon their heades, like kinges. Thoſe, the two Tribunes, Flauius and Marullus, went and pulled downe: and furthermore, meeting with them that firſt ſaluted Cæſar as king, they committed them to priſon. The people followed them reioycing at it, and called them Brutes: bicauſe of Brutus, who had in old time driuen the kings out of Rome, & that brought the kingdom of one perſon, vnto the gouernment of the Senate and people. Cæſar was ſo offended withall, that he depriued Marullus and Flauius of their Tribuneſhippes, and accuſing them, he ſpake alſo againſt the people, and called them Bruti, and Cumani, to witte, beaſtes and fooles. Hereuppon the people went ſtraight vnto Marcus Brutus, who from his father came of the firſt Brutus, and by his mother, of the houſe of the Seruilians, a noble houſe as any was in Rome, and was alſo nephew and ſonne in law of Marcus Cato. Notwithſtanding, the great honors and fauor Cæſar ſhewed vnto him, kept him backe that of him ſelfe alone, he did not conſpire nor conſent to depoſe him of his kingdom. For Cæſar did not onely ſaue his life, after the battell of Pharſalia when Pompey fled, and did at his requeſt alſo ſaue many moe of his frendes beſides: but furthermore, he put a maruelous confidence in him. For he had already preferred him to the Prætorſhippe for that yeare, and furthermore was appointed to be Conſul, the fourth yeare after that, hauing through Cæſars frendſhippe, obtained it before Caſſius, who likewiſe made ſute for the ſame: and Cæſar alſo, as it is reported, ſayd in this contention, in deede Caſſius hath alleaged beſt reaſon, but yet ſhall he not be choſen before Brutus. Some one day accuſing Brutus while he practiſed this conſpiracy, Cæſar would not heare of it, but clapping his hande on his bodie, told them, Brutus will looke for this skinne: meaning thereby, that Brutus for his vertue, deſerued to rule after him, but yet, that for ambitions ſake, he woulde not ſhewe him ſelfe vnthankefull nor diſhonorable. Nowe they that deſired chaunge, and wiſhed Brutus only their Prince and Gouernour aboue all other: they durſt not come to him them ſelues to tell him what they woulde haue him to doe, but in the night did caſt ſundrie papers into the Prætors ſeate where he gaue audience, and the moſt of them to this effect. Thou ſleepeſt Brutus, and art not Brutus in deede. Caſſius finding Brutus ambition ſturred vp the more by theſe ſeditious billes, did pricke him forwarde, and egge him on the more, for a priuate quarrell he had conceiued againſt Cæſar: the circumſtance whereof, we haue ſette downe more at large in Brutus life. Cæſar alſo had Caſſius in great gelouzie, and ſuſpected him much: whereuppon he ſayed on a time to his frendes, what will Caſſius doe, thinke ye? I like not his pale lookes. An other time when Cæſars frendes complained vnto him of Antonius, and Dolabella, that they pretended ſome miſchiefe towardes him: he aunſwered them againe, as for thoſe fatte men and ſmooth comed heades, q he, I neuer reckon of them: but theſe pale viſaged and carian leane people, I feare them moſt, meaning Brutus and Caſſius. Certainly, deſtenie may eaſier be foreſeene, then auoyded: conſidering the ſtraunge & wonderfull ſignes that were ſayd to be ſeene before Cæſars death. For, touching the fires in the element, and ſpirites running vp and downe in the night, and alſo theſe ſolitarie birdes to be ſeene at noone dayes ſittinge in the great market place: are not all theſe ſignes perhappes worth the noting, in ſuch a wonderfull chaunce as happened. Cæſar ſaued Marcus Brutus life, after the battell of Pharſalia.

Brutus conſpireth againſt Cæſar.

Predictions, & foreſhewes of Cæſars death.

A wryteth, that diuers men were ſeene going vp and downe in fire: and furthermore, that there was a ſlaue of the ſouldiers, that did caſt a maruelous burning flame out of his hande, inſomuch as they that ſaw it, thought he had bene burnt, but when the fire was out, it was found he had no hurt. Cæſar ſelfe alſo doing ſacrifice vnto the goddes, found that one of the beaſtes which was ſacrificed had no hart: and that was a ſtraunge thing in nature, how a beaſt could liue without a hart. Furthermore, there was a certaine Soothſayer that had geuen Cæſar warning long time affore, to take heede of the day of the Ides of Marche, (which is the fifteenth of the moneth) for on that day he ſhoulde be in great daunger. That day being come, Cæſar going vnto the Senate houſe, and ſpeaking merily to the Soothſayer, tolde him, the Ides of Marche be come: ſo be they, ſoftly aunſwered the Soothſayer, but yet are they not paſt. And

B the very day before, Cæſar ſupping with Marcus Lepidus, ſealed certaine letters as he was wont to do at the bord: ſo talke falling out amongeſt them, reaſoning what death was beſt: he preuenting their opinions, cried out alowde, death vnlooked for. Then going to bedde the ſame night as his manner was, and lying with his wife Calpurnia, all the windowes and dores of his chamber flying open, the noyſe awooke him, and made him affrayed when he ſaw ſuch light: but more, when he heard his wife Calpurnia, being faſt a ſleepe, weepe and ſigh, and put forth many fumbling lamentable ſpeaches. For ſhe dreamed that Cæſar was ſlaine, and that ſhe had him in her armes. Others alſo doe denie that ſhe had any ſuche dreame, as amongeſt other, Titus Liuius wryteth, that it was in this ſorte. The Senate hauing ſet vpon the toppe of Cæſars houſe, for an ornament and ſetting foorth of the ſame, a certaine pinnacle: Calpurnia

The dreame of Calpurnia, Cæſars wife.

C dreamed that ſhe ſawe it broken downe, and that ſhe thought ſhe lamented and wept for it. Inſomuch that Cæſar riſing in the morning, ſhe prayed him if it were poſſible, not to goe out of the dores that day, but to adiorne the ſeſſion of the Senate, vntill an other day. And if that he made no reckoning of her dreame, yet that he woulde ſearche further of the Soothſayers by their ſacrifices, to knowe what ſhould happen him that day. Thereby it ſeemed that Cæſar likewiſe did feare and ſuſpect ſomewhat, bicauſe his wife Calpurnia vntill that time, was neuer geuen to any feare or ſuperſticion: and then, for that he ſaw her ſo troubled in minde with this dreame ſhe had. But much more afterwardes, when the Soothſayers hauing ſacrificed many beaſtes one after an other, tolde him that none did like them: then he determined to ſende Antonius to adiorne the ſeſſion of the Senate. But in the meane time came Decius Bru-

D tus, ſurnamed Albinus, in whom Cæſar put ſuch confidence, that in his laſt will and teſtament he had appointed him to be his next heire, and yet was of the conſpiracie with Caſſius and Brutus: he fearing that if Cæſar did adiorne the ſeſſion that day, the conſpiracie woulde out, laughed the Soothſayers to ſcorne, and reproued Cæſar, ſaying: that he gaue the Senate occaſion to miſlike with him, and that they might thinke he mocked them, conſidering that by his commaundement they were aſſembled, and that they were readie willingly to graunt him all thinges, and to proclaime him king of all the prouinces of the Empire of ROME out of ITALIE, and that he ſhould weare his Diadeame in all other places, both by ſea and land. And furthermore, that if any man ſhould tell them from him, they ſhould departe for that preſent time, and returne againe when Calpurnia ſhoulde haue better dreames: what would his ene-

E mies and ill willers ſay, and how could they like of his frendes wordes? And who could perſwade them otherwiſe, but that they would thinke his dominion a ſlauerie vnto them, and tirannicall in him ſelfe? And yet if it be ſo, ſayd he, that you vtterly miſlike of this day, it is better that you goe your ſelfe in perſon, and ſaluting the Senate, to diſmiſſe them till an other time. Therewithall he tooke Cæſar by the hand, and brought him out of his houſe. Cæſar was not gone farre from his houſe, but a bondman, a ſtraunger, did what he could to ſpeake with him: and when he ſawe he was put backe by the great preaſe and multitude of people that followed him, he went ſtraight vnto his houſe, and put him ſelfe into Calpurnias handes to be kept, till Cæſar came backe againe, telling her that he had great matters to imparte vnto him. And one Artemidorus alſo borne in the Ile of GNIDOS, a Doctor of Rethoricke in the Greeke

F tongue, who by meanes of his profeſſion was verie familliar with certaine of Brutus confederates, and therefore knew the moſt parte of all their practiſes againſt Cæſar: came & brought him a litle bill wrytten with his owne hand, of all that he ment to tell him. He marking howe

Cæsar receiued all the supplications that were offered him, and that he gaue them straight to his men that were about him, presſed neerer to him, and sayed: Cæsar, reade this memoriall to your selfe, and that quickely, for they be matters of great waight and touche you neerely. Cæsar tooke it of him, but coulde neuer reade it, though he many times attempted it, for the number of people that did salute him: but holding it still in his hande, keeping it to him selfe, went on withall into the Senate house. Howbeit other are of opinion, that it was some man else that gaue him that memoriall, and not Artemidorus, who did what he could all the way as he went to geue it Cæsar, but he was alwayes repulsed by the people. For these things they may seeme to come by chaunce: but the place where the murther was prepared, and where the Senate were assembled, and where also there stoode vp an image of Pompey dedicated by him selfe amongest other ornamentes which he gaue vnto the Theater: all these were manifest proofes that it was the ordinaunce of some god, that made this treason to be executed, specially in that verie place. It is also reported, that Cassius (though otherwise he did fauour the doctrine of Epicurus) beholding the image of Pompey, before they entred into the action of their traiterous enterprise: he did softely call vpon it, to aide him. But the instant daũger of the present time, taking away his former reason, did sodainly put him into a furious passion, and made him like a man halfe besides him selfe. Now Antonius, that was a faithfull frende to Cæsar, and a valliant man besides of his handes, him, Decius Brutus Albinus entertained out of the Senate house, hauing begon a long tale of set purpose. So Cæsar comming into the house, all the Senate stoode vp on their feete to doe him honor. Then parte of Brutus companie and confederates stoode rounde about Cæsars chayer, and parte of them also came towardes him, as though they made sute with Metellus Cimber, to call home his brother againe from banishment: and thus prosecuting still their sute, they followed Cæsar, till he was set in his chayer. Who, denying their petitions, and being offended with them one after an other, bicause the more they were denied, the more they presſed vpon him, and were the earnester with him: Metellus at length, taking his gowne with both his handes, pulled it ouer his necke, which was the signe geuen the confederates to sette apon him. Then Casca behinde him strake him in the necke with his sword, howbeit the wounde was not great nor mortall, bicause it seemed, the feare of such a deuelish attempt did amaze him, and take his strength from him, that he killed him not at the first blowe. But Cæsar turning straight vnto him, caught hold of his sword, and held it hard: and they both cried out, Cæsar in Latin: O vile traitor Casca, what doest thou? And Casca in Greeke to his brother, brother, helpe me. At the beginning of this sturre, they that were present, not knowing of the conspiracie were so amazed with the horrible sight they sawe: that they had no power to flie, neither to helpe him, not so much, as once to make any outcrie. They on thother side that had conspired his death, compassed him in on euerie side with their swordes drawen in their handes, that Cæsar turned him no where, but he was striken at by some, and still had naked swords in his face, and was hacked and mangeled amonge them, as a wilde beaste taken of hunters. For it was agreed among them, that euery man should geue him a wound, bicause all their partes should be in this murther: and then Brutus him selfe gaue him one wounde about his priuities. Men reporte also, that Cæsar did still defende him selfe against the rest, running euerie waye with his bodie: but when he sawe Brutus with his sworde drawen in his hande, then he pulled his gowne ouer his heade, and made no more resistaunce, and was driuen either casually, or purposedly, by the counsell of the conspirators, against the base whereupon Pompeys image stoode, which ranne all of a goare bloude, till he was slaine. Thus it seemed, that the image tooke iust reuenge of Pompeys enemie, being throwen downe on the ground at his feete, and yelding vp his ghost there, for the number of wounds he had vpon him. For it is reported, that he had three and twenty wounds apon his body: and diuers of the conspirators did hurt them selues, striking one body with so many blowes. When Cæsar was slaine, the Senate (though Brutus stood in the middest amongest them as though he would haue sayd somwhat touching this fact) presently ran out of the house, and flying, filled all the city with maruelous feare and tumult. Insomuch as some did shut to their dores, others forsooke their shops & warehouses, and others ranne to the place to see what the matter was: and others also that had seene it, ran

A ran home to their houſes againe. But Antonius and Lepidus, which were two of Cæſars chiefeſt frends, ſecretly conueying them ſelues away, fled into other mens houſes, and forſooke their owne. Brutus and his confederats on thother ſide, being yet hotte with this murther they had committed, hauing their ſwordes drawen in their hands, came all in a troupe togither out of the Senate, and went into the market place, not as men that made countenance to flie, but otherwiſe boldly holding vp their heades like men of corage, and called to the people to defende their libertie, and ſtayed to ſpeake with euery great perſonage whome they met in their way. Of them, ſome followed this troupe, and went amongeſt them, as if they had bene of the conſpiracie, and falſely chalenged parte of the honor with them: among them was Caius Octauius, and Lentulus Spinther. But both of them were afterwards put to death, for their vaine B couetouſnes of honor, by Antonius, and Octauius Cæſar the younger: and yet had no parte of that honor for the which they were put to death, neither did any man beleue that they were any of the confederates, or of counſell with them. For they that did put them to death, tooke reuenge rather of the will they had to offend, then of any fact they had committed. The next morning, Brutus and his confederates came into the market place to ſpeake vnto the people, who gaue them ſuch audience, that it ſeemed they neither greatly reproued, nor allowed the fact: for by their great ſilence they ſhowed, that they were ſory for Cæſars death, and alſo that they did reuerence Brutus. Nowe the Senate graunted generall pardonne for all that was paſte, and to pacifie euery man, ordained beſides, that Cæſars funerals ſhoulde bee honored as a god, and eſtabliſhed all thinges that he had done: and gaue certaine prouinces alſo, and C conuenient honors vnto Brutus and his confederates, whereby euery man thought all things were brought to good peace & quietnes againe. But when they had opened Cæſars teſtamẽt, and found a liberall legacie of money, bequeathed vnto euery citizen of Rome, and that they ſaw his body (which was brought into the market place) all bemangled with gaſhes of ſwords: then there was no order to keepe the multitude and common people quiet, but they plucked vp formes, tables, and ſtooles, and layed them all about the body, & ſetting them a fire, burnt the corſe. Then when the fire was well kindled, they tooke the firebrandes, and went vnto their houſes that had ſlaine Cæſar, to ſet them a fire. Other alſo ranne vp and downe the citie to ſee if they could meete with any of them, to cut them in peeces: howbeit they could meete with neuer a man of them, bicauſe they had locked them ſelues vp ſafely in their houſes.

D There was one of Cæſars frends called Cinna, that had a maruelous ſtraunge & terrible dreame the night before. He dreamed that Cæſar bad him to ſupper, & that he refuſed, and would not goe: then that Cæſar tooke him by the hand, and led him againſt his will. Now Cinna hearing at that time, that they burnt Cæſars body in the market place, notwithſtanding that he feared his dreame, and had an agew on him beſides: he went into the market place to honor his funeralls. When he came thither, one of the meane ſorte asked what his name was? He was ſtraight called by his name. The firſt man told it to an other, and that other vnto an other, ſo that it ranne ſtraight through them all, that he was one of them that murdered Cæſar: (for in deede one of the traitors to Cæſar, was alſo called Cinna as him ſelfe) wherefore taking him for Cinna the murderer, they fell vpon him with ſuch furie, that they preſently diſpatched him in E the market place. This ſturre and furie made Brutus and Caſſius more affrayed, then of all that was paſt, and therefore within fewe dayes after, they departed out of Rome: and touching their doings afterwards, and what calamity they ſuffered till their deathes, we haue wrytten it at large, in the life of Brutus. Cæſar dyed at ſix and fifty yeres of age: and Pompey alſo liued not paſſing foure yeares more then he. So he reaped no other frute of all his raigne & dominion, which he had ſo vehemently deſired all his life, and purſued with ſuch extreame daunger: but a vaine name only, and a ſuperficiall glory, that procured him the enuy and hatred of his contrie. But his great proſperitie and good fortune that fauored him all his life time, did continue afterwards in the reuenge of his death, purſuing the murtherers both by ſea & land, till they had not left a man more to be executed, of al them that were actors or counſellers in the conF ſpiracy of his death. Furthermore, of all the chaunces that happen vnto men vpon the earth, that which came to Caſſius aboue all other, is moſt to be wondred at. For he being ouercome in battell at the iorney of Philippes, ſlue him ſelfe with the ſame ſworde, with the which he strake Cæsar. Againe, of signes in the element, the great comet which seuen nightes together was seene very bright after Cæsars death, the eight night after was neuer seene more. Also the brightnes of the sunne was darkened, the which all that yeare through rose very pale, and shined not out, whereby it gaue but small heate: therefore the ayer being very clowdy & darke, by the weakenes of the heate that could not come foorth, did cause the earth to bring foorth but raw and vnrype frute, which rotted before it could rype. But aboue all, the ghost that appeared vnto Brutus shewed plainly, that the goddes were offended with the murther of Cæsar.

Brutus vision.

The vision was thus. Brutus being ready to passe ouer his army from the citie of ABYDOS, to the other coast lying directly against it, slept euery night (as his manner was) in his tent, and being yet awake, thinking of his affaires: (for by reporte he was as carefull a Captaine, and liued with as litle sleepe, as euer man did) he thought he heard a noyse at his tent dore, & looking towards the light of the lampe that waxed very dimme, he saw a horrible vision of a man, of a wonderfull greatnes, and dreadfull looke, which at the first made him maruelously afraid. But when he sawe that it did him no hurt, but stoode by his bedde side, and sayd nothing: at length he asked him what he was. The image aunswered him: I am thy ill angell, Brutus, and thou shalt see me by the citie of PHILIPPES. Then Brutus replied againe, and sayd: well, I shall see thee then. Therewithall, the spirit presently vanished from him. After that time Brutus being in battell neere vnto the citie of PHILIPPES, against Antonius and Octauius Cæsar, at the first battell he wan the victorie, and ouerthrowing all them that withstoode him, he draue them into young Cæsars campe, which he tooke. The second battell being at hand, this spirit appeared again vnto him, but spake neuer a word. Thereuppon Brutus knowing he should dye, did put him selfe to all hazard in battell, but yet fighting could not be slaine. So seeing his men put to flight and ouerthrowen, he ranne vnto a litle rocke not farre of, and there setting his swordes point to his breast, fell vpon it, and slue him selfe, but yet as it is reported, with the helpe of his frend, that dispatched him.

The end of Cæsars life.

THE LIFE OF Phocion.

THE Orator Demades on a time floriſhed in ATHENS, bicauſe in all his doings and ſayings in the adminiſtration and gouernment of the common wealth, he alwayes fauored the MACEDONIANS and Antipater: in reſpect whereof he was eftſoones compelled, both in his counſell and lawes, to preferre many things to the diſhonor of his city, ſaying, that they muſt pardon him, bicauſe he gouerned the ſhippewrackes of his contrie. This was an arrogant ſpeache: but yet referring it to the gouernment of Phocion he ſayd truely. For in deede Demades ſelfe was the ſhippewracke of the common weale, bicauſe he liued ſo inſolently, and gouerned ſo lewdly. Inſomuch as Antipater ſayd of him, after he was very old: that there was nothing left of him, no more then of a beaſt ſacrificed, but the tongue and belly. But the vertues of Phocion, which had to fight againſt the cruell and bitter enemy of the time, were ſo obſcured by the calamities of GREECE: that his fame was nothing ſo great as he deſerued. For we muſt not credit Sophocles words, making vertue of it ſelfe but weake, in theſe verſes, VVhen ſtormes of ſore aduerſities (o king) doe men aſſaile, It dauntes their corage, cuts their combs, and makes their harts to quaile.

Demades arrogãt ſaying.

The power of vertue and fortune.

But we muſt onely geue place to fortune, who when ſhe frowneth vppon any good and vertuous men, her force is ſo great, that where they deſerue honor and fauor, ſhe violently heapeth falſe & malicious accuſations againſt them, which maketh their vertue lame, & not of that credit which in dede it deſerueth. And yet it ſeemeth to many, that free cities are moſt cruel vnto their good citizens in time of proſperity: bicauſe they ſlow in wealth & liue at eaſe, which maketh them of hauty mindes. But it is cleane contrary. For aduerſity commonly maketh mens maners ſower, chollericke, and very haſty: beſides, ſlow to heare, churliſh, and offended with euery litle ſharpe word. For he that correcteth them that offend, ſeemeth to caſt their aduerſitie in their teeth: and he that telleth them plainly of their faultes, ſeemeth alſo to deſpiſe them. For like as honnie ſweete by nature, applied vnto woundes, doth bring both ſmart and paine: euen ſo, ſharpe wordes, though profitable, doe bite the vnfortunate man, if they be not tempered with diſcretion & curteſie. And therefore Homer the Poet calleth ſweete and pleasaunt thinges μετοχὴν, as yeelding and not striuing with contrariety, against that parte of the minde, whereby we be angrie and froward. For euen as sore eyes doe like to looke on blacke and darke colours, and can not abide the bright and glaring: so in a city, where for want of foresight and gouernment, things goe not well, men be so diuers and vnwilling to heare of their owne fault and estate, that they had rather continue in their follie and daunger, then by sharpnes of words to be rebuked and restored. So that it being impossible to amend one fault with a greater, that common wealth must be in great daunger, that when it hath most nede of helpe, is lotheste to receiue any: and he also hazardeth him selfe, that plainly telleth them their faultes. Like as therefore the Mathematician sayth, that the sunne doth not altogether follow the motion of the higheste heauen, nor yet is moued directly contrary, but fetching a compase a litle ouerthwart, maketh an oblique circle, and by variety of approching and departing preserueth all things, & kepeth the world in good temperature. Euen so, too seuere gouernment, contrarying the peoples mindes in all things, is not good: as also it is maruelous daungerous, not to correct offendors when they offend, for feare of the peoples displeasure. But the meane, sometime to yeelde vnto the people to make them the more willing to obey, and to graunt them things of pleasure, to demaund of them againe things profitable: that is a good way to gouerne men the better by. For, by gentle meanes they are brought to doe many profitable things, when they seeke it not of them, by rigor & authority. In deede this meane is very hard to be obserued, bicause authority is hardly tempered with lenity. But when they meete together, there is no harmony more musicall, nor concordance more perfit then that: and therfore it is said, that thereby God doth gouerne the world, working rather a voluntary, then a forced obediēce in men. But this fault of seuerenes was in Cato the younger, for he could not fashion him selfe to the peoples maners, neither did they like his: neither did he win his estimacion in the common wealth by flattering of them. And therefore Cicero sayd, that he was put by the Consulship, for that he behaued him selfe as though he liued in the common wealth deuised by Plato, & not amongest the disordered and corrupt posterity of Romulus. Me thinketh I can liken him properly vnto vntimely frute: the which though men doe take pleasure to see and wonder at, yet they eate them not. Euen so, the auncient simplicity of Catoes maner (hauing so long time bene out of vse, & comming then to shew it selfe in that corrupt time & ill maners of the city) was in deede much praiseworthy: but yet not the conuenientest, nor the fittest for him, bicause it aunswered nor respected not the vse and maners of his time. For he found not his contry (as Phocion did) vtterly destroyed, but tossed in a daungerous tempest: & being not of authority like the pilot to take the sterne in hand, & gouerne the shippe: he tooke him selfe to tricking the sailes, and preparing the tacle, so to assist men of greater power. And yet being in no greater place, he so thwarted fortune (which seemed to haue sworne the ouerthrowe of the estate of Rome) that with much a doe, with great difficulty, & a long time after, she executed her malice. And yet the common wealth had almost gotten the victory of her, by meanes of Cato & his vertue: with whom I doe compare the vertue of Phocion, who yet in my opinion, were not in all thinges alike, neither in their honesty, nor policy of gouernment. For there is difference betwext manhood & manhood, as there was betwext that of Alcibiades, and that of Epaminondas: betwext wisedom & wisedom, as betwext that of Aristides, & that of Themistocles: & betwext iustice & iustice, as betwext that of Numa, & that of Agesilaus. But the vertues of these men (to him that shall superficially regard, & slightly consider them) seeme all one in quality, in maner, & vse, both alike in temperance of curtesie with seuerity, & manhood with wisdom: a vigilant care for others, with presence of corage & security of mind for them selues, abhorring all filthines & corruption, & imbrasing cōstancy & loue of iustice: that for any man to discerne the difference betwene thē, it requireth an excellent good wit & iudgement. Now touching Cato, euery man knoweth that he was of a noble house, as we wil shew you hereafter in his life: but for Phocion, I gesse he came of no base parentage. For if he had bene the sonne of a spoonemaker, as Idomeneus testifieth: Glaucippus the sonne of Hyperides, hauing in an inuectiue he wrote against him, rehersed all the mischiefes he could of him, he would not haue forgotte to haue vpbraid him with his base parētage, neither he him selfe also (if that had bene true) had bene so well brought vp as he was. For when he was but a young man, he was Platoes scholler;

Ciceroes saying of Cato, & the common wealth at Rome.

The parētage of Phocion.

A and afterwards Xenocrates ſcholler, in the ſchoole of Academia: and ſo, euen from his firſt beginning, he gaue him ſelfe to followe them that were learned. For as Duris writeth, neuer ATHENIAN ſaw him weepe nor laugh, nor waſhe him ſelfe in any common bathe, nor his hands out of his ſleeues when he ware a long gowne. For when he went to the warres, he would alwaies goe afoote, and neuer wore gowne, vnles it were extreame cold: and then the ſouldiers to mocke him withall, would ſay it was a ſigne of a ſharpe winter, when they ſawe Phocion in his gowne. Nowe, though in deede he was very curteous and gentle of nature, yet he had ſuch a grymme looke withall, that no man had any deſire to talke with him, but ſuch as were of his familliar acquaintance. And therefore when Chares the Orator one day mocked him for the bending of his browes, and that the ATHENIANS fell in a laughter withall: My Maiſters, ſay Phocion, the bending of my browes haue done you no hurt, but the foolery and laughing of theſe flatterers, haue made ye oftentymes to weepe. Furthermore, his maner of ſpeech was very profitable, for the good ſentences and counſells he vttered: but it was mixed with an imperious, auſtere, and bitter ſhortnes. For as Zeno the Philoſopher ſayeth, that the wiſe man ſhould temper his wordes with witte and reaſon, before he vtter them: euen ſo was Phocions ſpeech, the which in few words comprehended much matter. And thereupon it ſeemeth that Polyeuctus SPHETTIAN ſayd, that Demoſthenes was an excellent Orator, but in ſpeech, Phocion was very wittie. For like as coynes of gold or ſiluer, the lighter they waye, the finer they be of goodnes: euen ſo the excellencie of ſpeeche conſiſteth in ſignifying much, by fewe wordes. And touching this matter, it is reported, that the Theater being full of people, Phocion walked all alone vpon the ſcaffold where the players played, and was in a great muſe with him ſelfe: whereuppon, one of his friendes ſeeing him ſo in his muſes, ſaid vnto him, Surely Phocion, thy minde is occupied about ſomewhat. In deede ſo is it, ſayd he: for I am thinking with my ſelfe, if I could abridge any thing of that I haue to ſay to the people. For Demoſthenes ſelfe litle eſteming all other Orators, when Phocion roſe vp to ſpeake, he would round his friendes in their eares, and told them: See, the cutter of my wordes riſeth. Peraduenture he ment it by his maners alſo: For when a good man ſpeaketh, not a word onely, but a wincke of an eye, or a nod of his head, doth counteruaile many artificiall words & ſpeeches of Rethoritians. Furthermore, when he was a young man, he went to the warres vnder Captaine Chabrias, and followed him: of whom he learned to be a perfit ſouldier, and in recompence thereof, he reformed many of his Captaines imperfections, and made him wiſer then he was. For Chabrias otherwiſe beeing very dull and ſlothfull of him ſelfe, when he came to fight, he was ſo hotte and corageous, that he would thruſt himſelfe into daunger, with the deſperateſt perſons: & therefore for his raſhnes, it afterwards coſt him his life, in the citie of CHIO, where launching out with his gally before the reſt, he preſſed to land in deſpite of his enemies. But Phocion being wiſe to loke to him ſelfe, and very quicke to execute: on the one ſide quickned Chabrias ſlownes, and on the other ſide alſo, by wiſedom cooled his heate and furie. Chabrias therefore, being a good man & curteous, loued Phocion very well, and did preferre him in matters of ſeruice, making him famous amongeſt the GRÆCIANS, and employed him in his hardieſt enterpriſes. For by his meanes he atchieued great fame and honor in a battell by ſea, which he wanne by the Ile of NAXOS, giuing him the left winge of his armie: on which ſide the fight was ſharpeſt of all the battell, and there he ſooneſt put the enemies to flight. This battel being the firſt which the citie of ATHENS wanne with their owne men onely, after it had bene taken: gaue the people cauſe to loue Chabrias, and made them alſo to make accompt of Phocion, as of a noble ſouldier, & worthy to haue charge. This victory was gotten on the feaſt day of the great miſteries, in memory whereof, Chabrias did yearly, on the ſixtenth day of the moneth Boedromion (now called Auguſt) make all the people of ATHENS drinke. After that time, Chabrias ſending Phocion to receiue the tribute of the Ilanders, their confederats, and the ſhippes which they ſhould ſend him: he gaue him twenty gallies to bringe him thither. But Phocion then (as it is reported) ſaid vnto him: if he ſent him to fight with his enemies, he had neede to haue moe ſhippes: but if he ſent him as an Ambaſſador vnto his friendes, then, that one ſhippe would ſerue his turne. So he went with one gallie onely: and after he had ſpoken with the cities, and curteouſly dealt with the gouernors of euery one of them, he returned backe, furniſhed of their confederats, with a great fleete of ſhippes and money, to carry vnto ATHENS. So Phocion did not onely re- A uerence Chabrias while he liued, but after his death alſo he tooke great care of his friendes and kinſmen, and ſought to make his ſonne Cteſippus, an honeſt man: whom, though he ſawe very wilde and vntoward, yet he neuer left to reforme him, and hide his fault. It is ſayde alſo, that when this young man did trouble him much with vaine friuolous queſtions, ſeruing then vnder him, he being Captaine, and taking vpon him to giue him counſell, to reproue him, and to teache him the dutie of a Captaine: he could not but ſay, O Chabrias, Chabrias: now doe I paye for the loue thou dideſt beare me when thou wert aliue, in bearing with the folly of thy ſonne. But when he ſaw that the heads of the citie of ATHENS had as it were by lot deuided amonge them ſelues the offices of warre and peace, and that ſome of them, as Eubulus, Ariſto- phon, Demoſthenes, Lycurgus, and Hyperides were common ſpeakers and preferrers of matters in B counſells and Senate: and that others, as Diopithes, Meneſtheus, Leoſthenes, and Chares, became great men by the warres, and had charge of armies: he determined rather to follow the manner of gouernment, of Pericles, Ariſtides, & Solon, as being mingled of both. For either of them, ſeemed (as the Poet Archilochus ſayth)

To bee both Champions ſtowt, of Marſis vvarlyke band,
And of the Muſes eke, the artes to vnderſtand.

He knew alſo, that Pallas the goddeſſe and protector of ATHENS, was called Polemica, and Politica: to wit, skilfull to rule both in warre and peace. So, hauing thus diſpoſed of him ſelfe in gouernment, he alwaies perſwaded peace and quietnes, and yet was often choſen Captaine, and had charge of armies, being the onely man that of all the Captaines afore him, and in his C time, did neuer ſue for charge, neither yet refuſed it at any time, when he was called to ſerue the common wealth. It is certen that he was choſen fiue and forty times Prætor, and was alwaies abſent at the elections, but yet ſent for. Whereuppon all the wiſe men wondred to ſee the manner of the people towards him, conſidering that Phocion had neuer done nor ſayd any thing to flatter them withall, but commonly had bene againſt their deſires: and how they vſed other gouernours notwithſtanding, that were more pleaſant and delightfull in their orati-ons, like men to ſport at, as it is ſayd of kings, who after they haue waſhed their handes to goe to their meate, doe vſe to haue Ieſters and flatterers to make them mery: but on thother ſide when they had occaſion of warres in deede, how then like wiſe men they could bethinke them ſelues, and chooſe the wiſeſt and ſtowteſt man of the citie, & that moſt would withſtand their D mindes and deſires. For on a time an oracle of Apollo Delphias, beeing openly red before them, which ſayd, that all the other ATHENIANS being agreed, yet there was one amonge them that was contrary to all the reſt of the citie: Phocion ſtepping forth before them all, bad them neuer ſeeke further for the man, for it was he that liked none of all their doings. Another time he chanced to ſay his opinion before all the people, the which they all praiſed and approued:
but he ſaw they were ſo ſodeinly become of his minde, he turned backe to his friendes, and aſked them: alas, hath not ſome euill thing ſlipped my mouth vnwares? Another time a generall collection being gathered of the people at ATHENS, towardes the ſolemnizing of a ſacrifice: other men of his eſtate hauing payd their part, he was often alſo called vpon to pay his.
But he aunſwered them againe, aske them that be rich, for it were a ſhame for me to giue you E any thing, being yet in this mans debt: pointing to Callicles the Vſurer, who had lent him money. But when they left him not for all this, to cry out apon him for the contribution, he began to tell them this tale: that on a time there was a coward preparing to goe to the warres, and as he was ready to depart, he heard the Rauens what a crying they made, and taking it for an ill ſigne, he put of his harnes, and kept him at home. After that he put on his harnes againe, & went on his way towards the campe: the Rauens beganne againe to make a goodlier cry behind him. But thereuppon he ſtaied ſtraight, and at length ſayd: ye ſhall crooke as lowd as yo liſt, before ye feede of my carkas. An other time the ATHENIANS being in warre vnder his charge, would needes haue him to leade them to giue charge vppon their enemies, but he would not: thereuppon they called him coward, and ſayd he durſt not. Well, ſayd he againe, F it is not you can make me valiant, no more then my ſelfe can make you cowards: and yet ond of vs know an other. Another time in a maruelous daungerous time, the people handled him very Phocions no-table ſayings.

A very churliſhly, and would needes haue him preſently deliuer accompt of his charge: but he aunſwered them, O my friendes, firſt ſaue your ſelues. Furthermore, the people beeing very lowly and humble, for feare, in time of warres: and preſently in peace againe waxing braue in wordes againſt Phocion, charging him that he had taken the victorie out of their handes: he onely ſayd this to them, you are happy that haue a Captaine that knowes you, els you would ſinge a new ſonge. Another time there was a quarrell betwixt the BOEOTIANS, and them, about their bounds and fronters: the which they would not try by lawe, but by battel. But Phocion told them, they did they wiſt not what, & counſelled them rather to fight it out in words, in which they were the ſtronger, and not with weapons, where they were the weaker. Another time they ſo much miſliked his opinion in the aſſembly, that they woulde not abide to heare
B him, nor ſuffer him to ſpeake. Wel, my Maiſters, q he then, you may make me doe that which is not to be done: but you ſhall neuer compell me, againſt my minde, to ſay that which is not to be ſpoken. He would as gallantly alſo gird the Orators his aduerſaries, when they were buſie with him. As on a time he aunſwered Demoſthenes, that ſayd vnto him: the people, Phocion, will kill thee one day, and if it take them in the heades. Yea thee, q he, if they be wiſe. Agayne, when Polyeuctus SPHETTIAN, in a hotte day perſwaded the people of ATHENS to make warre with king Philip, ſweating, and with much a doe fetching his breath, being a fatte man, that he was driuen oftentymes to drinke water, to ende his oration: ſurely ſayd Phocion, ye ſhall doe maruelous wiſely, to make warre at ſuch a mans motion. Why, what thinke ye will he doe, when he hath his curats and his target vpon him, and that the enemies be ready to fight: that C now in making an oration onely before you, which he hath ſtudied long before, is almoſt ſtifled? Another time alſo whē Lycurgus in his oration had openly reproued him for many things before the people, and among the reſt, for that Alexander demaunding tenne Citizens of ATHENS to do with them what he thought good, that he had counſelled them to deliuer them: Phocion aunſwered him, I haue oftentimes counſelled them for the beſt, but they would neuer follow my councell. There was one Archibiades at that time in ATHENS, that counterfeated the LACEDÆMONIAN, with a maruelous long beard, a beggerly cloke, and a ſower looke. Phocion being checkt one day before the people, appealed vnto Archibiades for a witnes, to confirme that he ſpake. But he riſing vp, counſelled the people contrarily, to flatter them withall. Phocion perceiuing it, tooke him by the beard, and ſayd vnto him: alas Archibiades, why diddeſt D thou not then clippe thy beard, ſeeing thou wouldeſt needes flatter? There was another great pleader, one Ariſtogiton, that in all aſſemblies of the cities, did nothing but buſſe warres continually in their eares. Afterwards when men were to be leauied and muſtered, and their names entred that ſhould goe to the warres: Ariſtogiton came halting into the market place with a ſtaffe in his hand, and both his legges bound vp, to make the people beleeue that he was ſicke and diſeaſed. Phocion ſpying Ariſtogiton farre of, cryed out to the Clearke that wrote the billes: put in Ariſtogiton, lame, and impudent. So that oftentymes it makes me muſe, howe, or wherefore ſo ſharpe and ſeuere a man (as by theſe examples it appeareth he was) could come to the ſurname of good. Notwithſtanding, in the ende I find it a hard thing, but not impoſſible, that E a man ſhould be like wine, both ſweete and ſharpe together: as there are others to the contrary, that at the firſt ſight, ſeeme very curteous and gentle of conuerſation, and apon better acquaintance, proue churliſhe and dogged. It is reported alſo, that Hyperides the Orator one day ſhould ſay to the ATHENIANS: I pray you (my Lords) note me not for my ſharpenes, but conſider if my ſharpenes be without profit. As who ſhould ſay, men were not troubleſom, but for couetouſnes onely, and as if the people did not rather feare and hate them, that of inſolencie & malice did abuſe & contemne their authority. Phocion on thother ſide, he neuer did Citizen hurt, for any priuate malice he bare him: but was euer ſharpe and cruell to them, which were againſt any matter he preferred for the benefit of the common wealth. For in all other things, he ſhewed him ſelf maruelous lowly and curteous to euery body, and would be familliar with his aduerſaries, and helpe them if they wanted, or were otherwiſe in daunger of diſpleaſure
F with the ſtate. Inſomuch as his friendes therefore reproued him on a time, when he ſpake in the behalfe of a naughty man, an offender: O, ſayd he, honeſt men neede no helpe. An other time, Ariſtogiton the Sycophant, beeing clapped vp in priſon, ſent vnto Phocion to pray him ſo come and speake with him, after he was condemned. Phocion went into the prison to him, A though his friendes perswaded him the contrary, and aunswered them: O, let me alone, sayd he, for where could I see Aristogiton more gladly then in prison? Furthermore, when there went any army to sea out of ATHENS, if there were any other chosen generall but Phocion: the townes and Ilandes all alongest the sea coast, (which were friendes and confederats of the A-THENIANS) fortified their walls, filled vp their hauens, and brought their wiues, slaues, and cattell, and all their goods into their townes and cities, as if they had bene enemies, & open warre proclaimed. Contratily also, if Phocion had bene Capteine and generall: they would send out their shippes to the sea to meete him farre of, crowned with garlands in token of common ioy, and so would bringe him to their cities. King Philip secretly seking to winne the Ile of EU-BOEA, sent an armie thither out of MACEDON, and intised the townes by tyrannes to rebell: B whereuppon, Plutarke ERETRIAN praied in ayde of the ATHENIANS, to take this Iland from the MACEDONIANS, which they daily wanne more and more, if they came not presently to Phocions iorney into Euboea. ayde them. So Phocion was sent general thither, but with a fewe men onely, bicause they made account the men of that contry would straight ioyne with him, for the good will they bare him. But when he came thither, he found them all traytors, and rebells, and brybed with king Philippes money, which he lauished out amonge them: so that he was brought into great daunger. Thereupon he retyred to a litle hill that is seuered from the fieldes of Tamynes, with a great large valley, and there fortified him selfe with that litle armie he had. Then he persua-Phocion perswadeth his Captaines, to suffer the mutinous soulditers & cowards to depart the campe. ded his Captaines not to care for all those rebels, pratlers, and cowards which fled out of their tents, and forsooke their ensignes and Captaines, but that they should let them goe out of the C campe where they would. For, sayd he, such disobedient souldiers here will doe vs no seruice, and moreouer will hinder them that haue good will to serue well: and at home also, knowing them selues in faulte, for that they forsooke the campe without licence, they dare not complayne apon vs. Afterwards when the enemies came to set apon him, he commaunded his men to arme, and put them selues in readines, and not to sturre, vntill he had done sacrifice:

but he stayed long before he came, either bicause he could haue no lucky signes of the sacrifices, or els for that he would draw his enemies nearer. Thereuppon Plutarke ERETRIAN supposing he deferred to marche for feare, went him selfe first into the field, with certen light horsemen he had in pay. Then the men of armes seeing them giue charge, could hold no longer, but followed him also, stragling out of the campe one after an other disorderly, and so did D set apon their enemies. The first being ouerthrowen, all the other dispersed them selues, and Plutarke him self fled. Then certen bandes of the enemies thinking all had bene theirs, followed them euen into their campe, and came to throw downe their rampiers. In the meane time, Phocions victory in Euboea. Phocion hauing ended his sacrifice, the ATHENIANS came out of their campe, and set apon them, and made part of them flie immediatly, and part of them also they slue hard by the trenches of their campe. Then Phocion commaunded that the battell should stand still, to receiue their men that were scattered vp and downe the fieldes: and in the meane space, he him selfe, with the choyceste men of his armie, gaue charge apon the enemies. The fight was cruell be-twene them. For the ATHENIANS fought very valiantly, ventring their persons: but of them all, two young men fighting by their generall, (Glaucus, the sonne of Polymedes, and Thallus, the E sonne of Cineas) caried the praise away. And so did Cleophanes that daye also shewe him selfe very valiant. For he crying out still apon the horsemen that fled, & perswading them to come and helpe their generall that was in daunger: brought them backe againe, and thereby gotte the footemen the victorie. After this battell he draue Plutarke out of ERETRIA, and tooke the castell of ZARETRA, standing in a very commodious place for this warre, where the Ile draweth to a straighnes, enuyronned on either side with the sea: and would not suffer his men to take any GRAECIANS prisoners, fearing least the Orators at ATHENS might moue the people sodeinly in a rage, to put them to death. After all these thinges were done, Phocion returned backe to ATHENS. But then did the confederats of the ATHENIANS straight wishe for his iustice and curtesie: and the ATHENIANS them selues also knewe his skilfulnes and manhood. F For his successor Molossus, that was generall for the rest of the warre, delt so vndiscretely, that he him selfe was taken prisoner there. Then king Philip beeing put in maruailous great hope, went

A went with all his armie into HELLESPONT, perſwading him ſelfe, that he ſhould ſtraight take all CHERRONESVS, the cities of PERINTHE and BYZANTIVM. The ATHENIANS thereuppon determining to ſend ayde, to preuent king Philips comming: the Orators made great ſute, that Chares might be choſen Captaine. But he being ſent thither with a good number of ſhippes, did no ſeruice worthy commendacion, neither would the cities receiue his nauie into their hauens: but being ſuſpected of euery man, and deſpiſed of his enemies, he was driuen to ſayle vp and downe, and to get money of the allyes. The people being incenſed by the Orators, were maruelouſly offended, & repented them ſelues that they had ſent ayde vnto the BYZANTINES. Then Phocion riſing vp, ſpake vnto the people, & told them, that it was no reaſon that miſtruſting their confederats they ſhould be offended with them: but to be angry with their Cap-
B taines that deſerued to be miſtruſted. For they, ſaid he, doe make your confederats affraide of you, who without you notwithſtanding can not ſaue themſelues. The people chaunging their mindes by his oration, made Phocion againe their Captaine, and ſent him with an armie into HELLESPONT to helpe their confederats there, which was of great importance to ſaue the citie of BYZANTIVM. Furthermore, Phocions fame was ſo great, that Cleon, the greateſt man of vertue and authoritie in BIZANTIVM, and had before bene Phocions companion and familiar in the Academy: he made ſute for him vnto the citie. Then the BYZANTINES would not ſuffer him (though he deſired it) to campe without the walls of their citie, but opening their gates, receiued him in, and mingled the ATHENIANS amongeſt them. Who, perceiuing how much the Citizens truſted them, did ſo honeſtly behaue them ſelues in their conuerſation amongeſt C them, that they gaue them no maner of cauſe to complaine of them: and ſhewed them ſelues ſo valiant beſides in all battells and conflicts, that Philip (which before was thought dreadfull and inuincible, euery man beeing affraid to fight any battell with him) returned out of HELLESPONT without any thing done, and to his great diſcredit: where Phocion wanne ſome of his ſhippes, and recouered againe the ſtrong holdes, in the which he had placed his garriſons. Furthermore, making diuers inuaſions into his contries, he deſtroyed his borders: till that at length he was ſore hurt there, and ſo driuen to returne home againe, by meanes of a great armie that came againſt him, to defend the contry: Shortly after, the MEGARIANS ſecretly ſent vnto him, to deliuer their citie into his hands. Phocion fearing if the BOEOTIANS vnderſtood it, that they would preuent him: he called a common aſſembly earely in the morning, & told the D people what meſſage the MEGARIANS had ſent vnto him. The people apon his motion being determined to ayde them: Phocion ſtraight ſounding the trumpet at the breaking vp of the aſſembly, gaue them no further leyſure, but to take their weapons, and ſo led them incontinently to MEGARA. The MEGARIANS receiuing him, Phocion ſhut vp the hauen of NISÆA, and brought two long walls from the citie vnto it, and ſo ioyned it vnto the ſea: Whereby he ſtood not greatly in feare of his enemies by land, and for the ſea, the ATHENIANS were Lordes of it. Now when the ATHENIANS had proclaimed open warre againſt king Philip, and had choſen other Captaines in his abſence, and that he was returned from the Iles: aboue all thinges, he perſwaded the people (king Philip requiring peace, and greatly fearing the daunger) to accept the condicions of peace. Then one of theſe buſy Orators that was ſtill accuſing one or other,
E ſaid vnto him: why, Phocio, how dareſt thou attept to turne the ATHENIANS frō warre, hauing now their ſwordes in their handes? yes truely, ſaid Phocion: though in warre I know I ſhal commaund thee, & in peace thou wilt commaund me. But when the people would not harken to him, and that Demoſthenes caried them away with his perſwaſions, who counſelled them to fight with king Philip, as farre from ATTICA as they could: I pray thee friend, ſaid Phocion vnto him, let vs not diſpute where we ſhall fight, but conſider how we ſhall ouercome, the which if we can ſo bring to paſſe, be ſure we ſhall put the warre farre enough from vs. For men that are ouercome, be euer in feare and daunger, whereſoeuer they be. When the ATHENIANS had loſt a battell againſt Philip, the ſeditious Orators that hunted after innouacion, preferred Charidemus to be choſen generall of the ATHENIANS: whereuppon, the Magiſtrates & Senatours
F being affraid, and taking with them all the Court and Senate of the AREOPAGITS, they made ſuch earneſt ſute to the people, with the teares in their eyes, that at laſt (but with much a doe) they obteyned, that the affaires of the citie might be put into Phocions handes & gouernment.

Phocion ſaued the citie of Byzantium.

Phocio draue Philip out of Helleſpont.

Phocion ioyned Megara vnto Athens.

He thought good to accept the articles and gentle condicions of peace which Philip offered them. But after that the Orator Demades moued that the citie of ATHENS would enter into the common treatie of peace, & common assembly of the states of GRÆCE, procured at king Philips requeſt: Phocion would not agree to it, vntill they might vnderſtand what demaunds Philip would make at the assembly of the GRÆCIANS. When his opinion through the peruerſnes of time could not be liked of them, & that he ſaw the ATHENIANS ſoone after repented them that they did not followe his counſell, when they heard they ſhould furniſh king Philip with ſhippes and horſemen: then he told them, the feare whereof ye now complaine, made me to withſtand that, which now ye haue conſented vnto. But ſithence it is ſo that you haue nowe paſt your conſents, you muſt be contented, and not be diſcoraged at it: remembring that your aunceſtors in times paſt haue ſometyme commaunded, and other while obeyed others, and yet haue ſo wiſely and diſcreetely gouerned them ſelues in both fortunes, that they haue not onely ſaued their citie, but all GRÆCE beſides. When newes came of king Philips death, the people for ioy would ſtraight haue made bonfires and ſacrifices to the goddes for the good newes: but Phocion would not ſuffer them, and ſayd, that it was a token of a baſe minde, to reioyce at any mans death, & beſides that, the armie which ouerthrew you at CHÆRONEA, hath not yet loſt but one man. And when Demoſthenes alſo would commonly ſpeake ill of Alexander, and ſpecially when he was ſo neare THEBES with his armie: Phocion rehearſed vnto him theſe verſes of Homer:

To reioyce at any mans hurt, ſheweth a baſe mind, & vile nature.

Howu great a folly is it for to ſtand Againſt a cruell king, Which beeing armd and hauing ſword in hand, Seekes fame of euery thing?

What, when there is ſuch a great fire kindled, wilt thou caſt the citie into it? for my part therefore, though they were willing, yet will I not ſuffer them to caſt them ſelues away: for to that ende haue I taken vpon me this charge and gouernment. And afterwards alſo, when Alexander had raſed the citie of THEBES, and had required the ATHENIANS to deliuer him Demoſthenes, Lycurgus, Hyperides, and Caridemus, and that the whole aſſembly and counſell not knowing what aunſwer to make, did all caſt their eyes vppon Phocion, and cryed vnto him to ſay his opinion: he then roſe vppe, and taking one of his friendes vnto him called Nicocles, whome he loued and truſted aboue all men els, he ſayd thus openly vnto them. Theſe men whome Alexander requireth, haue brought this citie to this extremitie, that if he required Nicocles here, I would giue my conſent to deliuer him: For I would thinke my ſelfe happy to loſe my life, for all your ſafetie. Furthermore, though I am right hartely ſory (ſayd he) for the poore afflicted THEBANS, that are come into the citie for ſuecour: yet I aſſure ye, it is better one citie mourne, then two. And therefore I thinke it is beſt to intreate the Conqueror for both, rather then to our certeine deſtruction to fight with him that is the ſtronger. It is ſayd alſo that Alexander refuſed the firſt decree which the people offered him vppon Phocions requeſt, and ſent awaye the Ambaſſadors, and would not ſpeake with them. But the ſecond, which Phocion him ſelfe brought, he tooke: beeing tolde by his fathers olde ſeruaunts, that king Philip made great accompt of him. Whereuppon, Alexander did not onely giue him audience, and graunt his requeſt, but further followed his counſell. For Phocion perſwaded him, if he loued quietnes, to leaue warre: if he deſired fame, then, that he ſhould make warre with the barbarous people, but not with the GRÆCIANS. So Phocion feeding Alexanders humor with ſuch talke and diſcourſe as he thought would like him beſt: he ſo altered and ſoftened Alexanders diſpoſition, that when he went from him, he willed him that the ATHENIANS ſhould looke to their affayres, for if he ſhould dye, he knewe no people fitter to commaund then they. Furthermore, bicauſe he would be better acquainted with Phocion, and make him his friend: he made ſo much of him, that he more honored him, then all the reſt of his friends. To this effect, Duris the hiſtoriographer writeth, that when Alexander was growen very great, and had ouercome king Darius: he left out of his letters this worde Chærin (to wit, ioy, and health) which he vſed commonly in all the letters he wrote, and would no more honor any other with that maner of ſalutacion, but Phocion, & Antipater. Chares alſo writeth the ſame. And

Alexander pacified with the Athenians, by Phocions meanes.

A they all doe confesse, that Alexander sent Phocion a great gift out of Asia, of a hundred siluer talents. This money being brought to Athens, Phocion asked them that brought it, why Alexander gaue him such a great reward, aboue all the other Citizens of Athens. Because, sayd they, he onely esteemeth thee to be a good, and honest man. Phocion replied againe, then let him giue me leaue to be that I seeme, & am, whilest I liue. The Messengers would not so leaue him, but followed him home to his house, where they saw his great husbandrie, & thriftines: For they found his wife her selfe baking, and he him selfe drewe water before them, out of the well, to wash his feete. But then they were more earnestly in hand with him than before, and prayed him to take the kings present, and were offended with him, saying it was a shame for Alexanders friend to liue so miserably and beggerly as he did. Then Phocion seeing a poore old

B man goe by, in a threede bare gowne, asked them, whether they thought him worse then he? No, God forbid, aunswered they againe. Then replied he againe, he liues with lesse then I do, and yet is contented, and hath enough. To be short, said he, if I should take this summe of money and occupy it not, it is as much as I had it not: on thother side, if I occupy it, I shall make all the citie speake ill of the king and me both. So this great present was sent backe from Athens, whereby he shewed the Græcians, that he was richer that needed not such golde & siluer, then he that gaue it him. But when Alexander wrote againe vnto Phocion, that he did not reckon them his friendes, that would take nothing of him: Phocion notwithstanding would not take the money, but onely requested him for his sake, that he would set these men at liber-

C tie, which were kept prisoners in the citie of Sardis, for certeine accusations layde against them: Echecratides the Rhetorician, Athenodorus borne in the citie of Imbros, and two Corinthians, Demaratus and Spartus. Alexander presently set them at libertie, and sent Craterus into Macedon, commaunding him to giue Phocion the choyce of one of these foure cities of Asia, which he liked best: Cios, Gergitha, Mylassis, Elea: sending him worde, that he would be much more angrier with him now, if he did refuse this offer, then he was at the first. But Phocion would neuer accept any one of them: and Alexander shortly after dyed. Phocions house is seene yet at this day in the village of Melita, set forth with plates of copper, but otherwise very meane, and without curiositie. For his wiues he maryed, there is no mention made of the first, saue that Cephisodotus the image grauer was her brother. But for his second wife, she was no lesse famous at Athens, for her honestie, and good housewiuerie: then Pho-

And for proofe thereof, it is reported, that the Athenians beeing one daye assembled in the Theater, to see newe tragedies played, one of the players when he shoulde haue comen apon the scaffolde, to haue played his parte, asked the setter forth of the playes, the apparell of a Queene, and certeine Ladyes to wayte vpon her, because he was to playe the parte of the Queene. The setter forth of the playes denying him, the player went awaye in a rage, and left the people staring one at another, and woulde not come out vpon the stage. But Melanthius the setter forth of the playes, compelling him, brought him by force on the stage, and cryed out vnto him: Doost thou not see Phocions wife, that goeth vppe and downe the citie, with one mayde onely wayting on her? and wilt thou playe the foole, and marre the modestie of the women of Athens? The people hea-
